I nodded. It really was. Inside the barn there was a large gallery like a capsule, built to give optimal acoustics, with seating for 200 people. Art on the walls of all the rooms. There was a lot of money in this country now, I reflected again. I placed my bag against the lectern, took out my papers and books, shook hands with a few others I had to greet, among them the bookseller who had come to set up shop after the talk, a charming energetic elderly woman, before going downstairs for a walk in the darkness, to the river, where I smoked two cigarettes. Then I sat on the toilet for a quarter of an hour with my head in my hands. When I went back up there was quite a turnout. Forty, maybe fifty? That was good. And there was a brass band, too, who were going to play some Baroque music. They kept it up for half an hour, in the middle of the forest on a Friday night, and then it was my turn. I stood in the centre with everyone’s eyes on me, drank water, flicked through my papers, began to talk, hesitantly, swallowed words, my voice quivered, until I got into my stride and could talk freely. The audience was attentive, their interest streamed up towards me, I relaxed more and more, they laughed where they were supposed to, and I was filled with a feeling of happiness, for few things are more uplifting than talking to an audience who are on your wavelength, who don’t just wish you well but are also into what you are talking about. I could see it, they were vitalised, and when I sat down to sign books afterwards they all wanted to discuss what I had said, it touched something in their lives which they were enthusiastic to tell me about. It was only when I was walking over to the car with Geir that I came down to the ground again, to where I usually was, to the place where contempt flourished. I said nothing, just got in and stared at the road winding its way through the dark landscape.

'That was good,' Geir said. 'You've got that down to a fine art. I don't know what you were moaning about. You could travel round earning money from it!'

'It went well,' I said. 'But I give them what they want. I say what they want to hear. I pander to them the way I pander to everyone and everything.'

'There was a woman in front of me,' Geir said. 'She looked like a teacher. When you started to talk about child abuse she stiffened. Then you said the word they wanted to hear. Infantilisation. She nodded. This was a concept she could handle. It smoothed over everything. But if you hadn't said it, if you hadn't gone into detail, I'm not sure everyone would have spoken to you afterwards – I'm not. And what is paedophilia, if not infantile?'

He laughed. I closed my eyes.

'And the brass band in the middle of the forest. Baroque music. Who would have expected that? Ha ha ha! It was a great evening, Karl Ove, it was. Almost magical. The darkness and the stars and the sough of the forest.'

'Yes,' I said.

We drove around Kristiansand, over Varodd Bridge, past the animal park, past Nørholm, Lillesand and Grimstad. Chatted about this and that, arrived in Arendal, where we strolled around on the Tyholmen peninsula, I had a beer in a pub and for no particular reason felt completely out of kilter. Being here, surrounded by familiar buildings around the harbour, with the silhouette of Tromøya island on the other side of the water, in a world so crammed with memories, felt good but strange, not least because Geir, whom I connected with the Stockholm part of my life, was with me. At around twelve we drove to the island of Hisøya, he showed me some places which I looked at without being able to muster much interest, among them a quay where they had hung out in his youth, then we drove to the estate where he had grown up. He parked outside a garage, from the boot I took my bag and the bouquet I had been given and followed him to the house, which was a similar type to ours, or at least from the same period.

The hallway was full of flowers and wreaths.

‘There’s been a funeral, as you can see,’ he said. ‘If you like, you can put yours in one of these vases.’

I did as suggested. He showed me the room where I would sleep, which actually belonged to his brother, Odd Steinar, but had been tidied up for me. We had a couple of sandwiches in the kitchen, I wandered round the two living rooms looking. He had always said his parents actually belonged to the generation before our parents’ generation, and when I saw how they had arranged the house I understood what he meant. Tablecloths, runners, rugs, there was something 1950s, deepest Norway, about it, and the same applied to the furniture and the pictures on the walls. A 1970s house furnished like a 1950s home, that was how it looked. Lots of family photos on the walls, a large collection of ornaments on the windowsills.

I had been in a house once before when someone had just died. It was total chaos. Here everything was as good as unaffected.

I had a smoke on the lawn. Then we said goodnight, I went to bed, I didn’t want to close my eyes, I didn’t want to meet what I met there, but I had to, I summoned all the strength I had to think about a neutral topic and fell asleep after a few minutes.

The following morning I was woken at seven by activity in the rooms above me. Njaal, Geir’s son, and Christina had got up. I showered, dressed and went upstairs. A man of around seventy with a kind face and friendly eyes came out of the kitchen and greeted me. It was Geir’s father. We talked a bit about how I had grown up here and how beautiful it was. He radiated goodness, but not in that open, almost self-exposing, way that Linda’s father did. No, there was also solidity in this face. Not hardness exactly, but . . . character. That was what it was. Then Geir’s brother came in, Odd Steinar. We shook hands, he sat down on the sofa and began to talk about this and that; he too was friendly and kind, but with a shyness his father didn’t have and Geir definitely didn’t. The father set the table for breakfast in the living room, we sat down and I kept thinking that his wife and their mother had been buried yesterday, and that it was inappropriate for me to be here, yet I was being treated with kindness and interest, any friends of Geir's were their friends, their house was an open house.

Nonetheless, I took a deep breath as I left afterwards.

The flight home was in the afternoon, we had planned to drive around, go to Tromøya where I hadn't been for a long time, not to Tybakken, where I had grown up, and then straight to the airport, but Geir's father had insisted we should go back home first. It was Saturday, he would buy some shrimps at the harbour, I would have to experience them before I went to Malmö, we didn't have shrimps like that there, did we.

So we got into the car and motored over to Tromøya. Geir talked about the places we passed, told anecdotes associated with them. A whole life emerged from this area. Then he told me about his family. About who his mother had been, who his father and his brother were.

'It was interesting to meet them,' I said. 'Now I understand more about what you've been saying. Your father and brother, they have almost nothing in common with you. With your temperament. Your mind and your curiosity. Your restlessness. With your father and brother there was just kindness and friendliness. So where's the connection? Someone was missing, and it was so obvious. Your mother must have been like you. Am I right?'

'Yes, you are. I understood her. But that was also why I had to get away. Shame you never met her, by the way.'

'I've arrived when it's all over.'

'The most solid connection between the three generations is probably that Njaal, dad and I all have the same head from the back.'

I nodded. We drove up the hills before Tromøya Bridge. Mountains had been dynamited, roads built, industrial plants established like everywhere in the district.

Beneath us I saw the little island of Gjerstadholmen, further behind it Ubekilen Bay. To the right, Håvard's house. The bus stop, the forest below, where in the winter we had made ski slopes and in the summer walked down to the rocks to go swimming.

'In there,' I said.

'Where? To the left? Jesus, you didn't live there, did you?'

Old Søren's house, the wild cherry tree, and there, the estate. Nordåsen ringvei.

My God, it was so small.

'There it is. Straight ahead.'

'Where? The red house?'

'Yes. It was brown when we lived there.'

He parked the car.

How small everything was. And so ugly.

'Not a lot to see,' I said. 'Come on, let's go on. Up the hill here.'

A woman in a white Puffa jacket was walking down pushing a buggy. Otherwise there wasn't a sign of life anywhere.

Olsen's house.

The mountain.

We had called it the mountain, but it was only a little hill. Siv's house behind it. Sverre and the others' house.

Not a soul. Yes, there was. A huddle of children.

'You've gone quiet,' Geir said. 'Are you overwhelmed?'

'Overwhelmed? No, more like underwhelmed. This is so small. There isn't anything here. I've never experienced that before. There's nothing at all. And at one time it was my everything.'

'Ye-es, Karl Ove,' he said with a smile. 'Straight on?'

'Let's drive round the island, shall we? Tromøya Church? That's wonderful. Thirteenth century. There are some fantastic headstones from the seventeenth century, with skulls and hourglasses and snakes. I used an inscription from one of them in the first decent short story I wrote. As an epigraph.'

All the places I carried inside me, which I had visualised so many, many times in my life, passed outside the windows, completely aura-less, totally neutral – the way they were, in fact. A few crags, a small bay, a decrepit floating pier, a narrow shoreline, some old houses behind, flatland that fell away to the water. That was all.

We got out of the car and went to the cemetery. Wandered around, looked across towards the sea, but even that, even the sight of the pine trees growing down to the pebble beach, smaller and smaller the closer they got to the raw wind, aroused nothing in me.

‘Come on, let’s go,’ I said. Saw the fields where I had worked in the summer, the road leading to the water, where we could go swimming as early as 17 May. Sandum Bay. My teacher’s house, what was her name? Helga Torgersen? Must be getting on for sixty now? Færvik, the petrol station, the house on the other side, where the girls in the class had got so excited at the party the night before I left, the supermarket, which I could remember them building.

There was nothing. But lives were still being lived in these houses, and they were still everything for the people inside. People were born, people died, they made love and argued, ate and shat, drank and partied, read and slept. Watched TV, dreamed, ate an apple gazing across rooftops, autumn winds shaking the tall slim pine trees.

Small and ugly, but all there was.

An hour later I was sitting at the living-room table, alone, eating shrimps at top speed, served by Geir’s father, who wasn’t having any himself but wanted me to have a Sørland experience before I left. Then I shook hands, thanked them for having me, got into the car beside Geir again and was driven to the airport. We took the route via Birkeland because I wanted to see what my other childhood home, the one in Tveit, was like now.

Geir pulled up outside the house. He laughed.

‘Did you live there?’ In the middle of the forest? It’s completely isolated! There isn’t a soul here! So deserted . . . Pure Twin Peaks, if you ask me. Or Pernille and Mr Nelson, if you can remember the TV programme? It frightened the life out of me when I was a child.’

He continued to laugh as I pointed out places. And I had to laugh too because I saw them with his eyes. All these derelict old houses, these wrecks of cars on the drives, lorries parked outside, the distances between houses and the evident poverty. I tried to explain to him how nice our house had been, how good living here had been, that everything was here, but . . .

‘Come on!’ he said. ‘Living here must have been penal servitude.’

I didn’t answer, I was piqued, I felt the need to put up a defence. But I couldn’t be bothered. It was the same here, the inner experience, which made everything glow with meaning, it had no counterpart on the outside.

We shook hands in the car park, he got back into his car and I walked towards the departures hall. The flight was to Oslo, where I would change and fly to Billund in Denmark, where I would change again for Kastrup, Copenhagen. I didn't get home until ten in the evening. Linda hugged me when I arrived, a long, passionate hug, we sat down in the living room, she had made something to eat, I told her about the trip, she said the last day had been better, but she had realised we would have to do something to break the vicious circle we were in, I agreed, it couldn't go on, it couldn't, we had to find a way out and make a new path. At half past eleven I went into the bedroom and switched on my computer, opened a new document and began to write.

> In the window before me I can vaguely see the image of my face. Apart from the eyes, which are shining, and the part directly beneath, which dimly reflects light, the whole of the left side lies in shade. Two deep furrows run down the forehead, one deep furrow runs down each cheek, all filled as it were with darkness, and when the eyes are staring and serious, and the mouth turned down at the corners it is impossible not to think of this face as sombre.
> What is it that has etched itself into you?

The next day I continued. The idea was to get as close as possible to my life, so I wrote about Linda and John sleeping in the adjacent room, Vanja and Heidi, who were at the nursery, the view from the window and the music I was listening to. The next day I went to the allotment cabin, I wrote more there, some ultra-modernistic-style passages about faces and the patterns that exist in all big systems, sand heaps, clouds, economies, traffic, occasionally went into the garden to smoke and watch the birds flying hither and thither in the sky, it was February and there was no one around in the enormous allotment compound, just row upon row of small well-kept doll's houses in small gardens, so perfect they looked like living rooms. In the evening a huge flock of crows flew over, there must have been several hundred, a dark cloud of flapping wings drifting past and flying on. Night fell, and apart from what was lit up by the light streaming out of the open door at the other end of the garden, everything around me was dark. So still was I, where I sat, that a hedgehog shuffled by half a metre from my feet.

'Well, hello there,' I said and waited until it had reached the hedge before getting up and going in. The next day I began to write about the spring dad moved out from mum and me, and even though I hated every sentence I decided to persist, I had to come to terms with it, to tell the story I had tried for so long to tell. Back at home I continued with some notes I made when I was eighteen and for some reason had not disposed of, 'bags of beer in the ditch' caught my eye, a reference to one New Year's Eve when I was a teenager, I could use that as long as I wasn't too bothered and shelved any idea of aiming for the sublime. The weeks passed, I wrote, walked the children to the nursery or collected them, spent the afternoons with them in one of the many parks, cooked dinner, read to them and put them to bed, worked on reader reports and other odd jobs in the evenings. Every Sunday I cycled to Limhamnsfältet and played football for two hours, that was my only leisure activity, everything else was either work or children. Limhamnsfältet was an enormous grassy area outside the town, by the sea. Since the end of the 1960s a motley collection of men have gathered there every Sunday at a quarter past ten. The youngest are sixteen or seventeen while the oldest, Kai, is closer to eighty – he is on the wing and the ball has to be played to his feet, but if he gets it, there is still enough football left in him to whip in a centre, and now and then he even scores a goal. But the majority of the players are between thirty and forty, come from all walks of life and all they really have in common is the joy of playing football. The last Sunday in February Linda and the children came along, Vanja and Heidi cheered me on for a bit, then they went to the play area by the beach while I carried on playing. There had been a ground frost, the usually soft layer of grass was rock hard, and when after half an hour I was sent flying by a tackle and landed smack on my shoulder I realised at once that something was wrong. I stayed down, the others gathered round, I was nauseous with the pain, hobbled slowly, shoulder hunched, to behind the goal, the others knew that this wasn't just a little knock and the game was called off, it was half past eleven anyway.

Fredrik, a fifty-something writer and classic poacher who still bangs in goals in Swedish non-league football, drove me to hospital while Martin, a two-metre-plus giant of a Dane I knew through the nursery undertook to inform Linda and the children about what had happened. A & E was full, I took a number from the machine and sat down to wait, my shoulder burned and there was a stab of pain every time I moved it, but it was bearable for the half-hour it would take before it was my turn. I explained the situation to the nurse in reception, who came out to give me a quick examination, grabbed my arm and moved it slowly to the side. I screamed from the top of my lungs. AAAAAAgggghhh! Everyone stared at me. A man approaching forty wearing an Argentina national shirt and football boots, his long hair tied with an elastic band in a knot like a pineapple on top of his head, howling with pain.

‘You’d better come with me,’ the nurse said. ‘So we can have you examined properly.’

I went into a room nearby, she asked me to wait, a few minutes later another nurse came, she made the same movement with my arm, I screamed again.

‘Sorry,’ I said. ‘But I can’t help it.’

‘No problem,’ she said, gently removing my tracksuit top. ‘We’ll have to take your shirt off as well,’ she said. ‘Do you think that’ll be OK?’

She pulled at the sleeve, I screamed, she paused, tried again. Took a step back. Looked at me. I felt like an overgrown child.

‘We’ll have to cut it off.’

Now it was my turn to look at her. Cut up my Argentina shirt?

She came back with some scissors and cut up the sleeves, then asked me to sit on a bed once the shirt was off and stuck a needle in my lower arm just above the wrist. She was going to give me a bit of morphine, she said. After it was done, although I noticed nothing, she pushed me in a wheelchair into another room, perhaps fifty metres deeper into the labyrinthine building, where I was left alone to wait for an X-ray, not without some dread because I thought my shoulder must have been dislocated and, if so, I knew putting it back would be painful. But it was a fracture, the doctor confirmed. It would take between eight and twelve weeks to heal. They gave me some painkillers, a prescription for more, tied a bandage in a taut figure of eight over and under the shoulders, hung my tracksuit top on me and sent me home.

When I opened the door to the flat Vanja and Heidi came towards me at a run. They were excited, daddy had been to hospital, it was an adventure. I told them and Linda, who followed with John on her arm, that I had broken my collarbone and had a sling, it was nothing major, but I couldn’t lift or carry or use my arm for the next two months.

‘Are you serious?’ Linda asked. ‘Two months?’

‘Three at worst,’ I said.

‘You must never play football again, that’s for definite,’ Linda said.

‘Oh?’ I said. ‘So that’s your decision, is it?’

‘It’s me who has to put up with the consequences,’ she said. ‘How am I going to take care of the children on my own for two months, if I might ask?’

‘It’ll be fine,’ I said. ‘Relax. I’ve broken my collarbone after all. It hurts, and it’s not as if I did it on purpose.’

I went into the living room to sit down on the sofa. I had to make every movement slowly and plan it in advance. Every little deviation sent a pain through me. Agh, Ohh, Oooh, I said, slowly lowering myself. Vanja and Heidi watched with saucer eyes.

I smiled at them while trying to put the big cushion behind my back. They came up close. Heidi ran her hand across my chest as if to examine it.

‘Can we have a look at the bandage?’ Vanja asked.

‘Afterwards,’ I said. ‘It hurts a little to take clothes off and put them back on, you see.’

‘Food’s up!’ Linda shouted from the kitchen.

John was sitting in his baby chair banging his knife and fork on the table. Vanja and Heidi stared at me and my slow, laborious movements as I sat down.

‘What a day!’ Linda said. ‘Martin didn’t know a thing, only that you’d been taken to A & E. He brought us home, luckily, but when I was opening the door the key broke. Oh my God. I visualised us having to stay with them tonight. But then I double-checked my bag, and there it was, Berit’s key. What a stroke of luck! I hadn’t hung it up. And then you come home with a broken collarbone . . .’

She looked at me.

‘I’m so tired,’ she said.

‘I’m sorry,’ I said. ‘It’ll probably only be the first few days that I can’t do anything. And then one arm will be perfectly OK.’

After eating I lay down on the sofa with a cushion behind my back watching an Italian football match on TV. In the four years we’d had children I had only done something like this once. At the time I was so ill I couldn’t move, I lay on the sofa for a whole day, saw ten minutes of the first Jason Bourne film, slept for a bit, saw ten minutes, slept for a bit, threw up intermittently, and even though my whole body ached and basically it was absolutely unbearable, I still enjoyed every second. Lying on the sofa and watching a film in the middle of the day! Not one single obligation! No clothes to be washed, no floor to be scrubbed, no washing-up to be done, no children to look after.

Now I had that same feeling. I was not in a position to do anything. However much my shoulder burned and stung and ached, the pleasure at being able to lie in total peace was greater.

Vanja and Heidi circled round me, coming close every so often and gently stroking my shoulder, then they went out of the room to play, and came back. For them this was probably unprecedented, I mused, me being completely passive and still. It was as though they had discovered a new side to me.

When the match was over I went for a bath. We didn't have a holder for the showerhead, we had to hold it in one hand, and that option was out of the question now, so all I could do was run the bath and climb into the tub with difficulty. Vanja and Heidi watched me.

'Do you need any help with washing, daddy?' Vanja asked. 'Can we wash you?'

'Yes, that would be nice,' I said. 'Can you see the cloths there? Take one each, and then dip it in the water and rub some soap into it.'

Vanja followed the instructions precisely, Heidi copied her. And they stood there, leaning over the edge of the bath and washing me with their cloths. Heidi laughed, Vanja was serious and business-like. They washed my arms, neck and chest. Heidi was bored after a few seconds and ran into the living room while Vanja stayed for a while longer.

'Is that good?' she asked at length.

I smiled. That was what I usually asked.

'Yes, it's great,' I said. 'I don't know what I'd do without you!'

She brightened up, and then she ran into the living room as well.

I wallowed in the water until it turned cold. First football on TV, then a long bath. What a Sunday!

Vanja came in a couple of times to see. I supposed she was waiting for the bandage to be put on. She spoke Swedish of course, still with Stockholm intonation patterns, but when I had been with her for a morning or an afternoon, or she felt close to me for some other reason, words from my dialect appeared more frequently in her conversation. Very often she would say mæ instead of the Swedish mig, me. 'Lyft upp mæ!' Lift me up, she would say, for example. I laughed every time.

‘Can you go and get mummy?’ I said.

She nodded and ran off. I got out of the bath gingerly, and had dried myself by the time she came back.

‘Could you put the bandage on?’ I asked.

‘No problem,’ she said.

I explained how it was supposed to be, and said she had to pull it hard, otherwise it wasn’t doing its job.

‘Harder!’

‘Doesn’t it hurt?’

‘A bit, but the tauter it is the less it hurts when I move.’

‘OK,’ she said. ‘If you say so.’

And then she pulled from behind.

‘Aaaaagh!’ I said.

‘Was that too hard?’

‘No, that was good,’ I said. I turned towards her.

‘I’m sorry I was so grumpy,’ she said. ‘But I had such a terrible vision of the future, me doing everything on my own for months on end.’

‘It won’t be like that though,’ I said. ‘I’ll be able to take them to school and pick them up as usual within a few days, I’m sure.’

‘I know it hurts, and it’s not your fault. But I’m just so tired.’

‘I know. It’ll be fine. Things’ll sort themselves out.’

On Friday Linda was so tired that I went with John to pick the girls up from the nursery. Going there was easy, I pushed John in the buggy with my right hand while walking behind as carefully as I could. The way back was more problematic. I pulled John after me with my right hand, clutching the injured left hand to my side and somehow shunting Vanja and Heidi in the double buggy with my whole body. Occasional pains shot through me and I had no defence except to emit little screams. It must have been a bizarre sight, and people did stare at us as we trundled along. It was also a strange experience for me during those weeks. Not being able to lift or carry and finding it difficult to sit down and get up gave me a sense of helplessness that went beyond physical restrictions. Suddenly I had no authority, no strength, and the feeling of control I had taken for granted until now became manifest. I sat still, I was passive, and it was as though I had lost control of my surroundings. So, had I always felt I controlled them and had power over them? Yes, I must have done. I didn’t need to make any use of the power and the control, it was enough to know that it existed, it permeated everything I did and everything I thought. Now it was gone, and I saw it for the first time. Even stranger was the fact that the same applied to writing. Also with it I had a sense of power and control, which disappeared with the broken collarbone. Suddenly I was under the text, suddenly it had power over me, and it was only with the greatest effort of will that I managed to write the five pages a day I had set myself as a goal. But I managed, I managed that too. I hated every syllable, every word, every sentence, but not liking what I was doing didn't mean I shouldn't do it. One year and it would be over, and then I would be able to write about something else. The pages mounted, the story advanced and then one day I came to another of the places where I had made a note in the book I had kept for the last twenty years, about a party dad had held for friends and colleagues the summer I turned sixteen, a gathering which in the late-autumn darkness merged into one with my own enormous pleasure and dad crying, it was so emotional, such an impossible evening, everything converged there, and now at last I was going to write about it. Once it was done, the rest would be about dad's death. This was a heavy door to open, it was hard being inside, but I approached it in the new way: five pages every day, regardless. Then I got up, switched off the computer, took the rubbish with me, disposed of it in the basement and went to collect the children. The horror lodged in my chest dissipated when they came running towards me across the playground. They competed with each other, seeing who could shout loudest and give me the biggest hug. If John was with us he sat smiling and shouting, for him his two sisters were the tops. They scattered their lives around him, he sat lapping it all up, and copied whatever he could, and even Heidi, who could still become so jealous of him that she would scratch or knock or thump him if we didn't keep an eagle eye open, didn't hold any fears for him, he never viewed her with fear. Did he forget? Or was there so much goodness there the rest was lost in it?

One day in March the telephone rang while I was working, the number was unfamiliar, but as it didn't come from Norway, but was Swedish, I took it anyway. It was a colleague of my mother's, they were at a seminar in Gothenburg, mum had fainted in a shop and been taken to hospital, where she was now in intensive care. I rang, she'd had a heart attack, was being operated on now and was out of danger. Late that night she rang me herself. I could hear she was weak and perhaps a touch confused. She said the pain had been so great she would rather have died than gone on living. She hadn't fainted, she had just fallen over. And not in a shop but the street. While she was lying there, she said now, convinced that this was the end, the thought had gone through her head that she'd had a fantastic life. When she said that I froze.

There was something so good about it.

In addition, she said it had been particularly her childhood that had flashed through her mind as she lay there about to die, as a kind of sudden insight: she'd had an absolutely brilliant childhood, she had been free and happy, it had been fantastic. In the ensuing days what she had said kept returning to me. In a way I was shocked. I could never have thought that. If I keeled over now, and had a few seconds, perhaps minutes, to think before it was all over I would think the opposite. That I hadn't accomplished anything, I hadn't seen anything, I hadn't experienced anything. I want to live. But why don't I live then? Why, when I'm on board a plane or in a car imagining it's going to crash or have a collision, why do I think that's not so bad? That it doesn't matter? That I might just as well die as live? For this is what I think more often than not. Indifference is one of the seven deadly sins, actually the greatest of them all, because it is the only one that sins against life.

Later that spring, when I was nearing the end of the story about dad's death, the terrible days spent at the house in Kristiansand, mum came to visit me. She had been at another seminar in Gothenburg and came over to see us afterwards. Two months had passed since she fell over in the same town. If she had fallen over at home it is unlikely she would have survived, she lived alone, and if, contrary to expectation, she had got help it was a forty-minute drive to the nearest hospital. In Gothenburg she had been attended to at once, and in no time at all she was on the operating table. Now it transpired the heart attack hadn't come out of the blue. She'd had pains, terrible intermittent pains, but she thought it was stress, pushed it to the back of her mind, thinking she would go and see the doctor when she got home, and then she fell over.

One morning she was knitting while I sat writing and Linda was out with John after having taken the girls to the nursery. After a while I went in to see how she was and she started talking unbidden about dad. She said she had always wondered why she stayed with him, why she didn’t take us and leave him, was it because she hadn’t dared? Some weeks earlier she had talked to a friend about it, she told me, and suddenly she had heard herself say she loved him. Then she glanced at me.

‘I did love him, Karl Ove. I loved him a lot.’

She had never said that before. She hadn’t even been close to it. Indeed, I couldn’t recall her ever using a word like love before.

It was a shock.

What is going on? I thought. What is going on? For something around me was changing. Or was it changing inside me, so that now I could see something I hadn’t seen before? Or had I set something in motion? Because I talked to her and Yngve a lot about the time with dad. Suddenly it was close to me again.

That morning she went on to tell me about the first time they had met. She had been working at a hotel in Kristiansand during the summer when she was sixteen, and one day at a terrace restaurant in a large park, in the shade of a tree, her friend had introduced her to her boyfriend and his pal.

‘I didn’t quite catch his name, and for a long time I thought it was Knudsen,’ she said. ‘And at first I liked the other one better, you know. But then I fell for your father . . . It’s such a good memory. The sun, the grass in the park, the trees, the shade, all the people there . . . We were so young, you know . . . Yes, it was an adventure. The beginning of an adventure. That was how it felt.’

KARL OVE KNAUSGAARD

"My Struggle is a truly original and enduring and great work of literature."
—RIVKA GALCHEN, THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW

Praise for My Struggle

"Perhaps the most significant literary enterprise of our time."

—RACHEL CUSK, The Guardian

"Why would you read a six-volume, 3,600-page Norwegian novel about a man writing a six-volume, 3,600-page Norwegian novel? The short answer is that it is breathtakingly good, and so you cannot stop yourself, and would not want to . . . Arrestingly beautiful."

—LELAND DE LA DURANTAYE, The New York Times Book Review

"My Struggle is a revolutionary novel that is highly approachable, even thrilling to read. The book feels like a masterpiece—one of those genuinely surprising works that alters the tradition it inherited."

—MEGHAN O'ROURKE, Bookforum

"I fell into the first two books of My Struggle as if I were falling into a malarial fever. I did little else for four days except devour them, leaving email unanswered, dogs unwalked, dishes piling up in the sink. The steady headlamps of [Knausgaard's] prose stun and mesmerize you, as if you were a lumbering mammal caught in the middle of a highway."

—DWIGHT GARNER, The New York Times

"[Knausgaard] has managed to transform self-abasement into a kind of grandeur, humiliation into a purified form of pride, and—above all—fiction into the most painful mode of truth-telling."

—TED GIOIA, The Daily Beast

"[In My Struggle], the stubborn remnants of belief imbue the heaps of mundane detail with a peculiar and troubled profundity."

—SAM SACKS, The Wall Street Journal

"Reading Knausgaard is like the first time one looks at Google Earth: from space you can zoom in on the continent, then the country, then the town where you grew up; you can click on 'street view' and walk up to the house where you were born. It's all there, just keep clicking, you might even see, one imagines, your younger self climbing a tree or disappearing around the corner on a BMX." —BEN LERNER, London Review of Books

"What others might cast off, [Knausgaard] picks up, wipes clean, narrates in real time, and seals in amber."
—TED WEESNER, The Boston Globe

"Halfway through, this series is starting to look like an early-twenty-first-century masterpiece." —Kirkus Reviews (starred review)

"Karl Ove Knausgaard's epic autobiography is narcissistic, indiscreet, and a remarkable work of art."
—CHRISTIAN LORENTZEN, Slate

"Beautifully rendered and, at times, painfully observant, [Knausgaard's] book does a superlative job of finding that 'inner core of human existence.'" —BRIAN P. KELLY, The Wall Street Journal

"The book kept me up till two almost every morning for a week . . . [Knausgaard is] real and singleminded in his storytelling. I don't read Norwegian, but it's hard to believe that the translator, Don Bartlett, could have made such vital, humane prose—over such a long stretch—unless he was hewing close to a work of genius." —LORIN STEIN, The Paris Review

"A living hero who landed on greatness by abandoning every typical literary feint, an emperor whose nakedness surpasses royal finery." —JONATHAN LETHEM, The Guardian

"Free-form, fear-filled, densely descriptive . . . Karl Ove Knausgaard [is] Norway's biggest literary star since Ibsen."

—LEO ROBSON, New Statesman

"Steadily absorbing, lit up by pages of startling insight and harrowing honesty, My Struggle introduces into world literature a singular character and immerses us in his fascinating Underground Man consciousness." —PHILLIP LOPATE

"The second volume surpasses the first in original ideas about society and love and childhood and friendship. Karl Ove—with his shyness, his passion, his honesty—can take on any subject and make it his own." —EDMUND WHITE

"A literary event the likes of which we probably will not see again in our lifetimes." —JASON DIAMOND, Flavorwire

"Knausgaard's thinking is magnificently unbridled."

—Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (Germany)

"Compelling, rewarding, maddening and often breathtaking."

—STUART EVERS, The Observer (London)

"[Knausgaard's] preternatural facility for description, the dreamy thickness of his prose, speaks not only to the sheer pleasure his fiction affords, but to the philosophical stakes of that pleasure." —MARK SUSSMAN, Los Angeles Review of Books

"A masterpiece of staggering originality, the literary event of the century . . . Life here and now, examined at a fever pitch, your daily recollections recounted in exhausting but exhilarating detail." —ARLICE DAVENPORT, The Wichita Eagle

"The alchemy by which Knausgaard transforms the personal and mundane into the universal and perennially significant . . .

springs from his intensity of relation to his subject-matter, his rightful conviction that his own life-journey, however idiosyncratic, belongs to others also. In Don Bartlett's lively vernacular translation, My Struggle will, I am convinced, outlive the furore, welcoming or hostile, of its first appearance."

—PAUL BINDING, The Spectator

"I can't stop, I want to stop, I can't stop, just one more page, then I will cook dinner, just one more page . . ."

—Västerbottens-Kuriren (Sweden)

"My Struggle, the extraordinary six-volume, lightly fictionalized memoir by Karl Ove Knausgaard, is a literary project that flies in the face of every known commercial principle, and yet the author is a rock star: 450,000 copies sold in Norway alone—one copy for every nine adults of the population."

—EMMA BROCKES, The Guardian

"[My Struggle] achieves an aching intimacy, one that transcends the personal and makes Knausgaard's pursuit of grand artistic ideals, his daily joys and misgivings, strangely familiar."

—MATTHEW LOVE, Time Out New York

"My Struggle teems with . . . 'sensory bridges' that interweave description and reflection in an unaffected yet poetic fashion. Out of the ashes of his childhood and the cooling cinders of his youth, Knausgaard has fashioned a memoir that burns with the heat of life."

—CHRISTOPHER BYRD, Barnes & Noble Review

"[My Struggle] has the effect . . . of spurring the reader to think autobiographically: trying to recover the past while realising that its essence is out of reach. And that is ultimately what makes these memoirs so compelling."

—ANDREW NEATHER, London Evening Standard

"[Knausgaard is] amplifying his life, playing it as loud as he can, trying to get inside it—and letting its vibrations get inside of him." —JOSHUA ROTHMAN, Page-Turner (blog), The New Yorker

"Via his visceral, immersive art, Knausgaard makes the heart visible as he conjures 'the intensity that only exists in childhood.' With skin-tingling immediacy, Boyhood Island transmits 'the excitement that exists in the unseen and the hidden.' Join Karl Ove on 1970s Tromøya and you might never want to leave." —BOYD TONKIN, The Independent

"I read [Books One and Two] hungrily and find myself already missing Knausgaard just a few days after turning A Man in Love's last page, searching the Web for inexpensive crash courses in Norwegian, mostly just wishing volume three were available in English now." —JONATHAN CALLAHAN, The Millions

"Karl Ove Knausgaard is a writer strong enough to survive the hype . . . Brutally frank about the frustrations of marriage, work and parenthood, it's often horrifying and deeply funny."
—ANTHONY CUMMINS, The Observer (London)

"Knausgaard's workmanlike prose remains far more lucid and charming than most books you'll read this year . . . If Knausgaard keeps this up, the series' final three volumes will be fit for devouring." —SCOTT ESPOSITO, SFGate

"Powerfully alive . . . Knausgaard is intense and utterly honest, unafraid to voice universal anxieties . . . He wants us to inhabit the ordinariness of life, which is sometimes visionary, sometimes banal, and sometimes momentous, but all of it perforce ordinary because it happens in the course of a life, and happens, in different forms, to everyone . . . There is something ceaselessly compelling about Knausgaard's book."
—JAMES WOOD, The New Yorker (selected as a Book of the Year)

“My Struggle is unexpectedly entrancing—the combination of detail and intimacy creates an illusion of being inside somebody else’s brain.” —ROB BRUNNER, The Q (blog), GQ

“What’s notable is [Knausgaard’s] ability, rare these days, to be fully present in and mindful of his own existence. Every detail is put down without apparent vanity or decoration, as if the writing and the living are happening simultaneously. There shouldn’t be anything remarkable about any of it except for the fact that it immerses you totally. You live his life with him.”

—ZADIE SMITH, The New York Review of Books

My Struggle

One mild, overcast day in August 1969, a bus came winding its way along a narrow road at the far end of an island in southern Norway, between gardens and rocks, meadows and woods, up and down dale, around sharp bends, sometimes with trees on both sides, as if through a tunnel, sometimes with the sea straight ahead. It belonged to the Arendal Steamship Company and was, like all its buses, painted in two-tone light-and-dark-brown livery. It drove over a bridge, along a bay, signaled right, and drew to a halt. The door opened and out stepped a little family. The father, a tall, slim man in a white shirt and light polyester trousers, was carrying two suitcases. The mother, wearing a beige coat and with a light-blue kerchief covering her long hair, was clutching a stroller in one hand and holding the hand of a small boy in the other. The oily, gray exhaust fumes from the bus hung in the air for a moment as it receded into the distance.

"It's quite a way to walk," the father said.

"Can you manage, Yngve?" the mother said, looking down at the boy, who nodded.

"Course I can."

He was four and a half years old and had fair, almost white hair and tanned skin after a long summer in the sun. His brother, barely eight months old, lay in the stroller staring up at the sky, oblivious to where they were or where they were going.

Slowly they began to walk uphill. It was a gravel road, covered with puddles of varying sizes after a downpour. There were fields on both sides. At the end of a flat stretch, perhaps some five hundred meters in length, there was a forest that sloped down to pebbled beaches; the trees weren't tall, as though they had been flattened by the wind blowing off the sea.

On the right, there was a newly built house. Otherwise there were no buildings to be seen. The large springs on the stroller creaked. Soon the baby closed his eyes, lulled to sleep by the wonderful rocking motion. The father, who had short, dark hair and a thick, black beard, put down one suitcase to wipe the sweat from his brow.

"My God, it's humid," he said.

"Yes," she replied. "But it might be cooler nearer the sea."

"Let's hope so," he said, grabbing the suitcase again.

This altogether ordinary family, with young parents, as indeed almost all parents were in those days, and two children, as indeed almost every family had in those days, had moved from Oslo, where they had lived in Thereses gate close to Bislett Stadium for five years, to the island of Tromøya, where a new house was being built for them on an estate. While they were waiting for the house to be completed, they would rent an old property in Hove Holiday Center. In Oslo he had studied English and Norwegian during the day and worked as a nightwatchman, while she attended Ullevål Nursing College. Even though he hadn't finished the course, he had applied – and had been accepted – for a middle-school teaching job at Roligheden Skole while she was to work at Kokkeplassen Psychiatric Clinic. They had met in Kristiansand when they were seventeen, she had become pregnant when they were nineteen, and they had married when they were twenty, on the Vestland smallholding where she had grown up. No one from his family went to the wedding, and even though he is smiling in all the photos there is an aura of loneliness around him, you can see he doesn't quite belong among all her brothers and sisters, uncles and aunts, male and female cousins.

Now they're twenty-four and their real lives lie before them. Jobs of their own, a house of their own, children of their own. There are the two of them, and the future they are moving into is theirs, too.

Or is it?

They were born in the same year, 1944, and were part of the first post-war generation, which in many ways represented something new, not least by dint of their being the first people in this country to live in a society that was, to a major degree, planned. The 1950s were the time for the growth of systems – the school system, the health system, the social system, the transport system – and public departments and services, too, in a large-scale centralization that in the course of a surprisingly short period would transform the way lives were led. Her father, born at the beginning of the twentieth century, was raised on the farm where she grew up, in Sørbøvåg in the district of Ytre Sogn, and had no education. Her grandfather came from one of the outlying islands off the coast, as his father, and his before him, probably had. Her mother came from a farm in Jølster, a hundred kilometers away, she hadn't had any education either, and her family there could be traced back to the sixteenth century. As regards his family, it was higher up the social scale, inasmuch as both his father and his uncles on his father's side had received higher education. But they, too, lived in the same place as their parents, Kristiansand, that is. His mother, who was uneducated, came from Åsgårdstrand, her father was a ship's pilot, and there were also police officers in her family. When she met her husband she moved with him to his hometown. That was the custom. The change that took place in the 1950s and 1960s was a revolution, only without the usual violence and irrationality of revolutions. Not only did children of fishermen and smallholders, factory workers and shop assistants start at university and train to become teachers and psychologists, historians and social workers, but many of them settled in places far from the areas where their families lived. That they did all this as a matter of course says something about the strength of the zeitgeist. Zeitgeist comes from the outside, but works on the inside. It affects everyone, but not everyone is affected in the same way. For the young 1960s mother, it would have been an absurd thought to marry a man from one of the neighboring farms and spend the rest of her life there. She wanted to get out! She wanted to have her own life. The same was true for her brothers and sisters, and that was how it was in families countrywide. But why did they want to do that? Where did this strong desire come from? Indeed, where did these new ideas come from? In her family there was no tradition of anything of this kind: the only person who had left the area was her uncle Magnus, and he had gone to America because of the poverty in Norway, and the life he had there was for many years hardly distinguishable from the life he'd had in Vestland. For the young 1960s father, things were different: in his family you were expected to have an education, though perhaps not to marry a Vestland farmer's daughter and settle on an estate near a small Sørland town.

But there they were, walking on this hot, overcast day in August 1969, on their way to their new home, him lugging two heavy suitcases stuffed with 1960s clothes, her pushing a 1960s stroller with a baby dressed in 1960s baby togs, white with lace trim everywhere, and between them, tripping from side to side, happy and curious, excited and expectant, was their elder son, Yngve. Across the flat stretch they went, through the thin strip of forest, to the gate that was open and into the large holiday center. To the right there was a garage owned by someone called Vraaldsen; to the left large red chalets around an open gravel area and, beyond, pine forest.

A kilometer to the east stood Tromøya Church, built in 1150 of stone, but some parts were older and it was probably one of the oldest churches in the country. It stood on a small mound and had been used from time immemorial as a landmark by passing ships and charted on all nautical maps. On Mærdø, a little island in the archipelago off the coast, there was an old skippergård, a residence testifying to the locality's golden age, the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, when trade with the rest of the world, particularly in timber, flourished. On school trips to the Aust-Agder Museum classes were shown old Dutch and Chinese artifacts going back to that time and even further. On Tromøya there were rare and exotic plants that had come with ships discharging their ballast water, and you learned at school that it was on Tromøya that potatoes were first grown in Norway. In Snorri's Norwegian-king sagas the island was mentioned several times; under the ground in the meadows and fields lay arrowheads from the Stone Age and you could find fossils among the round stones on the long, pebbled beaches.

However, as the incoming nuclear family slowly walked through the open countryside with all their bags and baggage it wasn't the tenth or the thirteenth, the seventeenth or the nineteenth centuries that had left their marks on the surroundings. It was the Second World War. This region had been used by German forces; they had built the barracks and many of the houses. In the forest there were low-lying brick bunkers, completely intact, and on top of the slopes above the beaches several artillery emplacements. There was even an old German airfield in the vicinity.

The house where they were going to live during the coming year was a solitary construction in the middle of the forest. It was red with white window frames. From the sea, which could not be seen, though only a few hundred meters down the slope, came a regular crashing of waves. There was a smell of forest and salt water.

The father put down his suitcases, took out the key, and unlocked the door. Inside, there was a hall, a kitchen, a living room with a wood burner, a combined bath and washroom, and on the first floor, three bedrooms. The walls weren't insulated; the kitchen was equipped with the minimum. No telephone, no dishwasher, no washing machine, no TV.

"Well, here we are," the father said, carrying their suitcases into the bedroom while Yngve ran from window to window peering out and the mother stood the stroller with the sleeping baby on the doorstep.

Of course, I don't remember any of this time. It is absolutely impossible to identify with the infant my parents photographed, indeed so impossible that it seems wrong to use the word "me" to describe what is lying on the changing table, for example, with unusually red skin, arms and legs spread, and a face distorted into a scream, the cause of which no one can remember, or on a sheepskin rug on the floor, wearing white pajamas, still red-faced, with large, dark eyes squinting slightly. Is this creature the same person as the one sitting here in Malmö writing? And will the forty-year-old creature who is sitting in Malmö writing this one overcast September day in a room filled with the drone of the traffic outside and the autumn wind howling through the old-fashioned ventilation system be the same as the gray, hunched geriatric who in forty years from now might be sitting dribbling and trembling in an old people's home somewhere in the Swedish woods? Not to mention the corpse that at some point will be laid out on a bench in a morgue? Still known as Karl Ove. And isn't it actually unbelievable that one simple name encompasses all of this? The fetus in the belly, the infant on the changing table, the forty-year-old in front of the computer, the old man in the chair, the corpse on the bench? Wouldn't it be more natural to operate with several names since their identities and self-perceptions are so very different? Such that the fetus might be called Jens Ove, for example, and the infant Nils Ove, and the five- to ten-year-old Per Ove, the ten- to twelve-year-old Geir Ove, the twelve- to seventeen-year-old Kurt Ove, the seventeen- to twenty-three-year-old John Ove, the twenty-three- to thirty-two-year-old Tor Ove, the thirty-two- to forty-six-year-old Karl Ove – and so on and so forth? Then the first name would represent the distinctiveness of the age range, the middle name would represent continuity, and the last, family affiliation.

No, I don't remember any of this, I don't even know which house we lived in, even though Dad pointed it out to me once. All I know about that time I have been told by my parents or have gleaned from photos. That winter the snow was several meters high, the way it can be in Sørland, and the road to the house was like a narrow ravine. There Yngve is, pulling a cart with me in the back, there he is, with his short skis on, smiling at the photographer. Inside the house, he is pointing at me and laughing, or I am standing on my own holding on to the cot. I called him "Aua"; that was my first word. He was also the only person who understood what I said, according to what I have been told, and he translated it for Mom and Dad. I also know that Yngve went around ringing doorbells and asking if there were any children living there. Grandma always used to tell that story. "Are there any children living here?" she would say in a child's voice and laugh. And I know I fell down the stairs, and suffered some kind of shock, I stopped breathing, went blue in the face, and had convulsions, Mom ran to the nearest house with a telephone, clutching me to her breast. She thought it was epilepsy, but it wasn't, it was nothing. And I know that Dad thrived in the classroom, he was a good teacher, and that during one of these years he went on a trip into the mountains with his class. There are some photos from then, he looks young and happy in all of them, surrounded by teenagers dressed in the casual way that was characteristic of the early 1970s. Woolen sweaters, flared trousers, rubber boots. Their hair was big, not big and piled-up as in the sixties, but big and soft, and it hung over their soft teenage faces. Mom once said perhaps he had never been as happy as he was during those years. And then there are photos of Grandma on Dad's side, Yngve, and me – two taken in front of a frozen lake, both Yngve and I were clad in large woolen jackets, knitted by Grandma, mine mustard yellow and brown – and two taken on the veranda of their house in Kristiansand, in one she has her cheek against mine, it is autumn, the sky is blue, the sun low, we are gazing across the town, I suppose I must have been two or three years old.

One might imagine that these photos represent some kind of memory, that they are reminiscences, except that the "me" reminiscences usually rely on is not there, and the question is then of course what meaning they actually have. I have seen countless photos from the same period of friends' and girlfriends' families, and they are virtually indistinguishable. The same colors, the same clothes, the same rooms, the same activities. But I don't attach any significance to these photos, in a certain sense they are meaningless, and this aspect becomes even more marked when I see photos of previous generations, it is just a collection of people, dressed in exotic clothes, doing something that to me is unfathomable. It is the era that we take photos of, not the people in it, they can't be captured. Not even the people in my immediate circle can. Who was the woman posing in front of the stove in the flat in Thereses gate, wearing a light-blue dress, one knee resting against the other, calves apart, in this typical 1960s posture? The one with the bob? The blue eyes and the gentle smile that was so gentle it barely even registered as a smile? The one holding the handle of the shiny coffeepot with the red lid? Yes, that was my mother, my very own mom, but who was she? What was she thinking? How did she see her life, the one she had lived so far and the one awaiting her? Only she knows, and the photo tells you nothing. An unknown woman in an unknown room, that is all. And the man who, ten years later, is sitting on a mountainside drinking coffee from the same red thermos top, as he forgot to pack any cups before leaving, who was he? The one with the well-groomed black beard and the thick black hair? The one with the sensitive lips and the amused eyes? Yes, of course, that was my father, my very own dad. But who he was to himself at this moment, or at any other, nobody knows. And so it is with all these photos, even the ones of me. They are voids; the only meaning that can be derived from them is that which time has added. Nonetheless, these photos are a part of me and my most intimate history, as others' photos are part of theirs. Meaningful, meaningless, meaningful, meaningless, this is the wave that washes through our lives and creates its inherent tension. I draw on everything I remember from the first six years of my life, and all that exists in terms of photos and objects from that period, they constitute an important part of my identity, filling the otherwise empty and memoryless periphery of this "me" with meaning and continuity. From all these bits and pieces I have built myself a Karl Ove, an Yngve, a mom and dad, a house in Hove and a house in Tybakken, a grandmother and grandfather on my dad's side, and a grandmother and grandfather on my mom's side, a neighborhood and a multitude of kids.

This ghetto-like state of incompleteness is what I call my childhood.

Memory is not a reliable quantity in life. And it isn't for the simple reason that memory doesn't prioritize the truth. It is never the demand for truth that determines whether memory recalls an action accurately or not. It is self-interest that does. Memory is pragmatic, it is sly and artful, but not in any hostile or malicious way; on the contrary, it does everything it can to keep its host satisfied. Something pushes a memory into the great void of oblivion, something distorts it beyond recognition, something misunderstands it totally, something, and this something is as good as nothing, recalls it with sharpness, clarity, and accuracy. That which is remembered accurately is never given to you to determine.

In my case, any memory of my first six years is virtually nonexistent. I remember hardly anything. I have no idea who took care of me, what I did, who I played with, it has all completely gone, the years 1969–1974 are a great big hole in my life. The little I can muster is of scant value: I am standing on a wooden bridge in a sparse, high-altitude forest, beneath me rushes a torrent, the water is green and white, I am jumping up and down, the bridge is swaying, and I am laughing. Beside me is Geir Prestbakmo, a boy from the neighborhood, he is jumping up and down and laughing, too. I am sitting on the rear seat of a car, we are waiting at the light, Dad turns and says we are in Mjøndalen. We are going to an IK Start game, I've been told, but I can't remember a thing about the trip there, the soccer match, or the journey home. I am walking up the hill outside the house pushing a big plastic truck; it is green and yellow and gives me an absolutely fantastic feeling of riches and wealth and happiness.

That is all. That is my first six years.

But these are canonized memories, already established at the age of seven or eight, the magic of childhood: my very first memories! However, there are other kinds of memories. Those that are not fixed and cannot be evoked by will, but that at odd moments let go, as it were, and rise into my consciousness of their own accord and float around there for a while like transparent jellyfish, roused by a certain smell, a certain taste, a certain sound . . . these are always accompanied by an immediate, intense feeling of happiness. Then there are the memories associated with the body, when you do something you used to do: shield your eyes from the sun with your arm, catch a ball, run across a meadow with a kite in your hand and your children hard on your heels. There are memories that accompany emotions: sudden anger, sudden tears, sudden fear, and you are where you were, as if hurled back inside yourself, propelled through the ages at breakneck speed. And then there are the memories associated with a landscape, for landscape in childhood is not like the landscape that follows later; they are charged in very different ways. In that landscape every rock, every tree had a meaning, and because everything was seen for the first time and because it was seen so many times, it was anchored in the depths of your consciousness, not as something vague or approximate, the way the landscape outside a house appears to adults if they close their eyes and it has to be summoned forth, but as something with immense precision and detail. In my mind, I have only to open the door and go outside for the images to come streaming toward me. The gravel in the driveway, almost bluish in color in the summer. Oh, that alone, the driveways of childhood! And the 1970s cars parked in them! VW Beetles, Citroën DS 21s, Ford Tauneses, Granadas, Consuls, Opel Asconas, Kadetts, Ladas, Volvo Amazons . . . Well, okay, across the gravel, along the brown fence, over the shallow ditch between our road, Nordåsen Ringvei, and Elgstien, which traversed the whole area passing two estates apart from our own. The slope of rich, dark earth from the edge of the road down into the forest! The way small, thin, green stems had almost immediately begun to shoot up from it: fragile and seemingly alone in the new black expanse, and then the rampant multiplication of them the year after until the slope was completely covered with thick, luxuriant shrubbery. Small trees, grass, foxgloves, dandelions, ferns, and bushes eradicating what earlier had been such a clear division between road and forest. Up the hill, along the sidewalk with its narrow brick curb, and, oh, the water that trickled and flowed and streamed down there when it rained! The path off to the right, a shortcut to the new supermarket B-Max. The bog beside it, no bigger than two spaces in a parking lot, the birches thirstily hanging over it. Olsen's house at the top of the little hill and the road that cut in behind. Grevlingveien, it was called. In the first house on the left lived John and his sister Trude, it stood on a plot that was little more than a pile of rocks. I was always frightened when I had to walk past that house. Partly because John might be lying in ambush there, ready to throw stones or snowballs at any passing child, partly because they had an Alsatian . . . That Alsatian . . . Oh, now I remember it. What a dreadful beast that dog was. It was tied up on the veranda or in the drive, barked at all the passersby, slunk back and forth as far as its tether would allow, whimpering and howling. It was lean with yellow, sickly eyes. Once it came tearing down the hill toward me, with Trude hard on its heels and the leash dragging behind it. I had heard that you shouldn't take flight when an animal is after you, for example, a bear in the forest; the secret was to stand perfectly still and act cool, so I did, stopping the instant I saw it bounding toward me. It didn't help a scrap. It couldn't care less whether I was motionless or not, just opened its jaws and sank them into my forearm, next to my wrist. Trude caught up with it a second later, grabbed the leash, and yanked so hard it was wrenched backward. I hurried off, crying. Everything about that animal frightened me. The barking, the yellow eyes, the saliva that ran from its jowls, the round, pointed teeth, of which I now had an imprint in my arm. At home I didn't breathe a word about what had happened, for fear of being told off, because an incident like this offered so many opportunities for reproach: I shouldn't have been where I was at the time, or I shouldn't have whined or, a dog, was that any reason to be frightened? From that day on, terror had me in its grip whenever I saw the brute. And it was fatal because not only had I heard that you should stand still when a dangerous animal attacks, I had also heard that a dog can smell fear. I don't know who told me that, but it was one of the beliefs that people passed on and that everyone knew: dogs can smell if you are frightened. Then they can become frightened or aggressive themselves and go on the attack. If you're not afraid they are nice to you.

How that occupied my mind. How could they smell fear? What did fear smell like? And was it possible to pretend you weren't frightened, so that the dogs would smell that and wouldn't notice the real feelings that lay beneath?

Kanestrøm, who lived two houses up from us, also had a dog. It was a golden retriever called Alex and as meek as a lamb. It ambled after Herr Kanestrøm wherever he went, but also after every one of the four children if it could. Kind eyes and, somehow, gentle, friendly movements. But I was even afraid of this one. Because when you came into view on the hill and were about to go in to ring the doorbell it barked. Not tentative, friendly, or inquisitive barking, but vigorous, deep-throated, and resonant. Then I would stop in my tracks.

"Hi, Alex," I might say if no one was around. "I'm not frightened, you know. It's not that."

If someone was there I would feel forced to carry on, act as if nothing were happening, plow my way through the barking, as it were, and when the dog was in front of me, its jaws agape, I would bend down and pat it a couple of times on its side with my heart pounding and every muscle trembling with fear.

"Quiet, Alex!" Dag Lothar would say, as he came running up the narrow gravel path from the cellar door or rushing from the front door.

"You're frightening Karl Ove with your barking, you stupid dog."

"I'm not frightened," I would counter. Dag Lothar would just look at me with a kind of stiff smile, which meant "Don't give me that."

Then off we went.

Where did we go?

Into the forest.

Down to Ubekilen, to a bay.

Down to the pontoons.

Up to Tromøya Bridge.

Down to Gamle Tybakken.

Over to the plastic boat factory.

Up into the hills.

Along to Lake Tjenna.

Up to B-Max.

Down to the Fina gas station.

Unless, that is, we just ran about in the road where we lived, or hung around outside one of the houses there, or sat on the curb, or in the big cherry tree no one owned.

That was everything. That was the world.

But what a world!

An estate has no roots in the past, nor any branches into the skies of the future, as satellite towns once had. Estates arrived as a pragmatic answer to a practical question, where are all the people moving into the district going to live, ah yes, in the forest over there, we'll clear some plots and put them up for sale. The only house there belonged to a family called Beck; the father was Danish and had built the house himself in the middle of the forest. They didn't have a car, or a washing machine, or a television. There was no garden, only a drive made from pounded soil in among the trees. Piles of wood under tarpaulins and, in the winter, an upturned boat. The two sisters, Inga Lill and Lisa, went to the local middle school and looked after Yngve and me for the first years we lived there. Their brother was called John, he was two years older than me, wore strange, homemade clothes, wasn't in the slightest bit interested in what we were interested in, and devoted his attention to other matters, which he never told us about. He built his own boat when he was twelve. Not like us, not like the rafts we tried to cobble together from dreams and a lust for adventure, but a proper, real rowboat. You would have thought he would be bullied, but he wasn't, in a way, the distance was too great. He wasn't one of us and he didn't want to be. His father, the cycling Dane, who perhaps had nurtured an urge to live alone in the middle of the forest ever since his time in Denmark, must have been mortified when the plans for the estate were drawn up and approved and the first construction machinery rolled into the forest just beyond his house. The families who moved in were from all over the country and all of them had children. In the house across the road lived Gustavsen, he was a fireman, she was a housewife, they came from Honningsvåg, their children were called Rolf and Leif Tore. In the house opposite us lived Prestbakmo, he was a schoolteacher, she was a nurse, they came from Troms, their children's names were Gro and Geir. On the same side was Kanestrøm, he worked at the post office, she was a housewife, they came from Kristiansund, their children were called Steinar, Ingrid Anne, Dag Lothar, and Unni. On the other side was Karlsen, he was a sailor, she was a shop assistant, they were from Sørland, their children were Kent

Arne and Anne Lene. Above them was Christensen, he was a sailor, I don't know what she did, their children were called Marianne and Eva. On the other side lived Jacobsen, he was a typographer, she was a housewife, both were from Bergen, their children were Geir, Trond, and Wenche. Above them, Lindland, from Sørland, their children were Geir Håkon and Morten. Around there, I began to lose track, at least as far as the parents' names and jobs were concerned. The children there were: Bente, Tone Elisabeth, Tone, Liv Berit, Steinar, Kåre, Rune, Jan Atle, Oddlaug, and Halvor. Most were my age, the oldest seven years above me, the youngest four years below. Five of them would later be in my class.

We moved there in the summer of 1970, when most of the houses on the site were still being built. The shrill warning siren, which sounded before an explosion, was a common feature of my childhood, and that very distinctive feeling of doom you can experience when the shock waves from the explosion ripple through the ground causing the floor of the house to tremble was common, too. It was natural to think of connections above the ground – roads, electric cables, forests, and seas – but more disturbing to think of them being beneath the ground as well. What we stood on, shouldn't that be absolutely immovable and impenetrable? At the same time all the openings in the ground had a very special fascination for me and the other children I grew up with. It was not uncommon for us to flock around one of the many holes being dug in our area, whether for sewage pipes or electric cables, or for the foundations of a cellar, and to stare down into the depths, yellow where there was sand, black, brown, or reddish brown where there was soil, gray where there was clay, and sooner or later the bottom was always covered with an opaque layer of grayish-yellow water, its surface sometimes broken by the top of a huge rock or two. Above the hole towered a shiny yellow or orange excavator, not unlike a bird, with its bucket like a beak at the extreme end of a long neck, and beside it a stationary truck, with headlights like eyes, the radiator grille like a mouth, and the tarpaulin-covered rear, a back. In the case of large construction projects there would also be bulldozers or dump trucks, usually yellow, with enormous wheels and treads that were a hand's width. If we were lucky we would find piles of detonation cord in or near the hole, which we pinched because the cord had a high swap and utility value. Besides this, there were normally drums nearby, the height of a man, wooden bobbin-like constructions from which cables were unfurled, and piles of smooth, reddish-brown plastic pipes measuring the approximate diameter of our forearms. There were further piles of cement pipes and precast cement wells, so rough and wonderful, a bit taller than us, perfect for climbing on; long, immovable mats of old, cut-up car tires, which they used during the blasting; mounds of wooden telephone poles, green from the preservative they had been impregnated with; boxes of dynamite; sheds where the workmen changed their clothes and ate. If they were there we kept a respectful distance and watched what they were doing. If they weren't, we clambered down the holes, onto the dump-truck wheels, balanced on the piles of pipes, rattled the shed doors and peered through the windows, jumped down into the cement wells, tried to roll the drums away, filled our pockets with cable clippings, plastic handles, and detonation cord. In our world no one had greater status than these workmen; no work seemed more meaningful than theirs. The technical details were of no interest to me, they meant as little as the make of the construction machines. What fascinated me most, apart from the changes in the landscape the workmen wrought, were the manifestations of their private lives that came with them. When one of them produced a comb from his orange overalls or baggy, almost shapeless, blue trousers and combed his hair, safety helmet under his arm, amid all the droning and pounding of the machines, for example, or the mysterious, indeed almost incomprehensible, moment when the workmen emerged from the shed in the afternoon wearing absolutely normal clothes and got into their cars and drove off like absolutely normal men.

There were other workmen we watched closely, indefatigably. If anyone from Televerket appeared in the vicinity, the news spread like wildfire among the groups of children. There was the car, there was the workman, a telecom engineer, and there were his fantastic climbing shoes! With those on his feet and a tool belt around his waist he clicked on a harness that went around both him and the pole, and then, with a series of slow and deliberate, but for us completely mystifying, movements he began to mount the pole. How was this possible? Straight-backed, with no visible sign of effort, no visible use of force, he glided up to the top. Wide-eyed, we stared at him while he worked aloft. Not one of us would leave because soon he would be climbing down again, in the same easy, effortless, incomprehensible way. Imagine having shoes like those, with the curved metal hook that wrapped itself around the post, what couldn't you do?

And then there were the men working on the drainage. The ones who parked their cars by one of the many manhole covers in the road, which were either set in the pavement or placed on top of a brick circle somewhere close by, and who, after putting on rubber boots reaching up to their waists!, levered up the round, enormously heavy, metal lid with a crowbar, shifted it to the side and climbed down. We watched as first their calves disappeared from view, into the hole under the road, next their thighs, then their stomachs, then their chests and finally their heads . . . And what was there beneath if not a tunnel? Where water flowed? Where you could walk? Oh, this was just great. Perhaps one of them was over there now, beside Kent Arne's bike, which was lying strewn across the sidewalk, about twenty meters away, except that he was under the ground! Or were these manholes kinds of stations, like wells, where you could inspect the pipes and draw water when there was a fire? No one knew; we were always told to keep well away when they climbed down. No one dared ask them. No one was strong enough to lift off the heavy, coin-shaped metal covers on his own. So it remained a mystery, like so much else in those years.

Even before we started school we were free to roam wherever we wanted, with two exceptions. One was the main road, which ran from Tromøya Bridge to the Fina station. The other was the lake. Never go down to the lake on your own! the adults instilled in us. But, actually, why not? Did they think we would fall into the water? No, that wasn't it, someone said when we were sitting on the rocks beyond the little meadow where we sometimes played soccer and looking down over the edge of the steep cliff into the water, perhaps thirty meters beneath us. It was the water sprite. It abducted children.

"Who says so?"

"Mom and Dad."

"Is it here?"

"Yes."

We gazed down at the grayish surface of the water in Ubekilen. It didn't seem improbable that there was something lurking beneath.

"Only here?" someone asked. "If so, we can go somewhere else. Lake Tjenna?"

"Or Little Hawaii?"

"There are other sprites there. They're dangerous. It's true. Mom and Dad told me. They kidnap children and drown them."

"Could it come up here?"

"Dunno. No, I don't reckon so. No. It's too far. It's only dangerous by the water's edge."

I was scared of the sprite after that, but not as scared as I was of foxes, the thought of them terrified me, and if I saw a bush stir or I heard something rustle past, then I was off, running to safety, to an opening in the forest, that is, or up to the estate, where the foxes never ventured. In fact, I was so frightened of foxes that Yngve only had to say, I am a fox, and I am coming to get you – he was in the upper bunk and I was in the lower one – and I froze in terror. No, you aren't, I would say. Yes, I am, he would say, hanging over the edge and hitting out at me. Despite this and even though he did frighten me now and then, I missed having him there when we each had our own room and suddenly I had to sleep alone. It was all right, after all, it was inside the house, the new room, but it wasn't as good as having him there, in the bunk above me. Then I could just ask him things, such as, "Yngve, are you frightened now?" and he might answer "No-oo, why should I be? There's nothing to be frightened of here." And I would know he was right and feel reassured.

The fear of foxes must have worn off when I was about seven. The vacuum it left, however, was soon filled by other fears. One morning I was walking past the TV, it was on although no one was watching, there was a matinee film, and there, oh no, oh no, there was a man with no head walking up a staircase! Aaagh! I ran into my room, but that didn't help, I was just as alone and defenseless there, so off I went in search of Mom, if she was at home, or Yngve. The image of the headless man pursued me, and not just in the night, which the other fearful visions I had did. No, the headless man could appear in broad daylight, and if I was alone it made no difference that the sun was shining or the birds were singing, my heart pounded and fear spread like fire to every tiniest nerve ending in my body. It upset me more that this darkness could also appear in the daylight. In fact, if there was one thing I was really frightened of, it was this darkness in the light. And the worst of it was that there was nothing I could do about it. Shouting for someone didn't help, standing in the middle of an open area didn't help, and running away didn't help. Then there was the front cover of a crime magazine that Dad once showed me, a comic he'd had when he was a child, showing a skeleton carrying a man over its back, and the skeleton had turned its head and was looking straight at me through its hollow eye sockets. I was afraid of that skeleton as well; it, too, appeared in all sorts of expected and unexpected contexts. I was also afraid of the hot water in the bathroom. Because whenever you turned on the hot tap a shrill scream traveled through the pipes, and immediately afterward, if you didn't turn it off at once, they started banging. These noises, which were one unholy racket, scared the wits out of me. There was a way of avoiding them, you had to turn on the cold water first, and then somehow fiddle with the hot tap until the temperature was right. That was what Mom, Dad, and Yngve did. I had tried, but the shrill scream that penetrated the walls and was followed by a crescendo of banging, as though something down below was working itself up into a fury, started the second I touched the hot-water tap, and I turned it off as fast as I could, and ran out, my body shaking violently with fear. So, in the morning, I either washed in cold water or took Yngve's dirty but lukewarm water.

Dogs, foxes, and plumbing were concrete, physical threats, I knew where I was with them, either they were there or they weren't. But the headless man and the grinning skeleton, they belonged to the kingdom of death, and they couldn't be handled in the same way, they could be anywhere and everywhere, in a cupboard if you opened it in the dark, on the stairs as you were going up or down, in the forest, indeed even under the bed or in the bathroom. I associated my own reflection in windows with the creatures from beyond, perhaps because they only appeared when it was dark outside, but it was a terrible thought, seeing your own reflection in the black windowpane and thinking, that image is not me, but a ghoul staring in at me.

The year we started school none of us believed in sprites, pixies, or trolls anymore, we laughed at those who did, but the notion of ghosts and apparitions persisted, perhaps because we didn't dare ignore it; dead people did exist, and we knew that, all of us. Other notions we had, coming from the same tangled realm, that of mythology, were of a happier, more innocent nature, such as that of the pot of gold at the end of a rainbow. Even that autumn when we started the first class we still believed the myth enough for us to go in search of the rainbow. It must have been one Saturday in September, the rain had been pouring down all morning, we were playing on the road below the house where Geir Håkon lived, or, to be more precise, in the ditch that was flooded with water. At this exact spot the road passed a blasted rock face, and water was dripping and trickling down from its moss, grass, and soil-covered top. We were wearing rubber boots and thick, brightly colored oilskin trousers and jackets, with the hoods tied around our chins, thus displacing all sound; your own breathing and the movements of your head, where your ears met the inside of the hood, were always loud and clear while everything else was muffled and seemed to be happening a long distance away. Between the trees on the other side of the road and at the top of the mountain above us the mist was thick. The orange rooftops on both sides of the road downhill wore a dull sheen in the gray light. Above the forest at the bottom of the slope the sky hung like a swollen belly, penetrated by the pouring rain, which continued to dance on our hoods and now oversensitive ears.

We made a dam, but the sand we shoveled up kept collapsing, and when we caught sight of Jacobsen's car coming up the hill, we didn't hesitate, we dropped our spades and ran down to their house, where the car was parking at that moment. A bluish ribbon of smoke floated in the air behind the exhaust pipe. The father got out on one side, as thin as a stick, with a cigarette stub in the corner of his mouth, he bent down, pulled the lever underneath the seat, and pushed it forward, so that his two sons, Big Geir and Trond, could get out, while the mother, small and chubby, red-haired and pale, let out their daughter, Wenche, on her side.

"Hi," we said.

"Hi," said Geir and Trond.

"Where have you been?"

"To town."

"Hello, boys," their father said.

"Hi," we said.

"Do you want to hear what 777 is in German?" he said.

"Yes."

"Siebenhundertsiebenundsiebzig!" he said in his hoarse voice. "Ha ha ha!"

We laughed with him. His laughter morphed into coughing.

"Right then," he said when the fit was over. He inserted the key in the car-door lock and twisted. His lips kept twitching, and one eye, too.

"Where are you off to?" Trond asked.

"Dunno," I said.

"Can I join you?"

"Of course you can."

Trond was the same age as Geir and me, but much smaller. His eyes were as round as saucers, his lower lip was thick and red, his nose small. Above this doll-like face grew blond, curly hair. His brother looked completely different: his eyes were narrow and crafty, his smile was often mocking, his hair straight and sandy brown, the bridge of his nose freckly. But he was small, too.

"Put your rain jacket on," his mother said.

"I'll just get my jacket," Trond said, and ran indoors. We stood waiting without saying a word, our arms down by our sides like two penguins. It had stopped raining. A light wind shook the tops of the tall, slim pine trees scattered round the gardens below. A thin stream ran down the hill, alongside the road, taking with it little heaps of pine needles, the tiny, yellow v's or bones strewn everywhere.

In the sky behind us the cloud cover had opened. The scenery around us, with all the rooftops, lawns, clumps of trees, ridges, and slopes, was now suffused with a kind of glow. From the hill above our house, which we called the mountain, a rainbow had risen.

"Look," I said. "A rainbow!"

"Wow!" Geir said.

Up at the house, Trond had closed the door. He started running toward us.

"There's a rainbow over the mountain!" Geir said.

"Shall we go and look for the pot of gold?"

"Yes, let's!" Trond said.

We ran down the slope. On Karlsen's lawn Anne Lene, Kent Arne's little sister, stood watching us. She was wearing a safety harness; it was attached to a strap so that she wouldn't run off. Her mother's red car was parked in the drive. A light shone from a wall lamp. Outside Gustavsen's house Trond slowed down.

"I'm sure Leif Tore would like to join us," he said.

"I don't think he's at home," I said.

"We can ask anyway," Trond said, walking between the two brick gateposts, which were not hung with any gates and therefore subject to my father's ridicule, and into the drive. A hollow metal globe, from which protruded an arrow, all carried by a naked man with a bent back, was cemented to the top of the posts. It was a sundial, and my father made fun of that, too, for what was the point of two sundials?

"Leif Tore," Trond shouted. "Are you coming out?"

He looked at us. Then we all shouted.

"Leif Tore! Are you coming out?"

A few seconds passed. Then the kitchen window was opened, and his mother stuck out her head.

"He's coming now. He's just putting on his rain gear. You don't need to shout anymore."

I had a precise picture of this pot. Large and black, with three legs, full of glittering objects. Gold, silver, diamonds, rubies, sapphires. There was one at each end of the rainbow. We had looked for it before, without any luck. It was important to be quick, rainbows never lasted long.

Leif Tore, who for a while now had been a shadow behind the yellow glass of the door, opened it at last. A wave of warm air streamed out from behind him. It was always so hot in their house. I caught a slight odor of something that was both acrid and sweet. That was how it smelled in their house. All the houses apart from ours had their own smell, this was theirs.

"What are we going to do?" he said, slamming the door behind him and making the glass rattle.

"There's a rainbow on the mountain. We're going to search for the pot of gold," Trond said.

"Come on then!" Leif Tore said, breaking into a run. We followed, down the last part of the hill and onto the road going up toward the mountain. Yngve's bike still wasn't back in its place, I could see, but both Mom's green Beetle and Dad's red Kadett were there. Mom had been doing the vacuuming when I left, it was awful, I hated the sound, it was like a wall pressing itself against me. And they opened the windows while they were cleaning, the air indoors was freezing cold, and it was as if the cold were transmitted to Mom as well, she had no space left in her for anything else when she stood leaning over the wash tub, wringing the cloth, or when she pushed the broom or the Hoover across the floor, and since it was only in this surplus space that there was room for me, I also got cold on these Saturday mornings, in fact so cold that the chill penetrated my head and even made it difficult to lie on the bed reading comics, which normally I loved, so that in the end I had no choice but to get dressed and run outside and hope there was something happening there.

Both Mom and Dad did the cleaning in our house, which was not the norm; to my knowledge none of the other fathers did it, with the possible exception of Prestbakmo, but I had never seen him do it and actually doubted whether he would submit to that kind of work.

But on this day Dad had been to town to buy crabs at the harbor, after which he had sat in his office smoking cigarettes and perhaps marking essays, perhaps reading documents, perhaps fiddling around with his stamp collection, or perhaps reading The Phantom.

On the other side of our creosoted garden fence, where the path to B-Max started, water from a manhole cover had flooded the forest floor. Rolf, Leif Tore's brother, had said a few days ago that it was Dad's responsibility. "Responsibility," that was not a word he would normally use, so I guessed he had got it from his father. Dad was on the local council, they were the people who made the decisions on the island, and that was what Gustavsen, Leif Tore and Rolf's father, had meant. Dad had to report the flooding so they could send someone to do the repairs. As we walked up and my attention was again caught by the unnaturally large amount of water between the small, thin trees, with the odd bit of white toilet paper floating in it, I decided to tell him if the opportunity arose. Tell him he would have to report it at the Monday meeting.

There he was! In his blue waterproof jacket, with no hood, his old jeans, which he wore whenever he was going to work in the garden, and his green knee-high boots, he rounded the corner of the house. His upper body was twisted slightly to one side as he was carrying a ladder with both hands across the lawn, and then he dug it into the ground, straightened up, and pushed it into position against the house roof.

I turned back and sped up to catch the others.

"The rainbow's still there!" I shouted.

"We can see it, too!" Leif Tore cried.

I caught up with them at the start of the path, walked behind Trond's yellow jacket between the trees, which shed a shower of rain every time anyone lifted a branch, down to the brown house where Molden lived. He didn't have any young children, only a teenager with long hair, big glasses, brown clothes, and flared trousers. We didn't even know what his name was, we just called him Molden.

The best way up to the top of what we called a mountain went past their garden, and that was the path we were taking now, slowly, because it was steep and the long, yellow grass here was slippery. Now and then I grabbed a sapling to pull myself up. Just below the summit, the mountain was bare and protruded outward, impossible to walk up, at least when it was as wet as it was now, but at the edge there was a crevice between the rock face and a gently projecting crag where you could get a foothold and easily clamber up the last few meters to the summit.

"Where's it gone?" Trond said, the first man up.

"It was right there!" Geir said, pointing a few meters along the little plateau.

"Oh no," Leif Tore said. "It's down there. Look!"

Everyone turned and looked down. The rainbow was over the forest, a long way down. One end was above the trees below Beck's house, the other near the grassy incline down to the bay.

"Shall we go down then?" Trond said.

"What if the treasure's still here?" Leif Tore said, in the dialect we spoke. "We could at least have a peek."

"It isn't," I said. "It's only where the rainbow is."

"Who took it then? That's what I'd like to know," Leif Tore said.

"No one did," I said. "Are you stupid or what? No one brings it either, if that's what you think. It's the rainbow."

"You're the one who's stupid," Leif Tore said. "It can't just disappear all on its own."

"It seems it can," I said.

"No, it can't," Leif Tore said.

"Yes, it can," I said. "Take a look, then. See if you can find it!"

"I want to look, too," Trond said.

"Me, too," Geir said.

"Count me out," I said.

They turned and walked away, glancing from side to side. I wanted to go with them, I could feel myself drawn, but it wasn't possible now. Instead I looked at the view. It was the best vantage point anywhere. You could see the bridge almost rising from the treetops, you could see the sound, where there were always boats crossing, and you could see the big, white gasometers on the other side. You could see the island of Gjerstadholmen, you could see the new road, the low concrete bridge it crossed, you could see Ubekilen Bay from the landward side. And you could see the estate. All the red and orange roofs among the trees. The road. Our garden, Gustavsen's garden; the rest was hidden.

The sky above the estate was almost completely blue now. The clouds toward the town, white. While on the other side, behind Ubekilen, they were still heavy and gray.

I could see Dad down there. A tiny, tiny little figure, no bigger than an ant, on top of the ladder against the roof.

Could he see me up here? I wondered.

A gust of wind blew off the sea.

I turned to watch the others. Two yellow dots and one light green one moving to and fro between the trees. The rocky plateau was dark gray, much like the sky beyond, with yellow and, in some places, whitish grass in the cracks. A branch lay there, all its weight resting on the many needle-thin side branches in such a way that the thick main stem didn't touch the ground. It looked strange.

I had hardly ever been in the forest that lay ahead. The farthest I had gone on the path was to a large, uprooted tree, perhaps thirty meters inside. From there you could see down a slope where nothing grew but heather. With the tall, slim pine trees on both sides and the denser-growing spruces like a wall beneath, it resembled a large room.

Geir said he saw a fox there once. I didn't believe him, but foxes were no laughing matter, so for safety's sake we had taken with us a packed lunch and bottles of juice to the edge of the mountain, where the whole of the world as we knew it lay beneath us.

"Here it is!" Leif Tore shouted. "Wow! The pot of gold!"

"Wow!" Geir shouted.

"You can't fool me!" I shouted back.

"Yippeeeee!" Leif Tore cried. "We're rich!"

"I don't believe it!" Trond shouted.

Then it all went quiet.

Had they really found it?

Of course not. They were trying to trick me.

But the end of the rainbow had been on this precise spot.

What if Leif Tore was right and the treasure hadn't disappeared with the rainbow?

I took a few steps forward and tried to see through the juniper bushes they were standing behind.

"Ohhh, man! Look at this!" Leif Tore said.

I made up my mind in a flash and hurried over, dashing between the trees and past the bushes, then stopped.

They looked at me.

"Gotcha! Ha ha ha! We gotcha!"

"I knew all the time," I said. "I was just coming to get you. The rainbow will be gone if we don't hurry."

"Oh, yes," said Leif Tore. "We really fooled you. Admit it."

"Come on, Geir," I said. "Let's go and look for the pot of gold down there."

Feeling uncomfortable, Geir looked at Leif Tore and Trond. But he was my best friend and joined me. Trond and Leif Tore ambled along after us.

"I need a piss," Leif Tore said. "Shall we see who can piss the farthest? Over the edge? It'll be one great big long jet!"

Piss outdoors when Dad was down there and might be able to see?

Leif Tore was already out of his waterproof pants and fumbling with his fly. Geir and Trond had taken up positions on either side of him and were wriggling their hips and pulling down their trousers.

"I can't piss," I said. "I've just had one."

"You haven't," Geir said, turning toward me with both his hands around his willy. "We've been together all day."

"I had a piss while you were looking for the treasure," I said.

The next second they were enveloped in a cloud of steam as they pissed. I stepped forward to see who won. Surprisingly, it was Trond.

"Rolf pulled his foreskin back," Leif Tore said, closing his fly. "So he pissed much farther from the get-go."

"The rainbow's gone," Geir said, shaking his dick for a last time before tucking it back.

Everyone looked down over the edge.

"What shall we do now?" Trond said.

"No idea," said Leif Tore.

"Let's go to the boathouse, shall we?" I suggested.

"What can we do there?" said Leif Tore.

"Well, we can climb onto the roof," I said.

"Good idea!" Leif Tore said.

We zigzagged down the slope, fought our way through the dense spruce forest, and arrived five minutes later on the gravel road that ran around the bay. The grassy hill on the other side was where we usually went skiing in the winter. In the summer and autumn we seldom went there – what was there to do? The bay was shallow and muddy, no good for swimming, the jetty was falling to pieces, and the little island off the coast was covered with shit from the colony of gulls nesting there. When we wandered around there it was mostly because we were at loose ends, like this morning. High above us, between the sloping field and the edge of the forest, there was an old, white house in which an old, white-haired lady lived. We knew nothing about her. Not her name, nor what she did there. Sometimes we peered into the house, laid our hands against the window, and pressed our faces against the glass. Not for any particular reason, nor out of curiosity, more because we could. We saw a sitting room with old furniture or a kitchen with old utensils. Near the house, past the narrow gravel road, there was a red barn seemingly on the verge of collapse. And at the very bottom, by the stream running down from the forest, there was an old, unpainted boathouse with tarred felt on the roof. Along the bed of the stream grew ferns and some plants with, relative to their thin stems, enormous leaves; if you swept them aside with your hands, in that swimming stroke the way people do, to see past the unresisting foliage, the ground appeared naked, as though the plants were deceiving us, pretending they were lush and green while in reality, beneath the dense leaves, there was almost nothing but soil. Farther down, closer to the water, the earth or clay or whatever it was was a reddish color, reminiscent of rust. Occasionally a variety of things got caught there, a bit of a plastic bag or a condom, but not on days like today, when the water gushed out from the pipe under the road in an enormous torrent and only abated when it reached the little delta-like area where the water fanned out before it met the bay.

The boathouse was gray with age. In some places you could insert a hand between the planks, so we knew what the inside looked like, without any of us having been in there. After peering through these gaps for a while we directed our attention to the roof, which we were going to try to climb. In order to do so we would have to find something to stand on. Nothing in the immediate vicinity was of any use, so we snuck up to the barn and sniffed around there. First of all, we made sure there were no cars up behind the house, there was one there sometimes, the owner was a man, perhaps her son, he would occasionally stop us crossing the drive when we wanted to extend our ski run, which she never did. So we kept an eye open for him.

No car.

Some white cans strewn by the wall. I recognized them from my grandparents' farm; it was formic acid. A rusty oil drum. A door hanging off its hinges.

Over there, though! A pallet!

We lifted it. It had almost grown into the ground. Full of woodlice and small spiderlike insects crawling all over the place as we lifted. Then we carried it between us all the way across the field and down to the boathouse. Leaned it against the wall. Leif Tore, acknowledged to be the bravest among us, was the first to have a go. Standing on the pallet, he managed to get one elbow on the roof. With his other hand he took a firm grip on the edge of the roof, and then he launched one leg into the air. He got it over the edge, for an instant it rested on the roof, but as soon as his body followed, he lost his grip and plunged like a sack of potatoes, unable to break his fall with his hands. He hit the pallet with his ribs and slid down to the ground.

"Agh!" he screamed. "Oh, shit. Ooohh. Ow! Ow! Ow!"

He slowly got to his feet, studied his hands, and rubbed one buttock.

"Oooh, that hurt! Someone else can try now!"

He looked at me.

"My arms aren't strong enough," I said.

"I'll give it a shot," Geir said.

If Leif Tore was known for being brave, Geir was known for being wild. Not by nature, because had it been up to him he would have stayed at home drawing and pottering about to his heart's content all day long, but when he was challenged. Perhaps he was a bit gullible. That summer he and I had built a cart, with a great deal of help from his father, and when it was finished I got him to push me around, just by saying it would make him strong. Gullible but also foolhardy, sometimes all boundaries ceased to exist for him, then he was capable of anything.

Geir chose a different method from Leif Tore's. Standing on the pallet, he grabbed the protruding roof with both hands and tried to walk up the wall, with all of his weight invested in the fingers he was holding on with. That was, of course, stupid. Even if he had managed it, he would have been standing horizontal to the ground under the roof, in a much worse position than when he started.

His fingers slipped and he plunged butt first onto the pallet, after which he hit the back of his head.

He gave an involuntary grunt. When he stood up I could see that he had really hurt himself. He took a few determined paces to and fro, grunting. Nghn! Then he mounted the pallet again. This time he adopted Leif Tore's method. Once he had his leg over the edge, a series of electric charges seemed to shoot through him, his leg banged against the roofing felt, his body writhed, and hey presto, there he was, kneeling on the roof and looking down on us.

"Easy!" he said. "Come on! I can pull you up!"

"You cannot. You aren't strong enough!" Trond said.

"We can give it a try at any rate," Geir said.

"You'd better come down," Leif Tore said. "I have to go home soon anyway."

"Me, too," I said.

He didn't seem disappointed, though, up there. Determined would be a more accurate term.

"I'll jump down then," he said.

"Isn't it a bit high?" Leif Tore said.

"Not at all," Geir said. "Just have to put my mind to it."

He squatted down and stared at the ground while taking deep breaths as though intending to dive into water. For a second all the tension in his body was gone, he must have changed his mind, but then he braced himself and he jumped. Fell, rolled around, bounced up again like a spring, and started brushing his thigh to signal composure, almost before he was upright.

Had I been the only one of us to climb the roof, it would have been a great triumph. Leif Tore would never have given in. Even if he had spent all night climbing up and falling off he would have gone on trying to reduce the imbalance that had suddenly become apparent. Geir was different though. In fact, he could pull off the most amazing feats, like jumping five meters through the air into a snowdrift, something no one else would dare, and it meant nothing to him. It was of no real consequence. Geir was just Geir, whatever he got it into his head to do.

Without another word, we walked up the hill. In some places the water had carried parts of the road surface along with it, in others there were long sunken dips. We stopped for a while and pressed our heels into an especially soft patch, the wet gravel oozed over the edge of our boots, it was a good feeling. My hands were cold. When I squeezed them my fingers left white marks in the red flesh. But the warts, three on one thumb, two on the other, one on an index finger, three on the back of my hand, didn't change color, they were a dull reddish-brown color as always and covered with a layer of small dots you could scratch off. Then we went into the other part of the field, the bit that came to an end by a stone wall and the forest behind it; it was as though it was bordered by a long ridge, quite steep, perhaps ten meters high, clad with a line of spruce trees, broken occasionally by a knoll of bare rock. Walking here or in similar areas, I often happily indulged the notion that the countryside resembled the sea. And that fields were the surface of the sea with mountains and islands rising from them.

Oh, to sail in a boat through the forest! To swim among the trees! Now that would be something.

We sometimes used to drive to the far side of the island when the weather was good, park the car on the old shooting range, and walk down to the sea-smoothed rocks, our regular spot, not so far from Spornes beach, where of course I would have preferred to be, as there was sand and I could wade out to a depth that suited me. By the rocks the water was immediately very deep. There was, however, a little inlet, a kind of narrow cleft that filled up with water, which you could climb down into, where you could swim, but it was small and the sea bottom was uneven, covered with barnacles, seaweed, and shells. The waves beat against the rocks outside, causing the water to rise inside, sometimes up to your neck, and the Styrofoam floats on the life jacket I wore were lifted up to my ears. The sheer walls amplified the gurgling and slopping of the water, making them somehow sound hollow. Terrified, I would stand there, suddenly incapable of drawing breath in any other way than with great, shuddering gasps. It was just as creepy when the waves receded and the water level inside sank with a slurp. When the sea was calm, Dad would sometimes inflate the yellow-and-green raft, which I was allowed to lie on and float close to the shore, where, with my bare front stuck to the wet plastic and my back hot and dry from the burning sun, I would splash around, paddling with my hands in the water, which was so fresh and salty, watching the seaweed languidly sway to and fro along the rocks it was attached to, looking for fish or crabs or following a boat on the horizon. In the afternoon the Danish ferry came in, we could see it in the distance when we arrived, and it would be in the Galtesund strait when we left, white, enormous, towering above the low islands and reefs. Was it MS Venus? Or was it Christian IV? Kids all along the southern and western sides of the island, and presumably also the kids living on the other side of Galte Sound, on the, for us, foreign island of Hisøya, would go swimming when it came because its wake was immense and notorious. One afternoon, as I was paddling around on the raft, the sudden waves made me sit up and I toppled into the water. I sank like a stone. The water would have been about three meters deep there. I thrashed around with my arms and legs, shouted in panic, swallowed water, which only increased my fear, but it didn't last more than twenty seconds because Dad had seen everything. He dived in and dragged me to the shore. I regurgitated some water, I was very cold, and we went home. I hadn't been in any real danger and the incident had no lasting effect, except to leave me with the feeling I had as I walked up the hill to tell Geir what had happened: the world was something I walked on top of, it was impenetrable and hard, it was impossible to sink through it, no matter if it rose in steep mountains or fell in deep valleys. Of course I had known it was like that, but I had never felt it before, the sense that we were walking on a surface.

Despite this incident and the unease I could occasionally feel when I was paddling in the narrow inlet, I always looked forward to these trips. Sitting on a towel beside Yngve and scanning the light-blue, mirror-glass sea that only ended on the horizon, where big ships glided slowly past like hour hands, or looking at the two lighthouses on Torungen, the white a sharp contrast with the bright-blue sky: not much was better than that. Drinking pop that had been in the red-checked cooler bag, eating cookies, perhaps watching Dad as he walked to the edge of the rocks, tanned and muscular, and dived into the sea two meters below a second later. The way he shook his head and stroked back the hair from his eyes when he emerged, the rush of bubbles around him, a rare gleam of pleasure in his eyes as he swam to shore with those slow, ponderous lunges of his arms, his body bobbing up and down in the swell. Or walking to the two sinkholes nearby, one a man's depth with distinct spiral marks in the rock on the way down, filled with salty seawater, covered by green sea plants and at the bottom clusters of seaweed, the second less deep but no less beautiful for that. Or up to the shallow, extremely salty, hot pools that filled the hollows in the rock, refreshed only when there were storms, the surface thick with tiny, swirling insects and the bottom bedecked with yellow, sickly-looking algae.

On one such day Dad decided to teach me how to swim. He told me to follow him down to the water's edge. Perhaps half a meter below the surface, a small, slippery ridge overgrown with seaweed jutted into the sea, and that was where I was to stand. Dad swam out to a reef four or five meters from the shore. And turned to face me.

"Now you swim over here to me," he said.

"But it's deep!" I said. Because it was, the seabed between the two reefs was barely visible, it was probably three meters down.

"I'm here, Karl Ove. Don't you think I could rescue you if you sank? Come on, swim. It's not in the slightest bit dangerous! I know you can do it. Launch yourself and do the strokes. If you do that you can swim, you know! Then you can swim!"

I crouched down in the water.

The seabed was a greenish glimmer a long way down. Would I be able to float over that?

My heart only beat this hard when I was frightened.

"I can't," I shouted.

"Course you can!" Dad shouted back. "It's so easy! Just push off, do a couple of strokes, and you'll be here."

"I can't!" I said.

He studied me. Then he sighed and swam over.

"Okay," he said. "I'll swim beside you. I can hold a hand under your tummy. Then you can't sink!"

But I couldn't do it. Why didn't he understand?

I started to cry.

"I can't," I said.

The depth of the water was in my head and in my chest. The depth was in my arms and legs, in my fingers and toes. The depth filled all of me. Was I supposed to be able to think that away?

There weren't any more smiles to be seen now. With a stern expression he clambered onto the land, walked over to our things, and returned with my life jacket.

"Put this on then," he said, throwing it to me. "Now you can't sink even if you tried."

I put it on, even though I knew it didn't change anything.

He swam out again. Turned to face me.

"Try now!" he said. "Over here to me!"

I crouched down. The water washed over my trunks. I stretched my arms under the water.

"That's the way!" Dad said.

All I had to do was push off, do a few strokes, and it would all be over.

But I couldn't. I would never ever be able to swim across that deep water. Tears were rolling down my cheeks.

"Come on, boy!" Dad shouted. "We haven't got all day!"

"I CAN'T!" I shouted back. "CAN'T YOU HEAR?"

He stiffened and glared at me, his eyes furious.

"Are you being belligerent?" he said.

"No," I answered, unable to suppress a sob. My arms were shaking.

He swam over and took a firm grip of my arm.

"Come here," he said. He tried to tow me out. I twisted my body toward the shore.

"I don't want to!" I said.

He let go and took a deep breath.

"You don't say," he said. "We know that much."

Then he went to where we had left our clothes, lifted the towel with both hands, and rubbed his face. I took off the life jacket and followed him, stopping a few meters away. He raised one arm and dried underneath, then the other. Bent forward and dried his thighs. Threw the towel down, picked up his shirt, and buttoned it while surveying the perfectly calm sea. Then he pulled on a pair of socks and stuck his feet in his shoes. They were brown leather shoes without laces, which matched neither the socks nor his bathing trunks.

"What are you waiting for?" he said.

I pulled the light-blue Las Palmas T-shirt I had been given by my grandparents over my head and laced up my blue sneakers. Dad tossed the two empty pop bottles and the orange peel into the cooler bag, slung it over his shoulder, and set off, the wet towel crumpled up in his other hand. He said nothing on the way to the car. Opened the trunk, put in the cooler bag, took the life jacket from my hands, and placed it next to the bag together with his towel. The fact that I also had a towel didn't seem to enter his head and I certainly didn't intend to bother him with that.

Even though he had parked in the shade, the car was in the sun. The black seats were boiling hot and burned against my thighs. I wondered briefly whether to put my wet towel over the seat. But he would notice. Instead I placed my palms downward and sat on them, as close to the edge as I could.

Dad started the car and drove off at walking speed; the whole of the open gravel area, known as the firing range, was full of large stones. The road he took afterward was pitted with potholes, too, so he drove equally slowly along there. Green branches and bushes brushed the hood and roof, sometimes there was the odd thump, as a branch hit the car. My hands were still stinging, but less so now. It was only then it struck me that Dad was also wearing shorts on a red-hot seat. I glanced at his face in the mirror. It was grim and uncommunicative, but there was no indication that his thighs were burning.

When we came out onto the main road below the church he accelerated away and drove the five kilometers home at far above the speed limit.

"He's frightened of water," he told my mother that afternoon. It wasn't true, but I said nothing. I wasn't stupid.

A week later my grandparents on my mother's side came to visit us. It was the first time they had been to Tybakken. Back on their farm in Sørbøvåg they weren't the slightest bit out of place, they fit in perfectly, Grandad with his blue overalls and black narrow-brimmed hats, long brown rubber boots, and constant spitting of tobacco, Grandma with her worn but clean, flowery dresses, gray hair, and broad body, and hands that always trembled slightly. But when they got out of the car in the drive in front of our house, after Dad had picked them up from Kjevik, I could see at once they didn't fit in. Grandad was wearing his gray Sunday suit, light-blue shirt, and a gray hat, in his hand he held his pipe, not by the stem, the way Dad did, but with his fingers round the bowl. He used the stem to point with, I noticed, when later they were being shown around our garden. Grandma wore a light-gray coat, light-gray shoes, and on her arm she carried a bag. No one dressed like that here. You never saw anyone dressed like that in Arendal, either. It was as though they came from another era.

They filled our rooms with their strangeness. Mom and Dad suddenly behaved differently, too, mostly Dad, who behaved just as he did at Christmas. His invariable "No" became "Why not?"; his ever-watchful eyes became affable, and a friendly hand could even be placed on my or Yngve's shoulder as a casual greeting. But even though he chatted to Grandma with interest, I could see that in fact he wasn't interested, there were always brief moments when he looked away, and then his eyes tended to be utterly lifeless. Grandad, cheerful and enthusiastic, but somehow smaller and more vulnerable here than he was at home, never appeared to notice this trait of Dad's. Or perhaps he just ignored it.

One evening when they were with us Dad bought some crabs. For him they were the apotheosis of festive food, and even though it was early in the season there was meat in the ones he had managed to find. But my grandparents, they didn't eat crab. If Grandad got crabs in the net, well, he would throw them back. Dad would later tell stories about this, he viewed it as comical, a kind of superstition, that crabs should be less clean than fish, just because they crawled over the seabed and didn't swim as they pleased through the water above. Crabs might eat dead bodies, since they eat everything that falls to the bottom, but what were the odds of these crabs having chanced upon a corpse in the depths of the Skagerrak?

One afternoon we had been sitting in the garden drinking coffee and juice, afterward I had gone to my room, where I lay on my bed reading comic books, and I heard Grandma and Grandad coming up the stairs. They didn't say anything, trod heavily on the steps, and went into the living room. The sunlight on the wall of my room was golden. The lawn outside had great patches of yellow and even brown, although Dad switched on the sprinkler the instant the local council gave permission. Everything I could see along the road, all the houses, all the gardens, all the cars, and all the tools leaning against walls and doorsteps, was in a state of slumber, it seemed to me. My sweaty chest stuck uncomfortably to the duvet cover. I got up, opened the door, and went into the living room, where Grandma and Grandad were sitting in their separate chairs.

"Would you like to watch TV?" I asked.

"Yes, the news is on soon, isn't it?" Grandma said. "That's what interests us, you know."

I went over and switched on the TV. A few seconds passed before the picture appeared. Then the screen slowly lit up, the N of Dagsrevyen grew larger and larger as the simple xylophone jingle sounded, ding-dong-ding-dooong, faint at first, then louder and louder. I took a step back. Grandad leaned forward in his chair, the pipe stem pointing away from his hand.

"There we are," I said.

Actually, I wasn't allowed to turn on the TV, nor the large radio on the shelf by the wall, I always had to ask Mom or Dad if they could do it for me when there was something I wanted to see or listen to. But now I was doing it for Grandma and Grandad, surely Dad wouldn't object to that.

All of a sudden the picture started flickering wildly. The colors became distorted. Then there was a flash, a loud puff!, and then the screen went black.

Oh no.

Oh no, oh no, oh no.

"What happened to the TV?" Grandad asked.

"It's broken," I said, my eyes full of tears.

It was me who had broken it.

"It can happen," Grandad said. "And actually we like the news on the radio better."

He got up from his chair and shuffled over to the radio with his small steps. I went into my room. Chill with fear, my stomach churning, I lay down on the bed. The duvet cover was cool against my hot, bare skin. I took a comic from the pile on the floor. But I was unable to read. Soon he would come in, go over to the TV, and switch it on. If it had broken while I had been alone perhaps I could have acted as if nothing had happened, then he would have thought it had stopped working of its own accord. Although probably he would have figured out that it was me even so, because he had a nose for anything untoward, one glance at me was enough for him to know something was wrong and he put two and two together. Now, however, I couldn't feign ignorance, Grandma and Grandad had been witnesses, they would tell him what had happened, and if I tried to hide anything it would make matters much, much worse.

I sat up on the bed. I had a knot in my stomach, but there was no hint of the warmth and softness that illness brought with it, it was cold and painful and so tight that no tears in the world could undo it.

For a while I sat crying.

If only Yngve had been at home. Then I could have stayed with him in his room for as long as possible. But he was out swimming with Steinar and Kåre.

A sense that I would be nearer to him if I went into his room, even though it was empty, brought me to my feet. I opened the door, tiptoed along the landing, and into his room. His bed had been painted blue, mine orange, in the same way as his cupboard doors were blue and mine were orange. The room smelled of Yngve. I went to the bed and sat down.

The window was ajar!

That was more than I had dared hope for. Now I could hear their voices down on the terrace without their knowing I was here. If the window had been closed I would have revealed my presence when I opened it.

Dad's voice rose and sank in the calm manner it did when he was in a good mood. Now and then I caught Mom's brighter, gentler voice. From the living room came the sound of the radio. For some reason I had the impression that my grandparents were asleep, each in their separate chairs, their mouths open and their eyes closed, perhaps they often sat like that in Sørbøvåg when we visited them.

There was a clink of cups outside.

Were they clearing the table?

Yes, because afterward I heard the flip-flop of Mom's sandals as she walked around the house.

At once I wanted to have her for myself! Then I would be able to tell her first!

I waited until I heard the door below being opened. Then, as Mom came upstairs carrying a tray of cups, dishes, glasses, and the shiny coffeepot with the red lid atop a garland of clothespins that Yngve had made at Mom's arts and crafts workshop I went out onto the landing.

"Are you inside in this hot weather?" she said.

"Yes," I answered.

She was about to walk past, but then she stopped.

"Is there something the matter?" she asked.

I looked down.

"Is there?"

"The TV's busted," I said.

"Oh no," she said. "That's a pity. Are Grandma and Grandad in there?"

I nodded.

"I was just about to go and get them. It's such a fantastic evening. You come out, too, come on. You can have some more juice if you want."

I shook my head and went back into my room. Stopped inside the door. Perhaps it would be wisest to join them outside? He wouldn't do anything if they were there, even if he found out I had broken the TV.

But that in itself could make him even more furious. Last time we had been to Sørbøvåg everyone had been sitting round the dinner table, and Kjartan had been saying that Yngve had had a fight with Bjørn Atle, the boy on the neighboring farm. Everyone had laughed at that, Dad too. But when Mom had taken me to the shop and the others were having a midday nap, and Yngve had gone to bed to read a comic, Dad had gone in, lifted him up, and shaken him about because he had been fighting.

Nope, the best would be to stay here. If Grandad or Mom said the TV was broken he might lose his temper while he was sitting there with them.

I lay back down on my bed. My chest trembled uncontrollably; another flood of tears was set in motion.

Ohhhh. Ohhhh. Ohhhh.

He would be coming soon.

I knew it.

Soon he would be here.

I put my hands over my ears and closed my eyes and tried to pretend nothing existed. Only this darkness and this breathing.

But a feeling of defenselessness overcame me, and I did the opposite, knelt on the bed and looked out of the window, at the flood of light falling across the landscape, the glowing roof tiles and glinting windowpanes.

The door downstairs was opened and slammed.

I cast around wildly. Got up, pulled the chair from under the desk, and sat down.

Footsteps on the stairs. They were heavy; it was him.

I couldn't sit with my back to the door and got up again. Perched on the edge of the bed.

He thrust open the door. Took a step inside and stopped, looked at me.

His eyes were narrow, his lips clenched.

"What are you doing, boy?" he said.

"Nothing," I said, eyes downcast.

"Look at me when you talk to me!" he said.

I looked at him. But I couldn't. I looked down again.

"Something wrong with your ears as well?" he said. "LOOK AT ME!"

I looked at him. But his eyes, I couldn't meet them.

He took three quick strides across the floor, grabbed my ear, and twisted it as he dragged me to my feet.

"What did I tell you about switching on the TV?" he said.

I fought for breath and was unable to answer.

"WHAT DID I SAY?" he said, twisting harder.

"That I . . . that I sh . . . sh . . . shouldn't do it," I said.

He let go of my ear, grabbed both of my arms, and shook me.

"NOW LOOK AT ME!" he yelled.

I raised my head. Tears almost blurred him out.

His fingers squeezed harder.

"Didn't I tell you to keep away from the TV? Eh? Didn't I tell you? Now we'll have to buy a new TV and where will we get the money from? Can you answer me that, eh!"

"No-o-o-o," I sobbed.

He threw me down on the bed.

"Now you stay in your room until I tell you otherwise. Have you understood?"

"Yes," I said.

"You're grounded tonight, and you're grounded tomorrow."

"Okay."

Then he was gone. I was crying so much I couldn't hear where he went. My breathing was jerky, as though it was moving up a staircase. My chest was trembling, my hands were trembling. I lay there crying for twenty minutes perhaps. Then it started to ease. I knelt on the bed and gazed out of the window. My legs were still shaking, my hands were shaking, but it was loosening its hold on me, I could feel, it was as though I had entered a quiet room after a storm.

From the window I could see Prestbakmo's house and the entire front of their garden, which bordered ours, Gustavsen's house and the front of their garden, a bit of Karlsen's house, and a bit of Christensen's at the top. I had a view of the road as far as the mailbox stand. The sun, which seemed to become a touch fuller in the afternoon, hung in the sky above the trees on the ridge. The air was perfectly still, not a tree or a bush stirred. People never sat in their front gardens, that would be "displaying yourself," as Dad would say, making yourself visible to all; behind the houses was where all the garden furniture and the grills were in this neighborhood.

Then something happened. Kent came out of the door of Karlsen's house. I saw just his head above the parked car, the coruscating white hair gliding along like a puppet in a puppet show. He was gone for a few seconds, then he reappeared on his bike. He stood up on the pedals, jerking them backward to brake, shot out onto the road, and built up a pretty good speed before braking hard and swerving and coming to a halt in front of Gustavsen's house. He had lost his father, who had been a sailor, two years ago. I could barely remember him; in fact, I had only one image of him, once when we were walking down the hill, it was sunny and cold, but there was no snow, I was holding my small orange skates with three blades and straps to attach them to your shoes, so we must have been on our way to Lake Tjenna. I could also remember when I found out that he had died. Leif Tore had been standing by the line of concrete barriers that separated Nordåsen Ringvei from Elgstien, just outside our house, and had said that Kent Arne's father was dead. While he was telling me we looked up at their house. He had been trying to pull someone out of a tank that was being cleaned, it had been full of gas and they had fainted, and then he, too, had lost consciousness and died. We never talked about Kent Arne's father when he was there, or about death. Another man had just moved in, whose name, strangely enough, was also Karlsen.

If Dag Lothar was number one, then Kent Arne was number two, even though he was a year younger than us and two years younger than Dag Lothar. Leif Tore was number three, Geir Håkon number four, Trond number five, Geir number six, and I was number seven.

"Leif Tore, are you coming out?!" Kent Arne shouted in front of the house. Soon after he emerged, wearing only blue denim shorts and sneakers, got on Rolf's bike, and they cycled down the hill and were gone. Prestbakmo's cat lay motionless on the flat rock between Gustavsen's and Hansen's properties.

I lay back on the bed. Read some comics, got up, and flattened my ear against the door to hear if anything was happening in the living room, but not a sound, they were still outside. My grandparents were visiting, so it was unthinkable that I wouldn't be given any supper. Or was it?

Half an hour later they came upstairs. One of them went into the bathroom, which was adjacent to my room. It wasn't Dad, I could tell that from the footsteps, which were lighter than his.

But I couldn't tell whether it was Mom, Grandma, or Grandad, until the flushing of the toilet was followed by a loud banging from the hot-water pipes, which only Grandma or Grandad could have caused.

Now I was seriously hungry.

The shadows that descended over the ground outside were so long and distorted that they no longer bore any resemblance to the forms that created them. As though they had sprung forth in their own right, as though there existed a parallel reality of darkness, with dark-fences, dark-trees, dark-houses, populated by dark-people, somehow stranded here in the light, where they seemed so misshapen and helpless, as far from their element as a reef with seaweed and shells and crabs is from the receding water, one might imagine. Oh, isn't that why shadows get longer and longer in the evening? They are reaching out for the night, this tidal water of darkness that washes over the earth to fulfill for a few hours the shadows' innermost yearnings.

I looked at my watch. It was ten minutes past nine. In twenty minutes it would be bedtime.

In the afternoon, the worst part of being grounded was that you couldn't go out and you stood at the window watching everyone else outside. In the evening, the worst part was that there was no clear dividing line between the various phases that usually constituted an evening. After sitting up for some hours I simply pulled off my clothes and got into bed. The difference between the two states, which was normally so great, was almost completely eradicated when you were grounded, and that led to my becoming aware of myself in a way that I normally didn't. It was as if the person I was while doing whatever I was doing, such as eating supper, brushing my teeth, washing my face, or putting on my pajamas, not only revealed itself but also filled my whole being, as if all of a sudden there was simply nothing else. I was exactly the same person when I was sitting on the bed fully dressed as I was lying in it without my clothes on. In fact, there were no real dividing lines or transitions.

It was an irksome feeling.

I went to the door and placed my ear against it again. At first it was quiet, then I heard some voices, then it was quiet again. I cried a few tears, then I took off my T-shirt and shorts and got into bed with the duvet drawn up to my chin. The sun still shone on the wall opposite. I read some comics, then I put them on the floor, and closed my eyes. My last thought before I fell asleep was that it hadn't been my fault.

I woke up, looked at my wristwatch. The two luminous snakes showed it was ten minutes past two. I lay quite still for a while in an attempt to work out what had woken me. Apart from my pulse, which throbbed as if whispering in my ear, everything was silent. No cars on the road, no boats in Tromøya Sound, no planes flying overhead. No footsteps, no voices, nothing. Nor from our house.

I raised my head a little so that my ears weren't touching anything and held my breath. After a few seconds I heard a noise from the garden. A noise so high-pitched that at first I didn't catch it, but the moment I became aware of it I was terrified.

Eeee-eeee-eeeeee-eeeee. Eeeeeee-eeee-eeeeeee. Eeeeee.

I sat up on my knees, drew the curtain to the side, and peered through the window. The lawn was bathed in a weak light: the moon above our house was full. A gust of wind made it look as if the grass were racing away. A white plastic bag caught on the end of the hedge was flapping, and it struck me that someone who didn't know that wind existed would have thought that the bag was moving of its own accord. As though I were perched high above the ground, the tips of my toes and fingers tingled. My heart was beating fast. The muscles in my stomach tightened, I swallowed, and swallowed again. Night was the time for ghosts and apparitions, night was the time for the headless man and the grinning skeleton. And all that separated me from it was a thin wall.

There was that sound again!

Eeee-eeeeeeeee- eee-eeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeee-eee-eeeeeee.

I scanned the gray lawn outside. Over by the hedge, perhaps five meters away, I caught sight of Prestbakmo's cat. It was lying stretched out in the grass and smacking something with its paw. Whatever it was smacking, a gray lump, like stone or clay, was thrown a few meters closer to the window. The cat rose and followed. The lump lay still in the grass. The cat tentatively hit out at it a few more times, moved closer with its head, and seemed to nudge it with its nose, then opened its jaws and took it in its mouth. When the squeaking started again I guessed it was a mouse. The sudden noise appeared to confuse the cat. At any rate it tossed its head and flung the mouse in the air. This time it didn't stay where it landed, it made a headlong dash across the lawn. The cat stood watching, motionless. It looked as if it was about to let the mouse go. But then, just as the mouse reached the bed by the gate to Prestbakmo's garden, it set off. Three bounds and the cat had caught it again.

In the room beside mine I heard Dad's voice. It was low and mumbling, without beginning or end, the way it often sounded when he was talking in his sleep. A moment later someone got up from his bed. From the lightness of foot I realized it was Mom. Outside, the cat had started jumping up and down. It looked like some kind of dance. Another gust of wind swept through the grass. I looked up at the pine tree and saw its tender branches bending and swaying, slim and black against the heavy, yellow moon. Mom opened the door to the bathroom. When I heard her lower the toilet seat I put my hands over my ears and started to hum. The sound issuing from her after that, a kind of hiss, as if she were letting off steam, was awful. Usually I shut out Dad's thunderous torrents, too, even though they weren't quite as difficult to endure as Mom's hissing. Aaaaaaaaaaagh, I said, slowly counting to ten and watching the cat. Apparently tired of the game, it grabbed the mouse in its jaws and dashed through the hedge, across the road and into Gustavsen's drive, where it dropped the mouse on the ground by the trailer and stood staring at it. The mouse lay as still as any living creature could. The cat jumped onto the wall and slunk toward one of the globe-shaped sundials on the gatepost at the end. I took my hands away from my ears and stopped humming. In the bathroom the cistern flushed. The cat turned sharply and stared at the mouse, which still hadn't moved. A jet of water from the tap splashed against the porcelain sink. The cat jumped down from the wall, strolled into the road, and lay down like a small lion. Just as Mom pressed the handle and opened the door a twitch went through the mouse, as though the sound had released an impulse in it, and the next moment it set off on another desperate flight from the cat, which had obviously reckoned on this eventuality as it required no more than a fraction of a second to switch from resting to hunting. But this time it was too late. A sheet of white Eternit cladding left lying on the lawn was the mouse's salvation as it squeezed itself underneath a second before the cat arrived.

The animals' fleet movements seemed to linger on in me; long after I had gone back to bed my heart was still racing. Perhaps because it, too, was a little animal? After a while I changed position again, put the pillow at the foot of the bed, and drew the curtain to one side so that I could look up at the sky bestrewn with stars, so like grains of sand, a beach with a perimeter, invisible to us, against which the sea beat.

But what actually lay beyond the universe?

Dag Lothar said there was nothing. Geir said there were burning flames. That was what I believed, too; the image of the sea was more because the starry sky looked the way it did.

Mom and Dad's bedroom was quiet again.

I pulled the curtain to and closed my eyes. Charged with the silence and darkness of the house, I was soon fast asleep.

When I got up next morning Grandma and Grandad were sitting with Mom in the living room drinking coffee. Dad was walking across the lawn with the sprinkler in his hand. He placed it at the edge of the lawn so that the thin jets of water, which resembled a waving hand, not only fell on the grass but also the vegetable garden below. The sun's rays, on the other side of the house now, above the forest to the east, flooded into the garden. The air seemed to be as still as it had been the previous day. The sky was hazy; it almost always was in the morning. Yngve was sitting at the breakfast table. The white eggs in the brown egg cups reminded me that it was Sunday. I sat down in my regular place.

"What happened yesterday?" Yngve asked in a subdued voice. "Why were you grounded?"

"I broke the TV," I said.

He sent me a quizzical look, holding a slice of bread to his mouth.

"Yes, I put it on for Grandma and Grandad. Then it went puff. Haven't they said anything?"

Yngve took a large bite from the slice of bread, which he had spread with clove cheese, and shook his head. I sliced the top off the egg with my knife, opened it like a lid, scooped out the soft white with a spoon, reached for the salt shaker, and tapped it with my forefinger so that only a sprinkling came out. Spread margarine onto some bread and poured a glass of milk. Downstairs, Dad opened the door. I ate the white of the egg, poked the spoon into the yolk to see whether it was hard- or soft-boiled.

"I've been grounded for today as well," I said.

"The whole day? Or just the evening?"

I shrugged. The egg was hard-boiled, the yellow yolk disintegrated against the edge of the spoon.

"The whole day, I think," I said.

The road outside was empty and gleamed in the sun. But in the ditch beneath the dense branches of the spruces it was dark and shadowy.

A bicycle came tearing down the hill at full speed. The boy sitting on it, he must have been fifteen, had one hand on the handlebars and the other on the red gasoline canister he had tied to the luggage rack. His hair was black and fluttered in the wind.

On the stairs came the sound of Dad's footsteps. I sat up straight in my chair, cast a hurried glance across the table to see if everything was in place. A bit of the hard-boiled egg had ended up on the table. I quickly brushed it off the edge into my waiting hand and immediately put it on the plate. Yngve delayed the moment until it was almost too late to push his chair into the table and sit up straight, but only almost, for when Dad came in his back was erect and his feet were firmly planted on the floor.

"Pack your swimming trunks, kids," he said. "We're off to Hove for the day."

"Me, too?" I wanted to ask, but I held back, because he might have forgotten he had grounded me and the question would have jolted his memory. Also, if he remembered but had changed his mind, it would be best not to mention it, as it could be interpreted as his having made a mistake yesterday, his having done something wrong, and I didn't want him to think that. So I went for my trunks and a towel from the line in the boiler room, put them in a plastic bag with the diving goggles, which would come in handy if we were going to one of the two beaches in Hove, and sat down in my room to await departure.

Half an hour later we left for the far side of the island, on what was perhaps the best day of the year, with the sea so calm it barely made a sound and therefore lent the surroundings, the previously so silent bare rocks and the previously so silent forest above, a semblance of something unreal, such that every footstep on the rocks and every clink of a bottle sounded as if it was the very first time, and the sun, which was at its zenith in the sky, appeared as something deeply primitive and alien on this day, when you could see the sea curve and disappear down into the depths beyond the horizon, above which the sky floated so airily with its light, soft, misty blueness; and Yngve and I and Mom and Dad put on our swimsuits and each of us in our own way dipped our bodies, hot from the sun, into the lukewarm water, while Grandma and Grandad sat there in their finery, apparently unmoved by their surroundings and our activities, as though the 1950s and Vestland were not only features that had stamped themselves on them superficially, through their clothes, behavior, and dialect, in other words externally, but also internally, to the depths of their respective souls, to the innermost core of their respective characters. It was so strange to see them there, sitting on the rocks, squinting into the bright light coming at us from all directions, it seemed so alien.

The day after, they went home. Dad drove them to Kjevik, grabbed the opportunity to visit his own parents while he was there while Mom took Yngve and me to Lake Gjerstad, the idea being that we could swim and eat cookies and relax, but first of all Mom couldn't find a road to the lake, so we had to go on a long detour through a forest full of scrub and thickets; secondly, the part of the lake we arrived at turned out to be green with algae and the rocks slippery; and thirdly, it started to rain almost as soon as we had put down the cooler bag and the basket with the cookies and oranges.

I felt so sorry for Mom, who had wanted to take us on a nice trip, but it hadn't worked out. There was no way to express this to her. It was one of those things you had to forget as quickly as possible. And that was not at all difficult; there were so many new experiences in store for us during those weeks. I would soon be starting school, and as a result so many new objects would become mine. Above all, a satchel, which, the next Saturday morning, I went to Arendal with Mom to buy. It was square, blue and all shiny and glossy, with white straps. Inside, there were two compartments, where I immediately put the orange pencil case I had also been given, containing a pencil, a pen, an eraser, and a pencil sharpener, and one of the notebooks we had bought, with orange and brown squares on the front, the same as on Yngve's, plus some comics I put in to plump it up. There, nestling against the leg of the desk, it stood every night when I went to bed, not without some mental anguish for me, for there was still quite a time to go to the big day when I, along with almost everyone I knew, would be starting the first class. We had already been to school for a day, that past spring, we had had a chance to meet the woman who was to be our teacher and to do a bit of drawing, but this was different, this wasn't anywhere near the same, this was the real thing. There were those who said they hated school, indeed, almost all the older children said they hated school, and strictly speaking we knew we should, too, but at the same time it was so alluring, what was about to happen, we knew so little and we expected so much, in addition to the fact that starting school in itself elevated us into the same league as the older children, from one day to the next, in one fell swoop we were like them, and then we could certainly afford to hate school, but not now. . . . Did we talk about anything else? Hardly. In fact the school we applied to, Roligheden, where both Dad and Geir's father worked and where all the older children went, had no room for us, the year's intake was too big, too many families had moved into the area, so we had to go to a school on the east of the island, five or six kilometers away, with all the kids we didn't know from around there, and we were to be transported by bus. It was a great privilege and an adventure. Every day a bus would come to pick us up!

I was also given a pair of light-blue trousers, a light-blue jacket, and a pair of dark-blue sneakers with white stripes over the instep. Several times, when Dad was out, I put on my new clothes and paced in front of the hall mirror, sometimes with the satchel on my back, so when the day finally arrived and I posed on the gravel outside the door for Mom to take a photograph of me, it wasn't just the excitement and the uncertainty giving me butterflies but also the strange, almost triumphant, feeling I would have when I wore particularly attractive clothes.

The evening before, I'd had a bath, Mom had washed my hair, and when I woke in the morning it was to a quiet sleeping house, with a sun that was still climbing behind the spruce trees down beyond the road. Oh, what a pleasure it was to take my new clothes out of the wardrobe and put them on at last! Outside, the birds were singing, it was still summer, behind the veil of mist the sky was blue and immense, and the houses that now stood quiet on both sides of the road would soon be teeming with impatience and anticipation, like on Independence Day. I took the comics out of my satchel, hung it on my back, adjusted the straps, and took it off again. Pulled the zipper on the jacket up and down and speculated: it looked best with the zipper up, but then you couldn't see the T-shirt underneath . . . Went into the living room, looked out of the window at the sun, a reddish-yellow, fiery orange behind the green trees, went into the kitchen without touching anything, peered across at Gustavsen's house, where there was no sign of life. Stood in front of the hall mirror, pulling the zipper up and down . . . the T-shirt looked so good . . . it would be a shame if it couldn't be seen . . .

Brush my teeth! I could do that.

Into the bathroom, out with the brush from the tooth glass, a drop of water and on with the white toothpaste. I brushed energetically for several minutes while studying myself in the mirror. The sound of the brush against my teeth seemed to fill the whole of my head from the inside, so I didn't notice that Dad was up until he opened the door. He was wearing only underpants.

"Are you brushing your teeth before you've had breakfast? How stupid can you be? Put that brush down right now and go to your room!"

As I set foot on the red wall-to-wall carpet on the landing he slammed the door behind him and started pissing loudly into the toilet bowl. I knelt on my bed and looked up at Prestbakmo's house. Was that two heads I could see in the darkness of the kitchen window? Yes, it had to be. They were up. It would have been good to have a walkie-talkie so that I could talk to Geir! That would have been perfect!

Dad left the bathroom and went into the bedroom. I could hear his voice, and then Mom's. So she was awake!

I stayed in my room until she was up and on her way to the kitchen, where Dad had already been clattering around for a while. In the shelter of her back I sat down at my place. They had bought cornflakes, we almost never had them, and after she had put out a bowl and a spoon for me, and I had poured milk over the golden, somewhat perforated, irregularly formed flakes, I came to the conclusion that cornflakes were best when they were crispy, before the milk had soaked into them. But after I had been eating for a while and they were beginning to go soft, filled as it were with both their own taste and that of the milk, plus the sugar, of which I had sprinkled a liberal quantity, I changed my mind; that was when they were at their best.

Or was it?

Dad went into the living room with a cup in his hand, he didn't usually have breakfast, but sat in there smoking and drinking coffee instead. Yngve came in, sat down on his chair without saying a word, poured out some cornflakes and milk, sprinkled sugar over the top, and started wolfing it down.

"Looking forward to it?" he said at length.

"A little," I said.

"It's nothing to look forward to," he said.

"Yes, it is," Mom said. "You certainly looked forward to starting school anyway. I can remember it well. Can you?"

"Ye-es," Yngve said. "I suppose I can."

He cycled to school, usually a little while before Dad left, unless Dad had some work to do before the first lesson, that is, which was sometimes the case. Yngve was not allowed to have a lift, except on very special occasions, such as when it had snowed a lot overnight, because he wasn't to have any advantages just because his father was a teacher at the school.

When breakfast was finished and they had left, I sat with Mom in the kitchen. She read the newspaper, I chatted.

"Do you think we'll have to write in the first lesson, Mom?" I asked. "Or is it usually math? Leif Tore says we'll have drawing so that we can relax a bit at the beginning, and not everyone can write. Or add and subtract. Only me actually. As far as I know at least. I learned when I was five and a half. Do you remember?"

"Remember when you learned to read? What do you mean?" Mom said.

"That time outside the bus station when I read the sign? 'Kaffe-fetteria?' You laughed. Yngve laughed, too. Now I know it's called 'kafeteria.' Shall I read some headlines?"

Mom nodded. I read aloud. Bit staccato, but everything was correct.

"You managed that nicely," she said. "You'll do really well at school."

She scratched an ear as she read, the way only she could, she held her ear between her fingers and moved them back and forth incredibly fast, just like a cat.

She put down the newspaper and looked at me.

"Are you looking forward to it?" she asked.

"And how," I said.

She smiled, patted me on the head, got up, and started to clear the table. I went to my room. School didn't begin until ten o'clock as it was the first day. Nevertheless, we ended up being short of time, which was often the case with Mom, she was pretty absentminded when it came to matters like this. From the window I saw the excitement mounting outside the houses where there were children starting school, that is, in the families with Geir, Leif Tore, Trond, Geir Håkon, and Marianne, hair was combed, dresses and shirts were straightened, photographs taken. When it was my turn to stand outside, smiling at Mom, with one hand shielding my eyes from the sun, which had moved above the tops of the spruce trees by this time, everyone had gone. We were the last, and all of a sudden we were late, so Mom, who had taken the day off work for the occasion, hurried me along, I opened the door of the green VW, pushed the seat forward, and got in the back while she rummaged for the key in her shoulder bag and inserted it in the ignition. She lit a cigarette, reversed after casting a quick glance over her shoulder, put the car in first gear a few meters up the hill, and drove down. The roar of the engine resounded off the brick walls. I moved to the middle of the car so that I could see between the two seats at the front. The two white gas holders across Tromøya Sound, the wild cherry tree, Kristen's red house, then the road down to the marina where we almost never went, along the route where in the course of the next six years I would become familiar with every tiniest clearing and stone wall, and out to the small places on the east of the island, where Mom didn't know her way, which made her a bit agitated.

"Was it this way, Karl Ove, do you remember?" she said, stubbing out the cigarette in the ashtray as she peered into the mirror.

"I don't remember," I said. "But I think so. It was on the left, anyway."

Below, there was a shop by a quay and a clump of houses encircling it, no school. The sea was a deep blue, bordering on black beneath the shadow of the buildings; untouched by the high temperatures, this fullness distinguished it from most of the other colors in the landscape, which were as though bleached after the weeks-long heat wave. The sea's cool blue contrasted with the yellow and brown and the faded green.

Now Mom was driving along a gravel road. Dust whirled up behind us. As the road narrowed and nothing of any significance seemed to lie ahead, she turned and drove back. On the other side, down by the water, there was another road she tried. That didn't lead to any school, either.

"Are we going to be late?" I asked.

"Maybe," she replied. "Fancy not bringing a map with me!"

"Haven't you been here before then?" I said.

"Yes, I have," she said. "But my memory's not as good as yours, you know."

We drove up the hill we had come down ten minutes earlier and turned onto the main road by a chapel. At every sign and crossroads she slowed down and leaned forward.

"There it is, Mom!" I shouted, pointing. We still couldn't see it, but I remembered the green to the right; the school was at the top of the gentle gradient that followed. A narrow gravel road led down to it, there were lots of parked cars, and as Mom turned into it, I spotted the school playground swarming with people and a man everyone was staring at was gesticulating on top of a rock, beneath the flagpole.

"We've got to hurry!" I said. "They've started! Mom, they've started!"

"Yes, I know," Mom said. "But we have to find somewhere to park first. There, maybe. Yes."

We had ended up right down by the woodwork-room-cum-gym hall. A large, white building from the olden days, and outside it, on the pavement, Mom parked the car. We weren't exactly familiar with the school layout, so instead of going to the end and taking the shortcut across the soccer field, we followed the road on the other side up to the playground. Mom scooted along, with me in tow. The satchel bumped up and down so wonderfully as I ran, every bump reminding me of what I had behind me, shiny and glossy, and hot on the heels of that thought, the light-blue trousers, the light-blue jacket, the dark-blue shoes.

When we finally reached the playground, the crowd was slowly moving into the low school building.

"We seem to have missed the welcome ceremony," Mom said.

"That doesn't matter, Mom," I said. "Come on!"

I caught sight of Geir and his mother, ran over to them with Mom holding my hand, they smiled in greeting, and we went up the steps in the middle of the crowd of parents and children. Geir's satchel was identical to mine, as most of the boys' satchels were, whereas, from what I could glean in passing, the girls sported quite a wide variety.

"Where are we going? Do you know?" Mom asked Martha, Geir's mother.

"I'm afraid I don't." Martha laughed. "We're following their teacher."

I looked in the direction she nodded. And there, sure enough, was our Frøken. She stopped in front of the staircase and said that all those who were in her class should go ahead, and Geir and I ran down the stairs, through all the people, and along the corridor to the end. But Frøken stopped in front of a room close to the staircase, making us not the first, as we had imagined, but almost the last.

The room was full of children dressed in smart clothes and their mothers. Through the windows you looked down onto a narrow field; the forest was close behind. Frøken stood at her desk, which was on a little dais; on the blackboard was written HELLO, CLASS 1B in pink chalk with a flowery border around it. On the wall above the desk there were maps and charts.

"Hello, everyone," Frøken said. "And welcome to Sandnes School! My name is Helga Torgersen, and I'm going to be your class teacher. I'm really looking forward to this, I can tell you! We're going to have a lot of fun. And do you know what? You are not the only ones who are new to this school. I am new, too. You are my very first class!"

I looked around me. All the adults were smiling. Almost all the children were craning their necks and glancing at one another. I knew Geir Håkon, Trond, Geir, Leif Tore, and Marianne. And the boy who used to throw stones at us and had that frightening dog. I had never seen the others before.

"Now we are going to do a roll call," Frøken said from the dais. "Do you know what a roll call is?"

No one answered.

"You call out a name and the person with that name answers," I said.

Everyone looked at me. I put on a broad smile over my protruding teeth.

"That's correct," Frøken said. "And we start with the letter A. That's the first letter in the alphabet, you see. You'll learn all about that later. So, A. Anne Lisbet!"

"Yes," said a girl's voice, and everyone turned toward the sound, I did, too.

The voice belonged to a thin girl with shiny, black hair. She looked like an Indian.

"Asgeir?" Frøken said.

"Yes!" said a boy with big teeth and long hair.

After the roll call we sat down at our desks while our parents stood by the wall. Frøken gave everyone a recorder, an exercise book and a notebook, a schedule with our lessons printed on it, as well as a money box and a leaflet with a picture of a yellow ant on it from a local savings bank. Then she told us about some of the events that would be taking place during the autumn, one of which was a swimming class to be held in a pool at a school on the next island, as there wasn't a swimming pool on Tromøya. She handed out a piece of paper with a slip you could fill in and return if you were interested. Then we did some drawing, with our parents still there watching, and then it was over. The following day school would start in earnest, we would catch the bus on our own, and be there for three hours without our parents breathing down our necks.

As we left the classroom I was still wide-eyed with all the newness and strangeness, and the feeling continued when everyone in the new class got into their respective cars with their parents, normally it was only on the seventeenth of May that there was this level of synchronous vehicle activity, that a location was left simultaneously by so many children, but as we were driving home disappointment began to set in, and I became more and more dejected the closer we came to home.

Nothing had happened.

I could read and write, and I had counted on having a chance to show that on the first day. A bit at least! And I had been looking forward to having break time, to the bell ringing at the end of one lesson and the start of the next. To using my new pencil case and the compartments in the satchel.

No, the day hadn't lived up to my expectations, and I had to take off the clothes I looked so good in and hang them up in their place in my wardrobe, to await future formal occasions. I sat on the kitchen stool chatting to Mom while she made dinner, it was rare I had her to myself in the middle of the day, and on top of this she had been with me where it counted most, so I exploited the opportunity for all it was worth, and babbled away.

"I wish we had a cat I could play with," I said. "Can't we have a cat?"

"That would be nice," Mom said. "I like cats. They're good company."

"So is it Dad who doesn't like them then?"

"I don't know," Mom said. "He's just not that interested, I think. And he probably thinks they're a bit too much work."

"But I can take care of it," I said. "That's no problem."

"I know," Mom said. "We'll have to wait and see."

"Wait and see, wait and see," I said. "But if Yngve wants a cat, that'll make three of us."

Mom laughed.

"It's not that simple," she said. "You'll have to be patient. Who knows what will happen."

She put the peeled carrot on the board and chopped it up, lifted the board, and slid the pieces into the large pot where there were already bones and bits of meat. I looked out of the window. Through the many small holes in the orange curtain Mom had crocheted I could see the road outside was empty, which it invariably was in the middle of the day.

There was a sudden pungent smell of onions, and I turned to Mom, who was peeling one with her arms outstretched and her eyes full of tears.

When I turned back I saw Geir come bounding down the hill. He had also changed into his normal clothes. A second later I heard a crunch of gravel through the half-open window as he walked up the drive.

"Karl Ove, are you coming?" he shouted.

"I'm going out for a bit," I said to Mom, slipping off the stool.

"Fine," she said. "Where are you going?"

"I don't know."

"Don't go far then."

"No, I won't," I said, and hurried down, opened the door so that Geir wouldn't think the house was empty and go away, said hi, and put on my sneakers.

"I've got a box of matches," he whispered, patting his shorts pocket.

"You haven't!" I also whispered. "Where did you get hold of them?"

"Home. They were in the sitting room."

"You just took them?"

He nodded.

I straightened up and went out, closing the door after me.

"Let's set fire to something," I said.

"Yes, let's," he said.

"What then?"

"Doesn't matter, does it. We'll just find something. The box is half full. We can set fire to a lot of things."

"But we'll have to go somewhere no one can see the smoke," I said. "Up on the mountain maybe?"

"Okay."

"And we'll need something to put the fire out with," I said. "Just a sec. I'll get a bottle of water."

I opened the door again, kicked off my shoes, and went upstairs to Mom, who turned to me as I walked in.

"We're going for a walk," I said. "I need a bottle of water."

"Wouldn't you prefer juice? You can take some, you know. It's still your first school day!"

I hesitated. It had to be water. But that might make her suspicious because I always preferred juice to water. I looked at her and said, "No, Geir's got water, so that's what I want, too."

My heart beat faster as I spoke.

"As you like," she said. She found an empty juice bottle in the cupboard under the sink, dark green glass, almost opaque, she filled it with water, screwed on the top, and passed it to me.

"Would you like some smørbrød as well?"

I considered her offer.

"No," I said. "I mean yes. Two with liver paste."

As she took the bread and started to cut it, I pushed the window farther open and poked my head out.

"Be down in a minute!" I shouted. Geir looked up at me with grave eyes and nodded.

After she had made and wrapped the smørbrød, I put them in a plastic bag with the bottle and hurried back down. Soon we were on our way up the hill. The heat had made the edge of the road soft and crumbly. It was harder where the cars went. Sometimes we lay down on the pavement like cats and let the heat give us a good baking. But now we had other things on our minds.

"Can I see them?" I asked.

Geir stopped and dug the box up from his pocket. I shook it a little. Full. Then I opened it. All the matchheads were red.

Start a fire, start a fire.

"It's a new box," I said, giving it back. "Won't they notice you've taken it?"

"I don't think so," he said. "And if they do I'll just say it wasn't me. They can't prove anything."

We had reached Molden's house and set off up the path. The grass was dry and yellow, brown in places. In Geir's house it was his mother who was strict and his father who was nice. In Dag Lothar's they were both nice, perhaps the father was a tiny bit stricter. With all the others, it was the father who was strict and the mother who was nice. But no one was as strict as Dad, that was for sure.

Geir stopped and bent forward with the box of matches in his hand. He took out a match and was about to strike it against the side.

"What are you doing?" I said. "Not here! Everyone can see!"

"Hee hee hee," he giggled. But straightened up anyway, put the match back in the box, and walked on.

At the top of the hill we turned and cast our gaze across the sea as usual. I counted four small, white triangles in Tromøya

Sound. A larger boat with what looked like an excavator on board. There were two small boats moored on Gjerstadholmen.

Start a fire, start a fire.

As we continued into the forest my stomach was churning with excitement. Sunbeams lay on the forest floor like small, quivering creatures of light between the shadows of branches. We stopped by the huge roots of an upturned tree, I took the bottle of water from my bag, and held it at the ready while Geir leaned forward, struck a match, and held the small, almost invisible flame to one of the wispy blades of grass growing there. It caught fire at once. Spread to the grass beside it. When the flame was as broad as an adult's hand I sprayed water over it. A thin ribbon of smoke floated through the air, alone as it were, independent of what had just happened.

"Do you think anyone could see?" Geir asked.

"You can see smoke from an incredible distance," I answered. "Indians saw smoke signals from kilometers off."

"It caught fire straightaway," Geir said. "Did you see?"

He smiled and quickly ran a hand through his hair.

"Yes," I said.

"Shall we try somewhere else?"

"Yes, but this time I want to light the match."

"Okay," he said, handing me the box and scouring the area for another suitable spot.

Geir was always impatient before any activity and totally absorbed when in the thick of it. Of all the boys I knew he was the one most in thrall to his imagination. Whenever we played – explorers, sailors, Indians, race car drivers, astronauts, robbers, smugglers, princes, monkeys, or secret agents, for example – he could keep at it for hours, unlike Leif Tore or Geir Håkon, who were soon bored and wanted to do something else, completely untouched by the gleam that imagination could bring to bear on everything, but Geir was more than happy with the object itself, such as the old car wreck in the clump of narrow willow trees on the flat stretch between the playground and the soccer field, in which the seats, the steering wheel, gearshift, pedals, dashboard, glove compartment, and doors were still intact, where we used to play so often, and they just pretended it was a car, which of course it was, pressed the clutch, pulled the gearshift, turned the wheel, adjusted the broken side mirrors, jumped up and down on the seats to give the illusion of speed while Geir would be entertained by any embellishments you could add, such as being on the run after a bank robbery, and the windows, which were still a shower of glass fragments strewn across the black-rubber floor mats, had been shot to pieces; then one of us would drive and the other wriggle out through the window onto the roof to open fire on our pursuers, a game that could be extended to include parking the car in a garage and getting out to share the swag, or even further, for weren't the pursuers close on our heels as we slunk between the trees on our way home in the glow of the evening sun? Or else we might be in a moon-mobile and the landscape around us was actually lunar landscape where, after getting out of the car, we were unable to walk in a normal fashion, we had to hop – or it was one of the many streams we were surrounded by, and of all the boys I knew, only Geir would be interested in following it to find the source. What we did most often was to go out in search of new places or to one of the places we had already found. It might be a big old oak with a hollow trunk; a deep pool in a river; a cellar in an unfinished house that was full of water; the concrete foundations of the enormous bridge pylon; or the first few meters of the thick cable stays that ran from the bottom of an anchoring in the forest up to the top and that you could climb; a ramshackle shed with planks that were slippery and dark with decay between Lake Tjenna and the road on the other side, which so far was the farthest outpost of our explorations, we had never ventured any farther; the two dumped cars; the little pool with the three islands no bigger than tufts of grass, one almost completely covered by a tree, and where the water was so deep and black, even though it was right next to a road embankment; the white, crystalline rock from which you could hammer small chunks, beside the path to the Fina station; the boat factory on the other side of Tromøya Bridge beyond Gamle Tybakken, all the factory buildings there, the shells of the boats, the rusty block and tackle and the machines, the smell of oil and tar and salty water, which was so good. We crisscrossed this area, which extended over one or two kilometers in all directions, nearly every day, and the whole point of what we found or visited was that it was secret and it was ours. With the other children we played flip the stick or kick the can, kicked a soccer ball around or went skiing; when we were alone we searched out places with features that attracted us. That was how it was with Geir and me.

But on this day the magic lay in what we were doing, not where we were.

Start a fire, start a fire.

We walked over to a spruce tree a few meters away. The branches hanging just above the ground were gray and bare and looked extremely old. I broke off a bit between my thumb and first finger. It was brittle and crumbled easily. Grass grew sparsely on the small mound where the tree stood, between a patch of dry soil and a mass of desiccated, orangey spruce needles. I knelt down, drew the red match head across the black abrasive surface, and put the flame into the grass, which immediately caught fire. At first the flame was invisible, no more than a quiver of air above the blades of grass, which soon curled and crumpled. But then the tuft caught fire, and from there the flame spread, both quickly and slowly, like a swarm of frightened ants fleeing quickly if you see them as individuals, slowly if you view them as a group. All of a sudden the flames were up to my waist.

"Put it out! Put it out!" I shouted to Geir.

He shook the bottle over the fire, which hissed and shrank, while I beat the low flames in the grass at the edge with my hand.

"Phew!" I said a minute later, when the fire was out.

"That was close!" Geir laughed. "It really got a hold there!"

I stood up.

"Do you think anyone could see it? Shall we go to the cliff edge and see if anyone's looking up here?"

Without waiting for an answer I rushed across the soft moss and heather-covered forest floor between the trees. The sudden fear seemed to contract my insides, and whenever my thoughts turned to what had happened it was as if a ravine opened in me. It was bottomless. Oh, what would happen now? What would happen now?

At the cliff edge I stopped and put a hand to my brow to shield my eyes. Dad's car was in the drive. He was nowhere to be seen. But he could have been outside and gone in. Gustavsen was walking across the grass. He could have seen and told Dad. Or would tell him later.

The very thought of Dad, the fact that he existed, caused fear to pump through my body.

I turned to Geir, who sauntered over with my plastic bag dangling from one hand. Down below, a child resembling Geir Håkon's little brother was playing in the sand by the concrete barriers between our road and Elgstien. A car came up the hill, encased in itself like an insect, the black windshield its expressionless eye, turned left, and disappeared from view.

"We can't go straight down anyway," I said. "If someone's seen the smoke they'll put two and two together."

Why had we done it? Why, oh why?

"They can see us here, too," I said. "Come on!"

We descended the tree-clad slope beneath us. When we were at the bottom we stumbled homeward through the forest, which was perhaps ten meters from the road. We stopped by the big spruce beside the wide, shallow, turbid stream where all the colors were green and murky, its bark stained with sticky resin, not unlike burned sugar in color, with the pungent smell of juniper. Between the slender trunks of the nearby rowan trees you could see our house. I glanced at my hands to see if there was any soot on them. Nothing. But there was a faint burned smell, so I plunged them in the water and rubbed them dry on my trousers.

"What shall we do with the box of matches?" I said.

Geir shrugged.

"Hide it, I s'pose."

"If they find it, don't say anything about me," I said. "About what we did."

"Course not," Geir said. "Here's the bag, by the way."

We started to walk up to the road.

"Are you going to set fire to anything else today?" I said.

"I don't think so," he said.

"Not even with Leif Tore?"

"Maybe tomorrow," he said. And his face brightened. "Should I take the matches to school with me, what do you think?"

"Are you out of your mind?!"

He laughed. We reached the road, and crossed it.

"See you!" he said, running up the hill.

I passed Mom's VW, parked on a patch of scorched yellow grass just outside the fence, beside the gray garbage can, and stepped onto the gravel. I felt the fear rising in me again. Dad's red car gleamed in the fierce sunshine. I looked down, unwilling to meet the gaze that might await me in the kitchen window. The mere thought of it sent waves of despair shooting through me. When I reached the front doorstep and couldn't be seen from the windows on the first floor I clasped my hands together and closed my eyes.

Almighty God, I uttered silently. Let me get through this and I promise I'll never do anything wrong again. Never ever. I promise by all that is holy. Amen.

I opened the door and went in.

It was cooler in the hall than outside, and after the bright sunshine, almost completely dark. The smell of stew lay heavy in the air. I bent down and untied my shoelaces, carefully placed my shoes by the wall, slunk upstairs, trying to make my face appear normal, and stopped on the landing in a quandary. What would I normally do, go up to my room right away or go into the kitchen to see if dinner was ready?

Voices, the clinking of cutlery on plates.

Was I late?

Had they already started eating?

Oh no, oh no.

What should I do?

The notion of turning on my heel, calmly walking outside, up the hill and into the forest, never to return, came as a joyful clarion call amid all the tension.

Then they would be sorry.

"Is that you, Karl Ove?" Dad shouted from the other side of the door.

I swallowed, shook my head, blinked a few times, and took a deep breath.

"Yes," I said.

"We're eating!" he shouted. "Come on in!"

God had heard my prayer and done as I asked. Dad was in a good mood, I could see that as soon as I entered, he was leaning back in the chair with his legs stretched out, his arms wide apart, and his eyes glinting with mischief.

"What was so good that you lost track of time?" he said.

I sat down next to Yngve. Dad was sitting at the end to the right, Mom at the end to the left. The Formica table with a gray-and-white marble pattern and gray edging, shiny legs, and gray rubber feet was set: brown dinner plates, green glasses with "Duralex" written on the bottom, a basket of crispbread, a big pot from which protruded a wooden ladle.

"Been out with Geir," I said, leaning forward to check if there was a piece of meat in the ladle I lifted out a moment later.

"Where did you go then?" Dad asked, lifting his fork to his mouth. Something pale yellow, perhaps onion, was lodged in his beard, on his chin.

"Down to the forest."

"Oh yes?" he said, chewing several times and swallowing, his eyes trained on me the whole time.

"I thought I saw you on your way up the hill?"

I sat transfixed.

"It wasn't us," I said at length.

"Nonsense," he said. "What devilry were you up to there since you won't admit that's where you were?"

"But we weren't on the hill," I said.

Mom and Dad exchanged glances. Dad said no more. I could move my hands again. I filled my plate and started eating. Dad helped himself to another portion, still with the same apparent gliding movements. Yngve had finished eating, and sat next to me looking down in front of him, one hand resting on his thigh, the other on the edge of the table.

"And how was the schoolboy's first day?" Dad asked. "Did you get any homework?"

I shook my head.

"Was the teacher nice?"

I nodded.

"What was her name again?"

"Helga Torgersen," I said.

"That's right," Dad said. "She lives . . . did she say?"

"In Sandum," I said.

"She seemed so lovely," Mom said. "Young and pleased to be there."

"But we got there late," I said, relief spreading through my body at the turn the conversation had taken.

"Oh?" Dad said, looking at Mom. "You didn't mention that?"

"We got lost," she said. "So we arrived a few minutes late. But I don't think we missed anything important. Did we, Karl Ove?"

"No," I mumbled.

"Don't talk with your mouth full," Dad said.

I swallowed.

"All right," I said.

"And what about you, Yngve?" Dad said. "Any surprises on the first day?"

"No," Yngve said, sitting up straight in his chair.

"You have soccer practice today, don't you?" Mom said.

"Yep," Yngve said.

He had changed teams, had left Trauma, which was the island team where all his friends played, with its fantastic uniform, blue shirts with a white diagonal stripe, white shorts, and blue-and-white socks, for Saltrød, a club in a little town just across Tromøya Sound. Today was his first session there. He would have to cycle over the bridge alone, which he had never done before, and all the way to the training ground. Five kilometers, he had said it was.

"Didn't anything else happen at school today then, Karl Ove?" Dad said.

I nodded and swallowed.

"We're going to have a swimming class," I said. "Six lessons. At another school."

"There you go," Dad said, running the back of his hand across his mouth, but without removing the ribbon of onion from his beard. "That's not a bad idea. You can't live on an island and not be able to swim."

"And it's free, too," Mom said.

"But I need a swimming cap," I said. "Everyone does. And maybe some new swimming trunks? Not shorts, but the kind . . . well."

"We can find a cap for you. But your shorts will have to do you for now," Dad said.

"And goggles," I said.

"Goggles as well?" Dad said, looking at me with a teasing expression. "We'll have to see about that."

He shoved his plate away and leaned back.

"Great meal, Mom!" he said.

"Thanks, Mom," Yngve said, and snuck off. Five seconds later we heard the sound of his bedroom door being closed.

I stayed at the table for a little longer, in case Dad wanted to chat with me. He gazed out the window for a while, at the four boys hanging over the handlebars of their bikes by the second crossroads, then he got up, put his plate in the sink, took an orange from the cupboard, and went down to his study, the newspaper folded under his arm, without saying another word to anyone. Mom started clearing the table and I went to Yngve's room. He was packing his bag. I sat down on his bed and watched. He had real soccer cleats, a pair of black Adidas with screw-on studs, decent Umbro shorts, and some yellow-and-black IK Start socks. Mom had bought black-and-white Grane socks for him at first; he didn't want them, so he gave them to me. But the best equipment he had was the Adidas tracksuit, it was blue with white stripes, in some smooth, shiny material, not that matte, crepe, elastic, gymsuit-style material that all tracksuits used to be made of. Sometimes I sniffed it, buried my nose in the smooth material, because it smelled wonderful. Perhaps I thought that because I wanted one myself so much the smell was imbued with my own desire, perhaps I thought it because the smell, so thoroughly synthetic, didn't remind me of anything else – it didn't seem to belong to this world. That in some way it bore a promise of the future. In addition to this tracksuit, he also had some blue-and-white Adidas wet-weather gear.

He said nothing as he packed. Pulled the big red zipper and sat down at his desk. Looked at the schedule lying on it.

"Did you get any homework?" I said.

He shook his head.

"We didn't either," I said. "Have you covered your books yet?"

"No, we've got the whole week to do it."

"I'm going to do it tonight," I said. "Mom's going to help me."

"Good for you!" he said, getting up. "I'm off. If I'm not back before midnight the headless man's devoured me. I'd like to see how he manages that!"

He laughed and went downstairs. I watched him from the bathroom window, saw him put first one foot on the pedal, then shove off with the other and swing it over the crossbar and pedal as fast as he could in the highest gear until he reached the hill at such a speed that he could freewheel down to the crossroads.

When he had disappeared from view I went onto the landing, stood motionless for a moment to locate Mom and Dad. But all was silent.

"Mom?" I called softly.

No answer.

I went into the kitchen, she wasn't there, then into the back room, she wasn't there, either. Could she have gone to their bedroom?

I went there and stood outside the door for a moment.

No.

In the garden perhaps?

From various windows I scoured all four sides of the garden without catching a glimpse of her.

And the car was parked outside, wasn't it?

Yes, it was.

Not knowing where she was somehow loosened my hold on the house, it was slackened in a confusing, quite disturbing way, and to counter it I went into my room and sat down on the bed to read some comics; that was when it struck me that of course she was downstairs in Dad's office.

I almost never set foot in there. The few times I had, it had been to ask about something, if I could stay up and watch a particular TV program, for example, after knocking first and waiting for him to say, "Come in." Knocking on the door came at a great cost, often so high that I preferred to go to bed without seeing the program. On a couple of occasions he had actually asked us to come in, when he wanted to show us something or give us something, such as envelopes with stamps on them. We put them in the sink in the spare kitchen, which, as far as I knew, was used exclusively for that purpose, to dissolve the gum, and, after drying them for a few hours, we were able to put them in our albums.

Otherwise I never went there. Even when I was on my own at home it never occurred to me. The risk that he would find out was much too great, he would discover anything untoward that was going on, he would sniff it out by some means or other, however well I tried to cover my tracks.

As he had with the hill when we were having dinner. Even though he hadn't seen anything, only us on our way up, he knew we had been doing something wrong. Had he not been in such a good mood he would have brought everything into the open.

I lay on my stomach and started reading a Tempo. It was Yngve's, he had borrowed it from Jan Atle, I had already read it many times. It was for older kids and for me it had a strong aura of belonging to a distant but utterly radiant world. I didn't have any particular preferences regarding the settings of the comic books – it made no difference whether it was the Second World War, as in På Vingene or the Kamp series; nineteenth-century America, as in Tex Willer, Jonathan Hex, or Blueberry; England between the two World Wars, as in Paul Temple; or the fantasy realities, which the Phantom, Superman, Batman, the Fantastic Four, and all the Disney characters appeared in – but my feelings for them were different, they aroused different emotions in me, such that some of the series in Tempo, for example, the one that took place on a racetrack, or some in Buster, for example, Johnny Puma and Benny Goldenfoot, were particularly absorbing, perhaps because they were closer to the reality that I knew existed. In the summer you could see motorcyclists wearing the leathers and helmets with Formula 1 visors, you could see the low-slung cars with all those spoilers on TV, where they occasionally crashed into the barriers or one of the other cars, rolling over and catching fire, the driver being either burned to death or emerging from the flaming wreckage and calmly walking away.

Usually I was totally engrossed by these stories, without giving them a thought, the whole point of course was that you didn't think, at least not with your own thoughts, you just followed the action. That afternoon, however, I quickly put the comic to one side, for some reason I couldn't sit still, and it wasn't much later than five o'clock, so I decided to go out again. I stopped at the top of the stairs, not a sound, she was still down below. What was she doing? She was hardly ever there. At least not at this time, I thought, bending down for my shoes in the hallway and tying the laces. I knocked on the door to Dad's study. That is, the door leading to the corridor into which three rooms opened: the bathroom, the study, and the kitchen with the little box room at the end. In fact, it was a self-contained flat, but we had never rented it out to anyone.

"I'm going out!" I shouted. "Up to Geir's!"

That is what I had been told to do, to tell them if I was going anywhere and say where.

Nevertheless, after a few seconds of silence, Dad's irritated voice sounded from inside the study.

"All right, all right!" he shouted.

A few more seconds of silence passed.

Then Mom's voice, friendlier, as if to compensate for Dad's.

"That's fine, Karl Ove!"

I shot out, closed the door carefully behind me, and ran up to Geir's. I stood outside, called a few times until his mother came around the house. She had gardening gloves on, and was otherwise wearing khaki shorts, a blue blouse, and a pair of black clogs. In her hand she was holding a red trowel.

"Hi, Karl Ove," she said. "Geir went out with Leif Tore a while ago."

"Where did they go?"

"I don't know. He didn't say."

"Okay. Bye."

I turned and walked slowly down the drive with my eyes glazed with tears. Why hadn't they called at my house?

I stopped by the barrier between the two roads. Stood for a moment stock-still, listening. Not a sound. I sat down on one of the barriers. The rough concrete chafed against my thighs. Dandelions grew in the ditch below, all gray with dust. There was a grid next to it, rusty and with a sun-faded cigarette packet stuck between the bars.

Where could they have gone?

Down to Ubekilen?

Down to the pontoons?

To the soccer field and the play area?

Had Geir taken Leif Tore to one of our places?

Up the mountain?

I scanned the mountain. No sign of them there anyway. I got to my feet and started to make my way down. At the crossroads by the cherry tree there were three ways to choose among, if you were going to the landing stages. I chose the one to the right, through the gate, along the path covered with soil and twigs beneath the deep shadows from the tops of the enormous oaks, down to the field where we usually played soccer even though it sloped on both sides and the grass was knee-high, trampled from very early spring, there were also sapling trees growing on it, past the cliff with its grayish crags, generally bare but with some low-scattered cover, and on through the forest to the road. Beyond it there was the new marina, blasted out of the rock, with three identical quays, all with wooden gangways and orange pontoons.

They weren't there, either. I walked along one pontoon anyway; a double-ender had just moored at the tip, it belonged to Kanestrøm, and I went over to see what was happening. Kanestrøm was alone on board and peered up as I stood by the bow.

"So it's you who's out and about, is it?" he said. "I've been doing a bit of fishing, as you can see."

The sun glinted on his glasses. He had a moustache, short hair, a little bald patch on top, and wore denim shorts, a checked shirt, and sandals.

"Would you like to see?"

He held up a red bucket in my direction. It was full of thin, slippery mackerel with bluish, glistening skin. Some were twitching, and the movement seemed to spread to the other bodies lying so close to one another it was as though it were one and the same creature.

"Wow!" I said. "Did you catch all of them?"

He nodded.

"All in the space of a few minutes. There was a huge shoal just offshore. Now we've got enough food for several days!"

He put the bucket down on the narrow gangway. Lifted an old gasoline canister, and put it down beside the bucket. Then some fishing lines and a can of hooks and lures. Humming an old song all the while.

"Do you know where Dag Lothar is?" I said.

"No, I'm afraid I don't," he said. "Are you looking for him?"

"Yes, sort of," I said.

"Would you like to sit at the front here?"

I shook my head.

"Not really. In fact I'm a bit busy."

"All right," he said, and stepped onto the pontoon, bent down, and grabbed his gear. I hurried off so as not to have to walk alongside him. Ran across the stony car park and balanced on the high curbstone all the way up to the main road, where a rather steep path plunged down into the forest. It led to the Rock, the place where everyone on the estate went swimming, where you could dive off a two-meter-high rock and swim across to Gjerstadholmen, on the other side of a maybe ten-meter-wide channel. Even though the water was deep and I couldn't swim, I sometimes went along because so much happened there.

Now I could hear voices from the forest. A high-pitched child's voice and a slightly deeper youth's. A second later Dag Lothar and Steinar came into view between the sun-flecked tree trunks. Their hair was wet and both of them were carrying towels.

"Hey, Karl Ove!" Dag Lothar shouted, catching sight of me. "I saw an adder on my way down here!"

"Really?" I said. "Where did you see it? Here?"

He nodded and stopped in front of me. Steinar also stopped and adopted a posture that made it obvious he had no intention of chatting, he wanted to be on his way as soon as possible. Steinar was in the eighth class at Dad's school. He had long, dark hair and a shadow on his upper lip. He played the bass and had his room in the cellar with its own entrance.

"I was running down," Dag Lothar said, pointing along the path. "As fast as I could, pretty much, and as I was charging around the bend there was an adder in front of me, on the path. I almost didn't manage to stop!"

"What happened?" I said.

If there was anything I was frightened of in this world it was snakes and worms.

"It shot off like lightning into the bushes."

"Are you sure it was an adder?"

"Absolutely. It had the zigzag markings on its head."

He smiled at me. His face was triangular, his hair blond and soft, his eyes were blue, and the expression in them frequently intense and passionate.

"You don't dare go there now, do you?"

"I don't know," I said. "Are Geir and the others down there?"

He shook his head.

"Just Jørn and his little brother, and Eva and Marianne's mom and dad."

"Can I go up with you?" I said.

"Of course," Dag Lothar said. "But I can't play. We're going to have dinner now."

"I have to go home, too," I said. "Have to cover my books."

When we reached the road outside our house and Dag Lothar and Steinar went on to their homes, I didn't go in; I stood around looking for Geir and Leif Tore instead. They were nowhere to be seen. Irresolute, I started walking. The sun, which was just above the ridge, was burning down on my shoulders. I cast a final glance along the road, in case they might have appeared, and then I ran to the path behind the house. The first part went alongside our garden fence, the second skirted Prestbakmo's stone wall, half hidden behind the many slim aspen saplings growing there, which in afternoons throughout the summer stood trembling whenever the sea breeze blew. Then the path parted company with the estate, ran through an area of dense, young deciduous trees, came to some boggy land, at the far end of which was a small meadow beneath an enormous beech tree growing at an angle to a steep incline and immersing everything around it in shadow.

It was strange how all large trees had their own personalities, expressed through their unique forms and the aura created by the combined effect of the trunk and roots, the bark and branches, the light and shadow. It was as if they could speak. Not with voices, of course, but with what they were, they seemed to stretch out to whoever looked at them. And that was all they spoke about, what they were, nothing else. Wherever I went on the estate or in the surrounding forest, I heard these voices, or felt the impact these extremely slow-growing organisms had. There was the spruce by the stream, below the house, so incredibly wide at the bottom of the trunk, yet with damp bark and roots that became visible, like coils of thick rope, so far away from it. The way the branches cascaded, pyramid-like, to the ground, at a distance apparently stocky and smooth, but, close up, covered with small, dark green, perfectly formed needles. All those dry branches, light gray and porous, that could grow within the canopy of branches that were not gray but almost totally black. The pine tree on Prestbakmo's land, long and slim like a ship's mast, with red-flecked bark and small, green, lightly swaying whorls at the end of each branch, which didn't start growing until very near the tip. The oak tree behind the soccer field, whose trunk at the bottom was more like stone than wood, but which had nothing of the spruce's compactness because the oak's branches spread outward forming a sparse vault of foliage above the forest floor, so light that you would never believe there was not only a connection between the lowest part of the trunk and the slender extremities of the branches, but it was also their origin and source. In the middle of the trunk there was something that resembled a grotto, as if the tree had bulged out to form a softly contoured yet hard and gnarled oval, the inner cavity the size of a small head. And the leaves, like all leaves, wherever they sprouted, repeated the same beautiful, partly curved, partly jagged pattern, both when they hung from a branch, green, thick, and smooth, and when they lay on the ground a few months later, reddish brown and brittle. Around this tree the ground was always covered with a thick carpet of leaves in the autumn, flaming yellow and green at the beginning, darker and softer as time passed.

And then there was the tree on the slope by the boggy land. I didn't know what species it was. It wasn't compact like the other large trees but grew out from four equally proportioned trunks, they wound outward, serpent-like, with grayish-green bark full of extended hollows, and in this way it covered just as large an area as an oak or a spruce, but the effect was not as magnificent, it was more subtle. From one of the branches hung a rope and a wooden bar, probably put there by the boys living on the road opposite, they lived as close to this place as we did. No one was there now, and I went up the slope under the branches, grabbed the bar with both hands, and launched myself. I did it twice more. Then I stood for a while under the tree wondering what to do next. From the house facing the slope, occupied by a couple with a small child, came the sound of voices and the clinking of cutlery. I couldn't see anything, but guessed they had to be in the garden. Somewhere in the distance there was the drone of a plane. I took a few steps into the dried-up bog, peering at the sky. A small seaplane was approaching from the coast, flying very low, the sun gleaming on the white fuselage. Once it had gone behind the ridge I broke into a run again, into the shadow of the hill on the other side, where the air was a touch cooler. I looked up at Kanestrøm's house, thinking they were probably at the table eating mackerel at this very minute, there was no one outside at any rate, and then I looked down to the path, where I knew every stone, every dip, every tuft, and every mound. If a run had been arranged here, from our house along the path to B-Max, I would have been invincible. I could have run along that path with my eyes shut. Without ever needing to stop, always knowing what was waiting around the next bend, always knowing where it was best to tread. When we raced on the road Leif Tore won every time, but I would win here, of that I had no doubt. It was a good thought, a good feeling, and I tried to hold on to it for as long as possible.

Well before I reached the soccer field I heard the voices coming from it, screams and shouts and laughter, as if from a distance, as if heard through the forest, there was something almost apelike about it. I stopped in the clearing. The field before me was swarming with children of all ages, many of whom I had barely seen before, most crowded around the ball, with everyone trying to kick it away, the hubbub drifting from place to place, backward and forward, in fits and starts. The field was dark, trampled ground in the middle of the forest, and it sloped slightly up on one side, where quite a number of roots broke through the surface. At each end there was a big goal made with wooden beams, without a net. One side was considerably truncated by protruding rock while the other extended across an uneven patch of large tufts of stiff grass. Almost all my dreams originated here. Running around in this place was bliss.

"Can I join in?" I shouted.

Every kick of the ball returned in a dull echo off the hillside.

Rolf, who was in goal, turned to me.

"You can be goalie if you like," he said.

"Okay," I said, running toward the goal, which Rolf left with a slow, rolling gait.

"Karl Ove's in goal for us!" he shouted.

I positioned myself carefully between the posts and started to follow the game, gradually distinguishing who was on my team, leaned forward, and was ready when the ball approached, and when the first shot came, a loose ball along the ground, I crouched down and took it, bounced it three times on the ground and booted it up the field. The ball gave against my foot, it was big and soft and worn, the same color as the sun-baked ground. The orange tongue flashed beneath the stitching. The ball's trajectory wasn't high, but it went a long way nevertheless, bounced on the right-hand side of the field, and it was a joy to see the pack of boys running after it. I wanted to be a goalkeeper. I went into goal as often as I could, nothing could compare with the feeling of hurling yourself at a shot and stopping it. The problem was that I could only hurl myself to one side, the left. Hurling myself to the right appeared to be contrary to the laws of nature, I couldn't do it, so if the ball came on that side I had to stick out my leg instead.

The trees cast long shadows across the field, and flickering patches of murk pursued the running boys, who merged into a mass and dispersed again and again. But some boys had started walking instead of running, some were bent over, supporting themselves on their knees, and to my disappointment I realized the game was coming to an end.

"Well, I'd better be getting home," one said.

"Me, too," a second said.

"Let's keep going for a bit," a third said.

"I've got to be off, too."

"Shall we make new teams then?"

"I'm off."

"Me, too."

Within a couple of minutes the whole scene had evaporated, and the field was empty.

The wrapping paper Mom had bought was blue and semi-transparent. We sat in the kitchen, I unrolled a piece and cut it to size; if the edge was uneven and jagged Mom straightened it. Then I placed the book on top, spread out the two winglike flaps, folded the paper over them, and taped down the corners. Mom adjusted what needed to be adjusted along the way. Otherwise she sat knitting a sweater that was meant for me. I had chosen it from one of her pattern magazines, a white sweater with dark brown edges, it was different, because the collar was high and straight and there was a split on each side at the bottom so that it hung a bit like a loincloth. I really liked the Indian style and kept a weather eye on how far she had got with it.

Mom did a lot of needlework. She had crocheted the curtains in the living room and the kitchen, and she had sewn the white curtains in our bedrooms, Yngve's with a brown hem and a brown floral print, mine with a red hem and a red floral print. In addition, she knitted sweaters and woolly hats, darned socks, patched trousers and jackets. When she wasn't doing that, or cooking and washing up, or baking bread, she read. We had whole shelves full of books, something none of the other parents had. She also had friends, unlike Dad, mostly women of the same age at her workplace, whom she visited now and then, if they didn't come here, that is. I liked all of them. There was Dagny, whose son and daughter, Tor and Liv, I went to kindergarten with. There was Anne Mai, who was fat and happy and always brought us some chocolate, she drove a Citroën and lived in Grimstad, where I had visited her once with the kindergarten. And there was Marit, who had a son, Lars, the same age as Yngve, and a daughter, Marianne, who was two years younger. They didn't come here often, Dad didn't like it, but perhaps once a month one or more of them came; then I was allowed to sit with them for a while and bask in the radiance. And occasionally in the evening we went to the arts and crafts workshop in Kokkeplassen, it was the kind of place where you could do all sorts of things, the children of other employees at my mother's workplace went there, too, and that was where we used to make our Christmas presents.

Mom's face was gentle but serious. She had tucked her long hair behind her ears.

"Dag Lothar saw an adder today!" I said.

"Oh?" she said. "Where was that then?"

"On the path to the Rock. He almost stepped right on it! Fortunately, though, it was just as frightened as he was and slithered off into the bushes."

"Lucky for him," she said.

"Were there adders when you were growing up?"

She shook her head.

"There aren't any adders in Vestland."

"Why not?"

She chuckled.

"I don't know. Perhaps it's too cold for them?"

I dangled my legs and drummed my fingers on the table while humming, Kisses for me, save all your kisses for me, bye bye, baby, bye bye.

"Kanestrøm caught tons of mackerel today," I said. "I saw them. He showed me the bucket. It was full to the brim. Are we going to get a boat soon, do you think?"

"Take it easy now," she said. "A boat and a cat! Well, it's not impossible, but not this year, that's for certain. Next year maybe. It all costs money, you know. But you can ask Dad."

She passed me back the scissors.

You ask Dad, I thought, but didn't say anything, trying to slide the blade of the scissors along without making a cut, but it stopped, I squeezed the handles together and made a jagged cut.

"Goodness, Yngve's late," she said, looking out of the window.

"He's in safe hands," I said.

She smiled at me.

"I suppose so," she said.

"The note," I said. "The swimming class. Can you sign it now?"

She nodded. I got up and ran along the landing into my room, took the form from my satchel, and was about to run back when the door downstairs opened and I realized what I had done as my heart skipped an extra beat.

Dad's heavy footsteps sounded on the stairs. I stood motionless outside the bathroom as his gaze met mine.

"No running indoors!" he said. "How many times do I have to tell you? It makes the whole house bang and shake. Is that understood?"

"Yes."

He came up and walked past me, his broad back in the white shirt. When I saw he was heading for the kitchen all my happiness evaporated. But I had to go back in there, where he was.

Mom was sitting as before. Dad was standing at the window, looking out. I put the form carefully down on the table.

"Here," I said.

There was one book left. I sat down and made a start on it. Only my hands moved, everything else was still. Dad was mulling over something.

"Yngve's not home yet, is he?" he said.

"No," Mom said. "I'm getting a bit uneasy."

Dad looked down at the table.

"What's that you've brought?" he asked.

"The swimming class," I answered. "Mom was going to sign it."

"Let me have a look," he said, taking the form and reading it. Then he took the pen from the table, wrote his name, and passed the form to me.

"There we are," he said, nodding in the direction of the table. "Now you take all this stuff to your room. You can finish it there. We're going to have supper now."

"Yes, Dad," I said. Put the books in a pile, rolled up the paper, and stuffed it under my arm, grabbed the scissors and the Scotch tape with one hand, the books with the other, and left the kitchen.

While I was at the desk cutting the paper for the last book, a bike rolled up on the gravel outside. Just then the front door opened.

Dad stood waiting for him in the hall when he came up the stairs.

"What time's this supposed to be?" he said.

Yngve's answer was too subdued for me to hear, but the explanation must have been good because the next moment he went into his room. I laid the book on the paper I had cut out, folded it, and placed another book on top as a weight while I tried to pick the tape free from the roll. When I finally loosened a corner and pulled some off, it tore and I had to start again.

Behind me the door opened. It was Yngve.

"What are you up to?" he said.

"Wrapping my books, as you can see," I said.

"We had buns and pop after the training," Yngve said. "In the clubhouse. And there were girls on the team. One of them was really good."

"Girls?" I said. "Is that allowed?"

"Apparently. And Karl Frederik was great."

Through the open window came the sound of voices and footsteps going up the hill. I stuck the bit of tape I had on my finger on the paper and went over to see who it was.

Geir and Leif Tore. They had stopped outside the drive to Leif Tore's and were laughing about something. Then they said bye, and Geir ran the short distance to his drive. When he turned in there and I saw his face for the first time there was a little smile on his lips. His hand was clenched around something in his shorts pocket.

I turned to Yngve.

"What position are you going to play?"

"I don't know," he said. "Probably defense."

"What color's your strip?"

"Blue and white."

"Just like Trauma's?"

"Close," he said.

"Come and eat!" Dad called from the kitchen. When we went in, there was a plate with three slices of bread on it and a glass of milk in our places. Clove cheese, brown cheese, and jam. Mom and Dad were in the living room watching TV. The road outside was gray, and so, almost, were the branches on the trees at the edge of the road, whereas the sky above the trees, across Tromøya

Sound, was blue and open, as though it arched above a different world than the one we were in.

The next morning I was woken by Dad opening the bedroom door.

"C'mon, up, sleepyhead!" he said. "The sun is shining and the birds are singing."

I pulled the duvet to the side and swung my feet onto the floor. Apart from the sound of Dad's footsteps, fading as they went down the landing, the house was perfectly quiet. It was Tuesday. Mom started work early, Yngve had to be at school early while Dad didn't have to start until the second period.

I went to the wardrobe and searched through the piles of clothes, chose a white shirt, which was the best I had, and blue cords. But the shirt was probably too smart, I thought, he would notice, perhaps ask why I was all tarted up, perhaps tell me to take it off. Better to wear the white Adidas T-shirt.

With my clothes under my arm I went into the bathroom. Fortunately Yngve had remembered to leave the water in the sink. I closed the door behind me. Lifted the toilet seat and peed. The pee was a greenish yellow, not dark yellow as it often was in the morning. Even though I tried carefully to make sure all the drops fell inside the bowl when I shook myself dry, some landed on the floor, small transparent globules of moisture on the bluish-gray linoleum. I dried the floor with some toilet paper, which I threw in the bowl before pulling the chain. With the flushing noise in my ears I stood in front of the sink. The water was a pale-green color. Small transparent flakes of God knows what were floating in it. I cupped my hands, filled them with water, leaned forward, and dipped my head in. The water was a tiny bit colder than me. A shiver ran down my spine as it settled on my skin. I soaped my hands, rubbed them quickly over my face, closing my eyes as I did so, and rinsed and dried them and my face on the light-brown towel hanging on my hook.

Finished!

I pulled the bedroom curtain aside and peered out. The trees in the forest, above which the sun had just risen, cast long, dark shadows over the shimmering pavement. Then I put on my clothes and went into the kitchen.

There was a bowl of cornflakes in my place, with a carton of milk beside it. Dad wasn't there.

Had he gone to his study to get his things together?

No. I heard him moving in the living room.

I sat down and poured milk over the cornflakes. Dipped the spoon in and put it to my mouth.

Oh my God.

The milk was off, and the taste of it, which filled all my mouth, caused me to retch. I gulped it down because at that moment my father came across the floor. In through the doorway, across the kitchen, over to the counter, and leaned against it. He looked at me and smiled. I took another spoonful from the bowl and put it to my mouth. The mere thought of the taste made my stomach turn. But I breathed through my mouth and swallowed it after only a couple of chews.

Oh, yuck.

Dad showed no signs of wanting to leave and I continued eating. If he had gone to his study I could have emptied the dish into the bin and covered it with other rubbish, but as long as he was in the kitchen, or on the first floor, I had no choice.

After a while he turned to open a cupboard door, took out a bowl of the same kind as mine and a spoon from the drawer, and sat opposite me.

He never did that.

"I'll have some, too," he said. Sprinkled some golden, crispy flakes from the box with the red-and-green cockerel on it and reached over for the milk.

I stopped eating. Knowing that a calamity was looming.

Dad placed his spoon in the bowl, filled it to the brim with milk and cornflakes, and put it to his mouth. The moment it was inside, his face contorted. He spat it out into the bowl without chewing.

"Ugh!" he said. "The milk's off! Oh, good grief!"

Then he looked at me. I would remember that look for the rest of my life. His eyes were not angry, as I had expected, but amazed, as though he was looking at something he just could not comprehend. Indeed, as though he were looking at me for the very first time.

"Have you been eating cornflakes with sour milk on them?" he said.

I nodded.

"But you can't do that!" he said. "I'll get you some fresh milk!"

He got up, poured the carton of sour milk into the sink, shaking his arms wildly as he did so, rinsed it, scrunched it up, put it in the trash can beneath the sink, and grabbed a fresh carton from the fridge.

"Let me have that," he said, taking my bowl, emptying the contents into the sink, scouring it with the washing-up brush, rinsing it again, and putting it back on the table in front of me.

"There we are," he said. "Now help yourself to more cornflakes and milk. Okay?"

"Okay," I said.

He did the same with his dish and we ate in silence.

Everything about school was new during this period, but all the days had the same format, and we became so familiar with it that it was only a few weeks before nothing surprised us anymore. What was said from the dais was true, and the fact that it was said there made even the most improbable probable. Jesus walking on water, that was true. God appearing as a burning bush at Moses's feet, that was true. Illnesses originating from creatures that were so small no one could see them, that was true. All beings, including ourselves, consisting of tiny, tiny particles that were smaller than bacteria, that was true. Trees needing sunlight to live, that was true. But we not only accepted what the teachers said in this way, we also accepted what they did without a word. Many of our teachers were old, born before or during the First World War, professionally active since the 1930s or 1940s. Gray-haired and dressed in suits, they never learned our names, and what they had to offer as regards knowledge and wisdom never reached us. One of them was called Thommesen. He read a book to us once a week in the break, stooped over the table, his voice a touch snuffled, his complexion pale, almost yellow, and his lips a bluish red. The book he read was about an old woman in the wilderness, impossible to understand, not a word, so the time he may have regarded as cozy, a friendly gesture toward the small schoolchildren, was for us a torment because we had to sit still while he coughed and mumbled his way through the incomprehensible story.

Another teacher was in his fifties, his name was Myklebust, from somewhere in Vestland, but he lived on the island of Hisøya and was a stern disciplinarian. In lessons with him we not only had to stand in a line and march into the classroom, once we were in, we also had to remain standing beside our desks, whereupon he, from beside his desk, would slowly scan the class until there was total silence. Then he would raise himself onto the balls of his feet, bow, and say, “Good morning, class,” or, “Good day, class,” to which we would answer, “Good morning, teacher,” or, “Good day, teacher.” He had no compunctions about slapping pupils in heated exchanges or throwing them against the wall. He often ridiculed those he didn’t like. His gym lessons were nothing short of drills. There were some women teachers of a similar age who were also strict and formal, surrounded by an aura we didn’t recognize but automatically respected and, not infrequently, also feared. One of them lifted me off the ground by my hair once after I said something inappropriate, I remember. Normally they were happy to send notes home, as detentions or early starts were impractical because of the buses.

Alongside this band of old teachers, some of whom had been on the staff all their lives, there was also a new generation, the same age as our parents or even younger. Our teacher, Helga Torgersen, was one of them. She was what we called "nice," that is, she never came down heavily on breaches of rules, never lost her temper, never shouted, never hit or pulled hair, but always solved conflicts through discussion, in a calm, controlled voice, and through involving herself as a person rather than playing the teacher role, such that there was little difference between who she was in private, when she was out with friends or at home with her husband, whom she had recently married, and who she was in the classroom. She wasn't the only one, all the young teachers were like that, and they were the ones we liked to have. The headmaster of the school was young, too, his name was Osmundsen and he was around thirty years old, had a beard, and was strong, not so different from Dad, but we were afraid of him, perhaps more than the others. Not because of anything he did, but because of what he was. If you had done something seriously wrong you were sent to his office. The fact that he didn't do any teaching on a daily basis, that he was a kind of shadowy figure in the school, did nothing to diminish our fear. He was also legendary for another reason. The year before, a slave ship had been found only a few meters off the rocks on the eastern coast of the island. It had gone aground there in 1768 and the find had been described in all the newspapers and even shown on TV. Our headmaster, Osmundsen, was one of the three divers who had found it. To me, someone who held diving in greater esteem than anything else, apart from perhaps sailing ships, he was the greatest man I could imagine. It was like having an astronaut as headmaster. Whenever I did drawings, it was always divers and wrecks, fishermen and sharks I drew, apart from sailing ships, page after page after page. Whenever I watched one of the nature programs on TV, about diving down to coral reefs or diving in a shark cage, I talked about it for weeks afterward. And here he was, the bearded man who, the year before, had broken the surface with an elephant tusk in his hands, from one of the few intact wrecks of a slave ship that has ever been found.

He came into the classroom on the second day to tell us a little about the school and which rules were important, and after he had gone Frøken said that one day in the not-too-distant future, he would come back and tell us about the wreck he had helped to find. She had been standing by the window with her hands behind her back and a smile on her face all the time he had been there, and she did the same when he returned two weeks later, as promised. My mind was ablaze with the stories he regaled us with, but I was also a tiny bit disappointed when it turned out the wreck lay in waters that were only a few meters deep. That detracted from the achievement to no small degree, I had expected a depth of say a hundred meters, with divers who had to hold the rope for a breather on their way up, taking maybe as much as an hour in all, because of the extreme pressure down below. An overwhelming darkness, flashing beams from their torches, perhaps even a little submarine or diving bell. But on the seabed near the coast, right beneath the feet of bathers, within the range of any boy with flippers and a diving mask? On the other hand, he did show pictures of the find, they had a diving boat moored some way out into the bay, they wore wetsuits and had diving cylinders, and it had all been planned down to the last detail with old charts and documents, etcetera.

Once Dad had almost been on TV, they had interviewed him and so on, about something political, but when we watched the news there was nothing, and the item didn't come the next day, either, although we all gathered again to see it. However, he had been on the radio once, interviewed in connection with a stamp exhibition, I forgot all about it, so when I arrived home that day, it had already been broadcast and he had a go at me.

Many of the teachers chattered on about my name at first, they were colleagues of my father, I suppose, and assumed I was named after him, and I really liked that, their knowing about me, that I was the son of my father. From the very first day I did my utmost at school, above all in order to be the best in the class, but also because I hoped it would reach Dad's ears how smart I was.

I loved school. I loved everything that went on there and the rooms where it went on.

Our chairs, low and old, made with iron piping, a slab of wood to sit on, and one to lean back against, our desks covered with cuts and ink from all those who had sat at them before. The board, the chalk, and the sponge; the letters that grew from the chalk in Frøken's hand, an O, a U, an I, an E, an Å, an Æ, always white, which her hands soon became as well. The bone-dry sponge that darkened and swelled when she rinsed it in the sink, the great feeling it gave you when it rubbed out everything, leaving a trail of water that remained there for a few minutes, until the board was as green and pristine as before. Frøken, who spoke in Karmøy dialect, had big glasses and short hair, wore blouses and skirts, so much she asked us about and told us. She taught us not to speak all at the same time, and not just to shout out an answer but to put our hands up and speak only after she had pointed or nodded to us. Because at the beginning a forest of hands shot up in the classroom, waving impatiently to and fro, with students shouting me, me, me, because she didn't ask us difficult questions, only ones everyone could answer. Then there were the breaks and all that happened in them, all the children who were there, large groups assembling and dispersing, activities blazing up and dying back. The pegs in the corridor outside the classroom where we hung our jackets, the smell of ten years of green soap, the smell of piss in the toilets, the smell of milk in the milk lockers, the smell of twenty lunch boxes with a variety of smørbrød being opened at the same time in a classroom. The system of monitors, whereby every week a pupil was responsible for handing out whatever had to be handed out, cleaning the board after the lesson, and collecting the cartons of milk in the long break. The feeling this gave you of being the chosen one. And the very special feeling of walking down the corridors when everyone else was sitting in class, how deserted they were, jackets hanging from the pegs on both sides, the low mumble from the rooms as you walked past, the shafts of daylight that lent the linoleum floor a dull gleam, and on sunny days caused thousands of specks of dust in the air to shimmer, like a miniature Milky Way. A door being thrown open, a boy charging out, could change the atmosphere down the entire length of the corridor, suck up all the attention and significance: suddenly he was all that counted. As though he drew in all the smells, all the dust, all the light, all the jackets, and all the mumbling, like a comet in the sky, one might imagine, where all the passing flotsam and jetsam were sucked into its long, pallid – by comparison with the shining center – tail.

I loved the moment when Geir rang the bell and we wandered up to the supermarket, the competition that had already evolved there, where you had to arrive early and put your satchel as far to the front of the queue as possible so that you could get the best seat on the bus. I loved waiting by the shop and watching the other kids drifting in from all sides. Some of them lived right at the top of the estates behind the shop, others came from down in Gamle Tybakken, and others still from the estates on the flat land beyond the hill. I especially loved watching Anne Lisbet. Not only did she have shiny black hair, she also had dark eyes and a big, red mouth. She was always so happy, she laughed so much, and her eyes, they were not only dark, they sparkled, as though she had so much happiness inside her they were always filled to the brim with it. Her red-headed friend was called Solveig, they were neighbors and were always together, just like Geir and me. Solveig was pale and had freckles, she didn't say much, but she had kind eyes. They lived on the highest estate in Tybakken, in an area I had only visited a couple of times and where I knew no one. Anne Lisbet had a sister who was one year younger, she informed us when it was her turn to talk about herself in class, and a brother who was four years younger. Another boy in the class lived up there, his name was Vemund, he was a little plump and slow, perhaps even slow-witted, he was the last to run, the weakest, threw a ball like a girl, was useless at soccer, couldn't read, but he liked drawing and most of the other things you could do sitting indoors. His mother was a big, strong, energetic woman with angry eyes and a piercing voice. His father was thin and pale and walked on crutches, he had some kind of muscle disease, and he was a hemophiliac, Vemund proudly told us. A hemophiliac, what's that? someone asked. That's when the blood doesn't stop coming out, Vemund explained. When Dad has a cut and it starts bleeding, it never stops, it just bleeds and bleeds, so he has to take some medicine or go to hospital, and if he doesn't he dies.

Anne Lisbet, Solveig, and Vemund's neighborhood, where lots of other children lived, one or two years older or younger than us, was drawn into our world when we started school. The same applied to all the other neighborhoods where my classmates lived. It was as if a curtain went up, and what we had assumed was the whole stage turned out to be only the proscenium. The house on the hillside, whose completely level garden we could see from the top, balancing as it were on the edge of a white wall that plunged straight down, maybe five meters, with a green wire fence on top, was no longer just a house but the house where Siv Johannesen lived. Fifty meters farther away, behind the dense forest, a road came to an end, and it was along there that Sverre, Geir B, and Eivind lived. A bit farther down, but in a very different area, a very different world, lived Kristin Tamara, Marian, and Asgeir.

They all had their places, they all had their friends, and in the course of a few weeks at the end of the summer everything was opened to us. It was both new and familiar, we looked similar, we did the same things and were thus open to one another. Yet at the same time each one of us had something of his or her own. Sølvi was so shy she could barely talk. Unni worked at the market with her parents and brothers every Saturday, selling vegetables they had grown themselves. Kristin Tamara wore glasses with a patch over one eye. Geir Håkon, who had always been so tough, stood writhing with embarrassment in front of the blackboard. Dag Magne had a permanent grin on his face. Geir had received the last rites when he was born because they thought he was going to die. Asgeir always smelled vaguely of piss. Marianne was as strong as a boy. Eivind could read and write and was so good at soccer. Trond was small and ran like lightning. Solveig was so good at drawing. Anne Lisbet's father was a diver. And John, well, he had more uncles than anyone else.

One day, when we had been at school for the first three lessons, and the bus had dropped us off by the supermarket at twelve, Geir and I walked home with John. The sun was shining, the sky was blue, the road dry and dusty. When we came to John's house, he asked if we wanted to go up and have some juice. We did. We followed him up to the veranda, took off our satchels, and sat down on the plastic chairs they had. He opened the door to the house and shouted.

"Mom, we want some juice! I've got some boys from the class here!"

His mother came to the door. She was wearing a white bikini, her skin was tanned, her long hair dark blond. The whole upper part of her face was covered by a pair of large sunglasses.

"How nice," she said. "I'll see if we've got some juice for you."

She went into the sitting room and disappeared through a door. There was an empty feeling about the room. It looked like ours, but there was less furniture, and there were no pictures on the walls. Two of the girls from our class walked past on the road below. John leaned over the balcony and shouted after them, saying that they looked like monkeys.

Geir and I laughed.

The girls didn't take any notice and went on their way. Marianne, who was taller than all the boys, had a high forehead, high cheekbones, and long, blond hair hanging down either side of her face, like curtains. Now and then, when she was angry or desperate, she frowned and had a very special look in her eyes, which I liked. She could also lose her temper and give as good as she got, unlike the other girls.

John's mother came out with a tray holding three glasses and a jug of juice, put a glass in front of each of us, and filled it. The ice cubes floated around close together at the top of the red juice. I watched her as she went back in. She wasn't good-looking, yet there was something about her that made you notice her and watch.

"Were you looking at my mom's ass?" John said with a loud laugh.

I didn't know what he meant. Why would I look at his mother's behind? It was embarrassing as well, because he had said it so loudly that she, too, must have heard it.

"No, I wasn't!" I said.

He laughed even more.

"Mom!" he shouted. "Come out here a minute!"

She came, still in her bikini.

"Karl Ove was looking at your ass!" he said.

She slapped his face.

John continued to laugh. I looked at Geir: he was staring into space and whistling. John's mother went inside. I emptied the glass of juice in one go.

"Would you like to see my room?" John said.

We nodded and followed him through the dark sitting room to his room. There was a poster of a motorbike on one wall and a semi-naked woman, her skin orange from all the sun, on the other.

"It's a Kawasaki 750," he said. "Would you like some more juice?"

"Not for me," I said. "I've got to be getting home for dinner."

"Me, too," Geir said.

The dog snarled at us as we left. We walked down the hill without speaking. John waved to us from the veranda. Geir waved back.

Why would I have looked at John's mother's butt? Was there something about butts I hadn't understood? Why did he shout that out at me? Why did he tell her that? Why did she slap him? And why on earth did he continue laughing afterward? How could you laugh when your mother has hit you? In fact, when anyone has hit you?

I had looked at his mother, and had a vague sense of guilt when I did so, because she was almost naked, but not at her butt, why would I do that?

It was the first time I had been to John's house, and it would be the last. We played soccer and went swimming with John, but he was not someone whose house we went to. Everyone was a bit frightened of him because even though we said he acted tough but actually wasn't, we all knew that in fact he was. He sought the company of boys in the classes above us, was the only one of us who got into fights, and was the only boy who would talk back to teachers and refuse to do what they said. He was tired in the mornings because he was allowed to go to bed whenever he liked, and when he talked about his home life in class, which we all did, it was always about some uncle staying with them. Neither he nor any of us questioned the status of these men, and why would we? John had more uncles than anyone we knew, that was all there was to say about that.

A few days later, a Saturday at the beginning of September, one of those early-autumn days the summer has stretched into and filled to saturation, when the fields are hot and dusty, the sky deep blue, and the first withered leaves whirl through the air almost in a way that is contrary to nature, as the wind is still so mild and all the faces you see are glistening with sweat, Geir and I were walking up through the estate. With us we had a packed lunch and a bottle of juice. We had planned to follow a route we had heard about, it forked left at the end of a long, flat stretch, more or less where the path to the Fina station began. To get there we had to cross land belonging to a house we knew very little about, except that the owner could get angry because one

Sunday that spring a crowd of us had been playing soccer on the grass at the far end of his property, bordered on one side by rocks and a stream on the other, when, after half an hour, he had stormed out and started yelling and shaking his fists at us almost before he was within hearing distance, whereupon we all ran away at once. But now we weren't going to play soccer, now we were only going to cross his fields, along the stream toward the path, which was actually a little track, strewn with small, flat, mostly white, stones. We came to a gate, which we pushed aside, and then we were in a part of the island where we had never been before. The track, lined by tall trees, was in shadow, and it was like walking through a tunnel. Farther down, there was a curve in the path and white rock glistened in the sunshine. That was the cliff where the stones we were walking on must have come from. We stopped in front of it. It wasn't craggy or semi-rotten, so to speak, the way some more porous rocks might be after being blasted, nor was it flaky or slightly rough, the way bare rock and several of the uncovered crags you could come across in the forest were, no, this cliff was completely smooth, almost like glass, and consisted of many slanting surfaces. Was this a vein of gemstones we had stumbled upon? It seemed like it. On the other hand, it was too close to the estate for that, there was absolutely no chance that we had discovered something no one else had, we knew that, but we still filled our knapsacks with fragments of rock. Then we continued down. The stream followed the track, higher up it ran through a deep gully, then fell, where the slope began, trickling downward through a series of small terraces. At one point, where the stream ran almost level with the track, we tried to build a dam. We carried rock after rock to it, covered the crevices between them with moss, and after perhaps half an hour we had managed to make the water flow across the track. Suddenly we heard shots. We exchanged glances. Grabbing our knapsacks, we set off at a run. Shots? Could it be hunters? After a few hundred meters the track leveled out. It lay in deep greenish-black shadow, produced by dense rows of tall, overhanging spruce trees. A hundred meters or so away we caught sight of a paved road, and we stopped, for the shots were clearer now, and they were coming from our left. We walked between the trees, across the soft cover of blueberry bushes and heather and moss, up a gentle slope, and in front of us, perhaps twenty meters below, bathed in sunshine, there was an enormous clearing full of garbage.

A dumping ground.

A garbage dump in the forest!

Some seagulls were flying over the far end. Screaming, they circled above the garbage as if it were the sea. The stench, sweet though still pungent, stung our nostrils. Then the shots rang out again. Not loud, the reports were crisp, like a kind of crackle. Slowly we made our way down to the edge of the dump, and there, a stone's throw away, we saw two men, one standing by a wrecked car, the other lying on his stomach next to him. Both had guns pointing across the dump. They fired at intervals of a couple of seconds. The man on the ground stood up, and then they went into the dump, carrying their guns. We walked over to where they had been. Between the piles of waste, which rose and fell like hills and dales, ran a path that they followed. They were dressed like proper hunters with boots and gloves. They were grown-ups but not old. Around them I saw cars, fridges, freezers, TVs, wardrobes, and dressers. I saw sofas, chairs, tables, and lamps. I saw skis and bikes, fishing rods, chandeliers, car tires, cardboard boxes, wooden chests, Styrofoam containers, and heap upon heap of fat, bulging plastic bags. What lay before us was a whole landscape of abandoned goods. Most of it consisted of bags of food leftovers and packaging, things that all households carried to the trash can every day, but in the part where they were standing, and which the two men were crossing, perhaps a fifth of the total area, larger items had been deposited.

"They're shooting rats," Geir said. "Look!"

They had stopped walking. One held up a rat by the tail. The whole of one side was shot to pieces, or so it seemed. He swung it around a few times and let go, launching it through the air. It landed on some bags and slid down between them. They laughed. The second man kicked away another rat, putting the tip of his boot underneath the corpse and flicking it.

They returned. Their eyes squinting in the bright sun, they said hello to us. They could have been brothers.

"Are you out for a walk, fellas?" one asked. He had curly red hair beneath a blue peaked cap, a broad face, thick lips with a vigorous moustache above, also red.

We nodded.

"A walk to the garbage dump! Takes all kinds, eh," the second man said. Apart from his hair color, which was blond, almost white, and his top lip, which was hairless, he was the spitting image of the first man. "Are you going to eat your packed lunches out there? On top of the piles of garbage?"

They laughed. We laughed a little, too.

"Do you want to watch us shoot some rats?" the first man said.

"Yes, love to," Geir said.

"Then you'll have to stand behind us. It's important. Okay? And stand very still so that you don't distract us."

We nodded.

This time both of them lay down. For a long time they didn't move. I tried to see what they could see. But only when the shots rang out did I see the rat, which seemed to be hurled backward along the ground, as if caught by a sudden, violent gust of wind.

They got up.

"Do you want to come and see?" one said.

"There's not a lot to see!" the second man said. "A dead rat!"

"I want to see it," Geir said.

"Me, too," I said.

But the rat wasn't dead. It was writhing on the ground. The rear part was almost completely blown away. One of the men jabbed the stock of his gun into its head, there was a soft crunch, and it lay still. He studied the gunstock with a concerned expression.

"Oh, why did I do that?" he said.

"You probably wanted to look like a tough guy," the second man said. "Come on. Let's go. You can wipe it when we get to the car."

They went "ashore" again, with us tagging behind.

"Do your parents know you're here?" one said.

"Yes," I said.

"Good," he said. "I suppose they said you mustn't touch anything here? It's full of bacteria and other shit, you know."

"Yes," I said.

"Great! See you, fellas."

Some minutes later a car started down on the road, and we were alone. For a while we ran around looking at things, emptying bags, pushing over cupboards to see if there was anything behind them while shouting out what we had found. A bag of recent magazines, in good condition, was my biggest find. There was a stack of Tempo and Buster, a Tex Willer paperback, and then some of those small, rectangular cowboy magazines from the 1960s. Geir found a slim flashlight, a small deer embroidered on linen, and two stroller wheels. When we were done looking, we sat down in the heather with our finds and ate our packed lunches.

Geir scrunched up the wax paper and threw it as far as he could. Thinking, probably, that it would end up in the middle of the garbage, more or less, but it was met by a gust of wind just as he released it, and it was so light that it didn't even reach the edge and landed in the heather.

"Let's go for a shit, eh?" he said.

"Okay," I said. "Where?"

"Dunno," he said with a shrug.

We walked around in the forest for a while looking for an appropriate spot. Shitting in the garbage dump was, for some reason, inappropriate, there was something dirty about it, it seemed to me, and that was strange, because it was all waste, the whole lot of it. But garbage, that was shiny plastic bags and cardboard boxes, discarded electrical appliances and piles of newspapers. Anything soft and sticky was wrapped. So we had to go into the forest to do it.

"Look at that tree!" Geir said.

There was a tall pine tree on its side perhaps ten meters away. We clambered up on the trunk, pulled down our trousers, and stuck out our cheeks, each holding onto a branch. Geir swung his butt just as the shit came out so that it was flung to the side.

"Did you see that?" he laughed.

"Ha ha ha!" I laughed, trying a different ploy, dropping it like a bomb from a plane over a town. It was a wonderful feeling as it came farther and farther out, the moment when it was suspended in midair until it finally let go and plunged to the ground.

Sometimes I would hold it in for days so that I could have a really big one and also because it felt good in itself. When I really did have to shit, so much that I could barely stand upright but had to bend forward, I had such a fantastic feeling in my body if I didn't let nature take its course, if I squeezed the muscles in my butt together as hard as I could and, as it were, forced the shit back to where it came from. But this was a dangerous game, because if you did it too many times the turd ultimately grew so big it was impossible to shit it out. Oh Christ, how it hurt when such an enormous turd had to come out! It was truly unbearable, I was convulsed with pain, it was as if my body were exploding with pain, AAAAAAGGGHHH!! I screamed, OOOOOHHH, and then, just as it was at its very worst, suddenly it was out.

Oh, how good that was!

What a wonderful feeling it was!

The pain was over.

The shit was in the pan.

Everything was peace and light throughout my body. Indeed, almost so peaceful that I didn't feel like getting up and wiping my bum. I just wanted to sit there.

But was it worth it?

I could spend the whole day dreading one of those big shits. I didn't want to go to the toilet because it hurt so much, but if I didn't it would only hurt more and more.

So in the end there was no option but to go. Knowing full well that this would hurt like hell!

Once I was so terrified I tried to find another way to get the shit out. I half stood, and then I stuck my finger up my butt, as far as it would go. There! There was the shit. As hard as a rock! When I had located it I wriggled my finger to and fro in an attempt to widen the passage. At the same time I pressed a little, and in that way, bit by bit, I managed to maneuver the shit to the side. Oh, it still hurt to work the last bit free, but not so much.

What a method that was!

I didn't mind so much that my finger was all brown; it was easy enough to wash it off. The smell was another matter, however, because although I scrubbed and scoured, a faint odor of shit hung around my finger all day and all night, even the next morning I could still smell it when I woke.

All these pros and cons had to be weighed up against one another.

When Geir and I had finished, we each wiped ourselves with a fern leaf, and then we went to see the result. Mine had a greenish glimmer to it and was so soft it had already spread across the ground. Geir's was light brown with a black patch at one end, harder and more lump shaped.

"Isn't it strange that mine smells good whereas yours stinks?" I said.

"It's yours that stinks!" Geir said.

"It does not," I said.

"Pooh, manohman!" he said, pinching his nose with his fingers as he poked around in my shit with a long stick.

Some flies buzzed above it. They, too, had a greenish glimmer.

"Right," I said. "Shall we go? We can see what has happened to them next Saturday, maybe?"

"I'll be away then," he said.

"Where are you going?"

"To Risør," he said. "We're going to look at a boat, I think."

We ran up to fetch our things, and then we walked home, Geir with a stroller wheel in each hand, me with a plastic bag full of comics. I made him promise he wouldn't say anything at home about where we had been because I had a suspicion they would ban us from going if they knew. I had prepared an explanation for the comics, I had borrowed them from someone called Jørn, who lived on the other estate, in case Dad found them and kicked up a fuss.

Once inside the porch, I stood still for a moment. I heard nothing unusual and bent down to untie my shoelaces.

Somewhere inside the house a door opened. I took off one shoe and put it next to the wall. The second door opened, and Dad was standing in front of me.

I put my other shoe in its place and stood up.

"Where have you been?" Dad asked.

"In the forest."

I suddenly remembered my explanation, and added, looking at the floor, "And then on top of the hill."

"What have you got in the bag?"

"Some comics."

"Where did you get them?"

"I borrowed them from someone called Jørn. He lives up there."

"Let me see," Dad said.

I passed him the bag, he eyed the contents, and took out a Tex Willer paperback.

"I'll have that," he said, and went back to his study.

I went into the hall and was halfway up the stairs when he called me.

Had he sussed me? Perhaps it smelled of garbage?

I turned and went back down, so weak at the knees that they could hardly carry me.

He stood in the doorway.

"You haven't had this week's pocket money," he said. "Yngve had his a while ago. Here you are."

He put a five-krone coin in my hand.

"Oh, thank you!" I said.

"But B-Max is closed," he said. "You'll have to go to the Fina station if you want to buy candy."

It was a long way to the Fina station. First of all, there was the long hill, then there was a long, flat stretch, then there was the long path through the forest, down to the gravel lane that came out by the main road, where the gas station was, which was both fantastic and bad. The hill and the flat stretch were no problem, there were lots of houses and cars and people on both sides. The path was more problematic because after only a few meters you disappeared into the trees where there were neither humans nor anything made by human hand to be seen. Just leaves, bushes, trunks, flowers, the odd bog, the odd pile of felled trees, the odd meadow. I used to sing when I walked there. Gikk jeg en tur på stien, I sang. Children's songs: Fløy en liten blåfugl, Bjørnen sover, and Jeg gikk meg over over sjø og land. When I sang it was as if I wasn't alone, even though I was. It was as if the singing was another boy. If I didn't sing, I talked to myself. Wonder whether anyone lives on the other side, I said. Or wonder whether the forest continues into eternity. No, it can't, we live on an island. So the sea is around us. Perhaps the ferry to Denmark is there now? I'd like a bag of Nox licorice, please, and a bag of Fox lemon candies. Fox and Nox, Nox and Fox. Fox and Nox, Nox and Fox.

On the right-hand side, a vast concourse opened beneath the crowns of the trees. They were deciduous, they were tall, and the tops formed such a dense canopy that the vegetation on the ground was sparse.

Straight afterward I came to the gravel lane, followed it past the old white house and the old red barn, heard the whoosh of the cars on the main road below, and when I reached that, fifty meters away stood the gas station in all its glory.

The four gas pumps holding their hands to their temples in their usual salute. The big white plastic sign with FINA in blue letters shone wanly at the top of the high pillar. A semi was parked there, with the driver hanging an arm out of the open window and talking to someone on the ground beneath him. Outside the kiosk there were three mopeds. A car stopped at one of the pumps, a man with a thick wallet in his back pocket got out, grabbed the nozzle, and stuck it in the tank. I stopped next to him. The pump began to burr; the numbers on what I thought of as the face sped around. It seemed to be blinking at an incredible speed. The man was looking another way while this was going on, and to me it seemed to be a gesture of nonchalance, not following what was happening. This was someone who knew what he was about.

I went to the kiosk and opened the door. My heart was beating fast, you never knew what was awaiting you in here. Would someone talk to you? Crack a joke and make all the others laugh?

"Ah, here's Knausgaard junior," they might say. "What's your father up to today? Is he at home grading papers?"

The customers who hung out went to the school where Dad taught. They wore denim, or even leather, jackets, often with brand labels sewn on. Pontiac, for example, or Ferrari or Mustang. Some of them wore scarves. All of them had their hair down over their eyes. And then they tossed their heads back when they wanted to see something. Outside they spat all the time and drank Coke. Some of them put peanuts into the bottle so they could drink and eat at the same time. Almost all of them smoked, even though it was forbidden. The youngest had bicycles, the oldest mopeds, now and then they were joined by even older boys who had cars.

This was where the bad side came in. Mopeds, long hair, smoking, malingering, playing the machines, everything that happened at the gas station was bad.

The laughter, which always met me when they realized that I was Knausgaard junior, gave me nightmares. I had no answer, I had to lower my head and make a beeline for the counter and buy whatever I was there to buy.

"Knausgaard junior is afraid!" they might shout, if they were in that mood, for they left me alone as often as they shouted at me. You never knew.

This time they left me in peace. Three of them stood around a one-arm bandit, four sat around a table drinking Coke, and then there were three girls wearing makeup and giggling at the table at the back.

I spent all my money on Fox and Nox, it wasn't a small amount, the assistant put them in a transparent plastic bag for me, and I hurried out.

Up the gravel lane, where the air was chilly as the sun had stopped shining there, onto the path. It wasn't so bad, I told myself, looking between all the tree trunks in the vast concourse beneath the branches to see if anything was moving. What should I do? I wondered. Eat the Fox and Nox alternately, or eat all the Fox candies first and then all the Nox?

To the right of me the bushes rustled.

I stopped and stared at them. Slowly retreated a couple of paces, for safety's sake.

More rustling.

What could it be?

"Hello," I said. "Is anyone there?"

Silence.

I bent down and picked up a stone. Hurled it into the bushes and then ran off as fast as my legs would carry me. When I stopped and saw no one was following me, I laughed.

"That taught you!" I said, and walked on.

As for spirits of the dead, it was best not to think about them. Keep your mind on other things at all times. Because as soon as you started thinking about the dead, about them being around you, behind that spruce tree over there, for instance, all of a sudden it was impossible to think about anything else, and you just got more and more frightened. In the end, all you could do was run, with your heart hammering away and a sort of scream echoing throughout your body.

So even though everything had been fine this time, it was still with a sense of relief that I saw the path and the estate on the flat land open in front of me.

The air, which had been clear and bright when I set out, had turned a little gray as it hovered above the land between the houses along the road.

I ran a few steps.

Two girls were standing outside one of the houses. They watched me as I came across the grass. Then they started running toward me.

What did they want?

I watched them approaching but continued to walk.

They stopped in front of me.

One was the sister of Tom, one of the biggest boys on the estate, who had his own car, red and shiny. I had never seen the other girl before. They were at least ten years old.

"Where have you been?" one said.

"Fina," I said.

"What were you doing there?" the other said.

"Nothing," I said, moving off.

They stepped to the side so that I couldn't get past.

"Get out of the way," I said. "I'm going home."

"What have you got in the bag?"

"Nothing."

"Oh yes, you have. Fox and Nox. We can see."

"And? I've bought them for my brother. He's eleven."

"Give them to us."

"No-oo," I said.

One of them, Tom's sister, made a grab for the bag. I swung it to the side. The other girl pushed with both arms and sent me flying.

"Give us the bag," she said.

"No," I said, wrapping my arms round it while struggling to get to my feet.

She pushed me again. I fell headlong and started crying.

"They're mine!" I shouted. "You can't have them!"

"Thought they were supposed to be your brother's," one of them said, grabbing the bag and yanking it out of my hands. Then they ran across the grass as fast as they could to the road, laughing all the while.

"They're mine!" I yelled after them. "They're mine!"

I cried all the way home.

They had stolen my candy. How was that possible? How could they just come up to me and take them? They were mine! I had been given the money by Dad and walked all the way to the Fina station and back! And they just came and took them! Pushed me over! How could they do that?

Approaching my house, I wiped my face on my sweater sleeves, blinked a few times, and shook my head a bit so that no one would see I had been crying.

Once when I was five, Trond's little sister, Wenche, threw a rock at me, right into my stomach. I burst into tears and ran over to our garden fence, where Dad was working. I was sure he would help me, but he wouldn't, on the contrary, he said not only was Wenche a girl, she was also a year younger than me, it was nothing to snivel about. He said I embarrassed him and I should fight back, surely I understood that. But I didn't. Everyone knew it was wrong to throw stones, didn't they? And that fighting back was bad, a last resort?

Not Dad, though, no. He stood there with his stern gaze, and his folded arms, looking across the road to where all the children were playing, nodded his head, and said I should carry on playing and stop bothering him.

And since it was girls who had stolen my candy, there was no hope of any help from Dad.

I stood still in the hallway, listened, removed my shoes, put them by the wall, walked carefully upstairs, and into Yngve's room while the thought of all the lost Foxes and Noxes hit me with renewed force, and again the tears began to roll down my cheeks.

Yngve was lying on his stomach on the bed reading a copy of Buster with his legs in the air. He had emptied a bag of candy.

"What are you crying about?" he said.

I told him what had happened.

"Couldn't you just have run off?" he said.

"No, they were in my way."

"They pushed you. Couldn't you have pushed them?"

"No, they were much bigger and stronger than me," I sobbed.

"Surely you don't have to blub like that because of it," Yngve said. "Would it help if I gave you some of mine?"

"Ye-e-s," I hiccuped.

"Not a lot, though. But some. This one and this one and this one and this one, for example. And maybe this one. There you go. Is that better now?"

"Yes," I said. "Can I sit here as well?"

"You can sit here until you've eaten these. Then you've got to go."

"Okay."

After I had eaten the candy and washed my face in cold water it felt as if I was starting afresh. Mom was in the kitchen, I could hear, she was cooking, the fan was blowing. All the time I had been upstairs I hadn't heard anything from Dad, so he must have been in his study.

I went into the kitchen and sat down on a chair.

"Did you buy some candy today?" Mom asked. She was standing by the stove and turning what was probably minced meat in the frying pan. It was sizzling and spitting. There was a pan on the other plate hissing away inaudibly, drowned by the noise of the fan.

"Yup," I said.

"Did you go all the way down to the Fina station?" She always said, "the Fina station," never just "Fina," as we did.

"Yes," I said. "What are we having?"

"Casserole with rice, I thought."

"And pineapples?"

She smiled. "No, not pineapples. That's a Mexican dish."

"Oh, yes."

There was a pause. Mom tore open a bag and poured the contents over the meat, then she measured some water in a jug and poured that on top. As soon as that was done, the water was bubbling in the pan and she poured in the rice. She sat down at the other side of the table, pressed her hands against her back, and stretched.

"What do you actually do in Kokkeplassen?" I said.

"Surely you know, don't you? You've been there many times."

"You take care of the people living there."

"Yes, you could put it like that."

"But why are they there, actually? Why don't they live at home?"

She considered that question at length. Indeed, she thought for so long that my mind was on other things by the time she answered.

"Many of the people who live there suffer from anxiety. Do you know what that is?"

I shook my head.

"It's when you're afraid of something and you don't know what it is."

"Are they afraid all the time?"

She nodded.

"Yes, they are. And then I talk to them. Do a variety of activities with them to make them less afraid."

"But . . ." I said. "Aren't they afraid of one thing in particular? Or are they just afraid?"

"Yes, that's exactly how it is. They're just afraid. But then it passes and then they move back home."

There was another pause.

"Why did you ask about that? Is it something you've been wondering about?"

"Nope. It was Frøken. We had to tell her what our parents did. I said you worked at Kokkeplassen, and she asked what you did there. I wasn't a hundred percent sure. But do you know what Geir said? He said his mother taught the people who were where she worked to tie their shoelaces!"

"That's a good way of putting it. The ones she works with aren't afraid. But they have difficulty doing the little chores we take for granted. Like cooking and washing. And getting dressed. So Martha goes there and helps them."

She got up and stirred the pot.

"They're loonies, aren't they?" I said.

"'Mentally handicapped' is the expression," she said, looking at me. "'Loony' is a very ugly word."

"Is it?"

"Yes."

A door opened on the floor below.

"I'm going to see Yngve," I said, getting up.

"You do that," Mom said.

I walked as fast as I could without running. If I set off as soon as I heard the first door I would reach Yngve's room before Dad had come up the stairs and seen me. If I set off when I heard the second door he would see me.

Now I could hear the first footstep on the stairs as I closed the door behind me.

Yngve was still on his bed reading. He had a soccer magazine now.

"Food ready soon?" he said.

"I think so," I said. "Can I borrow a comic?"

"Help yourself," he said. "But be gentle with it."

Dad walked past outside. I bent down over the pile of comic books on the shelf. He kept his comics in collections, so The Phantom was in a file, for example, while mine lay all strewn about. He was also a member of the Phantom Club.

"Can I take the whole file?" I said.

"Out of the question," he said.

"The annual then?"

"You can have that," he said. "But bring it back when you've finished!"

On Saturdays we had cold rice pudding in the morning and a hot meal in the evening, usually a casserole, always in the dining room, and not in the kitchen where we normally ate. There was a napkin by each place. Mom and Dad drank beer or wine with the food; we were given a soft drink. After eating we watched TV. More often than not there was some Broadway-style show from a studio in Oslo, with women dressed in net stockings, jackets, and hats and carrying canes, while men in dinner jackets, white scarves, and hats and carrying canes came down a white staircase singing some song or other. Frequently it was "New York, New York." Sølvi Wang, whom Mom liked, usually was featured. Leif Juster, Arve Opsahl, and Dag Frøland were other regular contributors to Saturday night TV. Wenche Myhre used to perform a sketch playing a young girl in a nursery, or there was the Eurovision Song Contest, which, aside from the FA Cup Final, the European Cup Final, and Wimbledon, was the pinnacle of the year's TV.

On this evening, a man dressed in rags sat on a roof singing and he had an incredibly deep voice. Oul man rivå, he sang. I was humming the song all evening. Oul man rivå, I sang as I was brushing my teeth, Oul man rivå, I sang as I was getting undressed, Oul man rivå, I sang lying in bed and going to sleep.

Mom and Dad had closed the sliding door and were in the living room sitting and chatting, smoking, listening to music, and finishing off the bottle of wine after dinner. Between the songs I could just hear Dad's rumbling voice and was aware that Mom said something in the pauses, although I couldn't hear her.

I fell asleep. When I awoke they were still there. Were they going to talk all night, or what? I thought, and fell asleep again.

The warm, bright September days were summer's last burst of energy before abruptly crumbling, and in its place came rain. T-shirts and shirts were exchanged for sweaters and long trousers, jackets were put on in the morning and, when the torrential autumn rain set in, rubber boots and raincoats. Streams swelled, gravel roads were covered in puddles, water poured down the gutters in the streets, bringing with it sand, small stones, and pine and spruce needles. Beach life stopped, people no longer went on trips in their boats on the weekends, and the traffic to and from the pontoons was all about fishing now. Dad also got out his fishing equipment, the rod, the reel, the lures, and the gaff, put on his dark-green oilskins, and chugged to the far side of the island, where some weekends he stood alone for hours, fishing for the big cod that were there during the winter season. It was very appropriate that the swimming class started at this time because there was something unnatural about the thought of swimming in an indoor pool when the sun was baking hot outside. It was every Tuesday evening all autumn, and everyone in the class had signed up. Since Mom left for work before I got up in the morning I reminded her about the course the night before, so that she would remember to buy me a swimming cap on her way home. We should have done it a long time ago, but for some reason or other it hadn't happened. When I heard her car coming up the hill I ran down into the hall and waited. She came in wearing her coat, carrying a bag over her shoulder, and, on seeing me, smiled a weary smile. No plastic bag from a sports shop in evidence anywhere. Perhaps it was in her handbag? After all, a bathing cap occupied no space.

"Have you got the cap?" I said.

"Oh no, do you know what?" she said.

"You forgot it? You didn't forget it, did you? The course is today!"

"I did. I was lost in my own world on the way back from work. But you know . . . when does it start?"

"At six," I said.

She looked at her watch.

"It's half past three now. The shops close at four. I can make it if I go now. I can do that. Tell Dad I'll be back again in an hour, will you?"

I nodded.

"Hurry up then!" I said.

Dad was in the kitchen frying chops. A cloud of cooking fumes hovered in the air above the stove. The lid on the potatoes clanked against the side of the pan with the pressure from the steam. He had the radio on and stood with his back to it, one hand holding the spatula and the other resting against the edge of the counter.

"Dad?" I said.

He swivelled round.

"What?" he said. And when he saw me, "What do you want?"

"Mom'll be back in an hour," I said. "She told me to tell you."

"Has she been here and gone off again?"

I nodded.

"Why? What for?"

"To buy a swim cap. I've got my swimming course today."

The irritation in his eyes was unmistakable. But I wasn't out of the woods yet. I couldn't just turn on my heels and go.

Then he nodded in the direction of my room, and I went, glad to have got off so lightly.

Ten minutes later he called us. We slunk onto the landing from our rooms, warily pulled our chairs back from the table, sat down, waited until Dad had put the potatoes, a chop, a little pile of browned onions, and some boiled carrots on our plates before, sitting up straight and utterly still, apart from our forearms, mouths, and heads, we started to eat. No one said a word during the meal. When our plates were empty, except for the potato skins and the bones that had been gnawed clean, we thanked Dad and went back to our rooms. From the whistling I could hear I concluded that Dad was making coffee in the kitchen. After it had stopped, he went down to his study, probably with a cup of coffee in his hand. I lay on my bed reading with my ears tuned to the noises outside the house, the drone of cars passing, and I recognized the sound of Mom's VW the moment it turned into the road farther down, Beetles were unmistakable and, had I made a mistake, nonetheless, I was absolutely certain I was right a few seconds later when it entered Nordåsen Ringvei. I got up and went onto the landing above the staircase. As Dad was in his study, it was the best place to wait.

The door opened, I heard her taking off first her boots, then her jacket, which she hung on the hat stand in the corner, and her footsteps across the carpet in the hallway below, which, as they began to climb the stairs, seemed to merge into the sight of her.

"Have you got it?" I said.

"Yes, no problem," she said.

"Can I see it?"

She passed me the white Intersport bag she was holding. I opened it and pulled out the bathing cap.

"But Mom, it's got flowers on it!" I said. "I can't wear a cap with flowers on it! That's no good! It's a woman's! You bought a woman's swimming cap!"

"Isn't it lovely?" she said.

I looked down at the cap with tears in my eyes. It was white, and the flowers decorating it were not just printed on but small, raised plastic imitations of flowers.

"You'll have to go and change it," I said.

"Karl Ove, my love, the shops are closed. I can't."

She laid her hand on my head and looked at me.

"Is it really that bad?" she said.

"I can't go to the class with this. I won't go. I'll stay at home."

"But Karl Ove," she said.

The tears were streaming down my cheeks now.

"You've been looking forward to the class so much," she said. "Surely a few flowers don't matter that much, do they? You can still go. Then we'll buy you a new cap for next time. I can use this one. I need one. And I think the flowers look lovely, I really do."

"You don't understand anything, do you," I said. "I can't go. That's a woman's swimming cap!" I shouted.

"Now I think you're being unreasonable," Mom said.

At that moment Dad's study door slammed. He could scent a scene like this from a range of several kilometers. Quick as a flash, I dried my eyes and put the cap back in the bag. But it was too late. He was already at the bottom of the stairs.

"Well?" he said.

"Karl Ove didn't like the bathing cap I bought him," Mom said. "So now he's refusing to go to the swimming class."

"What nonsense is this!" Dad said. He came up the last steps and lifted my chin with his hand.

"You're going to the class with the cap your mother has bought you. Is that understood?"

"Yes," I said.

"And don't burst into tears over such trivialities. It's pathetic."

"Yes," I said, wiping my eyes with my hand again.

"Go into your room and stay there until it's time to leave. Now."

I did as he said.

"Imagine going all the way back to town to buy it in the first place," I heard him say as they went into the kitchen.

"But he's been looking forward to this class for so long," Mom said. "It was the least I could do. I had promised him. And then I went and forgot."

An hour later Mom came in to get me. We went downstairs to the hall, I had decided not to talk to her, and said nothing, just put on my boots and anorak. In my hand I had a bag with my trunks, towel, and the swimming cap in it. Opening the door, I saw Geir and Leif Tore waiting outside, each holding a plastic bag. It was getting dark outside, and the air was heavy with drizzle. Their hair was wet; their jackets glistened in the light from the lamp above the door.

They said hello to Mom, Mom returned the greeting, and then she dashed across the gravel with us close behind. She opened the car door, pushed the seat forward, and we clambered onto the backseat.

She inserted the key into the ignition and started the engine.

"Is there something wrong with the exhaust?" Leif Tore asked.

"Yes, it's an old car," Mom said, putting the car into reverse and backing up the hill. The wipers dawdled to and fro across the windshield. The headlights lit up the black spruce trees across the road, which seemed to take a step toward us.

"Geir can swim," I said. Then I remembered I wasn't going to say anything.

"Very impressive!" Mom said. Flicked the turn-signal lever down and glanced through the right-hand window before turning onto the road and driving off to the next crossroads, where everything was repeated, just the other way around: now the lever was flicked up and she glanced through the left-hand window.

"And you, Leif Tore, can you already swim?" she said.

The roar of the engine rebounded off the blasted rock face on the other side of the road as we struggled up the hill to Tromøya Bridge. The lights at the top of the mast glowed red in the night. If you didn't know any better you would probably think they were floating in the air, I thought.

Leif Tore shook his head.

"Just a bit," he said.

The rain-filled gloom had begun to merge the sea and the uplands, I could see as we crossed the bridge. The difference could still be distinguished because the darkness of the land was a shade deeper and denser than that of the calm water, which had a kind of sheen to it. The lights, visible on both sides, seemed to hang in midair in the far distance, almost like stars in the firmament, while those closest, whose illuminated surroundings could still be made out, were set in the landscape in quite a different way. Green and red lights shone from lanterns or small lighthouses here and there. We drove down to the intersection over the bridge, houses and gardens appeared on one side, industrial buildings on the other, yellow and empty in the light of the headlights, with the dripping tarpaulin of night hanging above. The wipers were racing across the windshield; the rain was heavier now. Leif Tore said Rolf had been in the same swimming class. The teacher was an older woman, in her forties, who, according to Rolf, was very strict. But Rolf said so many things. If he got a chance to pull a fast one on Leif Tore, or anyone else, he took it. I said I didn't have any goggles with me, but I could see underwater, so it wasn't a problem. Geir showed us his. They were Speedo goggles with blue glass and white elastic.

"What about your cap?" Leif Tore said.

"My dad's. It's a bit big!" Geir laughed.

"Does your dad have a swimming cap? Mine definitely doesn't. Does yours?" Leif Tore asked, looking at me.

"I don't think so. What's the time, Mom? Will we make it?"

Mom raised her left arm and consulted her watch.

"Twenty-five to six. So we're in good time."

"Why do only women and children wear caps?" Leif Tore continued.

"They don't," I said. "Swimmers who take part in competitions wear them, too."

"I'm going to get one of those white ones with a Norwegian flag on it the next time we have any money," Geir said. "Dad promised me today. And then he said I could join a swimming club as soon as I can swim properly. In town."

"But weren't we going to join a soccer club?" I said.

"Ye-es. I can do both, can't I?" Geir said.

Mom signaled to leave the main road, drove up a gravel road leading to an unilluminated school, and parked in front.

"I think it's over there," she said, pointing to a low building behind.

"It is," Leif Tore said. "Because that's Trond and Geir Håkon over there."

"I'll be back to pick you up in about an hour then," Mom said. "Good luck!"

We piled out of the car with our bags and ran to the entrance as Mom's green Beetle turned and drove back the way we had come.

The changing room was cold, the floor a greenish color, the walls white, the light in the ceiling shrill. A number of cream-colored wooden benches ran along three of the walls, with a line of hooks above. Five of the boys had come; they chatted and laughed as they undressed. They said hi to us.

"The water in the pool's cold!" Sverre said.

"Freezing cold," Geir B added.

"Have you been in?" Leif Tore said.

"Of course," Sverre said.

I sat down on the bench and pulled my sweater over my head. Stood up and took off my trousers. The faint smell of chlorine filled me with happiness. I loved chlorine, I loved swimming pools, I loved swimming. Geir B, Sverre, and Dag Magne went into the shower naked. Trond and Geir Håkon followed. We had been told in the strictest of terms that we had to have a shower before we entered the pool. I watched them all as they stood at a distance from the shower, stretched out a hand to turn it on with as much caution as if they were dealing with an unpredictable animal, and checked the temperature of the water with the other. Once it was warm enough they stood underneath, all with their backs to the wall. Their hair stuck to their foreheads. I took off my underpants, left my clothes in a pile on the bench, and waited for Geir and Leif Tore to finish. The door opened, four new boys came in, among them John. There was something I didn't like about being naked when the new arrivals were well wrapped up, so I took the soap and towel from my bag and went into the showers, to the one farthest away, which was one of three that were unoccupied. Geir and Leif Tore came straight after me, fortunately.

Oh, how wonderful it was to stand under the hot water as the room slowly filled with steam! I could have stood there forever. But my skin went so red whenever I showered, especially my bum, which after ten minutes of really hot water looked like the rear end of one of those monkeys with red rumps. It was impossible not to notice or make a comment on, so after a couple of minutes and a quick check of the color of my backside, I turned the shower off, dried, and went into the changing room to put on my trunks. It wasn't only after a shower that it went red, it also stuck out quite a bit. Dad used to say I had a bulging bum. It was true, and it was important for me that no one noticed and made a comment. That kind of thing spread like wildfire.

I sat for a while on the bench, bent forward with my hands on my knees, watching the others coming out of the shower one by one, all with big heads, fair hair, darkened now by the water, pale skin where, after only a few weeks, the clear marks left by a T-shirt and swimming trunks were now disappearing, and skinny bodies, no one was fat in our class, not even Vemund, he was just a bit flabby and had round cheeks, but still he was called fat, the class fatty. Someone had to be. The skin on my arms was developing goose pimples in the cold air and I ran my hands over them quickly a few times. I tried to recapture the happiness the chlorine had filled me with, but now it was as if I couldn't regain it, as if it had been used up or taken over by everything else that was happening.

Through the chink in the open door I saw that the lights in the swimming pool had been switched on.

"It's starting!" someone shouted.

The few boys left in the showers hurried out. The rest put on their bathing trunks, goggles, and caps.

A whistle sounded from inside. I took the cap from my bag, crumpled it up in my hand, and went to the pool, after Geir, before John. The girls came out of their changing room opposite at exactly the same moment. The teacher stood by the edge of the pool beckoning to us. The whistle hung from a cord around her neck. She was holding a sheet of paper in a transparent plastic sleeve.

She blew the whistle again. The last boys came running out of the changing room, laughing.

"Don't run!" she yelled. "We never run in here. It's slippery and the floor's hard."

She adjusted her glasses.

"Hello and welcome to the class!" she said. "We'll be meeting here six times this autumn, and our goal is to teach everyone to swim. As this is our first lesson today, we'll take things slowly. First of all, we can play in the water for a bit, and then we'll practice some strokes on the mats you can see over there."

"On land?" Sverre said. "Are we going to learn to swim on land?"

"Yes, that's exactly what we're going to do. Now, there are some simple rules we have to follow. You always shower before getting into the pool. Is there anyone here who hasn't had a shower?"

No one said anything.

"Good! And you must all wear caps. There is to be no running, not even when we have finished. There is to be no dunking! Not under any circumstances! There is to be no jumping into the pool. Always use one of the two ladders you can see."

"Are we allowed to dive then?" John asked.

"Can you dive?" she asked.

"Yes, a bit," John said.

"No, you are not allowed to dive," she said. "Not even 'a bit.' So, no jumping, no diving, and no running. And whenever I blow this whistle you pay attention to me. Have you got that?"

"Yes."

"Right, let's start with the roll call. Answer me when I say your name."

Anne Lisbet was the first to have her name called out, as usual. She was standing right at the back in a red swimsuit, smiling, laughing almost, as she answered. I felt a tingle go through me. At the same time I dreaded my name being read out, hated the way every name was sliced off like a piece of bread and put to one side, until it was my turn. Usually I looked forward to this, sitting in class with everyone's attention drawn to me for a second, how loud and clear my voice was . . . but this was different.

"John!" she said.

"Yes, here," John said, waving his raised hand.

She sent him a sharp glance before going on to the next.

"Karl Ove!" she said.

"Yes," I said.

She looked at me.

"Where's your bathing cap? Haven't you got it with you?"

"Here," I said, raising my hand with the cap so that she could see.

"Put it on then, young man!" she said.

"I'd prefer to wait until I'm in the water," I said.

"There's no 'preferring' here. On with it!"

I unfurled it, drew apart the sides, and wriggled it into position on my head. This did not go unnoticed.

"Look at Karl Ove!" someone said.

"He's wearing a woman's cap!"

"A cap with flowers on it! That's for old biddies!"

"Now, now," said the swimming teacher. "All caps are acceptable here. Marianne!"

"Yes," Marianne said.

But I didn't escape so lightly. All around me there were grins, nudges, and amused grimaces. The cap seemed to be burning on my head.

When the roll call was over everyone went as quickly as they could to the two ladders at the corners of the pool. The water was cold, it was best to submerge your body as fast as possible, and I crouched down, launched myself, and took as many strokes as I could manage along the bottom. I could swim underwater; the problem was on top. But what a feeling it was, with the bottom only a few centimeters beneath my body and all the water above me! As I broke the surface and stood up, I searched for Geir.

"Did you borrow your mom's cap, or what?" Sverre said.

"No, I did not," I said.

Geir and Leif Tore had both taken a kickboard, they lunged forward with it in their hands, and kicked as hard as they could. I went over to them.

"Want to go a bit farther up and dive?" I said.

They nodded, and we waded off with the slow, heavy steps you take when you walk in water, until it was up under our arms.

"Is it true your eyes can be open underwater?" Leif Tore said.

"Yes," I said. "All you have to do is keep them open."

"But it'll sting!" he said.

"It doesn't sting mine," I said, happy for the opportunity he had given me to shine. For a while we tried to dive the way divers did, swimming on the surface of the water and then bobbing down with their legs in the air. None of us could do it, but Geir was quite close. He was good at everything in water.

When the whistle sounded and we assembled by the thin blue mats to practice strokes, I had almost completely forgotten about the cap. But then Marianne came over to me.

"Why do you have a woman's cap?" she said. "Did you think the flowers were so pretty, or what?"

"That's enough about the cap," the teacher said. She had been standing right behind us. "Okay?"

"Okay," Marianne said.

We lay on our stomachs on the mats, waving our arms and kicking our legs like pale overgrown frogs. The teacher walked around correcting our movements. Then we had to go into the pool again, take a kickboard, and practice our kicks. When we had been doing that for some time, the lesson was suddenly over. After a short get-together at the end of the pool, when she praised us, told us what we would be doing in the next lesson, and reminded us to have a shower, we went into the changing room. I sat down on the bench and was about to put the cap in my bag when Sverre bounded over and grabbed it out of my hand.

"Let me have a look!" he said.

"No," I said. "Give it to me."

I lunged at him, but he jumped back. He put on the cap and walked around wiggling his hips.

"Oh, what lovely flowers I have on my cap," he said in a girl's voice.

"Hand it over," I said, getting up.

He took a couple more mincing steps.

"Karl Ove's got a woman's cap, Karl Ove's got a girl's cap," he said. As I ran at him he removed the cap, dangled it in front of me, and took a couple of steps backward.

"Let me have it," I said. "It's mine!"

I made another lunge at it. Sverre threw it to John.

"Karl Ove's got a girl's cap," he chanted. I turned to him and tried to grab it. He gripped my arm and squeezed while holding the cap in front of my face.

I started to cry.

"I want it!" I shouted. "Give it to me!"

My eyes were almost blind with tears.

John threw it back to Sverre.

He held it up in the air and gazed at it.

"Look! What nice flowers!" he said. "Oh, how pretty they are!"

"Give it to him," someone said. "He's crying."

"Oh, the poor baby. Do you want this lovely cap back?" he said, and threw it to where I had been sitting. I walked back, put it in my bag, took my towel, and went in for a shower, stood under the hot jet for a brief moment, dried, dressed, and was the first to leave the changing room, found my boots among all the others in the front hall, put them on, opened the glass door, and stepped out into the playground, where the large, shallow puddles, visible only because they were a little shinier than the surrounding pavement, were lashed by rain. There wasn't a soul around. I walked toward the school building, which was almost identical to ours, and saw the green Beetle parked exactly where Mom had dropped us just over an hour ago.

I opened the door and got into the back.

"Hi," Mom said, turning to me. Her face was illuminated by the gleam of a lamp hanging over the edge of the school like a vulture.

"Hi," I said.

"Did it all go well?"

"Fine."

"Where are Geir and Leif Tore?"

"They're coming."

"Can you swim now?"

"Nearly," I said. "But we swam mostly on land."

"On land?"

"Yes, on some mats. To learn the strokes."

"Oh, I see," Mom said, turning back. The smoke from the cigarette she held in her hand hung under the sloping windshield, thick and gray. She took another drag, then pulled out the little metal ashtray and stubbed out the cigarette. From the swimming pool door swarmed a mass of kids. A car headlight swept across the pavement, then another. The two cars drove almost right up to the entrance.

"Perhaps I'd better tell them you're here," I said, opening the door.

"Geir! Leif Tore!" I shouted. "Car's over here!"

They both looked at me, but they didn't come, they stayed with the kids collecting around the entrance.

"Geir! Leif Tore!" I shouted. "Come on!"

And then they came. Said something to the others first, then they set off, side by side, at a jog across the playground. White plastic bags hanging from their hands, the only things about them that reflected any light and they resembled heads.

"Hello, Fru Knausgaard," they said, getting into the backseat.

"Hello," Mom said. "Was it good?"

"Not bad," they said. They looked at me.

"Yes, it was fun," I said. "But the teacher was strict."

"Was he?" Mom said, starting the car.

"It was a she," I said.

"Oh," Mom said.

When, four days later, I was walking up through the forest with Geir, Leif Tore, and Trond, after the brief and unsuccessful hunt for treasure at the end of the rainbow, the fantasy of being able to swim among the trees there made me pause to wonder whether I would ever be able to swim at all. Grandad couldn't swim, and at one time he had even been a fisherman. I didn't know if Grandma could, but I found it difficult to imagine her swimming.

Behind the swaying pine trees clouds scudded across the sky.

What was the time, I wondered.

"Do you have your watch on, Geir?" I said.

He shook his head.

"I do," Trond said, thrusting his hand forward and up, making his sleeve glide back, so that his watch was visible.

"Twenty-five past one, no, past two," he said.

"Twenty-five past two?" I said.

He nodded and my stomach churned. On Saturdays we had rice pudding at one.

Oh no, oh no.

I broke into a run, as if that would help.

"Got a rocket up your ass, or what?" said Leif Tore behind me. I craned my head.

"Lunch was supposed to be at one," I said. "I'd better go."

Up the soft fir-needle-strewn incline, over the little algae-green stream, past the tall spruce, and up the slope to the road.

Both Mom's and Dad's cars were there. But not Yngve's bike. Had he been home, eaten, and cycled off again? Or he was he late as well?

The thought, unlikely though it was, kept a little hope burning within me.

Across the road, into the drive. Dad might be behind the house, might come round the corner at any second. Might be waiting for me in the hall, might be in his study, and tear the door open when he heard me. Might be standing at the kitchen window waiting for me to appear.

I closed the door gently behind me and stood still for a couple of seconds. Footsteps on the kitchen floor above me. Dad's. I took off my boots, placed them by the wall, unbuttoned my waterproof jacket, pulled down my waterproof trousers, took them into the boiler room, and hung them on the line there. Stopped and glanced at myself in the mirror above the chest of drawers. My cheeks were red, my hair was a mess, there was some shiny snot under my nose. My teeth stuck out as always. Buckteeth, as people called them. I went upstairs and into the kitchen. Mom was doing the dishes; Dad was sitting at the table eating crab claws. Both looked at me. The pot of rice was on the stove, the orange plastic ladle protruding.

"I lost track of time," I said. "Sorry. We were having a lot of fun."

"Sit down," Dad said. "You must be hungry, I imagine."

Mom took a dish from the cupboard, filled it with rice pudding, and put a bowl of sugar, a packet of margarine, and a cinnamon shaker, which hadn't been put away with the other spices, beside it.

"What have you been up to?" she said. "Oh, you need a spoon as well."

"This and that," I said.

"You and . . . ?" Dad said, without looking at me. He folded the small white bits that stuck out from the end of the hairy orange claw to the side and put the claw to his mouth. Sucked at it with a short slurp. I could hear the meat being released and sliding into his mouth.

"Geir, Leif Tore, and Trond," I said. He broke the empty claw at the joint and began to suck on the next. I put a knob of margarine on the rice, even though it wasn't warm enough to melt, and sprinkled some cinnamon and sugar on it.

"I've cleaned the roof gutters," he said. "You should have been here."

"Oh, yes," I said.

"But now I'm going to chop a bit of wood. As soon as you've eaten up, you can join me."

I nodded and tried to look happy, but he could read my thoughts. "We'll be finished in time for the match," he said. "Who's playing today?"

"Stoke and Norwich," I said.

"Noritsch," he said, correcting my pronunciation.

"Nowitsch," I said.

I liked Norwich, I liked their yellow-and-green uniforms. I liked Stoke, too, with their red-and-white-striped shirts. But best of all I liked the Wolverhampton Wanderers, who played in gold and black and whose mascot was a wolf's head. Wolves, that was my team.

I would have preferred to lie down and read until the match started, but I couldn't say no to Dad, and bearing in mind what could have happened I had to count myself lucky.

The rice was so cold that I ate it in a couple of minutes.

"Are you full?" Dad said.

I nodded.

"Let's go then," he said.

He scooped the empty crab shells into the trash can, put the plates on the counter, and went out, with me hard on his heels. From Yngve's room came the sound of music. I looked at the door, nonplussed. How could that be? His bike wasn't there.

"Come on," Dad said, already on the landing. I followed him. On with my jacket and boots, out onto the gravel, wait for him.

He came a few minutes later with an ax in his hand and a playful glint in his eye. Follow him over the flagstones, then across the waterlogged lawn. We weren't allowed to walk on the grass, but when I was with him, such edicts could be lifted.

Quite a long time ago he had chopped down a birch tree by the fence in the kitchen garden. All that remained of it was a pile of logs that he wanted to split now. I wasn't supposed to do anything, just stand there and watch, to "keep him company," as he called it.

He removed the tarpaulin, took a log, and placed it on the chopping block.

"Well?" he said, raising the ax above his shoulder, concentrating for a second, and letting fly. The blade bit into the white wood. "Everything going well at school?"

"Yes," I said.

He lifted the log with the ax wedged in and hit it against the block a few times until it split into two. Held the parts and split them, placed them on the ground by the rock face, wiped his brow with his hand, and straightened up. I could see from his body that he was happy.

"And Frøken?" he said. "Torgersen was her name, wasn't it?"

"Yes," I said. "She's nice."

"Nice?" he said, taking a new log and repeating the procedure.

"Yes," I said.

"Is there anyone who isn't nice?" he said.

I hesitated. He suspended his chopping activities for a moment.

"Well, since you say that she's nice, there must be someone who isn't nice. Otherwise the word loses all its meaning. Do you understand?"

He resumed his work.

"I think so," I said.

There was a silence. I turned away and saw the water rising above the grass beyond the path.

"Myklebust, he's not so nice," I said, turning back.

"Myklebust!" Dad said. "I know him."

"Do you?" I said.

"Sure. He comes to the meetings at the Teachers' Association. Next time I see him, I'll tell him you said he wasn't nice to your class."

"No, please don't do that!" I said.

He smiled.

"Of course I won't," he said. "Don't worry."

Then there was another silence. Dad worked, I stood there with my arms hanging down by my sides, motionless, watching. My feet were beginning to get cold. I wasn't wearing thick socks. And my fingers were beginning to get cold.

There was no one out. Apart from the occasional car that went past, there wasn't a soul around. The lights in the houses were beginning to get brighter, apparently regulated and intensified by the nascent twilight, which, in contrast with the open sky, seemed to rise from the ground. As though beneath us there was a reservoir of darkness that seeped through thousands, no, millions of tiny holes in the ground every afternoon.

I watched Dad. Sweat was running down his forehead. I rubbed my palms against each other several times. He leaned forward. Just as he was grabbing the log and about to straighten up, he farted. Caught in the act.

"You said we should only fart in the toilet," I said.

At first he didn't answer.

"It's different when you're outside in the open air," he said, without meeting my gaze. "Then you can, well, let your farts go free."

He brought down the ax onto the log and split it in half at the first attempt. The sound of the blow rebounded off the house wall and the cliff above, the latter with a strange delay, as though there were a man up there swinging an ax exactly one second after Dad.

Dad swung again and threw the four pieces of wood on the pile. Took another log.

"Could you start piling them up, Karl Ove?" he said.

I nodded and went over to the small pile.

How should I do it? What did he have in mind? Alongside the rock or coming off it? A narrow pile or a wide one?

I looked at him again. He didn't notice. I squatted and picked up a piece of wood. Placed it up against the rock, on end. Placed another piece next to it. When I had laid five in a row, I laid one crosswise on top of them. It was exactly the same length as the width of the five logs. So I laid four more on top, making two equally large squares. Now I could either make two squares next to it, identical, or start a new layer on top.

"What are you doing?" Dad said. "Are you completely stupid? You don't stack wood like that!"

He bent down and scattered the logs with his big hands. I watched him with tears in my eyes.

"You lay them lengthwise!" he said. "Have you never seen a woodpile before?"

He looked at me.

"Don't stand there weeping like a girl, Karl Ove. Can't you do anything right?"

Then he went on chopping. I started stacking the logs the way he told me. Sobs shook me every so often. My hands and toes were freezing. At least it wasn't difficult stacking them lengthwise. The only question was when to stop. When I had laid them all in a row I stood up with my hands down by my sides and watched him as I had done before. The glint in his expression was gone; I saw that as soon as he glanced at me from the corner of his eye. But that didn't necessarily mean something would happen, as long as I didn't say or do anything that might irritate him. At the same time the thought of the match on TV was gnawing at me. It must have started ages ago. He had forgotten about it, but I couldn't remind him, not the way the situation was. My toes and fingers were hurting me more and more. Dad just kept chopping. He paused and occasionally flicked back his hair in a typical gesture of his, a kind of slow toss of his head along with his hand.

We had just been given a post office box in Pusnes, which meant we no longer received mail in our mailbox on the hill, only a newspaper, and Dad had to drive there to collect our mail. Last Saturday I had sat in the car with him, and he had combed his hair in the mirror, perhaps for a whole minute, patting his thick, shiny locks afterward, and then got out. I had never seen that before. And when he went in, a woman had turned to look at him. She was unaware that someone who knew him was sitting in the car watching what went on. But why had she turned? Did she know him? I had never seen her before. Perhaps she was the mother of someone in his class?

I put the new logs he threw over on top of the first row. Wriggled my toes backward and forward in my boots, not that it helped, they hurt, hurt, hurt.

I was about to say that I was freezing cold, took a deep breath, but then I paused. Turned again and looked at the shiny pool that shouldn't have been there. Watched a large transparent bubble breaking the surface right above the rusty manhole cover. When I turned back, Steinar was walking along the road. He was carrying a guitar case over his back, with his head bent, his long black hair falling over his shoulders and swaying gently to and fro.

"Hello there, Knausgaard!" he said as he passed.

Dad stood up and sent him a nod.

"Hi there," he said.

"Doing a bit of wood chopping, I see!" Steinar said, without slowing down.

"I am," Dad said.

He resumed work. I paced backward and forward, backward and forward.

"Stop doing that," Dad said.

"Okay, but I'm freezing cold!" I said.

He sent me an icy stare.

"Oh, you're fweezing, are you?" he said.

My eyes filled with tears again.

"Stop parroting me," I said.

"Oh, so I can't pawwot you now?"

"NO!" I yelled.

He stiffened. Dropped the ax and came toward me. Grabbed my ear and twisted it round.

"Are you talking back to me?" he said.

"No," I said, looking down at the ground.

He twisted harder.

"Look at me when I'm talking to you!"

I raised my head.

"Do not talk back to me! Have you got that?"

"Yes," I said.

He let go, turned, and put another log on the block. I was crying so much I could barely breathe. Dad ignored me and kept on chopping. There were only a couple of logs left now, then he was finished.

I walked back to the low stack of wood and added the new logs. Wriggled my toes in my boots. The tears receded, there was just the odd surreptitious aftershock in the form of an untimely and wholly uncontrollable sob. I dried my eyes on my sleeve, Dad tossed four logs over, I put them on the stack, when a thought fluttered in to lift me out of my misery. I wouldn't watch the soccer. I would go straight to my room and let Yngve and him watch it without me.

Yes.

Yes.

"There we are," he said, throwing over the last four. "That's us finished."

I followed him without a word, took off my boots and my coat and hung it up, went upstairs, gathered from the noise in the living room that Yngve was watching the match, and went into my room.

I sat down at my desk and pretended to read.

Just so that he got the message.

He did. A few minutes later he opened the door.

"The match has started," he said. "Come on."

"I don't want to see it," I said, without meeting his eyes.

"Are you being headstrong now?" he said.

He came into the room, grabbed my arm, and dragged me to my feet.

"Come on," he said. He let go of my arm.

I stood still.

"I DON'T WANT TO SEE THE MATCH!" I said.

Without another word, he grabbed my arm again and dragged me crying out of my room, through the hall, and into the living room, where he hurled me onto the sofa next to Yngve.

"Now you sit there and watch the game with us," he said. "Have you got that?"

I had thought of closing my eyes if he forced me into the living room, but now I didn't dare.

He had bought a bag of glacier mints and a bag of English chocolate toffees. The toffees were my favorite, but the glacier mints were good as well. As usual, he had the bags next to him on the table. Now and then he threw one to me and Yngve. Today he did the same. But I wouldn't eat them; I left them untouched in front of me. In the end, he reacted.

"Eat your candy," he said.

"I don't feel like them," I said.

He stood up.

"Now you eat your candy," he said.

"No," I said, and started crying again. "I don't want to. I don't want to."

"Now you EAT them!" he said. He grabbed my arm and squeezed.

"I-don't-want-any . . . candy," I gasped.

He seized the back of my head and pressed it forward, almost down to the table.

"There they are," he said. "Can you see them? Eat them. Now."

"Okay," I said, and he let go. Stood over me until I had unwrapped a chocolate-coated toffee and put it in my mouth.

The next day we were going to Kristiansand to visit my father's parents. We often did that on the Sundays when IK Start was playing at home. First of all, we had dinner there, then Yngve, Dad, and Grandad went to the match, sometimes Mom did as well, while I stayed with Grandma because I was too small.

Both Mom and Dad had put on better clothes than usual. Dad wore a white shirt, a brown tweed jacket with brown patches on the elbows, and light-brown cotton slacks, Mom wore a blue dress. Yngve and I wore shirts and cords, Yngve's were brown, mine were blue.

Outside, the sky was overcast, but the clouds were of the fluffy whitish-gray variety that, while they may have shut out the sky, did not carry rain. The road was dry and gray, the gravel dry and blue gray, and the trunks of the pines standing tall at the top of the estate dry and reddish.

Yngve and I got into the back, Mom and Dad the front. Dad lit a cigarette before starting the car. I was behind him, so he couldn't see me unless I leaned to the side. As we reached the crossroads below the slope up to Tromøya Bridge I folded my hands and said to myself, "Dear God, please don't let us crash today. Amen."

I prayed like this whenever we went on longer trips because Dad drove so fast, he was always above the speed limit, always overtaking other cars. Mom said he was a good driver, and he was, but every time the car accelerated and we crossed the white line, a feeling of terror took me in its grip.

Speed and anger went hand in hand. Mom drove carefully, was considerate, never minded if the car in front was slow, she was patient and followed. That was how she was at home as well. She never got angry, always had time to help, didn't mind if things got broken, accidents happened, she liked to chat with us, she was interested in what we said, she often served food that was not absolutely necessary, such as waffles, buns, cocoa, and bread fresh out of the oven, while Dad on the other hand tried to purge our lives of anything that had no direct relevance to the situation in which we found ourselves: we ate food because it was a necessity, and the time we spent eating had no value in itself; when we watched TV we watched TV and were not allowed to talk or do anything else; when we were in the garden we had to stay on the flagstones, they had been laid for precisely that purpose, while the lawn, big and inviting though it was, was not for walking, running, or lying on. Yngve and I had never celebrated a birthday at home, and that was rooted in the same logic, it was unnecessary, a cake with the family after dinner was sufficient. We weren't allowed to have friends at home and that was also another aspect of the same logic, because why would we want to be indoors, where we only made a mess and created havoc, when the world outside existed? Our friends would have been able to tell their parents how we lived, and that may well have been a factor; actually the same logic applied here, too. Actually it explained everything. We weren't allowed to touch any of Dad's tools, not a hammer, not a screwdriver, not a saw or a pair of pliers, a snow shovel or broom, nor were we allowed to cook in the kitchen, nor even cut a slice of bread, nor switch on the TV or radio. If we had been allowed to do that, the house would have been turned upside down, whereas the way it was organized now everything was orderly, as it should be, and if anything was used, by him or Mom, it was done in a methodical, appropriate fashion. It was the same with driving: he wanted to progress as speedily as possible, with the fewest possible hold-ups, from one point to the next. In this case, from Tromøya to Kristiansand, the hometown of this thirty-year-old schoolteacher.

Time never goes as fast as in your childhood; an hour is never as short as it was then. Everything is open, you run here, you run there, do one thing, then another, and suddenly the sun has gone down and you find yourself standing in the twilight with time like a barrier that has suddenly gone down in front of you: Oh no, is it already nine o'clock? But time never goes as slowly as in your childhood either, an hour is never as long as it was then. If the openness is gone, if the opportunities to run here, there, and everywhere are gone, whether in your mind or in physical reality, every minute is like a barrier, time is a room in which you are trapped. Is there anything worse for a child than to sit in a car for a whole hour, on a journey he knows inside out, on the way to something he's looking forward to? In a car full of cigarette smoke from two parents and with a father who hisses with irritation every time you shift position and happen to nudge his seat with your knee?

Oh, how slowly time went. Oh, how slow the landmarks were in appearing outside the window. Up the steep hill from the center of Arendal, through the residential district to Hisøy Bridge, along the whole length of the island coastline, past Kokkeplassen Sanatorium, where Mom worked, down the hill and past the shops there, over the bridge crossing the Nidelva River, and then the endless plains with houses and woods and fields to Nedenes. We weren't even in Fevik yet! And from there it was still a long way to Grimstad, not to mention how far it was from Grimstad to Lillesand, and from Lillesand to Timenes, and from Timenes to Varodd Bridge, and from Varodd Bridge to Lund . . .

We sat at the back, silent, gazing out at the varied rolling countryside the road wound its way through. Past straits with islets and skerries, into the dense forests, past rivers and waterfalls, residential and industrial quarters, farms and fields, all so familiar that at any moment I knew what was coming next. Only when we drove past the zoo did we emerge from our torpor because who knew whether an animal or two might appear from behind the tall, long wire fences, free of charge! Then we were past it, and we sank back into our torpor. For an hour we sat in the backseat without moving, for an entire endless hour, before the town began to take shape around us, and the center of gravity shifted from the car journey to our imminent visit to our grandparents. Entering the town was like entering time, the clock started ticking again, there was the Oasen shop, farther down our cousins, Jon Olav and Ann Kristin, the children of Mom's sister, Kjellaug, and her husband, Magne; there were the chestnut trees along the road, the tall, dirty brick buildings behind them, there was the chemist, there was the kiosk they called Rundingen, there were the traffic lights, there was the music shop, there were the white timber houses, there was the narrow road, and then, all at once on the left-hand side, Grandma and Grandad's yellow house.

Dad drove some way past the house, down the hill, and then reversed into the lane opposite. Only then could he drive up the short, steep drive.

Grandma's face appeared in the kitchen window. When we had got out of the car, which was parked close to the wooden garage door with its black wrought-iron fittings, and were heading for the red brick steps, she opened the door.

"There you are!" she said. "Come on in!" And when we were in the small hallway:

"Oh, how I've been looking forward to seeing you two boys!"

She gave Yngve a long hug and rocked him back and forth. He looked away, but he liked it. Then she gave me a long hug and rocked me back and forth. I also looked away, but I liked it, too. Her cheek was warm, and she smelled nice.

"We might have seen a wolf in the zoo!" I said as she let go of me.

"Did you?" she said, ruffling my hair.

"No, we didn't," Yngve said. "It was just in Karl Ove's imagination."

"Oh no?" she said, ruffling his hair. "Well, it's good to see you boys anyway!"

We hung up our jackets inside, where there was an open built-in wardrobe, walked across the wall-to-wall carpet and up the staircase. On the first floor, the posh living room was on the right and the kitchen on the left. This living room was used only on Christmas Eve and other formal occasions. By the short wall there was a piano on which there stood three photos of the sons of the house wearing student caps, and above them hung two paintings. Against the long wall there were dark display cabinets, with some souvenirs from their travels arranged on top, among them a shining gondola and a golden-brown glass teapot with a very long spout, adorned with what I assumed were diamonds and rubies. At the back of the room there were two leather sofas, between them a corner cupboard decorated with painted roses and in front a low table. Through the large windows you had a view of the river and the town beyond. However, on a normal visit, which this was, we didn't go in there, we took the door to the left, to the kitchen and the two living rooms below, the lowest of which was connected to the best room via a sliding door above a little staircase. Half of the long wall was taken up by a window, through which you saw first the garden, then the river stretching out to meet the sea and, farthest away, the white Grønningen Lighthouse, towering over the horizon.

It smelled good there, not only in the kitchen, where Grandma was making meatballs and gravy, which she did better than most, but everywhere there was a fragrance that underlay all the others and was constant, a vaguely fruity sweetness I associated with this house whenever I met it outside, for example when Grandma and Grandad were visiting us, because they brought the fragrance with them, it was in their clothes, I noticed it as soon as they stepped into our hall.

"Well," Grandad said as we went into the kitchen. "Was there much traffic on the way here?"

He was sitting on his chair, legs slightly apart, wearing a gray cardigan over a blue shirt. His stomach hung over the waistband of the dark-gray trousers. His hair was black and combed back, apart from one lock, which had fallen over his forehead. A half-smoked, unlit cigarette hung from his mouth.

"No, went like clockwork," Dad said.

"How did you do with the soccer pools yesterday?" Grandad said.

"Not too well," Dad said. "Seven right was all I managed."

"I got two tens," Grandad said.

"That's pretty good," Dad said.

"I slipped up on numbers seven and eleven," Grandad said. "The second one was annoying. The goal was scored after full-time!"

"Yes," Dad said. "I didn't get that one, either."

"Did you hear what one student said to Erling the other day?" Grandma said from the stove.

"No. What?" Dad said.

"He came into class in the morning, and this student asked, 'Have you won the pools or what?' 'No,' Erling said. 'Why do you ask?' 'You look so happy,' the student said."

She laughed. "You look so happy!" she repeated.

Dad smiled.

"Anyone for a cup of coffee?" Grandma asked.

"Yes, please. I'd love one," Mom said.

"Let's sit in the living room then," Grandma said.

"Could we go upstairs and get some comics?" Yngve said.

"You can," Grandad said. "But don't make a mess!"

"Nope," Yngve said.

Treading carefully, for this was not a house you could run in either, we went into the corridor and up the stairs to the second floor. Apart from Grandma and Grandad's bedroom there was a big attic room there, and along the wall cardboard boxes containing old comics, going right back to when Dad was a child in the 1950s. There was a variety of other objects as well, among them an ancient mangle for wringing tablecloths and bed linen, an old sewing machine, a number of old games and toys, including a tin spinning top, and something that was meant to be a robot made of the same material.

But it was the comics that appealed to us. We weren't allowed to take them home with us, we had to read them there, and we read plenty from the time we arrived to the time we left. Taking a pile each, we went downstairs and found a chair, and didn't look up until food was on the table and Grandma called us to eat.

After the meal Grandma washed up while Mom stood next to her, drying. Grandad sat at the table reading a newspaper, Dad stood by the window in the living room looking out. Then Grandma came in and asked if he would like to join her in the garden, there was something she wanted to show him. Mom and Grandad sat at the table, they chatted a bit, but mostly they were silent. I got up to go to the bathroom. It was on the ground floor, I didn't like it and I had held on for as long as I could, but now I was bursting. Out into the corridor, down the creaking wooden stairs, a quick dash across the carpeted hall surrounded, as it were, by three empty rooms behind closed doors, and into the bathroom. It was dark. In the seconds before the light came on I was shaking inside. But even with the light on, I was afraid. I peed down the side so that the splash of the pee hitting the water would not prevent me from hearing anything. I also washed my hands before flushing the toilet because the moment I pressed the lever at the side of the cistern I would have to rush out as fast as I could, as the noise was so loud and eerie that I couldn't be in the same room. I stood at the ready, with my hand around the little black ball for a couple of seconds. Then I flushed, darted into the hall, also scary, because every slightest thing there silently "transmitted itself," and set off up the stairs, not able to run, of course, with a sensation that something down below was following me, until I entered the kitchen and the presence of the others broke the spell.

Outside, in the lane; the stream of people on their way from town to the stadium had increased, and soon also Dad, Mom, and Yngve would be getting ready to go. Grandad always cycled there and left a little later than the others. He was wearing a gray coat, a rust-colored scarf, a grayish cloth cap, and black gloves, I could see him from the window, as he freewheeled down the hill. Grandma took out some rolls from the freezer, we were going to have them when the others returned home, and put them on the counter.

She sent me a mischievous look.

"I've got something for you," she said.

"What's that?" I said.

"Wait and see," she said. "Cover your eyes!"

I covered my eyes, and heard her rummaging about in the drawers. She stopped in front of me.

"Now you can look!" she said.

It was a bar of chocolate. One of those triangular ones you don't see often that are so good.

"Is it for me?" I said. "All of it?"

"Yes," she said.

"What about Yngve?"

"No, not this time. He's been allowed to see the match. You have to have a treat as well!"

"Thank you very much," I said, tearing off the cardboard packaging to reveal the bar wrapped in silver paper.

"But don't say anything to Yngve, okay?" she said with a wink. "It's our secret."

I munched the chocolate as she sat doing a crossword.

"We're getting a telephone soon," I said.

"Are you?" she said. "Then we can talk to each other."

"Yes," I said. "We're actually at the end of the waiting list, but we're getting it anyway because Dad's in politics."

She laughed.

"In politics, Karl Ove?" she said.

"Yes," I said. "He is, isn't he?"

"Yes, he is. He is indeed."

"Are you enjoying school?" she said.

I nodded.

"Yes, very much."

"What do you like best?"

"The breaks," I said, knowing that would make her laugh, or at least smile.

When I had finished the chocolate and she was immersed in the crossword again, I went up to the loft and brought down some of the games.

After a while she looked at me and asked me if we shouldn't go to the match as well. I wanted to go. We got dressed, she took her bike from the garage, I sat on the luggage rack, she sat on the saddle but kept one foot on the ground and turned to me.

"Ready?" she said.

"Yes," I said.

"Hold on tight, here we go!"

I wrapped my arms around her. She pushed off with her foot, put it on the pedal, and freewheeled down the little hill, turned right, and started pedaling.

"Are you okay?" she asked, and I nodded until I realized she couldn't see me, and said, "Yes, I'm fine."

And I was. It felt good holding her, and cycling with her was fun. Grandma was the only person who touched Yngve and me, the only person who gave us hugs and stroked our arms. She was also the only person who played with us. Dad might do it at Christmas, but we always did the things he wanted to do, like playing Mastermind or chess or Chinese checkers or Yahtzee or crazy eights or poker with matchsticks. Mom joined in when we played, but we did most things with her, either on the kitchen table at home or at the arts and crafts workshop in Kokkeplassen, and it was fun, but not like with Grandma, who didn't mind doing what we were doing and followed with interest when Yngve showed her something from his chemistry set, for example, or helped me when I was doing a jigsaw puzzle.

The wheels went more and more slowly until they almost stopped completely and Grandma got off and pushed the bike to the crest of the hill.

"You just stay where you are, if you want," she said.

I sat gazing over the town while Grandma pushed the bike, a trifle out of breath. Reaching the top, she got back on the saddle and it was a gentle downhill ride all the way to the stadium. A sudden huge groan erupted, as if from an enormous animal, and then there was clapping. Few sounds were so irresistible. Grandma cycled down to one end of the stadium, rested the bike against the wooden fence, and let me stand on the luggage rack for a few minutes while she held me so that I could see what was happening on the field. The players were a long way away, all the details eluded me, apart from the yellow-and-white shirts against the green of the turf and all the spectators standing around the field, a black surging mass, but I caught the mood, I inhaled it and in the days to come I would savor it in my mind.

Back home, she began to prepare the meal we would have before leaving, and not long afterward the door in the hall opened, it was Grandad, his expression was grim, and when Grandma saw it she said, "So they lost?"

He nodded, sat down on his chair, and she poured him some coffee. I never quite understood what the power relationship was between Grandma and Grandad. On the one hand, she always served him food, cooked all the meals, did all the washing up and the housework, as though she were his servant; on the other hand, she was often angry or irritated with him, and then she gave him a mouthful or made a fool of him, she was sharp and not infrequently sarcastic, while he said very little, preferring not to respond. Was it because he didn't need to? Because nothing of what she said altered anything important? Or because he couldn't? If Yngve and I were present during such sparring, Grandma would wink at us, as if to say this wasn't serious, or use us in her sally against him by saying such things as "Grandad can't even change a lightbulb properly," while Grandad, for his part, would look at us, smile, and shake his head at Grandma's antics. I never saw any form of intimacy between them, other than in their verbal exchanges or the closeness that was evident when she served him.

"They lost, I heard?" she said again when Mom, Dad, and Yngve came up the stairs ten minutes later.

"Yes, they did. 'Eternally owned is but what's lost,'" Dad quoted. "Or what do you reckon, Dad?"

Grandad growled something or other.

When we left in the evening we were given a bag of plums, a bag of pears, and a bag of bread rolls. Grandad, reluctant to leave his chair, said goodbye to us upstairs while Grandma came down with us, gave us each a long hug, stood on the front doorstep, and waved until she could no longer see us.

Strangely enough, the journey back always seemed much faster than the journey there. I loved traveling in a car at night, with the dashboard lit, the muted voices from the front seats, the gleam of streetlamps as we passed beneath, washing over us like breakers or waves of light, the long, completely dark stretches that cropped up intermittently, where all you saw, all that existed, was the pavement lit up by the headlights and the countryside they illuminated on the bends. Sudden treetops, sudden crags, sudden sea inlets. It was always a particular pleasure to arrive at the house in the night as well, to hear footsteps on the gravel and the sharp slam of car doors and the rattle of keys, to see the light in the hall come on, revealing the presence of all the familiar objects. The shoes with the grommets as eyes and the tongue as a forehead, the chilly gaze from the white two-holed electric sockets above the baseboard, the hat stand in the corner, with its back turned. And in my room: the pens and pencils assembled like a gang of schoolchildren in the pen stand, some insolently leaning against the edge, ready at any moment to discharge a gobbet of spit to prove they were not interested in anyone or anything. The duvet and the pillow that were either tidy and puffed up, looking like something that shouldn't be touched, a coffin or a capsule in a spaceship, or else were molded in the shape of my last movements, happy to be rearranged, but with no real inclination in that direction. The fixed stare of the lamps. The mouth of the keyhole, the two screw eyes of the metal fitting, the long, oddly positioned nose of the handle.

I brushed my teeth, shouted goodnight to Mom and Dad, and got into bed to read for half an hour. I had two favorite books, which I tried to quarantine long enough to be able to read them again in the same way I had the first time, but it never worked, I picked them up again much too soon. One was Doctor Dolittle, which was about a doctor who could talk to animals and one day went on a long voyage with them, to Africa, where, after being hunted and captured by some Hottentots, he finally found what he was looking for, the rare sausage animal that had two heads, one at each end. The second book was Gangles, which was about a girl who would stand on fountains of water and allow herself to be hurled into the air, and who, after several misadventures, ended up balancing above the sea on a spout of water blown out by an enormous whale. Tonight, however, I chose another book from the pile, The Little Witch, which was about a witch who was too small to join the coven in Bloksberg, but who snuck in anyway. She did lots of things she wasn't supposed to do, like witchcraft on Sundays, which was almost unbearable to read about, she shouldn't have done it, she would be caught . . . and indeed she was, but everything turned out fine in the end. I read a few pages, but as I knew the story so well I looked at the pictures instead. After flicking through it, I turned off the light, rested my head on the pillow, and closed my eyes.

I had almost let go, perhaps I had even fallen asleep, because it was as though I had suddenly been brought back to my bed and my room, summoned by a ring at the front door.

Diing-dong.

Who on earth could that be? No one rang our doorbell, except guests we were expecting, which in nine out of ten cases were Grandma and Grandad, plus the occasional salesman, or one of Yngve's friends. But none of them would ring so late at night.

I sat up in bed. Heard Mom padding along the landing and down the stairs. Muffled voices from below. Then she came back up, exchanged a few words with Dad, which I didn't catch, went downstairs, and must have put on her coat there because straight afterward the front door was slammed shut, and straight after that her car started up.

What in the world? Where was she going now? It was nearly ten o'clock!

A few minutes later Dad went downstairs as well. But he didn't go out, he went into his study. When I heard that I got up, carefully opened the door, and snuck along the landing into Yngve's room.

He was lying on his bed reading. Still dressed. He smiled when he saw me and sat up.

"You're only wearing your underpants," Yngve said.

"Who was that at the door?"

"Fru Gustavsen, I think," he said. "And all the kids."

"Oh? Why? And why did Mom go? Where did she go?"

Yngve shrugged.

"I think she drove them to some relatives."

"Why?"

"Gustavsen's drunk. Didn't you hear him shouting at them a while ago?"

I shook my head.

"I was asleep. But was Leif Tore with them? And Rolf?"

Yngve nodded.

"Jeez," I said.

"Dad'll be coming back up," he said. "You'd better go to bed. I'll turn out the lights too now."

"Okay. Good night."

"Good night."

In my room, I drew the curtains aside and looked across to Gustavsen's house. I couldn't see anything unusual. Outside, at least, everything was still.

Herr Gustavsen had been drunk before, he was well known for it. One night that spring a rumor had spread that he was drunk, and three or four of us crept into their garden and stood by the living-room window looking in. But there was nothing to see. He was sitting on the sofa gazing into the distance without moving. At other times we had heard him shouting and yelling, through the open windows and on the lawn. Leif Tore just laughed. But perhaps this was something different? Escaping from him, they'd never done that before.

When I next woke it was morning. Someone was in the bathroom, I could hear, probably Yngve, and from the road outside, along the three-meter-high wall surrounding Gustavsen's property and supporting the level lawn, came the drone of Mom's car. She had to go to work early today. Yngve closed the bathroom door, returned to his room, and then went downstairs.

The bike!

Where was his bike?

I had completely forgotten to ask him.

But that had to be the reason he was leaving so early; he couldn't cycle, he had to walk to school.

I got up, took my clothes into the bathroom, washed in the water he had remembered to leave, today, too, dressed, and went to the kitchen where Dad had made three smørbrød and put them on a plate in my place, as well as a glass of milk. The milk carton, the bread, the cheese, sliced meat, and jams had been cleared away. He was sitting in the living room, listening to the radio and smoking.

Outside it was raining. A steady drizzle, broken by intermittent gusts of wind, pitter-pattering against the windows and sounding like tiny drumming fingers.

Monday was the only day no one was at home when I came back from school. So I had my own key, which I carried on a piece of string around my neck. But there was a problem with the key: I couldn't get it to open the door. The first Monday it had been raining and I bounded across the gravel in rubber boots and rain gear, the key nestling in my hand, overjoyed at the imminent prospect and filled with pride. I managed to get the key into the lock, but not to turn it. It would not budge however much force I used. The key was unmovable. After ten minutes I started crying. My hands were red and cold, the rain was bucketing down, and all the other children had been at home for ages. At that moment one of the neighbors I didn't know so well passed – she was old and lived with her husband in the house at the very top by the forest above the soccer field – on her way down the road, and when I saw her, I didn't hesitate, because she had no connection with my parents, I dashed over and asked, with tears running down my cheeks, if she could help me with the lock. She could. And for her it was no problem at all! She fiddled with the key and it turned. And, hey presto, the door was open. I thanked her and went inside. Knowing there was nothing wrong with the key, there was something wrong with me. The next time this happened it wasn't raining, so I left my satchel by the step and ran up to Geir's. Dad made a comment about the satchel when he came home, I wasn't to leave it lying around, so the following Monday, when the weather was also dry, I simply took it with me, under the pretext of having to do some homework with Geir and thus needing my satchel close at hand.

In the meantime, I had worked out a method I could use when the weather got worse during autumn and winter, like today. In the boiler room there was a little window, more like a hatch, but not so small that I couldn't crawl through. It was positioned about half a meter above my head. I had worked out that if I opened the window in the morning, and there was no great risk involved because the window stayed close to the frame even when the two catches were undone, I could pull over the trash can when I got home, stand on it, wriggle through into the boiler room, open the door from the inside, put the trash can back, close the window, and be indoors without anyone realizing I couldn't get the key to turn. The sole doubt in my mind was when to undo the catches. However, if it was raining, it would be the most natural thing in the world to go into the boiler room, because that was where my rain gear usually hung, and all I had to do was lift the catches, impossible to see unless you stood close to the door. And I wasn't so stupid that I would touch anything with Dad around in the hall!

I ate the three smørbrød and drank the glass of milk. Brushed my teeth in the bathroom, collected my satchel from my room, went downstairs and into the hot, narrow room with the two water cylinders. I stood absolutely still for two seconds. As there was no sound of footsteps on the stairs, I stretched up and unhooked the catches. Then I donned my rain gear, slipped on my satchel, went into the hall where my boots were, a pair of blue-and-white Viking rubber boots that I had been given despite my wanting white ones, shouted goodbye to Dad, and ran out, up to Geir's, he poked his head out of the window and called that he was still having breakfast but would be down soon.

I walked over to one of the gray puddles in Geir's family's drive and started throwing stones in it. Their drive wasn't covered in gravel as most of the others were, nor brick paving like at Gustavsen's, but compacted reddish earth full of small, round stones. This wasn't all that was different about them. At the back of the house they didn't have a lawn but a little patch where they had planted potatoes, carrots, swedes, radishes, and various other vegetables. On the forest side they didn't have a wooden fence, as we did, or wire netting, as many others did, but a stone wall that Prestbakmo had built himself. Nor did they throw all their garbage in the trash can, as we did; they kept all their milk and egg cartons to use in a variety of ways and they put all their food remains on a compost heap by the stone wall.

I straightened up and glanced at the cement mixer. The round green drum was partially covered by a white tarpaulin and it looked like a headscarf. Her mouth was open, it was big and toothless; what was it she could see that surprised her so much?

Down the hill came Geir Håkon's father in his green Ford Taunus. I waved; he lifted his hand from the steering wheel in a fleeting response.

I was suddenly reminded of Anne Lisbet. The thought soared from my stomach and spread like an explosion of joy in my chest.

She hadn't been at school on Friday. Solveig had said she was ill. But today was Monday. She was bound to be better now.

Oh, please let her be better!

I was dying to go up to B-Max and see her.

Her black glittering eyes. Her happy voice.

"Geir! Come on!" I shouted.

I heard his muffled voice from behind the door. The next instant he tore it open.

"Want to take the path?" he said.

"Sure," I said.

So we ran behind the house, scrambled over the stone wall, and joined the path. From being no more than a mass of tufts with small dried-up channels in between, the bog was now full of water, impossible to cross dry-shod, even in boots, because your foot would sink in a puddle to way above the boot top, but we tried anyway, balancing on the quivering tufts, jumping to the next, slipping, putting out a hand to save ourselves and feeling the ground give, the water seeming to creep up our sweaters under the sleeves of our jackets. We laughed and shouted, telling each other what had happened, crossed the now muddy and slippery soccer field, and went between the deciduous trees to the right, up the broad avenue that might once have been a cart track, it was broader than a path at any rate and covered with a carpet of leaves. Red, yellow, and brown, they lay there, with the occasional splash of green. At the top there was a tiny field, the grass was long here, a yellowish white, and lay flat, plastered to the ground. Above it a bare tor towered, on which there stood an old telegraph pole. The former cart track continued for a while, then disappeared, devoured by the new main road running past, maybe twenty meters from the field. Below lay the forest, mostly oak trees, between two of them there was an abandoned car, in much worse condition than the one where we normally played, perhaps a hundred meters lower down, but no less appealing for that, in fact the contrary: hardly anyone ever played here.

Oh, the smell of an abandoned car in a wet forest! The smell of the synthetic material on the torn seats, moldy and mildewed, but still sharp and fresh compared with the heavy, musty smell of rotting leaves emanating from the ground all around them. The black window seals that had come loose and hung from the roof like tentacles. All the glass that had been smashed to pieces and largely lost in the soil, although there were scattered fragments on the floor mats or in the door openings, like small matte diamonds. And, oh, the black floor mats! Shake them and a whole horde of creepy crawlies ran for cover. Spiders, daddy longlegs, and woodlice. The resistance of the three floor pedals, which you could hardly move. The raindrops that fell through a window onto your face whenever the wind forced them off track or shook them from the leaves of the swaying branches above.

Sometimes we found objects lying around and about near the car: a lot of bottles, some bags of car or porn magazines, empty cigarette packets, empty plastic bottles of windshield fluid, the odd condom, and once we found a pair of underpants still full of shit. We laughed about that for a good long time, about someone shitting themselves and then coming here to throw away their underpants.

But we used to have a shit in the forest when we were on our walks. We would climb up trees and shit from there, squat on top of a cliff and shit over the edge, or on the bank of a stream and shit in it. All to see what happened and how it felt. What color the turds were, whether they were black, green, brown, or light brown, how long and fat they were, and what happened when they lay there glistening on the forest floor, between heather and moss, whether there would be flies swarming around them or beetles climbing over them. Also the smell of shit was sharper, stronger, and more distinct in the forest. Now and then we revisited places where we'd had a shit, to see what had happened to it. Sometimes they had vanished, sometimes there were only dry remains, and at other times they lay flat as though they had melted in a pool.

But now we had to go to school and there was no time for such activities. Down the hill, across the playground, which consisted of little more than a rusty climbing frame, a rusty swing, and a rotting sandpit with next to no sand in it. Up the steep slope, over the high concrete barriers, across the road, and B-Max stood in front of us. The line of satchels in the queue was already long. Some girls were skipping despite the pouring rain; others stood under the overhanging roof in front of the shop. But where was Anne Lisbet? Wasn't she here?

At that moment the bus came up the hill. Geir and I crossed the road and reached the bus stop as it turned into the paved shoulder outside the supermarket. We got on last and sat right at the front. The big windows misted up with the moisture we brought in with us. Many of the kids started drawing in the condensation. The driver closed the doors and set off toward the main road. I knelt on my seat and scanned the back of the bus. She wasn't there, and it was as if all meaning had leaked from the world. Now I would have to go all day without seeing her and perhaps the following day as well. Solveig wasn't there either, so it wouldn't be possible to find out how ill she was or for how long.

Ten minutes later the bus stopped outside the school, we ran across the playground and into the wet-weather shelter, where we huddled with almost all the other pupils until the bell went and we lined up. I knew most of them by appearance now, some also by name and reputation. We had gymnastics with the parallel class, who had an advantage over us, as they came from this area and were on home ground. This was their school, the teachers were their teachers, to them we were just some kind of immigrant, without any rights. But they were also tougher than we were, that is, they had more fights, they caused more trouble and mouthed off more, at least some of them did, which only the toughest of us, viz Asgeir and John, stood up to. The rest of us were pushed around as they pleased. Any second you could feel an arm around your throat, and then a jerk and you were on the floor. Any second a fist could hit you in the shoulder, where it hurt most, as you lined up or were on the way to the classroom. Any second someone could stamp on your toes in a soccer game. But they quickly learned they couldn't bully John or Asgeir because they retaliated and gave as good as they got. These boys, who lived on the east of the island, also dressed differently from us, at least some of them did. Their clothes were older and seemed more used, as though they only wore hand-me-downs, and not just from one brother but two or maybe even three . . . Geir's and my greatest fear was that some of these boys would find us when we were in our secret place. But they didn't represent much of a problem, you only had to be on your guard when you were out and everything was usually fine. Perhaps the most significant consequence was that we stuck together more and saw ourselves as a unit and the classroom as a bastion of security.

The bell rang, we lined up, and Frøken, tall and thin as ever, appeared at the top of the stairs with her slightly lopsided gait and nervous hand movements, and we marched down to the classroom, where, after hanging up our outdoor clothes on the pegs outside, we at once sat down in our places.

"Anne Lisbet's sick today as well!" someone said.

"And Solveig."

"And Vemund."

"And Leif Tore," Geir said.

Then I remembered what had happened the night before.

"Vemund's sick in the head!" Eivind said.

"Ha ha ha!"

"No, no, no," Frøken said. "We are not nasty to anyone in this class. And certainly not behind their backs!"

"Leif Tore's father was drunk yesterday!" I said. "My mom had to drive them to a relative's house. That's why he isn't here today!"

"Shhh," Frøken said, looking at me, holding a finger to her lips and shaking her head. Then she wrote something in her book before scanning the class.

"Anyone else away? No? So, let's get started, shall we?"

She stepped forward and perched on the edge of her desk. "This week we're going to learn about farms. Has anyone ever been to a farm?"

Oh, I shot up my arm as high as I could, almost standing up, shouting, Me, me, me! I have!

I wasn't the only person to have something to say about the topic. And it wasn't my hand Frøken pointed to but Geir B's.

"I've ridden a horse in Legoland," he said.

"But that's not a farm," I screeched. "I've been to a farm lots of times. Grandma and Grandad – "

"Was it your turn, Karl Ove?" Frøken said.

"No," I said, eyes downcast.

"It's true that Legoland is not a farm," she continued. "But horses are on farms, that's true, Geir. Unni?"

Unni, who was that?

I turned. Ah, that's the girl who was always giggling. Chubby with blond hair.

"I live on a farm," she said with flushed cheeks. "But we haven't got any animals. We grow vegetables. And Dad sells them at the market in town."

"But I've been to a farm with animals!" I said.

"Me, too," Sverre said.

"And me!" said Dag Magne.

"You'll have to wait your turn," Frøken said. "Everyone has to have a chance."

She pointed to five other people before I was finally able to take my hand down and say what I had to say. Well, Grandma and Grandad had a farm, it was big, they had two cows and a calf, and they had hens. I had collected the eggs many times, and I had seen Grandma milking the cows in the morning. First she shoveled away the muck, and then she fed them, and then she milked them. Sometimes they lifted their tails and had a piss or a shit.

A wave of laughter rolled toward me. Emboldened by it, I continued. And once, I said, sitting there in class, my face crimson, one of the cows pissed on me!

I looked around and lapped up the ensuing laughter. Frøken said nothing, she pointed to someone else, but I could see from her face that she didn't believe me.

When everyone who wanted to say something had had a turn, she read a passage from a book about Ola Ola Heia. She asked us questions about what she had read out, completely ignoring me until the bell rang, when she asked me to stay behind.

"Karl Ove," she said. "Wait here. I need to have a word with you."

I stood beside her desk while the others hurried out. When we were alone she perched on the edge of her desk and looked at me.

"We can't tell everyone all the things we know about one another," she said. "What you said about Leif Tore's father, for example. Don't you think Leif Tore would be upset about that?"

"Yes, he would," I said.

"He wouldn't want anyone else to know. Do you understand?"

"Yes," I said, starting to cry.

"We all have private lives," she said. "Do you know what that is?"

"No," I said, sniffling.

"It's everything that happens at home, in your home, my home, their homes, everyone's home. If you see what happens in other people's homes, it's not always nice to tell others. Do you understand?"

I nodded.

"Good, Karl Ove. Don't be upset. You didn't know. But now you do! So off you go."

I scampered up the stairs, through the hall, and onto the playground. Cast an eye over the various groups standing there. Some girls were doing French skipping with elastic, some with a rope, some were playing tag. Down on the soccer field I saw a mass of players in front of the nearest goal. The center of the field was covered in a pool of yellowish mud. Geir, Geir Håkon, and Eivind were standing by the bench below the little rock with the flagpole on it, and I ran over to join them. They were playing with Geir Håkon's boat cards.

"Have you been crying?" Eivind said.

I shook my head. "It's the wind," I said.

"What did Frøken say then?"

"Nothing much," I said. "Can I have a card?"

"You've been crying," Eivind said.

Along with Sverre and me, Eivind was the best in the class. He was the best at math, Sverre was next best, and I was third best. I was best at reading and writing, Eivind was next best, and Sverre third best. But Eivind was much faster than me, and of the boys in the class only Trond was faster than him. I was the sixth fastest. And he was stronger than me. I was the next weakest, only Vemund was weaker, and since he was the fattest and the dumbest boy in the class, it wasn't a very good situation, no one took any notice of him. Even Trond, the smallest boy in the class, was stronger than me. I was the third tallest in the class, a bit taller than him. I was the fourth best at soccer; ahead of me were Asgeir, Trond, and John, while Eivind was fifth best. I was better at drawing than him, but not as good as Geir, who could draw everything as it really was, and Vemund. As for throwing a ball, I was next to last, again only Vemund was worse than me.

"The wind was in my eyes as I came down the steps," I said. "I wasn't crying. Can I have a card too?"

The first card I took was SS France, the world's biggest passenger liner, which walloped everybody else in all categories.

In the next lesson we wrote letters of the alphabet in our notebooks: u as in kui, a as in lam, å as in gås. For homework we had to write the same letters in our notebooks. Frøken asked whether anyone lived near the students who were absent today and, if so, could they pass on the homework.

But I didn't become aware of the opportunity that had presented itself until the next and final lesson, which was gymnastics, as I was running round and round the tiny gymnasium. I could walk up to Anne Lisbet's and tell her what we had to do for homework! The thought made me flush with pleasure. As soon as we had dressed and left the changing room, on the way up to the place where we lined up to wait for the bus, I told Geir about my plan. He wrinkled his nose, go to Anne Lisbet's, why? We had never been there, that was one thing. And Vemund lived there, that was another. Couldn't Vemund take the homework? You don't understand, I said. The whole point is that we do it!

He still hemmed and hawed, but after I had put a bit more pressure on him, he agreed to go with me.

Instead of making everyone get off at B-Max, this morning the bus went up through the estate and dropped us off on the way. It did that now and then, and it was a strange sight every time, because the enormous bus didn't belong there, on the narrow roads, it towered over everything like a liner in a canal. We stood on the sidewalk watching it go up the hill, as it groaned with the effort and released clouds of greasy fumes in its wake.

"Shall I go up or will you come down?" I said.

"You come up," Geir said.

"Okay," I said, walking in the drive, which as fortune would have it was clearly empty. It was no longer raining, but everything I saw was wet. On the dark-brown wall there were extensive patches of black damp, on the brick doorstep all the little hollows were full of water, on the spade leaning against the wall raindrops hung trembling from the handle. I unzipped my jacket and took out the key to see if I could perhaps get it to open the door today. But the same happened, the key went in, but the little drum that was supposed to rotate didn't budge. I looked up the road. No one there. So I went to the garbage can by the fence, took out the black half-empty bag, and put it on the ground, grabbed the garbage can by the handles, and lifted it. It was heavier than I had anticipated, and I had to put it down several times on the way to the house. Still there was no one to be seen on the hill. A car came past, but it wasn't anyone I knew, so I carried the can across the lawn and placed it under the window. Clambered on top, lifted the window, and pushed my head and shoulders through. The feeling of losing control, because I couldn't see if anyone was watching me, all I saw was the empty room in front of me, dark and hot, filled me with panic. I twisted and turned, and when I had half my body in, I grabbed the metal pipe on the tank and pulled myself through.

Down to the floor, off with my boots – which I carried through the hall and put on again on the porch – open the door and out again. Hollow with fear and tension, I looked down the hill. No cars, nothing. As long as he stayed away for the next two minutes, and didn't come home because he had forgotten something, or because he was ill, which never happened, Dad was never ill, everything would be fine.

A little gasp of joy escaped my lips. I hurried over to the garbage can, carried it to its place, put the garbage bag back in, folded it over the edge, and dashed back to the window. To my horror, I saw that the container had left marks in the grass. Quite deep marks, too. I ran my hand over the grass and tried to ruffle it to cover the patches where the edge had sunk in and formed a ridge in the muddy soil. Straightened up and regarded my handiwork.

You could still see it.

But if you had no idea it was there, perhaps it was more difficult to see?

Dad saw everything. He would see it.

I crouched down and ruffled the grass some more.

There.

That would have to do.

If he saw it I could always deny all knowledge. I doubted he would be able to imagine I had carried the garbage can onto the lawn and put it under the window to climb in. No, if he saw the mark it would be a mystery to him, utterly unfathomable, and so long as I denied all knowledge in a normal voice and with a normal expression he would have nothing else to go on.

I wiped my moist, dirty hands on my thighs and went up to my room with my satchel. Opened the wardrobe door and was about to put on my white shirt, warmed by the happy thought that Anne Lisbet would think it looked good, when I came to my senses and dropped the idea, in case Dad asked why I had changed clothes and I got myself into a tangle that he would be able to unravel.

Then I locked the front door, climbed up onto the hot water tank, turned around, stuck my feet through the window, gently lowered myself until I let go, and landed on the ground with a bump.

Picked myself up, down to the drive as fast as possible, acting as if nothing had happened.

There were no cars to be seen now. John Beck, Geir Håkon, Kent Arne, and Øyvind Sundt were standing at the crossroads. When they saw me they cycled over. I stood still, waiting for them.

"Have you heard?" Geir Håkon said, braking just in front of me.

"Heard what?"

"A workman on Vindholmen was cut in two by a steel cable early today."

"Cut in two?"

"Yes," John Beck said. "The wire snapped while towing. One end hit a man and cut him in two. Dad told me. Everyone was given the day off."

I imagined a man on a tug being cut in two, the top half, the part with the head and arms, standing beside the bottom half, the part with the legs.

"You still have a puncture?" Kent Arne said.

I nodded.

"You can sit on the back of mine."

"I'm off to see Geir," I said. "Where are you going?"

Geir Håkon shrugged.

"Down to the boats maybe?"

"Where are you two going?" Kent Arne said.

"To see someone in the class about homework," I said.

"Who, if I might ask?" Geir Håkon said.

"Vemund," I said.

"Do you two hang out with him?"

"Nope," I said. "Just today. I've got to get going."

I ran up the hill and shouted for Geir, who came out right away with a slice of bread in his hand.

Twenty minutes later we walked past B-Max again, along a flat stretch that, after a bend, ascended to the highest point on the estate where the road began that led to where Anne Lisbet, Solveig, and Vemund lived. It was also possible to get to it by walking in the opposite direction from our house because the road that linked all the side roads and housing areas on the estate went in a circle, inside which was our own circular Ringvei. As if that wasn't enough, the main road outside also went in a circle, around the whole island. So we lived inside a circle inside a circle inside a circle. A hundred meters past the supermarket the two outermost roads ran parallel, but you couldn't see that because they were separated by a rock face, perhaps ten meters high, molded into a brick wall. Above this wall was a green wire fence, beyond that there was a rocky slope, and then came the road we were following. But even though we couldn't see the cars whizzing past beneath us we could hear them. The sound of the cars was exciting, and we climbed down to the fence. At first we heard them as a faint drone as they came up the hill from the Fina station, then the volume rose and rose until they were racing past beneath us, the roar of their engines amplified by the rock face. We decided we would throw stones at them. As we couldn't see the cars, the trick was to time the sounds exactly. We each took a stone in our hands and waited for the next car. The stones were big, bigger than our hands, but not so heavy that we couldn't heave them over the fence, from where they fell vertically, ten meters down to the carriageway. Geir started. He threw as the car was beneath us, and missed, of course, we heard the faint, hollow clunk as it landed on the pavement and rolled downward. When it was my turn, however, I threw much too soon; when the stone hit the road the car was probably fifty meters away.

A woman walked along the sidewalk carrying a bag in each hand. She stopped and spoke to us, even though we had never seen her before.

"What are you doing down there?" she said.

"Nothing much," Geir said.

"Come on up," she said. "It's steep and dangerous there."

She set off walking again, but kept an eye on us, so we did as she said and went up.

We balanced on the curb all the way up to Vemund's house. Outside, his sister was on her knees playing in a sandpit. Her waterproof jacket and bottoms were yellow, the bucket blue, and the spade green.

"Want to go and see Vemund first?" Geir said.

"No, let's not," I said. "Let's start with Anne Lisbet."

The sound of her name was electric, thousands of crackling nerve channels opened inside me as I articulated the words in my mouth.

"What is it?" Geir said.

"What's what?" I said.

"You went a bit funny."

"Funny? No. I'm quite normal."

After a few steps up the road, covered on one side by a film of water running downward, so thin that it quivered rather than ran, we could see the gable end of the house where Anne Lisbet lived. It was situated at the top of a hill, with a lawn at the front, trees below. A window on the top floor, there was a light on, was that her room perhaps? On the other side of the road was Myrvang's house and the house where Solveig lived, below them the forest, green and dark and wet. We passed them, and the road ended in a gravel cul-de-sac on the edge of the forest. From there a drive led to Anne Lisbet's house. A light shone above the front door.

"Will you ring?" I said when we were there.

Geir stretched up on his toes and pressed the doorbell. My heart was fluttering. A few seconds passed. Then her mother opened the door.

"Is Anne Lisbet in?" I said.

"Yes," she said.

"We're from her class," Geir said. "We've brought her homework."

"How nice of you," she said. "Would you like to come in?"

She had blond hair and blue eyes, so completely different from Anne Lisbet, but she was good to look at as well.

"Anne Lisbet!" she called. "You've got visitors from your class!"

"Coming!" Anne Lisbet called from above.

"Isn't she ill?" I said.

Her mother shook her head.

"Not anymore. We were just keeping her here for another day to be on the safe side."

"Oh, yes," I said. Footsteps sounded on the stairs, and Anne Lisbet appeared. She was holding a slice of bread in one hand and smiling at us with her mouth full.

"Hi!" she said.

"We thought you were ill," I said.

"We've brought you the homework," Geir said.

She was wearing a white sweater with a high neck and a red pattern, and blue trousers. The skin above her lips was as white as milk.

"Wouldn't you like to go outside and play?" she said. "I've been indoors all day. And all day yesterday, too!"

"Sure," I said. "Is that all right, Geir?"

"Why not," Geir said.

She put on her white boots and the red raincoat. Her mother went upstairs.

"See you, Mom!" she called, and ran out. We ran after her.

"What should we do?" she said, stopping where the gravel finished and suddenly turning to us. "Want to go down to Solveig's?"

We did. Solveig came out, Anne Lisbet suggested doing some skipping, so we stood there, Geir and I, with elastic around our legs while Solveig and Anne Lisbet hopped and skipped to and fro in accordance with the intricate patterns they mastered to such perfection. When it was my turn Anne Lisbet showed me what to do. She placed her hand on my shoulder and a quiver ran through me. Her dark eyes sparkled. She burst into laughter when I messed it up, and, oh, I smelled the fragrance of her hair as it flew past my face.

It was absolutely fantastic. Everything was absolutely fantastic. Above us the cloud thickened, the gray had taken on a tinge of bluish black, the sky was like a wall above the forest, soon afterward it began to rain. We put up the hoods on our rain jackets and continued to skip. The rain fell on our hoods and ran down our faces, the gravel crunched beneath our feet, the lamp on top of the pole at the end of the cul-de-sac suddenly came on. A little while later a car approached slowly.

"That's Dad!" Anne Lisbet said.

The car, a Volvo Estate, stopped at the end of the drive, and a large, powerful man with a black beard stepped out. He waved to her, she ran over to him, he bent down and gave her a hug, then went in.

"We're having dinner now," she said. "What was for homework?"

I told her. She nodded, said bye, and was gone.

"I have to go, too," Solveig said, standing there with her sad eyes and rolling up the elastic.

"Us, too," I said.

When we reached the crossroads I suggested running all the way to the shop, which we did. There, Geir suggested we didn't go home via Grevlingveien, nor through the forest, but take the main road down to Holtet. Which we did. A path led from there up through the heath to Ringveien, which we then followed home. But after we had gone a few meters along the road, something strange happened. The bus came down, instinctively I turned, and in the window, only a little way from me, at the same height, sat Yngve!

What on earth was he doing there? Was he going to Arendal? Now? What was he going to do there?

"That was Yngve," I said. "He was on the bus."

"Oh yes," Geir said, not very interested. We crossed the lawn outside the house there and walked onto the road.

"That was really fun up there," Geir said.

"Yes," I said. "Shall we go up again later?"

"Yes," Geir said. "But perhaps it's best not to tell anyone? After all, they're girls."

"Well, there's no reason why we should."

From the top of the hill I could see that Dad's car was parked outside our house. Geir's father was home, too. They were teachers and finished work earlier than other fathers.

I recalled the garbage can I had used to get indoors.

"Shall we do something else?" I said. "Go somewhere else? Down to the tree swing?"

Geir shook his head.

"It's raining. And I'm hungry. I'm going home."

"Okay," I said. "Bye."

"Bye," Geir said, and ran to his house. He slammed the door so hard the glass rattled. I gazed across at Gustavsen's house. There was a light on in the kitchen. Had they come back home or was it the father? They had a garage, so it was impossible to know whether the car was there or not.

I turned and looked up the hill. Marianne's father took off the lid of the garbage can and threw in a scrunched-up plastic bag. He was wearing a woollen cardigan and was unshaven. He always looked angry, but I wasn't sure if he was, I had never spoken to him or heard anything about him. He was a seaman and away for large parts of the year. When he was at home he was there all the time.

He closed the door without noticing me.

From the crossroads came an enormous yellow truck with rocks on the back. The ground vibrated as it passed. Thick smoke rose from an exhaust pipe at the front.

Yngve had once shown me a picture of the biggest vehicle in the world. It was in a book about the Apollo program he had borrowed from the library. Everything about it was the biggest in the world. It had been especially built to transport the rocket the few kilometers to the launch pad. But it was as slow as it was big and moved at a snail's pace, Yngve said.

The most appealing part was the launch itself. I could look at photos of it any number of times. Once I had seen it on TV, too. You might expect the rocket to shoot off from the platform at an incredible speed, but that was not the case; on the contrary, for the first few meters it rose very slowly, the fire and the smoke it emitted formed a kind of cushion underneath, which it seemed to rest on for a brief instant before gently moving upward, almost waveringly, with a colossal roar that could be heard from a distance of several kilometers. And then it soared faster and faster until its speed was as mind-blowing as you had imagined, and it flew like an arrow or lightning into the crystal-blue sky.

Sometimes I imagined a rocket being launched from this forest. Hidden behind a mountain, it would be erected in secret and one day we would see it rise slowly, very slowly, above the trees just down there, pure and white against the green and gray, with a cloud of fire and smoke beneath it, and then it would be clear of them, almost hanging in the sky for a moment, before gaining speed and soaring faster and faster upward with the roar from the gigantic engines reverberating between our houses.

It was a good thought.

I jogged down to the house, crossed the gravel to the door, opened it, and was taking off my boots on the doormat when Dad came into the hall from his study.

I glanced up at him.

He didn't look particularly angry.

"Where have you been?" he said.

"Playing with Geir," I said.

"That wasn't what I asked you," he said. "Where have you been?"

"We were up at B-Max," I said. "Behind it."

"Oh," he said. "What were you boys doing there?"

"Nothing much," I said. "Playing."

"You'll have to go back," he said. "We need some potatoes. Can you buy some, do you think?"

"Yes," I said.

He took his wallet from his rear pocket and produced a banknote.

"Let me see your pockets," he said.

I stood up and thrust forward my hips.

He passed me the note.

"Put this in your pocket," he said. "And don't hang around."

"Okay," I said. He went back to the kitchen. I put my boots back on, closed the door gently behind me, and set off at a run.

Yngve came home shortly before we were to have dinner and just made it to his bedroom before Dad shouted that the food was ready. He had fried some chops and onions and boiled some cauliflower and potatoes. Mom informed us that we were going to have a cleaning woman, an old lady called Fru Hjellen, who would come once a week, and she would be popping by this afternoon. Mom had rung her from work, she said, she had seemed very nice. I knew Dad didn't want a cleaning woman, he had mentioned it once, but now he was quiet, so I supposed he must have changed his mind.

I was looking forward to her coming. The few times we had visitors it was always fun, perhaps because when they came they filled the house with something new and different. And it was good because they always showed Yngve and me some attention. "So those are your boys, are they?" they would say, if they had never seen us before, or, "How tall they've grown," if they had, and sometimes they even asked us questions, such as how school was going or about soccer.

After eating I slipped into Yngve's room. He took a cassette from the rack, it was Status Quo, Piledriver, and put it in the recorder.

"I saw you on the bus," I said. "Where were you going?"

"To town," he said.

He lay on the bed and started reading a comic.

"What did you do there?"

"That's enough questions," he said. "I had to buy a part for my bike."

"Is it broken?"

He nodded. Then he looked me in the eye.

"Don't tell anyone. Not even Mom," he said.

"Cross my heart and hope to die," I said.

"It's up at Frank's. You know the part the handlebars are attached to, well, it broke. But his father promised he would fix it for me. I get it back tomorrow."

"Imagine if Dad had seen you," I said. "In Arendal. Or someone he knows had seen you."

Yngve shrugged and continued reading. I went into my own room. After a while the doorbell rang. I waited until Mom was downstairs in the hall before leaving my room. Shortly afterward an elderly, somewhat plump or perhaps I should say broad, lady with gray hair and glasses came up the stairs.

"This is Karl Ove," Mom said. "Our younger son."

I nodded to her. She smiled.

"My name's Fru Hjellen," she said. "I'm sure we'll become good friends."

She patted my shoulder. I felt a warmth suffuse my whole body.

"Our elder son, Yngve, is in his room," Mom said.

"Should I get him?" I said.

Mom shook her head. "No need."

She started showing her around, and I went back to my room. Outside, dusk was falling. The rain was drumming softly on the roof and wall. The gutters were swirling and gurgling. Large raindrops hit the window and rolled down in patterns it was impossible to predict. The headlights from a car lit up the spruce tree above the mailbox stand. Jacobsen returning from work. The green boxes and the stand to which they were attached glinted silently in the glare. No, no, they said. Not the light, not the light. I lay down on my bed and thought about Anne Lisbet.

Tomorrow we would go there again. But first of all I wanted to see her at school! And it was enough to see her. I needed no more than that for the pleasure to spread through every part of my body. One day I would ask her to go out with me. One day I would be in her room and she would be in mine. Even though I wasn't allowed to have anyone in my room, she would be allowed to come here, I would fix that. Even if we had to climb in through the little window in the boiler room!

I sat down at my desk, took the books from my satchel, and did my homework. Fru Hjellen left, and then I heard Yngve going to the kitchen. It was Monday today, and every Monday he had started making scones or waffles in the evening. I would sit in the kitchen with Mom while he worked, it was warm there, the aroma of scones or waffles was good, and we talked about everything under the sun. After Yngve had finished we ate the scones with butter, which melted on them, and brown cheese, or waffles with butter and sugar, which also melted, and drank tea with milk. Now and then, but not often, Dad joined us. By and large, though, he went back down to his study pretty quickly.

I did my homework at breakneck speed. I could do the letters, of course, it was just a question of scribbling down enough of them, and then I went into the kitchen, too. A light shone from the empty oven. Yngve stood stirring a bowl on the counter with his sleeves rolled up and an apron on. Mom sat knitting.

"Haven't you finished yet?" I said, sitting down at my place.

"Another day or two," she said, pulling at the wool, as though she were in a boat and jig fishing. "It depends on how much I get done."

"Geir and I were up at Anne Lisbet and Solveig's today," I said.

"Oh?" Mom said. "Who are they? Some girls in your class?"

I nodded.

"Have you started playing with girls now?" Yngve said.

"Yes. And?" I said.

"Are you in love or what?"

I glanced at Mom hesitantly, then at Yngve.

"I think so," I said.

Yngve laughed.

"You're only seven! You can't be in love!"

"Don't laugh at him, Yngve," Mom said.

Yngve blushed and studied the bowl in front of him.

"Feelings are feelings whether you're seven or seventy. It means the same, you know."

There was a silence.

"But it can't go anywhere!" Yngve said.

"You might be right about that," Mom said. "But you can feel something for others despite that, can't you?"

"You were in love with Anne," I said.

"I was not," he said.

"You said you were."

"Well, never mind," Mom said. "How's the mix going? Will it be ready soon?"

"Think so," Yngve said.

"May I have a look?" Mom said, putting her knitting in the basket at her feet and getting up.

"Will you grease the tray, Karl Ove?"

She took the little pan with the melting butter off the heat, passed me a brush, and took the baking tray from the drawer at the bottom of the stove. The butter was ready; you could see that by the color: there were several inlets and some large lagoons of light brown in the thin yellow liquid. If you heated it slowly the color became fuller and purer. I dipped the brush in the pan and swept it over the baking tray. Butter heated slowly could make the bristles stiffen, so you had to dab rather than stroke it on, whereas with a thin brown liquid it was easier to cover a surface. It took ten seconds and the tray was ready. I sat down again and Yngve started shaping the scones. Downstairs a door opened. Straight afterward came the sound of Dad's heavy footsteps on the stairs. I straightened up in my chair. Mom sat down again, put her knitting on her lap, and looked up as Dad appeared in the doorway.

"Everything's in full swing here, I can see," he said, tucking his thumbs through the loops of his belt and pulling up his trousers. "Soon be something to eat, I presume."

"In a quarter of an hour or so," Mom said.

"Are those scones you're making, Yngve?" he said.

Yngve just nodded without looking up.

"Good," Dad said. He turned and went into the living room. The floor creaked lightly under his weight. He stopped by the television, switched it on, and ensconced himself in the brown leather chair.

I knew that voice. It was the man on the doctor program. A bit hoarse, it sounded rusty, it issued from a face that always leaned backward as though addressing itself to the ceiling while his eyes always looked down, as though to direct his voice to the right place.

I got up and went into the living room.

The screen showed an open wound with blood and skin and flesh surrounded by blue linen.

"Is that an operation?" I said.

"It is indeed," Dad said.

"May I watch?"

"Yes, I don't think there would be any harm in that."

I perched on the edge of the sofa. You could see deep into the body. There was a kind of shaft into it, held open by several metal clips, revealing a layer of flesh that the blood appeared to have just left, and a glistening, membrane-like organ at the very bottom, also stained with blood, all illuminated by a sharp, almost white, light. A pair of rubber-gloved hands rummaged around, apparently at home in these surroundings. Occasionally you saw a fuller picture. Then it became clear the shaft had been opened in a patient lying on a table otherwise completely covered by a blue plastic-like material and that the hands belonged to a surgeon who constituted the focal point of a circle of five people, all dressed in green, the two in the center leaning over the body under a saurian lamp, the other three next to them with trays of instruments and all sorts of equipment I had never seen before.

Dad got up.

"No, I can't watch this," he said. "How can they show this on TV on a Monday night!"

"Can I watch it anyway?" I said.

"Yes, of course," he said, heading for the staircase.

The membrane at the bottom was pulsating. Blood streamed over it, and it sent the blood back, then seemed to rise, until the blood washed across again and once more it had to send it back and once more it had to rise.

Suddenly I realized this was a heart I was watching.

How incredibly sad.

Not because the heart was beating and couldn't escape, it wasn't that. The point was that the heart should not be seen, it should be allowed to beat in secret, hidden from our sight, it was obvious, you understood that when you saw it, a little animal without eyes, it should pound and throb inside your chest unseen.

But I kept watching. Medical programs were my favorite on TV, and especially the few that showed operations. A long time ago I had decided I would be a surgeon when I grew up. Mom and Dad sometimes mentioned this to others, it was intended to be amusing because I'd said it when I was so small, but I really meant it, that was what I wanted to do when I grew up, cut up other people and perform operations on them. I often did drawings or paintings of operations with blood and knives and nurses and lamps, and Mom had asked me many times why I drew and painted so much blood, why couldn't I choose something else, houses and grass and sun, for example, and that was fine by me, but it wasn't what I wanted to do. Divers, sailing ships, rockets, and operations, they were what I wanted to draw and paint, not houses and grass and sun.

When Yngve was very small and they lived in Oslo he had said he wanted to be a garbage collector when he grew up. Grandma laughed a lot about that and often mentioned it. In the same breath she said Dad had wanted to be an odd-job man when he was small. She laughed just as much about that, sometimes so much tears rolled down her cheeks, even though she must have said it a hundred times. My wanting to become a surgeon wasn't funny in the same way, it carried a different message, but then I was also a lot older than Yngve had been when he said he wanted to be a garbage collector.

Step by step all the clips and tubes were removed from the shaft in the body. Then the host of the show came on camera and talked about what we had just seen. I got up and went back into the kitchen, where the scones were cooling down on the tray on top of the stove, a pan of hot water for tea was steaming beside them, and Mom was setting the table with plates, cups, knives, and a variety of spreads.

The next day the temperature had fallen and the rain had stopped. My winter boots from last year were too small, and Mom found some woolen socks I could wear inside my rubber boots instead. The blue Puffa jacket still fit, so I wore that for the first time since last year. And then, as soon as I was out of the house, there was a blue bobble cap that I pulled down so far over my face that it formed a black ceiling to my vision. Anne Lisbet was wearing a light-blue Puffa jacket, in smooth, shiny material, unlike mine, which was coarse and matte, a white cap from which her black hair protruded, a white scarf, blue trousers, and a brand-new pair of red boots. She was standing with some girls and didn't return my gaze when I looked at them.

The color of her jacket was just incredibly attractive.

I wanted one like it.

When we got to school and everyone had left their satchels in a line, I suggested to Geir that we steal their caps. He would take Solveig's and I would take Anne Lisbet's. She was standing with her back to us, and when I grabbed it, she whirled around with a scream. I waited until her eyes met mine, and then I ran off. I didn't run so fast that she couldn't catch me or so slowly that everyone would see I was waiting.

I could hear her footsteps on the pavement behind me.

And then she wrapped her arms around me.

Oh! Oh! Oh!

Her wonderfully thick down jacket pressed against mine, she smiled, and shouted, Let me have it, let me have it, and I simply couldn't drag the moment out any longer by holding the cap high above her head, the joy inside me was too strong, I just gave it to her and stood still and watched her put it on her head and walk away.

Then she turned and smiled at me!

And her eyes, oh, her eyes, so black and beautiful, they were gleaming! It was like entering a zone of shining light against which everything outside paled and lost meaning. The bell rang, we marched up the stairs, along the corridor, sat down at our desks, and took out our books. And I did what we were told, listened when we had to listen, chatted away as usual, drew my sunken wrecks and swimming frogmen, ate my packed lunch and drank my milk, played soccer at recess, sat beside Geir, and sang in the bus on the way home, ran through the flock of children with my satchel hanging off my back down the last hill, present in both body and soul, yet absent, because inside me there suddenly existed a new sky under whose vaults even the most familiar of thoughts and actions appeared new.

When we went to see Anne Lisbet that day she was standing in the middle of a crowd of kids on the cul-de-sac outside her house. Two of them were swinging a rope between them like a machine, it lashed the ground like a whip, and one after the other they slipped in, stood, and jumped up and down a few times, then slipped out, so that the next person could step in. She was wearing the same cap and the same scarf, and she smiled at us as we stopped in front of them.

"Join in, come on!" she said.

We got in line. I wanted to impress her so much, just slip into the spinning corridor the rope drew in the air, but I didn't manage more than two jumps before it hit my calf and I was out.

Strangely, Geir, whose motor control was not that great and whose arms and legs flapped about wildly, managed very well. Jump, jump, jump, jump, jump – and then he hurled himself out with such force and determination that he had to take a few extra steps to prevent himself from stumbling, not dissimilar to a runner throwing himself at the tape.

Now she would think that Geir was better than me.

The somberness of that thought was gone the very next moment because it was her turn. She ran in and danced inside the rope, an absolute virtuoso, her weight was first on one leg, then on the other while she stared straight ahead, as though her head had nothing to do with what her body was doing. But as she jumped out, no longer needing to concentrate, it was me she looked at and sent a smile to. Did you see that? her smile said. Did you see me just now?

The water covering the largest sunken areas of the cul-de-sac where we were standing was almost yellow. In the smaller puddles it was a greenish gray, like the surrounding gravel, only a shade lighter. And shinier, of course. From the forest below came the babbling of a stream. The drone of a machine was also audible. I had never been there before, and walked over to the edge to look down. From the house above me on the edge of the forest, a broad, rocky slope fell away sharply. Beneath it there was a yellow bog. Behind that, pines huddled together. Between the trunks I could see a green workmen's shed and a yellow generator. That was what was making the noise.

Then some drilling started. I couldn't see who was doing it, but the sound, such a monotonous rat-a-tat-tat, with that brittle, almost singing tone of metal on rock lying like a veil over it, was unmistakable. I knew it through and through.

I turned back and saw Geir nodding his head in time with the rope to adapt to the rhythm for his turn. But this time he didn't do so well, his foot got tangled at once, and as the two rope swingers resumed their mechanical motions, he shuffled over toward me. Behind him Anne Lisbet slipped in. But as soon as she was in position the rope hit her on the arm. She seemed almost to have done it on purpose.

"Are you coming, Solveig?" she said.

Solveig nodded and left the line. Both of them came over to us.

"What do you want to do?" Anne Lisbet said.

"Maybe go and look for some bottles?" I said.

"Yes, let's!" Geir said.

"Where, though? Where are there any bottles?" Anne Lisbet said.

"Along the main road," Geir said. "And in the forest behind the play area. Around the sheds. Sometimes by the Rock. Never in the autumn, though."

"At the bus stop," I said. "And under the bridge."

"Once we found a whole bag full," Geir said. "In the ditch near the shop. We made four kroner on the deposits!"

Solveig and Anne Lisbet looked at him, impressed. Even though the bottle idea had been my suggestion! I had come up with it, not Geir!

Without thinking, we had started to walk. The sky was as gray as dry cement. Not a breath stirred the trees; everything was still, brooding, as if turned in on itself. Except for the pines, that is: they were as open and free and sky-embracing as ever. Standing more as though they were in repose. It was the spruces that were turned inward, swallowed up by their own darkness. The deciduous trees, with their thin trunks and splayed branches, were nervous and wary. The old oaks, of which there were quite a few on the slope beyond the road, where we were heading now, were not afraid but lonely. They could endure the loneliness, though; they had stood there for so many years and would stand there for so many more to come.

"There's a pipe there that goes under the road," Anne Lisbet said, pointing to the slope running down alongside the road. It was covered with black soil, laid recently, because no flowers had come up yet.

We walked down. And, sure enough, a pipe did go under the road, made of concrete, perhaps a little more than half a meter in diameter.

"Have you ever crawled through it?" I said.

They shook their heads.

"Why don't we?" Geir said. He leaned over with one hand on the edge of the pipe and peered into the darkness.

"What if we get stuck inside?" Solveig said.

"We can do it," I said. "So you can cross the road and wait for us."

"Do you dare?" Anne Lisbet said.

"Of course," Geir said. He glanced at me. "Who'll go first?"

"You can," I said.

"Okay," he said, bending down and squeezing into the pipe. It was too narrow to scramble through on all fours, I could see, but not so narrow that you couldn't wriggle through. After a few seconds of twisting and turning his whole body had disappeared. I looked at Anne Lisbet, leaned forward, and stuck my head in the pipe. A smell of something fusty, like mildew, filled my nostrils. I placed my elbows on the bottom and edged the rest of my body forward, moving like a grub. When all of my body was inside, I raised myself as far as was possible, and with my forearms, knees, and feet pushing against the cement wriggled into the gloom. For the first few meters I could see the shadowy figure of Geir in front of me, but then the darkness deepened and he was gone.

"Are you there?" I shouted.

"Yes," he answered.

"Are you scared?"

"A little. And you?"

"Yes, a little."

Suddenly everything vibrated. A car or a truck must have driven over us a long way up. What if the pipe broke? What if it caved in and we were stuck in it?

The tips of my fingers and toes began to tremble with a faint sense of panic. I knew this feeling, it could arise when I was climbing a mountain and then I would be paralyzed. Frightened out of my wits, I would stand perfectly still, incapable of ascending or descending, in full knowledge of the fact there was only one way to go, only my own movements could get me out of this. I couldn't move, I had to move, but I couldn't, had to, couldn't, had to, couldn't.

"Are you still scared?" I said.

"A little. Did you hear the car? Here comes another!"

Again the pipe vibrated around me.

I kept quite still. There was water lying in several places at the bottom of the pipe and it was advancing up my trousers.

"I can see light!" Geir said.

I thought of the enormous weight on the pipe. It was only a few centimeters thick. My heart was pounding. Suddenly I wanted to stand upright. The urge grew wildly inside me, but collided with the recognition that it was impossible, the concrete was wrapped around my body like a cocoon. I couldn't move.

Sometimes Yngve would sit astride me while I was lying under the duvet. He would hold me so firmly that I couldn't move at all. The duvet was tight across my chest, my hands were locked in his, and my legs were rendered useless under his weight and the taut duvet. He did it because he knew I absolutely hated it. He did it because he knew that after a few seconds of being held captive I would panic. That I would summon all my strength in an attempt to break free, and when I couldn't, when he held me in his grip, I would begin to scream as loudly as I could. I screamed and screamed like a being possessed, and I was, I was possessed by terror, I couldn't break free, I was stuck, completely and utterly stuck, and I screamed from the bottom of my lungs.

Now I could feel the same grip around my heart.

I couldn't move.

Panic was growing.

I knew I mustn't think about not being able to stand up, I should crawl forward patiently and everything would be fine. But I couldn't. All I could think of was that I couldn't move.

"Geir!" I shouted.

"I'm nearly out!" he shouted back. "Where are you?"

"I'm stuck!"

Silence for some seconds.

Then Geir shouted, "I can come and help you! I just have to get out and turn first!"

The panic attack was like an exhalation of breath, because it was out of me now. I moved my arms forward and dragged my knees after. The material of my jacket scraped against the pipe above. Only a few centimeters above that there were tons of rocks and earth. I stopped. My legs and arms had gone weak. I lay down flat.

What would Anne Lisbet and Solveig think about me now?

Oh no, oh no.

Then the panic returned. I couldn't move. I was trapped. I couldn't move! I was trapped! I couldn't move!

Somewhere in the darkness in front of me something moved. Cloth scraped against cement. I heard Geir breathing, it was unmistakable: he would often breathe through his mouth.

Then I saw him, a white face in the blackness.

"Are you stuck?" he said.

"No," I said.

He grabbed the sleeve of my jacket and pulled. I raised my back and moved first one arm forward, then the other, one leg, then the other. Geir wriggled backward without letting go of my sleeve, and even though he wasn't pulling me, because of course I was scrabbling my way through, it felt like he was, and the sight of his white face, pointed like a fox's and unusually concentrated, meant that my mind was no longer on the pipe and the darkness and not being able to move, and so I could move, little by little over the damp concrete, which became lighter and lighter until Geir's feet were out of the hole, followed by his torso, and I could poke my head out into daylight.

Anne Lisbet and Solveig were standing close together by the opening and looking at me.

"Did you get stuck?" Anne Lisbet said.

"Yes," I said. "For a while there, but Geir helped me."

Geir brushed down his hands. Then he brushed the knees of his trousers. I straightened up. The space beneath the gray sky was vast. All the shapes were razor sharp.

"Why don't we go down to Little Hawaii?" Geir said.

"Good idea," I said.

It was wonderful to run on the forest floor. The surface of the water in the little lake was completely black. The trees rising from the two small islands were still. We jumped over to our respective islands. Anne Lisbet and I on one, Solveig and Geir on the other.

Anne Lisbet's lips seemed so vital; they opened and smiled with such ease, now and then of their own accord when her eyes remained unmoved. They seemed to obey the slightest impulse of her mind. She thought of something, they spread across her hard white teeth, soft and red, occasionally followed by an exclamation or a glow of happiness in her eyes, occasionally unconnected with anything else.

"You're sailors," she said out of the blue. "And you come home to us. We haven't seen each other for ages. Shall we play that?"

I nodded. Geir nodded, too.

The two girls jumped onto land and went a little way into the forest.

"You can come now!" Anne Lisbet shouted.

We moored, leaped ashore, and walked toward them. But we weren't quick enough for them, Anne Lisbet was impatiently dancing from one foot to the other, she set off running, toward me, and when she reached me she threw her arms around me and hugged me and pressed her cheek against mine.

"I have missed you so much!" she said. "Oh, my darling husband!"

She took a step back.

"Again!"

I ran back to the lake, jumped onto the little island, waited until Geir was on the other one, then we repeated our actions with one difference, this time we ran as fast as we could to the girls.

Again she wrapped her arms around me.

My heart was racing, for I was not only standing on the ground in a forest with the sky far above me, I was also standing on the ground inside myself and looking up into something light and open and happy.

Her hair smelled of apples.

Through the material of her thick, padded jacket I could feel her body. Her cold, smooth face against mine, almost glowing.

We did this three times. Then we delved farther into the forest. After only a few meters it sloped down, and as the trees growing there were mostly deciduous, the ground was covered with red, yellow, and brown leaves, a floor to the bare walls of trunks. There was the sound of a rushing stream somewhere nearby. The forest tapered to a path running steeply down to the main road, which we couldn't see until we came out a couple of meters above it.

On the other side, a field sloped down, beyond lay Tromøya Sound, as gray as clay, while the sky that opened above was a shade lighter.

The traffic was fast moving, and we kept to the ditch as we walked along. The bottles we usually found here were always new and shiny while those we found in the woods were often covered in grass and had leaves stuck to them, sometimes they were also full of little insects and lifting them up was like lifting up a bit of the field.

Today, however, there were no bottles to be seen. When we reached Larsen's house – a dilapidated, shedlike construction that had once been part of a farm but was now squeezed into a corner between the forest and the road, whose owner was a teacher at the same school as Dad and according to rumors had turned up for work drunk several times – we crossed the road and followed the steep gravel road down to Gamle Tybakken. We looked for bottles on the way, but our efforts became more and more halfhearted. Soon we came to a built-up area. Old white houses set far back in well-established gardens full of fruit trees and fruit bushes. Where we were walking, the colors were so sharp, all the leaves were brilliant yellow and piercing red, and so matte in the sky's pale, slightly frigid gray, it gave me a sense I was walking at the bottom of a tin can, with the sky the lid and the hills that rose all around me the sides. After a few hundred meters we walked past a large property with a lawn stretching up toward the forest above. The house at the top was surprisingly small, considering the size of the land. A narrow gravel track led up to it, and we stopped by the mailbox at the end because, outside the house, beside a large stream that plunged down from the forest, an old lady was pulling at a tree that had got wedged in it.

The tree was perhaps three times bigger than her, with a broad panoply of thin branches around it.

Somehow or other she noticed us standing there because the very next moment she straightened up and looked across at us. She waved. But not in greeting, she was pointing to herself, she was beckoning us to come over.

We ran as fast as we could up the gravel track, across the soft, wet lawn and stopped in front of her.

"You look strong," she said. "Can you help an old lady, do you think? I need to get this tree out of the stream. It's gotten stuck."

Flattered, we got down to work. Geir waded into the water as far as he could and grabbed a branch, I did the same on the other side while Anne Lisbet and Solveig pulled the trunk. At first it wouldn't budge, but then Geir began to shout, Heave-ho! Heave-ho! to make us pull in unison and bit by bit we managed to drag it out. When it was free the current caught the end and pushed it onto our side, but we held on and hauled it onto dry land.

"Oh, how wonderful!" the old lady said. "Many, many thanks! I would never have managed that on my own, you know. You are so strong! Well done. Wait here and I'll give you a little something as a sign of gratitude."

She scurried off to the house with her head bowed and disappeared through the front door.

"What do you think we'll get?" I said.

"Few cookies maybe," Geir said.

"Or a bag of bread rolls," Anne Lisbet said. "Mom always keeps some handy."

"I think apples," Solveig said. And when she said that, I agreed wholeheartedly because beyond the gravel track there were lots of apple trees.

But when the old lady reappeared, with her head still bowed, she came toward us empty-handed. Hadn't she found anything?

"Now look here," she said. "This is for you with my thanks. Who's going to take care of it? It's for all of you."

She held out a coin. It was five kroner.

Five kroner!

"I can look after it," I said. "Thank you very much!"

"It's me who should thank you," the old lady said. "All the best now!"

Elated, we sprinted down the hill. Then without a second thought we walked back the way we had come, discussing what we would do with the money. Geir and I wanted to go to the shop straightaway and buy candy with it. Anne Lisbet and Solveig also wanted to buy candy, but they didn't want to go to the shop now, it would soon be dinner and they had to go home. We decided to save the money for the day after and then buy candy.

Anne Lisbet and Solveig took the path home. Geir and I continued along the main road to the shop. Standing outside, we couldn't wait as we had agreed, the five-krone coin was burning a hole in our pockets, it was all we could think about. Waiting to spend it was simply not an option, so we decided to buy the candy now and save it until the following day and surprise Anne Lisbet and Solveig with it.

And so we bought it.

However, after we had done so and started walking to the road, Geir's father came along in their Beetle. He pulled over beside us, leaned over the seat, and opened the door.

"Hop in," he said.

"Can Karl Ove come, too?"

"No, not this time, we're not going home. We're going to town. Another time, Karl Ove!"

"Okay," Geir said. Turned to me and said in his dramatic whisper, "Don't eat any of the candy!"

I shook my head and stood watching until Geir was in and the car had driven off. Then I ran to the concrete barriers, jumped over them, scampered down the slope and into the play area, past the wreck of a car, across the soccer field, through the forest, and along the edge past the bog. Just before I could be seen from our house I stopped and divvied up all the candy, which until then had been in one bag, and put it into the four pockets of my jacket. I threw the bag away and ran onto the road, down the side of the house – there was a light on in the living-room window – and into the drive. Dad's car was there and, leaning against the wall in its usual place, Yngve's bike!

The little metal part holding the handlebars in position had a very different, and much brighter, gleam than the metal around it. Surely Dad couldn't help but notice?

I opened the door and went in. If Dad met me I would just hang up my jacket as normal. If he stayed in his study or in the living room, I would go upstairs wearing my jacket, hide the candy in my room, and then go back down with the empty jacket. If he met me then and asked why I was still wearing my jacket I would say I'd had to go to the toilet urgently.

The house was quiet.

There he was. Upstairs in the living room.

I carefully removed my shoes and walked through the hall, up the stairs, and into the bathroom. Opened my fly, wriggled out the wiener, and peed. Pulled the chain, washed my hands in cold water, dried them, and waited for the flush to stop before I opened the door. Cast a fleeting glance into the living room, nothing, went into my room, pulled the duvet aside, emptied my pockets of all the candy, covered it again, and went onto the landing.

"Karl Ove, is that you?" Dad said from the living room.

"Yes," I said.

He came out.

"Where have you been?" he said.

"Gamle Tybakken with Geir," I said.

"What were you doing there?"

His mouth was a straight line. His eyes were cold.

"Nothing much," I said, so happy my voice held firm. "Walking around, that was all."

"Why are you wearing your jacket?"

"I had to go to the bathroom. I'll take it off now."

I continued down the stairs. He went back to the living room. I hung up my jacket and quickly returned, unhappy at the thought that all that candy was lying there unprotected. Switched on the small, round metal lamp on the desk. The long, slim bulb filled the empty space it resided in with its yellow light. Sat down on the bed. Straightened the duvet over the candy.

What now?

Contrasting feelings coursed through me. One minute I was on the verge of tears, the next my chest was bursting with happiness.

I took out a book about space Dad had had as a child and which I had been allowed to borrow the previous time I was ill. It was crammed with drawings of how space travel would be in the future. Astronauts' equipment, the shape of rockets, and the surfaces of planets.

Dad strode along the landing.

He opened the door and eyed me. Without making a move to come in or say anything.

I closed the book and sat up straight. Glanced in the direction of the candy.

It was impossible to see there was anything underneath the duvet.

"What have you got there?" Dad said.

"Where?" I said. "What do you mean? I haven't got anything."

"Under the duvet," Dad said.

"I haven't got anything under the duvet!"

He eyed me again.

Then he walked over to the bed and tore the duvet aside.

"You're lying to me!" he said. "Are you lying to your own father?"

He grabbed my ear and twisted it round.

"I didn't mean to!" I said.

"Where did you get the candy? Where did you get the money to buy it?"

"An old lady gave it to me!" I said, starting to cry. "I haven't done anything wrong!"

"An old lady?" Dad said. He twisted harder. "Why would an old lady give you money?"

"Ow! Ow!" I yelled.

"Be quiet!" he said. "You lied to me, didn't you?"

"Yes, but I didn't mean to!"

"Look at me when I'm talking to you. Did you lie?"

I raised my head and looked at him. His eyes were smoldering with anger.

"Yes," I said.

"So now you tell me where you got the money from. Do you understand?"

"Yes. I got it from an old lady! We did her a favor!"

"Who?"

"Geir and I and A – "

"You and Geir and who?"

"No one. Just me and Geir."

"You little liar. Just you come here."

He twisted my ear around again while pulling my hand and forcing me to stand up. I gasped and sobbed and my insides went hollow.

"Down to my study," he said, without letting go of my ear.

"I . . . haven't . . . done . . . anything . . . wrong," I said. "We . . . were . . . given . . . the money."

He pushed open the first door so hard that it slammed against the wall. Dragged me in through the second and onto the floor. Then he let go.

"How did you get the money?" he said. "And don't you tell me any lies!"

"We helped . . . an old lady."

"To do what?"

"There was . . . a tree. A tree . . . stuck in a stream. We pulled . . . it out."

"And she gave you money for that?"

"Yes."

"How much?"

"Five kroner."

"You're lying, Karl Ove. Where did you get the money from?"

"I AM NOT LYING!" I yelled.

His hand shot out and slapped me on the cheek.

"Do not shout!" he hissed.

He stood up.

"But there is a way to find out," he said. "I'll ring the old lady and ask her if it's true."

He looked me in the eye as he said it.

"Where does she live?"

"In . . . Gamle Ty . . . bakken," I said.

Dad went to the telephone on his desk, lifted the receiver, and dialed a number. Held the receiver to his ear.

"Oh, hello," he said. "My name's Knausgaard. I'm ringing about my son. He says you gave him five kroner today. Is that correct?"

There was a pause.

"You didn't? You didn't have two boys helping you today? You didn't give them five kroner? Oh yes, I see. I apologize for the intrusion. Thank you very much. Goodbye."

He cradled the receiver.

I couldn't believe my own ears.

He looked at me.

"She hasn't seen any boys. And she definitely didn't give anyone five kroner."

"But it's true. We were given five kroner."

He shook his head.

"That's not what she said. So. That's enough lying. Where did you get the money from?"

Another deluge of tears swept through me.

"From . . . the . . . old . . . lady!" I sobbed.

Dad stared at me.

"We're not going to get any further with this," he said. "Now you go and throw the candy in the bin. And you stay in your room for the rest of the evening. Then I'll have a chat with Prestbakmo in a bit."

"But it's not mine!" I said.

"It's not yours? You've told me you were given five kroner? Wasn't it your money after all?"

"It's Geir's as well," I said. "I can't throw the candy away."

Dad stared at me with his mouth agape and a furious glare.

"You do as I say," he said at length. "Now I don't want to hear a single word more from you. Have you got that? You steal, you lie, and on top of all that you talk back! So. Get up there."

With him right behind me, I gathered up all the candy in my hands, threw it in the kitchen trash can, and went back to my room.

That autumn and winter we went up to see Anne Lisbet and Solveig as often as we could. We stumbled around playing in the darkness, our rain gear glistening with rain in the gleam of our flashlights, which shone narrow tunnels of light into the forest below their houses, we sat in one of their bedrooms drawing and listening to music, we went to the boat factory and the big quay there, up the hill behind, where none of us had been before, and we went down into the forest below the bridge next to the immense concrete foundations.

One Saturday we wandered down to the secret dumping ground. They were just as eager as we had been, and Geir and I dragged four chairs and a table, a lamp, and a chest of drawers into the trees, we arranged them as if we were in a living room, and it was absolutely fantastic because we were outside in the forest, in the sunlight, yet inside a living room, and we were there with Solveig and Anne Lisbet.

The tingle of excitement I felt when I looked at her never waned, she was so beautiful it hurt. Her thick, light-blue jacket with the shiny material. The white cap. The rim of wool around the top of her boots. Her face when for some reason she sent us a fierce look. Her smile, as radiant as a billion diamonds.

When the snow began to fall we wandered around searching for suitable places to jump from, slide down, or dig holes in. Her hot, red cheeks then, the gentle but distinct smell of snow that changed so much according to the temperature, but that was everywhere around us nevertheless; all the possibilities that existed. Once the mist hung between the trees, the air was thick with drizzle and we were wearing waterproof clothing that was so frictionless on the snow we could slide down it like seals. We climbed to the top of the slope, I lay on my front, Anne Lisbet sat astride me, Solveig astride Geir, and we slid down on our stomachs all the way to the bottom. It was the best day I had ever experienced. We did it again and again. The feeling of her legs clamped round my back, the way she held my shoulders, the howls of delight she gave when we picked up speed, the fantastic somersaults when we reached the bottom, rolling around with our legs and arms entwined. All while the mist hung motionless amid the wet, dark green spruce trees, and the drizzle in the air lay like a thin film of skin on our faces.

We discovered lots of new places that winter, such as the deciduous forest below the road, which surrounded the whole estate and the area above the Fina station, two places that had been totally separate in our consciousness but that were now suddenly connected. The old gravel lane that led down there, the last part of which we had joined when we were going to the Fina station, also had a top end, where the children we had never seen lived, they also had a soccer field in the forest, small, it was true, but with decent goals. Or the road below Anne Lisbet and Solveig's, where the houses highest up were only a stone's throw away from theirs. Dag Magne, who was in our class, turned out to be Solveig's neighbor. It came as a surprise that their houses were so close to one another, they belonged to two different worlds and there was a belt of forest between them. Presumably it was the forest that had deceived us. It was no more than twenty, perhaps thirty meters wide, but it represented so much more than houses that, emotionally, the distance felt like several hundred meters. This was the same across the whole estate, and not only there, it was like that by the dumping ground, too, for if you took the road from Færvik and continued straight on, which very few people did, instead of turning right onto the road to Hove, you were there. And if you bore right at the end of the long, flat stretch, on the road east toward the school, it was only a couple hundred meters before the dumping ground revealed itself in all its glory between the trees. Areas that had previously been isolated, in their own worlds, so to speak, were suddenly connected. How many people knew that Lake Tjenna was actually located right by Lake Gjerstad? Lake Gjerstad, which you could walk to from Sandum, on the other side of the island! Or reach via a shortcut off the road to school!

Another surprise was that Fru Hjellen, our houskeeper, lived with her husband in the house next to Anne Lisbet's. They had no children, she was always happy to receive visitors, and I went there both on my own and with the other three. When she cleaned our house I told her all sorts of things, even things I didn't tell

Mom and Dad. She taught me how to open the front door with the key I had been given – the trick was to pull it out a tiny bit after fully inserting it and then turn.

And so it was Fru Hjellen I confided in when one of the rocks we regularly dropped on cars from the road below us finally hit one. I was the one who dropped it. We were standing by the green fence, Geir had just missed his car, when I picked up a stone and waited for another car to come. The stone was bigger than my hand and so heavy that I pushed it rather than dropping it. There, a car was coming round the bend. Racing across the flat stretch. Now!

The stone flew through the air. The instant it left my hand I knew it was going to hit. However, I had not anticipated the bang on the car roof would be so loud. Nor that the very next second there would be a squeal of brakes and locked tires screaming across the pavement.

Geir looked at me with terrified eyes.

"Let's scram!" he said.

He crawled up the rocks, dashed across the road, climbed up the little knoll, and was gone.

Absolutely paralyzed, I didn't move. I simply couldn't move a muscle. I was too frightened. Even when I heard a car door slamming below, the engine starting, and the car heading for where I was standing. I didn't move.

Thirty seconds later the car came up the road. With tears running down my cheeks and my legs trembling so much I could barely stand, I watched it stop on the road three meters above me. The driver didn't open the door and get out; he hurled it open and leaped out, his face red with fury.

"Did you throw that rock?" he yelled, already on his way down the slope.

I nodded.

He grabbed both my arms and shook me.

"You could have killed me, do you understand? If the rock had hit the windshield! Do you understand! And whatever happens, the car's a WRITE-OFF! Do you know how much it costs to repair a roof? Oh, this is going to cost you a bundle!"

He let go of me.

I was crying so much I couldn't see.

"What's your name?" he said.

"Karl Ove," I said.

"Surname?"

"Knausgaard."

"Do you live here?"

"No."

"Where do you live then?"

"Nordåsen Ringvei," I said.

He straightened up.

"You'll be hearing from me," he said. "Or your father will be hearing from me, I should say."

He took the slope in one stride with his long legs, got into his car, slammed the door hard, and drove off with a jerk.

I sat down on the ground sobbing. All hope was gone.

A moment later Geir called from the terrain above. He came sprinting down, bursting with questions about what had happened and what had been said. I knew he was glad it was me who had thrown the rock and that I had given my name. But what he wanted to know most was why I hadn't run. After all, we'd had plenty of time to get away. If I'd run he would never have caught me and never known it was me who had dropped the stone.

"I don't know," I said, drying my tears. "But I couldn't. Suddenly I couldn't move."

"Are you going to tell your mom and dad?" Geir said. "That'd be best. If you tell them the truth they'll be angry, but it'll be over and done with quickly. If you don't say anything and he rings, it'll be worse."

"I don't dare," I said. "I can't tell them."

"Did you tell him your father's name?"

"No, just mine."

"But your name's not in the phone book!" he said. "And he'll have to ring your dad. But you didn't tell him his name!"

"No," I said, with a flicker of hope.

"In that case, definitely don't tell them anything," Geir said. "Perhaps nothing will come of it!"

When I got home, Fru Hjellen was there. She could see I had been crying and asked me what was wrong. I asked her not to say a word to anyone. She promised. Then I told her. She stroked my cheek and said it would be best if I told my parents. But I didn't dare, I told her, and so we left it at that. Whenever the phone rang in the following days, I froze in a fear that was greater than any I had ever experienced. An immense darkness hung over those days. But it was never him on the phone, it was always someone else, and I was beginning to believe that everything would pass and disappear of its own accord.

Then he called.

The phone rang, Dad picked it up downstairs, perhaps three minutes went by before the handset upstairs clicked, which meant he had rung off. He came upstairs, his footsteps firm and laden with determination. On his way to see Mom. The voices from the kitchen were loud. I sat in bed crying. A few minutes later my bedroom door opened. Both of them came in. That never happened. Their faces were grave and somber.

"A man has just called me, Karl Ove," Dad said. "He told me you dropped a big stone on his car and destroyed the roof. Is that true?"

"Yes," I said.

"How could you do such a thing?" he said. "What's wrong with you? You could have killed him! Don't you understand? Don't you understand how serious this is, Karl Ove?"

"Yes," I said.

"If the stone had gone through the windshield," Mom said, "he could have driven off the road or collided with another car. He could have died."

"Yes," I said.

"Now I have to pay for the repairs. Which will run into several thousand kroner. And that's money we don't have!" Dad said. "Where do you think that's going to come from, eh?"

"I don't know," I said.

"Oh, you accursed boy!" he said, turning away.

"And then you didn't say a word," Mom said. "It's more than a week since it happened. You have to tell us when this kind of thing happens. Do you understand? Promise me you will."

"Yes," I said. "But I told Fru Hjellen."

"Fru Hjellen?" Dad said. "And not us?"

"Yes."

He looked at me with those cold, angry eyes of his.

"Why did you do it?" Mom said. "How could you even think of dropping stones on cars? You must have known it was dangerous?"

"We didn't think we would hit anything," I said.

"We?" Dad said. "Were there more of you?"

"Geir was with me," I said. "But I dropped the stone that hit the car."

"Looks like I'll have to have a chat with Prestbakmo as well," Dad said, glancing at Mom. Then he turned to me.

"You're grounded today and for two more days. No pocket money for this week or the following one. Do you understand?"

"Yes."

Then they went out.

It had all passed. This, too. It had been the darkness between the act and the revelation, when everything appeared normal but wasn't, which had been so terrible. When everything trembled behind the static façade of everyday normality. Once, about a year earlier, a similar situation had made me run away. Then it had been not a rock but a knife that had led to the misfortune. All the other children had been given scout knives, except me. I was too small and too irresponsible. But then one day, in an act that bore some resemblance to a ceremony, Dad presented me with a knife.

They trusted me, he said. I hid my disappointment that it was a girl's knife he had bought and that the scout in the picture on the sheath wore a skirt, not trousers, these were details you could not expect an adult to understand, and I allowed my pleasure at receiving the knife to predominate because now I could cut and carve and chop and throw with the others. All I needed to do was keep the sheath out of their sight. That day I carved a sword with Leif Tore. A long piece of wood I sharpened at the end like a bradawl and a short piece nailed on as a handle. Swords in hand, we roamed the estate. Finding two girls, each with a doll's stroller, we snuck after them for a while before we launched an attack, imagining we were pirates and they were ships, and again and again we ran our swords through the leather hoods of the strollers. The girls shouted and screamed, we retreated, they said they would tell on us, we began to worry about what we had done, and kept a wary eye on them. First of all, they went home, then they came out, and started to walk toward Gustavsen's house and ours. Terrified of the consequences, we decided to run away. We climbed the mountain, went into the forest at the top, and walked as far as we could, that is, to the cliff above Lake Tjenna. Neither Leif Tore nor I had been there before. It was a long way from home and I thought we could sleep there and leave the following morning. We sat on the edge looking over. The sun hung low in the sky behind us; the countryside that spread out around us was golden in the sunshine. We sat there for half an hour perhaps. Then Leif Tore wanted to go home. He was hungry, he said. I tried to persuade him, we had run away after all, we couldn't go back, but he stuck to his guns, he didn't want to sleep outdoors under any circumstances, so I went back with him. Dad was waiting for me in the garden when I arrived home. He grabbed my arm in an iron grip, dragged me to my room, and told me I was grounded. The knife was confiscated, even though that wasn't what I had used but a sword. They didn't understand the difference. Stabbing with a knife was unthinkable. The sword was made of wood, it was what we had used for the attack, and they should have confiscated that. But they took the knife. I heard them talking about it. "Look," Dad had said. "Look at the sheath. It's completely ruined." He was referring to all the holes I had made to hide the fact that the scout was wearing a skirt and not trousers, but he interpreted it as a sign that I was careless and immature. Sitting there in my room, grounded for that night and the following one, I watched Leif Tore playing outside. He had been given a slap and that was that. Slaps didn't bother him.

But it passed. Everything passed. The girls got new strollers, the motorist got a new roof, the grounding came to an end, pocket money was reinstated, the road outside the house was packed with children in the evening, and the forest below was always open, day and night, winter and spring. Anne Lisbet and Solveig didn't come down to us, we always went up to them, and in that way we had two worlds: one outside our houses, where we joined the gatherings of kids every evening, kicking a soccer ball, playing in the road, building dens in the forest below, running round and poking our noses in every nook and cranny of the estate, and when the cold came and the water froze, skating on Tjenna, with the wonderful sound of steel blades on ice, resounding against the low hills bordering the lake, and every day was filled with such intense pleasure – and another world up there with them, where everything appeared to resemble what we had at home because here too children were throwing themselves into everything you could throw yourself into, here too they kicked a soccer ball in the road, played games in the dark, here too they skipped, here too they skated when the water froze and skied when snow fell, yet it was different. The pleasure was somehow elsewhere, not in what we did but in who we did it with. So intense was the pleasure that it was often there even when they weren't. One evening we played table tennis in Dag Lothar's garage, one evening we snuck around a couple of workmen's sheds by a new road in the forest, one evening we sat in Geir's bedroom playing Chinese checkers, one evening I would be getting undressed by my bed and the thought of Anne Lisbet and her whole being could suddenly strike me with such force that I was left reeling with happiness and longing. Furthermore, it was not just her in those feelings, there was also her beautiful mother and her broad-shouldered father, who was a diver and had a couple of yellow oxygen bottles in the cellar bathroom, her little sister and brother, all the rooms in their house, and the pleasant fragrance that filled them. There were all the things she had in her room, so different from those that occupied mine, lots of dolls, dolls' clothes, a lot of pink and frills. And there was what we did together, which her joy and enthusiasm heightened and added gloss to. Especially at school, where we kept to ourselves until a particular situation brought us together, it might be in a circle when we played Ta den ring og la den vandre and it was me she gave the ring to, or when it was me she caught while singing the last line of "Bro bro brille" and clasped her arms around or when I chased her in tag and she deliberately slowed down so that I could catch her. Oh, had it been up to me I could have run after Anne Lisbet all my life as long as I was allowed to wrap my arms around her at the end.

Did I know that it couldn't last?

No, I didn't. I thought it would just go on and on forever. Spring came, and with it a lightness: one day I put on my new sneakers, and running in them after months of trudging around in various kinds of boots was like flying. Puffa pants and jackets, which made all movement so awkward and clumsy, were replaced by light trousers and light jackets. Gloves, scarves, and caps were packed away. Skis and skates and sleighs and sleds were put into sheds and garages; bikes and soccer balls were taken out, and the sun, which for so long had hung low in the sky and whose rays had been for the eyes only, rose higher and higher with every day that passed and was soon so hot that the jackets we put on in the morning were stuffed in our satchels when we returned from school at midday. But during these weeks the most telling sign of spring was the reek of burning garden refuse wafting across the estate. The cool evenings, the bluish darkness, the cold emanating from ditches still littered with the remains of snowdrifts, as hard as ice and studded with grit, the constant buzz of children's voices outside, children running after a soccer ball in the road, others cycling up and down ditches or doing wheelies on the sidewalk, everything bubbled with life and lightness, you had to run, you had to cycle, you had to shout, you had to laugh, all with the pungent yet rich smell of burning spring grass that was suddenly everywhere in your nostrils. Now and then we ran up and watched: the low, dense flames like little orange waves, damp almost with the intensity of color brought out by the evening gloom, tended by a proud mother or father, often with a rake over their shoulder and gloves on their hands, like some kind of lower-middle-class knight. Now and then there were real bonfires they kept watch over, when all the trash they had collected in the garden during the winter was burned.

What was it about fire?

It was so alien here, it was so profoundly archaic that nothing about it could be associated with its surroundings: what was fire doing side by side with Gustavsen's trailer? What was fire doing side by side with Anne Lene's toy shovel? What was fire doing side by side with Kanestrøm's sodden and faded garden furniture?

In all its various hues of yellow and red it stretched up to the sky, consuming crackling spruce twigs, melting hissing plastic, switching this way, switching that, in totally unpredictable patterns, as beautiful as they were unbelievable, but what were they doing here among us ordinary Norwegians on ordinary evenings in the 1970s?

Another world was revealed with the fire, and departed with it again. This was the world of air and water, earth and rock, sun and stars, the world of clouds and sky, all the old things that were always there and always had been, and which, for that reason, you didn't think about. But the fire came, you saw it. And once you had seen it you couldn't help seeing it everywhere, in all the fireplaces and wood-burning stoves, in all the factories and workshops, and in all the cars driving round the roads and in garages or outside houses in the evening, for fire burned there, too. Also cars were profoundly archaic. This immense antiquity actually resided in everything, from houses – made of brick or wood – to the water flowing through the pipes into and out of them, but since everything happens for the first time in every generation, and since this generation had broken with the previous one, this lay right at the back of our consciousness, if it was there at all, for in our heads we were not only modern 1970s people, our surroundings were also modern 1970s surroundings. And our feelings, those that swept through each and every one of us living there on these spring evenings, were modern feelings, with no other history than our own. And for those of us who were children, that meant no history. Everything was happening for the first time. We never considered the possibility that feelings were also old, perhaps not as old as water or the earth, but as old as humanity. Oh no, why would we? The feelings running through our breasts, which made us shout and scream, laugh and cry, were just part of who we were, more or less like fridges with a light that came on when the door was opened or houses with a doorbell that rang if it was pressed.

Did I really think it would last?

Yes, I did.

But it didn't. One day toward the end of April I told Anne Lisbet we were going to go up to their place after school, and she said we couldn't come.

"Why not?" I said.

"Someone else is coming over," she said.

"Who?" I said, thinking perhaps it was an uncle or an aunt.

"It's a secret," she said, smiling her sly smile.

"Someone from the class?" I said. "Marianne or Sølvi or Unni?"

"It's a secret," she said. "You and Geir can't come. Bye!"

I went over to Geir and told him what she had said. We decided to sneak over after school and spy on them. After dropping off our satchels at home we took the other way up, cut through the building site in the forest below, where the foundations for the new houses had already been built, crept through the trees, over the bog, and up to the cul-de-sac between their houses.

No one.

Were they indoors?

We couldn't ring the bell, of course; we weren't supposed to be there. We walked down. Geir had the brilliant idea of ringing the bell at Vemund's house. He came out and stood in the doorway with that same stupid expression on his round face. Yes, they had gone down the hill some time ago.

Alone?

No, they were with two others.

Who?

'Fraid he hadn't seen.

Boys or girls?

Boys, he thought. At first he had assumed it was us, as we were here so much, but now he could see of course it must have been someone else!

He laughed. Geir laughed, too.

Who could it be?

And what were they doing with them?

"Come on, let's follow them," I said to Geir.

"But they didn't want us with them," Geir said. "Wouldn't it be better to go to Vemund's for a while?"

I stared at him, my eyes as wide as they could be.

"Okay," he said.

"Don't say anything to the others," I said to Vemund. He nodded, and then we walked across their property and down to the road.

Where could they be?

For all we knew, they could have gone all the way down to the shop. But something told me they would stay near the house.

We joined the road below theirs. Four of them. They should be easy to see and hear.

"Should we go up?" I said, stopping at the crossroads where one road led up to Dag Magne's and theirs.

Geir shrugged.

We walked up the gentle slope. Dag Magne's house lay in a little dip. There was a garage adjacent to it, full of bikes and tools and car tires. Under the veranda there was a pile of wood.

Reaching the summit of the slope, we saw Dag Magne in a window looking out at us. To avoid giving the impression that we were on our way to see him we cut across their property without looking at him and down into the forest on the other side. Spring was in the air, the grass that had been white for so long was turning green, but there were no leaves on the trees, so we could see a long way into the young forest.

There. Directly below the slope to Solveig's house I saw something blue and red moving.

"There they are," Geir said.

We stopped and stood still.

They were laughing and chatting excitedly.

"Can you see who it is?" I whispered.

Geir shook his head.

We went closer. Hiding behind trees as far as we could. When we were about twenty meters away, we crouched down behind a rock.

I poked my head up and watched them.

It was Eivind and Geir B with them.

Eivind and Geir B.

Oh God, would you believe it! Eivind and Geir B, they were in our class! They were neighbors and best friends, and lived just along from Sverre, who lived just along from Siv, whose house we could see from our road.

What was the difference between them and us?

There was almost no difference!

They were best friends, we were best friends. Eivind was one of the best students in the class; I was one of the best students in the class. Geir B and Geir both just hung out with us two.

But Eivind was better looking than me. He had curly hair, high cheekbones, and narrow eyes. I had protruding teeth and a protruding bum. And he was stronger than me.

Now he was hanging from a dead tree trying to break it. Geir B was on the other side pushing as hard as he could. Anne Lisbet and Solveig stood watching.

They were showing off.

Oh flippin' hell!

What should we do? Go over and act cool? Make a group of six?

I turned to Geir.

"What shall we do?" I whispered.

"I don't know," he whispered back. "Beat them up?"

"Ha ha," I whispered. "They're stronger than us."

"We can't stay here all day, anyway," he whispered.

"Should we get out of here?"

"Yes, let's go."

As carefully as we had come, we crept off. At the crossroads, Geir asked if I wanted to go up to Vemund's.

"No way!" I said.

"I'll go then," he said. "See you."

"See you."

After a few meters I turned and watched him. He had found a twig and was whacking one knee and then the other as he walked on the sidewalk alongside the wall. I cried almost all the way home and kept to the path past the soccer field so that no one would see.

This happened on a Friday. Early on the Saturday morning I ran up to Geir's, but he was going to Arendal with his parents. Mom and Dad were cleaning the house and vacuuming, Yngve had caught the bus to Arendal with Steinar, so I was left to my own devices. I went into the bathroom and locked the door, rummaged through the dirty linen basket and found my ugly brown cords, which were filthy around the knees. I put them on, ran into my room, and searched for my disgusting yellow sweater, put it on, went downstairs unobserved and into the boiler room, where my rubber boots were, the ugliest footwear I possessed, carried them into the hall, and put them on. From the hook I grabbed the thin gray jacket I had been given last spring, too small now and pretty grubby, on top of which the zipper didn't work, so I would have to walk with it undone. That suited me fine because the yellow sweater underneath would be visible then.

Dressed like this, in the ugliest clothes I could muster, I set off for the estate where Anne Lisbet lived. With eyes downcast all the while, I wanted people who saw me to realize how upset I was. And if I bumped into Anne Lisbet, which was the object of the exercise, I wanted her to see what she had done. The filthy, ugly clothes I was wearing, the drooping head, all of this was for her benefit, so that she would understand.

I didn't want to ring, or else I would have to talk to her. No, the whole point was that she would happen to catch a glimpse of me and realize for herself how upset I was about what she had done.

When I reached Vemund's house, and there was still no sign of her, I entered the road leading to her house, even though it could ruin my plan, because what was I actually coming here for, if not to meet them?

To meet Bjørn Helge perhaps?

He was a year younger, and the idea of playing with him was inconceivable. Although he played soccer and was quite grown-up for his age.

I stood for a moment at the cul-de-sac wondering whether to go up to Bjørn Helge's. But just seeing the house where she lived upset me, so after a while I went down into the forest, past the newly blasted building sites. The construction machines and portacabins stood idle, staring ahead through vacant, black windows onto the road along the flat land. I looked for a while at the new parish hall that was being built, then at the field where we used to play soccer and the gate to the path leading to the garbage dump, which was a hundred meters farther on. Slowly I began to descend. In the middle of the hill I walked past, hidden behind rocky outcrops and trees, lived Eivind and Geir B. We had been up there a couple of times to play, and in the winter before the snow fell we had taken them to Lake Tjenna and gone skating. Once we had also been to Geir B's birthday party. And once to Sverre's. That time I had lost the ten kroner that had been meant for him, the envelope was empty when I arrived dressed in my Sunday best, I began to cry, it wasn't good, it wasn't good at all, but there was a reason, ten kroner was a lot of money. His father fortunately went with me to find it, we walked back up the road I had come along, and there, bright blue on the black pavement, was the ten-krone note. So they could no longer think I had tricked them, taken the money myself, and pretended I had lost it.

On a lawn in a garden by the road stood the boy with the long, black hair and the Indian features playing keepie-uppie with a soccer ball.

"Hi," he said.

"Hi," I said.

"How many can you do?" he said.

"Four," I said.

He laughed. "That's nothing."

"How many can you do then?"

"Did sixteen not long ago."

"Show me," I said.

He dropped the ball and placed his foot on top. With one swift flick he sent the ball into the air. One, two, three kick-ups and then the ball was too far from him and the last kick, a wild lunge with his leg, sent the ball into the hedge.

"That was four," I said.

"It's because you're watching," he said. "You make me think about what I'm doing. I'll have another go. Will you wait?"

"Yes."

This time he got the ball up to knee height, and then it was easy, the ball went from knee to knee five times before he lost control.

"Eight," I said.

"Yes," he said. "But now I'll show you."

"I've got to run," I said.

"Okay," he said.

His father, a fat man with glasses and thick, gray hair, was in the window watching us. I ran across the road, suddenly realized what clothes I was wearing, slowed down, and started to walk with my head bowed again.

When I came down the hill Dad was reversing the car out of the drive. He waved me over, leaned across the seat, and opened the door.

"Jump in," he said. "We're going to town."

"But my clothes," I said. "Can I change first?"

"Nonsense," he said. "Jump in, now!"

I pulled the little lever at the side of the seat and was about to push it forward.

"Sit in the front," he said.

"In the front?" I said.

This never happened.

"Yes," he said. "We haven't got all day! Come on now!"

I did as he said. After I had closed the door he put the car in gear and we set off down the hill.

"Your clothes are a bit dirty," he said. "But we're only going for a little trip. It won't matter."

I started fiddling with the seat belt and didn't see a lot until it had clicked into position and we were on Tromøya Bridge.

"I felt like going to the fish market," he said. "And the record shop. Do you want to join me?"

"Yes," I said.

He steered with one hand on the wheel. The other was on the gearshift, a cigarette burning between his fingers. He drove fast as always.

For a long time we said nothing.

On the left was Vindholmen, and the shipyard with the huge cranes like monitor lizards and the fiberglass hall. The parking lot outside was just under half full. There was an enormous oil platform in the sound. A Condeep platform that was due to be towed out the following week.

After we had driven through the little tunnel and come into the town of Songe, he glanced at me.

"Have you been out with Geir today?" he said.

"No," I said. "They're in Arendal."

"We might bump into them then."

There was another silence.

It bothered me; he was in such a good mood and didn't deserve to be met with silence. But what could I say?

After a while I thought of something.

"Where are you going to park?"

He shot me a sidelong glance.

"We'll find somewhere," he said.

"Maybe in Skytebanen? There's always room on Saturdays."

"That's the last resort," he said.

He found a parking spot in Tyholmen. He set off at a good clip between the tall timber houses, and I had to jog to keep up. I was ashamed of my clothes, I looked like such an idiot in them, and I kept a close eye on the people we passed to see if they were staring or laughing.

At the fish market Dad scanned the glass counters while waiting his turn.

"Let's have some shrimp, shall we, eh, Karl Ove?" he said.

I nodded.

"And perhaps that piece of cod?"

I didn't say anything.

He smiled and looked at me.

"I know you don't like cod, but it's good for you. When you grow up you'll get a taste for it."

"I doubt it," I said.

I felt like chatting and telling stories, the way I did with Mom, but I couldn't even get off the ground with him. However, I was glad he had brought me along and it was important he knew that.

When it was his turn and he pointed out what he wanted to the assistant, one of the other women behind the counter stared at him. Realizing that I was watching her, she lowered her gaze and continued to pack the fish on the cutting board in front of her. There was something about Dad, in the crowd by the counter, his pointing and talking, that made me think he wanted to dispel from his mind everything that existed around him. Not his appearance, not the face dominated by the beard, not the light-blue eyes, not the slightly curled lips, nor his tall, slim body, there was something else, something he "radiated."

"There we are," he said as he received his change and held the white bag of fish and shrimp in his hand. "Let's go then!"

Outside, beneath the gray sky, with people packing all the sidewalks and pedestrian areas, as always on Saturdays, we walked around Pollen, the central bay area, heading for the record shop, I did a few skips beside him, to show him I was happy. When he looked at me I smiled. The wind coming off the sound ruffled his hair and he patted it back in place.

"Could you carry the bag for me for a bit?" he said inside Musikkhjørnet. I nodded and held it in my hand while he nimbly flicked through the records.

My parents used to play music when we had gone to bed, especially on Friday and Saturday evenings. Often it was the last thing I heard before I fell asleep. Every now and again he played records when he was alone in his study. Steinar had told me once that he had brought a Pink Floyd LP into the classroom and played it. He had said this with awe in his voice.

"Wouldn't you like to choose a cassette?" Dad remarked, without taking his eyes off the records he had in front of him.

"But I don't have a cassette recorder," I said.

"You can borrow Yngve's," he said. "And then we'll see you get one of your own for Christmas. It's good to have a few cassettes lying around. No point having a recorder without any cassettes!"

Shyly I went over to the cassettes, which were not in boxes like the records but in racks on the wall. One was full of Elvis cassettes. I picked out one with the cover showing him in a leather suit, sitting with a guitar in his lap and smiling.

Dad bought two records, and when he placed them on the counter he told the assistant that I would point out a cassette I wanted. He came over to the rack with a little key in his hand. I indicated the Elvis cassette, he unlocked the glass door, took it out, and put it in its own little bag beside Dad's big bag.

"Good choice," Dad said as we walked toward the car. "You know Elvis was number one when I was growing up. Elvis the Pelvis, we called him. I still have some of his old records. They're at Grandma and Grandad's. Perhaps we should bring them back next time we go? So that you can listen to them?"

"Yes, that would be good," I said. "Maybe Yngve would like it, too."

"They must be worth a mint today," he said. Stopped and took the keys from his pocket. I looked over at the massive oil tankers laid up in Galtesund, on the Tromøya side of the strait. They were so big that, set against the low hills, they seemed to come from another world.

Dad opened the door on my side.

"Can I sit in front on the way home, too?" I said.

"You can. But only today, okay?"

"Okay," I said.

He put the bags on the backseat and lit a cigarette before strapping himself in, which I had already done, and started the car. On the way home I sat partly looking at the cover of the cassette and partly out of the window. There was a line of traffic the entire length of Langbrygga, it started moving more freely in the bay around the headland, with Bai Radio and TV on one side and the fish auction hall, with its low, white-brick buildings and fluttering flags on the other. Across the sound and its choppy white-tipped waves lay Skilsø, a collection of timber houses situated along a hill, with a ferry terminal below, beyond which was Pusnes Mekaniske Verksted, marine suppliers, and then it was mostly forest along the coast of the island, while on the mainland, where the road wound up and down, there were houses and jetties all the way to the gas station, after which came Songe, Vindholmen, and the road that led to Tromøya Bridge. All ruffled and tousled, as it were, by the wind from the south. As we drove, the thought of Anne Lisbet crept up on me and darkened my mood. Perhaps it was the Condeep platform that had triggered it because I had been thinking of going with Geir and the girls up to Tromøya Bridge and watching it being towed out to sea. Now I wouldn't. Or would I? She still hadn't been to my room, which I imagined every night before going to sleep, that one day she would be sitting there, on my bed, surrounded by my things, and the thought always set off fireworks of joy in my brain, Anne Lisbet, here, next to me!

Why should Eivind suddenly visit her instead of me? We'd had so much fun!

Eivind had to go. We had to get back together.

But what could be done?

Beneath us Tromøya Sound stretched to the east and the west. A double-ender was coming in, approaching land, I saw a figure standing at the stern with the tiller in his hand.

Dad indicated left and slowed down, waited for two passing cars, and then he crossed the road and arrived at the last hill up toward our house. Leif Tore, Rolf, Geir Håkon, Trond, Big Geir, Geir, and Kent Arne were playing soccer in the road. They glanced at us as we passed them and parked in the drive.

I raised a hand to them as I got out.

"Gonna join in?" Kent Arne shouted.

I shook my head.

"I've got to eat."

As we walked toward the house, out of sight of the boys in the road, Dad grabbed my hand.

"Let me have a look," he said. "So the warts haven't gone yet?"

"No," I said.

He let go.

"Do you know how to get rid of them?"

"No."

"I'll tell you. I have an old method. Come into the kitchen afterward and I'll tell you. You want to get rid of them, don't you?"

"You bet."

The first thing I did upstairs was to throw the trousers and the sweater in the dirty linen basket and put on the clothes I was wearing earlier. Then I propped the cassette, face up, against the wall on my desk so that I could see it wherever I was in the room, and went to the kitchen, where Dad was sitting with a little bowl of shrimp in front of him. Rice pudding was cooking on the stove; Mom was in the living room watering the flowers.

"We can just fit this in before we eat," Dad said. "It's a kind of magic. My grandmother did it for me when I was small. And it worked. My hands were covered with warts. After a few days they were all gone."

"What did she do?"

"You'll see," he said. He got up, opened the fridge, and took out something wrapped in white paper that he placed on the table and unfolded. There was bacon inside.

"First of all, I'm going to grease your fingers with the bacon. And then we'll go into the garden and bury the bacon. Then, in a few days' time, your warts will be gone."

"Is that true?"

"Yes! That's what's so strange! But they do disappear. Just wait and see! Pass me your paws."

I gave him one hand. He held it in his, took a rasher of bacon, and carefully rubbed it around all the fingers, the palm, and the back of my hand.

"Now the other one," he said. I gave him my other hand and he took another rasher and did the same. "Have I greased everything now?"

I nodded.

"Let's go outside then. Now you have to carry the bacon and bury it."

I followed him downstairs, put my boots on without touching them with my hands – I had the rashers of bacon in them – and walked behind him – he was carrying a spade – around the house into the kitchen garden by the fence bordering the forest. He thrust the spade into the ground, pressed with his foot, and began to dig. After a few minutes he stopped.

"Drop the bacon in there then," he said.

I did as he said, he filled in the hole, and we left.

"Can I wash my hands now?" I asked.

"Yes, of course," he said. "The bacon we buried will remove the warts."

"How long does it take?"

"We-ell . . . a week or two. It depends on how much you believe."

After dinner I went into the road. No one was playing soccer any longer, but Geir Håkon, Kent Arne, and Leif Tore were still outside, they were running at the wall alongside the road to see how far they could climb before they fell. If they ran fast enough they managed three, perhaps four, steps before gravity took hold and dragged them down. If they got too far up they landed on their backs, so this was an activity that required caution. I was wary at the first attempt, my only attempt, in fact, because straight afterward Geir Håkon was too ambitious and fell in the ditch with a thump, knocking all the air out of his lungs. He filled them again and let out a loud, tremulous howl while fighting off tears, which purged us of any desire we had to continue.

Geir Håkon got to his feet, averted his face, and, with his back to us, recovered his regular breathing. When he turned, everyone could see he had been crying, but no one said a word.

Why not?

If it had been me, they would have said something.

"What shall we do now?" Kent Arne said.

At that moment Kleppe came down the hill on his bike. He was wobbling from side to side, dressed in a black jacket and black cap, his bloated red features sagging and drooping, a bit like the two B-Max bags he had hanging from either side of the handlebars. He was the father of Håvard, a boy living in the house farthest from ours, who was already seventeen, someone we admired but seldom saw. The father, it was rumored, was a boozer. When he turned into the road where we were I saw my chance. I ran beside him for a little way pretending to be looking inside the bags on the handlebars.

"He's got beer bottles in the bags!" I shouted to the others and stopped.

Kleppe did not so much as send me a glance. But the others laughed.

The next day we sat in Geir's bedroom and wrote a love letter to Anne Lisbet. His parents' house was identical to ours, it had exactly the same rooms, facing in exactly the same directions, but it was still unendingly different, because for them functionality reigned supreme, chairs were above all else comfortable to sit in, not attractive to look at, and the vacuumed, almost mathematically scrupulous, cleanliness that characterized our rooms was utterly absent in their house, with tables and the floor strewn with whatever they happened to be using at that moment. In a way, their lifestyle was integrated into the house. I suppose ours was, too, it was just that ours was different. For Geir's father, sole control of his tools was unthinkable, quite the contrary, part of the point of how he brought up Geir and Gro was to involve them as much as possible in whatever he was doing. They had a workbench downstairs, where they hammered and planed, glued and sanded, and if we felt like making a soap-box cart, for example, or a go-kart, as we called it, he was our first port of call. Their garden wasn't beautiful or symmetrical as ours had become after all the hours Dad had spent in it, but more haphazard, created on the functionality principle whereby the compost heap occupied a large space, despite its unappealing exterior, and likewise the stark, rather weed-like potato plants growing in a big patch behind the house where we had a ruler-straight lawn and curved beds of rhododendrons.

Geir's room was where mine was, his sister, Gro, had her room where Yngve's was, and his parents had theirs between the two, exactly the same as in our house. Geir walked freely from room to room, ran up and down the stairs, and if he felt like a smørbrød he helped himself to whatever was in the fridge and made one. The same applied to me in his house, I could run between their rooms if I wanted or make myself something to eat with Geir. Often we sat in the living room listening to a Knutsen & Ludvigsen record he had, and laughed at it, or at him, because not only did he know all the lyrics, he could also perform them with the same tones and mannerisms. He was hopeless at soccer, hopeless at all ball games, there was something about his coordination that wasn't quite right, there was something about his enthusiasm that wasn't quite right, he never burned with a passion to play, as I often did, and playing soccer on a field for an entire afternoon but still yearning for more when darkness fell and everyone had left was completely alien to him. He wasn't much good at school, either. He was poor at reading, poor with figures, could seldom reproduce anything he had read or heard in the lesson, though he coped well for all that, nothing depended on soccer or school as far as he was concerned. He was good at imitating people and had started to attract whole crowds around him at school. He liked that, laughter would egg him on to become more and more adventurous, as though it were a kind of fuel, but not even that was important to him. He seemed to have his own small worlds. Such as drawing. He could sit for a whole day in his room drawing. Or building model airplanes, which he often did. His laughter was raucous and it could turn hysterical. Perhaps more than anything else, he liked farting; at any rate there was a lot of experimentation and discussion about it.

Having an older sister was perhaps the reason he wasn't drawn to the girls' world in the same way that I was, not initially anyway. But the idea of a love letter excited him. I would write the letter and he would add a drawing, which showed a boy trampling on a heart and two boys standing by watching. Beneath it I wrote in a red felt pen, Eivind breaking our hearts. The letter itself consisted of five lines.

Dear Anne Lisbet
Our hearts are broken
Come back to us
Can you hear
We love you so much

We couldn't hand this letter and the drawing to her. For all we knew, she might show them to people, perhaps even people at school, and then we would become a laughingstock. Instead we decided to show them to her. With the letter and drawing rolled up like a treaty in our hands, we walked to her house. Up along the rock from Fru Hjellen's, into her garden, under her window. We threw some gravel up and she appeared. First we held the drawing and the letter up for her to see, then we tore them into pieces and stamped on them, and then we walked off. Now at least she knew how we felt. Now it was up to her.

Geir stopped at the crossroads.

"I'm going up to Vemund's," he said. "Coming?"

I shook my head. On the way down I thought I should go and visit a new friend, too. Dag Magne perhaps? But that would seem out of character, so I went home instead. Lay down on the bed reading until Yngve came in and asked if I wanted to play soccer with him in the road. I did. There was nothing I liked more than doing things with Yngve. Indoors we usually played games or listened to music together, while outdoors, we went our separate ways, him with his friends and me with mine, apart from during the holidays when we went swimming or played soccer or table tennis or badminton and in cases like now, when he was bored and had no one else to play with other than me.

For more than an hour we kicked a ball back and forth between us. For a while Yngve took shots at me in goal and I practiced goal kicks. Then we did some passing.

As if by a miracle my warts disappeared. They got smaller and smaller, and then, perhaps three weeks later, they had completely gone. My hands were so smooth it was hard to imagine they had ever been any different.

But Anne Lisbet didn't come back. Whereas before she had squealed with pleasure whenever I had taken her cap or pulled her scarf or covered her eyes from behind, now she was irritated or even angry. I felt a stab of pain when I saw her and Solveig going to the bus accompanied by Eivind and Geir B, and every night before I went to sleep I imagined a situation in which I rescued them or somehow stood in a light that enabled her to see the error of her ways and return to me, unless, that is, I was imagining I was dead, and the immense sorrow that would overwhelm her, and the remorse when she realized that what she actually wanted – to be with me – was no longer possible, as I was lying in a coffin bedecked with wreaths and flowers. Death was generally a sweet thought at that time because it was not only Anne Lisbet who would regret what she had done but also Dad. Standing by my coffin, weeping for me, the prematurely departed. The whole estate would be there, and all the opinions they had held about me would have to be reevaluated because now I was gone and the person I had really been would appear in the utmost clarity for the first time. Yes, death was sweet and good and of great comfort. However, even if I was upset about Anne Lisbet, she was still there, I saw her every day at school, and as long as she was at school, there was hope, though precious little. The darkness that thinking about her could generate inside me was therefore of a different order from the other darkness that sometimes came over me, which had a depressing and burdening effect on everything, and which Geir also felt, it transpired. One evening we sat in his room and he asked me what was up with me.

"Nothing much," I said.

"You're so quiet!" he said.

"Oh, that," I said. "I'm just fed up."

"What about?"

"I don't know. There's no particular reason. I'm just fed up."

"I feel like that sometimes, too," he said.

"Do you?"

"Yes."

"You're just fed up for no particular reason?"

"Yes. I'm like that, too."

"I didn't realize," I said. "Didn't realize others could feel like that, too."

"That's what we'll have to call it," he said. "Like that. We can say it when we're in that mood. 'I'm like that today,' we can say, and then the other person will understand right away."

"That's a good idea," I said.

There were other new words being added as well, for example, the one Yngve taught me, the real name for fucking was "intercourse," and this knowledge was so shocking that I took Geir to the top of the mountain before I dared tell him. "It's called intercourse," I told him, "but don't say you heard it from me! You've got to promise me!" He promised. He was spending more and more time at Vemund's house, and Vemund was coming down to see him now and then. I simply didn't understand that and I told him so. Why do you spend time with Vemund? He's fat and stupid and the worst in the class. He never really gave me a decent answer, just said he liked being there. Why? I said. What do you do that's so fantastic? Well, Geir said, we sit and draw most of the time . . . Even in lessons it was Vemund he turned to when we had to work in pairs, instead of me, which he had done automatically before. I joined him a couple of times at Vemund's, also to be close to Anne Lisbet, but I found what they did boring and when I said so and suggested something else they stuck together and wanted to continue what they were doing. That was fine by me, if he wanted to be with the class dunce, let him. Besides, we were still neighbors, it was still me he came to in the afternoons, and that spring we started going to soccer together. Almost all the kids in our road did. The training sessions were in Hove, and Mom and Geir's mom took turns driving us there. Mom bought me a tracksuit when it started. It was my first, and I had great hopes before the day, imagining a sparkly-blue Adidas one, like Yngve's, or even better, a Puma, or at least a Hummel or an Admiral. But the one she bought wasn't a brand name. It was brown with white stripes, and even though I considered the color ugly, that wasn't the worst thing about it. The worst was that the material wasn't shiny but matte, a bit coarse, and it didn't hang off your body, it clung to you, making my butt stick out even more than usual. When I put on the tracksuit that was all I could think about. Even when I ran onto the field and training began, it was all I could think about. My butt is sticking out like a balloon, I would think, running after the ball. My tracksuit is brown and ugly, I would think. I look like an idiot in it, I would think. An idiot, an idiot, an idiot.

However, I never said this to Mom. I pretended to be happy when I was given it because it had cost a lot of money, she had gone all over Arendal looking for it, and if I said I didn't like it, she would first think I was ungrateful and then she would be sad that she had bought the wrong thing. And I didn't want that. So I said, How nice. Great. Really. Just what I wanted.

The odd thing about the training sessions that spring was that there was such a big difference between the person I was inside and the person I was on the field. Inside myself I was full to the brim with thoughts and emotions about scoring and dribbling, about the terrible tracksuit I had, and my big butt and, by extension, my protruding teeth – whereas on the field, running around, I was, to all intents and purposes, completely invisible. There were so many kids on the field, an enormous melee of arms, legs, and heads following the ball like a swarm of mosquitoes, and the coaches didn't know the names of more than a handful of them, the ones from their immediate neighborhood presumably, their sons, and their friends. The first time I stood out from the crowd was an evening when someone had kicked the ball into the forest behind the goal, where it was lost, and everyone was ordered over to look for it. Two, perhaps three, minutes of intensive searching followed. No one could find the ball. Then suddenly I saw it in front of me. Under a bush, it glowed, white and wonderful, in the dusk. I knew this was my opportunity, I knew I ought to shout, "Got it!" and carry it with me onto the field, so that the rightful credit fell to me, but I didn't dare. Instead I just kicked it onto the field. "There's the ball!" someone shouted. "Who found it?" someone else shouted. I emerged from the forest with all the others and said nothing, so it remained a mystery.

The second time was a similar situation, though even more flattering to me. I was running in a pack of players, maybe ten to twelve meters from the goal, the ball landed among us, everything was a vortex of limbs, and when the ball came free, a meter from me, I booted it as hard as I could and it rocketed in by the bottom of the post.

"Goal!" they roared.

"Who scored it?"

I said nothing, did nothing, stood stock-still.

"Who scored? No one?" the coach called. "No, okay! Let's carry on!"

They might have thought it was an own goal and that was why no one owned up to the shot. Even though I didn't dare say I had scored, it was my very first goal, and the thought of that burned inside me for the rest of the session, and in the car on the way home. The first thing I said when we ran to the car, where Mom was waiting, was that I had scored.

"I scored a goal!" I said.

"Oh, great!" Mom said.

When we returned home and I was sitting at the kitchen table to eat supper, I said it again.

"I scored today!"

"Was it a match?" Yngve said.

"No," I said. "We haven't had any matches yet. It was training."

"Then it means nothing," he said.

A couple of tears detached themselves and rolled down my cheeks. Dad looked at me with that stern, annoyed expression of his.

"For Christ's sake, you can't cry about THAT!" he said. "There must be SOMETHING you can take without blubbering!"

By then the tears were in full flow.

Crying so easily was a big problem. I cried every time anyone told me off or corrected me, or when I thought they would. Usually it was Dad. He only had to raise his voice to make me cry, even though I knew he hated me doing it. I couldn't help myself. If he raised his voice, and he often did, I began to cry. I seldom cried because of Mom. Through the whole of my childhood it had only happened twice. Both times during the spring when I started soccer training. The first was the most disturbing. I had been down in the forest with a gang of kids, we were standing in a sort of circle, Yngve was there, Edmund from his class was there, as well as Dag Lothar, Steinar, Leif Tore, and Rolf. Tongues were going nineteen to the dozen. Gulls were screaming from Ubekilen, the sky was still light, although darkness was creeping across the hill and beneath the trees above the forest floor. The conversation turned to school and teachers, skipping classes, detentions, and having to report to school early. Then it moved to a boy in Yngve's class who was extremely intelligent. I had just been listening, happy to be with the older boys, but there was a sudden lull in the conversation that I was able to fill.

"I'm the best in my class," I said. "At least at reading and writing and natural and social sciences. And local history."

Yngve stared at me.

"Don't brag, Karl Ove," he said.

"I'm not bragging. It's true!" I said. "There is no doubt about it! I learned to read when I was five, before anyone else in the class. Now I can read fluently. Edmund, for example, is four years older than me, and he can't read at all! You said that yourself! That means I'm smarter than him."

"Stop that bragging right now," Yngve said.

"But it's true," I said. "Isn't it, Edmund? It's true that you can't read, isn't it? That you have a special teacher? Your sister's in my class. She can't read, either. Or only a little. That's not a lie, is it?"

Now something strange happened: Edmund had tears in his eyes. He wrenched himself away and set off up the slope.

"What do you think you're doing?" Yngve hissed at me.

"But it's true," I said. "I'm the best in my class and he's the worst."

"Go home," Yngve said. "Now. We don't want you here with us."

"It's not up to you," I said.

"Shut your mouth and go home!" he snapped, putting his hands on my shoulders and shoving me.

"Okay, okay," I said, and set off up the hill. Crossed the road, slipped through the door, and took off my outdoor clothes. It was true what I had said, so why had he shoved me?

Tears were in my eyes as I lay on my bed and opened a book. It was unfair, what I had said was true, it was so unfair, so unfair.

Mom came home from work, brewed up some tea, and prepared a bite to eat. Yngve was still out, so we ate alone. She asked if I had been crying, I said yes, she asked why, I said Yngve had pushed me, she said she would take the matter up with him. I showed her a letter I had written to Grandad, she said he would really like it, gave me an envelope, I put the letter in, she wrote down the name and address and promised to post it the following day. When it was done I went for a rest. I heard Yngve come home while I was reading, the footsteps up the staircase and into the kitchen where Mom was. Now she would tell him he shouldn't push me and tell me to shut up, I thought, lying there, and I imagined Yngve's bowed head. Then came the sound of their voices and footsteps on the landing, and the door was opened.

I could see at once that Mom was angry and sat up.

"Is it true what Yngve has told me?" she said. "That you made a fool of Edmund because he can't read?"

I nodded.

"Sort of," I said.

"Don't you understand that Edmund was upset? Don't you understand that you mustn't talk about other people in that way?"

She stepped forward until her face was in front of mine. Her eyes were narrow; her voice was loud and sharp. Yngve stood behind her, watching me.

"Karl Ove, don't you?" she said.

"He cried," Yngve said. "And it was you who made him cry. Do you understand?"

And suddenly I did understand. What Mom said cast an implacable light over what had happened. Edmund was the one she felt sorry for, even though he was four years older. He was upset and I was the one who had upset him.

I started crying as I had never done before.

Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, I sobbed. Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh, Oh.

Mom leaned over and stroked my cheek.

"Sorry, Mom," I wept. "I'll never do it again. Never, ever. I promise you with all my heart."

The loud sobs and my shouted rather than spoken apologies pacified my mother but not Yngve; several days were to pass before the events receded into the past for him. And that despite Edmund not being central to his life, not one of his best friends, just someone who was in his class. I both understood and I didn't.

The second time Mom made me cry was when we went out one evening, she wanted to buy something from the Fina station and preferred to walk there, and I, who loved having her to myself, joined her. I took a flashlight along, the path was dark, but before we got there I shone the flashlight through the darkened living-room window of a house we passed.

"Don't do that!" Mom hissed. "There are people living there! You can't invade their privacy like that!"

I shone the flashlight on the ground at once, and fought back tears for a few seconds, until I had to admit defeat and they streamed out amid great gasps and sobs.

"Was that so upsetting?" Mom said, looking at me. "I had to tell you. Surely you understand. What you did wasn't very polite."

I started crying not because I had been told off but because she had told me off.

But at least she didn't get angry because I was crying.

Outside the house I hardly ever cried. Unless, of course, I hurt myself, everyone did, no one could restrain the tears then. The fact that no one was exactly beating a path to our door says more about other things, over which I had no control. I quarreled a lot with the others, especially Leif Tore, we disagreed on a wide range of matters, including who gave the orders, and even though we were similar in that neither of us would yield it was still him everyone wanted to play with and not me. As long as there were lots of us, such as when we built dens down in the spruce forest or played soccer on the field, it wasn't noticeable, it was only when there were three or four of us that it became apparent. Nor was it a problem when I was with older boys, such as Dag Lothar, I just sort of adapted, followed his example without a protest, didn't say a word, and it felt natural, after all he was a year older. Once I pointed out to Geir that Dag Lothar told me what to do, and I told Geir what to do and Geir told Vemund what to do. He went sullen and said I didn't tell him what to do. Yes, I do, I said. I say what we're going to do. But you don't tell me what to do, Geir said. What difference does it make? I said. I said Dag Lothar told me what to do. And that you tell Vemund what to do. So what difference does it make if I tell you what to do? Well, it evidently did make a difference. Geir's face went all stiff in the way it did, his body had that mutinous look and soon he was gone. Others got annoyed about even less. Like the time when Geir Håkon, Kent Arne, Leif Tore, and I were standing by the road one early afternoon after school, alone on the estate, and a huge truck drove past with a load of boulders from some blasting work they were doing farther up.

"Did you see that?" I said. "It was a Mercedes!"

I wasn't interested in cars, boats, or motorbikes, I knew nothing about them, but as all the others did, I had to make an effort now and then, just to show that I, too, was clued in.

"No, it wasn't," Geir Håkon said. "Mercedes doesn't make trucks."

"Didn't you see the star then?" I said.

"Are you blind or what? That was not a Mercedes star," he said.

"Yes, it was," I said.

Geir Håkon snorted. For a moment his puffy cheeks were even fatter than usual.

"Anyway, Mercedes does make trucks. I've read about it in a book I have."

"I'd like to see that book," Geir Håkon said. "You're lying through your teeth. You know nothing about trucks."

"And I suppose you do, just because your dad works on construction machines?" I said.

"Yes, as a matter of fact I do," he said.

"Oooh," I said sarcastically. "You think you know all about slalom skis, too, just because your dad has bought you a pair. But you can't slalom. You're useless at skiing. So what are you doing with all that gear if you can't use it? Everyone says you're spoiled. And you are. You get everything you point a finger at."

"I do not," he said. "You're just jealous."

"Why would I be jealous of you?" I said.

"Give it a rest, Karl Ove," Kent Arne said.

Geir Håkon had not only averted his face now but his whole body.

"Why should I give it a rest, and not Geir Håkon?" I said.

"Because Geir Håkon's right," Kent Arne said. "It wasn't a Mercedes. And he's not the only person who has slalom skis. I've got some, too."

"That's just because your dad's dead," I said. "That's why your mother buys you all sorts of things."

"That's not why," Kent Arne said. "It's because she wants me to have them. And we can afford it."

"But your mother works in a shop," I said. "You don't exactly earn a lot of money there."

"Is being a teacher any better?" Leif Tore said, who wanted to put in his two cents now. "Don't you think we've seen the wall at your place? It's full of cracks and falling down because your father didn't know it needed reinforcement. He only used cement! How stupid can you get?"

"And then he reckons he's something special because he's on the council," Kent Arne said. "Salutes us with one finger and stuff when he drives past. So you can just shut up."

"Why should I shut up?"

"Well, in fact, you don't have to. You can stand here and rattle on as you usually do. We definitely don't want to play with you."

And then they ran off.

The disagreements never lasted long, a few hours later I was playing with them again, if I wanted, but there was something awry, I was finding myself in situations with my back against the wall more and more often, the others were moving away more and more often when I approached, even Geir, in fact, on occasion I realized they were actually hiding from me. On the estate when anyone said something about someone it was immediately repeated by others, and then it suddenly became something everyone said. About me it was said that I always knew best and I was always boasting. But I did know best, I knew much more than the others, so why should I pretend anything else? If I knew something, it was because that was how it was. And as far as boasting was concerned, everyone boasted, all the time. Dag Lothar, for example, whom everyone liked, didn't he start every other sentence with "I don't mean to brag but . . ." and go on to tell us about something good he had done or something good someone had said about him?

Yes, he did. So this wasn't about what I did but about the person I was. Why otherwise would Rolf call me "Mr. Pro" when we played soccer in the road? I hadn't done anything special, had I? You think you're so good at soccer, don't you, he said, eh, Mr. Pro? But all I had done was to say what was what, and why shouldn't I if I went to a soccer camp and actually knew? We shouldn't run around in a pack, we had to spread out and then pass the ball or dribble, not mill around the way we did.

But I also had the last word that spring. For when the lessons at school were reorganized to make preparations for the end-of-the-year celebrations and Frøken handed out booklets of the play that we were to perform for all the parents on the biggest day of the year, namely the last, who was allocated the principal role but me?

Not Leif Tore, not Geir Håkon, not Trond, and not Geir.

But me.

Me, me, me.

None of them would be capable of learning so many lines by heart, it was something only Eivind and I, and perhaps Sverre, of the boys, could do, and the fact that Frøken chose me in the end was by no means fortuitous.

I was so happy when she told me that I didn't know what to do with myself.

Every day of the last week we rehearsed, every day I was the center of attention in the class, Anne Lisbet's, too, and when the final day arrived, in radiant sunshine, all the parents came as well. Dressed in their finest outfits, they sat on chairs by the wall, took photos, were hushed when we enthusiastically said our lines, and burst into applause at the end.

Then we played recorders, sang, were presented with our grade books, Frøken wished us a good summer, and we ran out into the playground and down to the waiting cars.

Grade book in hand, I stood impatiently with Geir in front of Mom's Beetle. She strolled along with Martha, they were chatting and laughing and didn't see Geir and me until they were a few meters away.

Mom was wearing beige trousers and a rust-red sweater with the sleeves turned up over her forearms. Her hair hung a long way down her back. On her feet she wore a pair of light-brown sandals. She had just turned thirty-two, while Martha, who was wearing a brown dress, was two years older.

They were young women, but we didn't know that.

Mom rummaged through her bag for the car key.

"You were all so good," Martha said.

"Thank you," I said.

Geir said nothing, just squinted into the sun.

"Oh, here it is," Mom said at length. She unlocked the car and we got in, adults in the front, children in the back. They both lit up cigarettes. And then we drove home in the sunshine.

That evening I stood in the doorway watching Mom drying her hair in their bedroom. Occasionally, when Dad wasn't there, I followed her round the house and talked her ears off. Now I was quiet, the whine of the hairdryer made it impossible to speak, instead I watched her as she bent her head and lifted her hair up with a brush in one hand to the dryer in the other. She sent me sporadic glances and smiled. I went into the room. On the little table by the wall there was a letter. I didn't mean to pry, but even at some distance I could see the first name was Sissel, Mom's name, and that the full name was longer than Mom's, because between "Sissel" and "Knausgaard," which I recognized rather than read, there was a third name. I went closer. "Sissel Norunn Knausgaard," it said.

Norunn?

Who was that?

"Mom!" I said.

She lowered the hairdryer, as though that would make my voice clearer, and looked at me.

"Mom," I said again. "What does that envelope say? What kind of name is that?"

She switched off the hairdryer.

"What did you say?"

"What kind of name is that!"

I nodded toward the envelope. She leaned over and took it.

"That's my name."

"But it says Norunn! Your name's not Norunn!"

"Yes, it is. It's my middle name. Sissel Norunn."

"Has it always been your name?"

I felt my chest tighten with despair.

"Ye-es. All my life. Didn't you know?"

"No! Why didn't you say?"

Tears were running down my cheeks.

"But, darling," Mom said, "I didn't think it mattered. Sissel is the name I use. Norunn is just a middle name. A kind of extra name."

I was shaken to the core. Not by the name in itself, but by the fact that I hadn't known it. That she'd had a name I didn't know.

Was there anything else I didn't know?

A month later, in the middle of the long summer holiday, we drove up to Sørbøvåg by Åfjorden in Ytre Sogn, where my mother's parents lived, and we stayed there for two weeks. I had been looking forward to this so much that on the morning we were due to leave and I was woken at the crack of dawn, there was a tinge of unreality about it. The trunk was packed to the gunnels, Mom and Dad sat at the front, Yngve and I in the back, we would be in the car all day and evening, and even the most familiar sight, the road down to the crossroads and up to Tromøya Bridge, seemed cast in a different light. Now it didn't belong to the house and our existence in it, now it belonged to the great expedition we had set out on, which lent every crag and every rock, every islet and every skerry, excitement and anticipation.

When we came to the crossroads by the bridge I folded my hands as usual and said the short prayer that had worked every time so far:

Dear God,
Please don't let us crash.
Amen.

We drove across the mainland, through vast, monotonous, coniferous forests, past Evje with its long, low military barracks and pine plains, past Byglandsfjord and the campsite, up into Setesdalen, with its age-old enclosed fields and farms and the many silversmith signs, along a road that in some places almost seemed to go through people's drives. Slowly buildings disappeared, it was as if the houses lost their hold on us and fell by the wayside one by one, like children fell off the enormous inner tube someone had roped to a boat earlier that summer. As the boat's speed increased only the tube was left. I saw glinting sandbanks along the sides of the river, green-clad hills rising more and more steeply, the occasional enormous, bare mountainside, in every shade of gray, with some flame-red pine trees on top. I saw rapids and waterfalls, lakes and plains, everything bathed in the glow of the clear, bright sun, which, as we drove, had risen higher and higher in the sky. The road was narrow, and it gently and unobtrusively followed all the countryside's dips and climbs, curves and bends, with trees like a wall on both sides in some places, towering over everything in others, in sudden and unexpected vantage points.

Sporadically, rest areas appeared during the journey, small graveled areas beside the road where families could sit and eat at rough-hewn timber tables, their cars next to them, generally with doors and trunks open, under the shade of trees, often close to a lake or a river. Everyone had a thermos on the table, many had a cooler bag, some also a Primus stove. "Aren't we going to stop for a break soon?" I would ask after seeing such a rest area because breaks, alongside ferry crossings, belonged to the high points of the journey. We, too, had a cooler bag in the trunk; we, too, had a thermos, juice, and a little pile of plastic glasses, cups, and plates with us. "Don't pester me," Dad would say then, desperate to cover as many kilometers as he could in one go. That meant that, at the very least, we would have to drive to the end of Setesdalen, past Hovden and Haukeligrend and up Mount Haukeli, before the question of a break even came into consideration. Then we would have to find a suitable place because we would not take the first opportunity, oh no: if the stops were few and far between, then the location of the rest area had to be something special.

In the uplands the terrain was completely flat. There wasn't a tree or a bush to be seen anywhere. The road continued dead straight. Some areas were littered with boulders strewn across the ground, covered with a kind of coating I thought might have been lichen or moss. Others were unbroken rock face, clean, scrubbed. Here and there water sparkled, snow glinted. Dad drove faster as there was such a clear view. At intervals, along the roadside, we saw tall poles, and Yngve said it was quite incredible, they were markers and so high because the snow in winter could reach up to the top. That was several meters!

The sun shone, the mountain plateau stretched in all directions, and we, we were racing ahead. One rest area after another was left in our wake until, without warning, Dad signaled, braked, and pulled in.

It was situated right next to a lake, oval and utterly black. Beyond it the ground rose gently while at the side there was a big snowdrift, bluish in color and hollow underneath where the water disappeared down an opening.

Around us it was perfectly still. After so many hours with the regular hum of the engine the silence felt artificial, as though it didn't belong to the landscape but to us.

Dad opened the trunk, took out the cooler bag, and put it on the coarse wooden table, where Mom immediately began to unpack it as he fetched the thermos and the bag with the cups and plates. Yngve and I ran to the water, bent down, and dipped a hand. It was freezing cold!

"How about a swim here, boys?" Dad said.

"Oh no, it's freezing!" I said.

"Sissies," he said.

"But it's fr*eee*zing!" I said.

"Yes, I'm sure it is. I was only joking. We haven't time for a swim anyway."

Yngve and I walked over to the snowdrift. It was so solid we couldn't make snowballs from it, as we had hoped. And walking across the top, with the water underneath, wouldn't be in the cards if Mom and Dad were there.

I broke off a clump and threw it into the lake, where it bobbed up and down like a mini iceberg. Now at least, when we were home, I could say we had thrown snowballs in the middle of July.

"Come and eat," Mom called.

We sat down. We each had a packed lunch. Three slices of bread with boiled egg on top. In addition, there was a package of cookies on the table. In our glasses there was juice. The plastic gave it a different taste, but I liked it, it reminded me of the trips we used to have when we picked berries and went on camping holidays. We hadn't had that many, there'd been basically only one, last summer when we went to Sweden with Grandma and Grandad. A car raced up from behind me, it was as though the sound vibrated as it increased in volume, then after a kind of boom it went quieter again until it was gone. Steam rose from Mom and Dad's coffee. A car towing a trailer came from the other direction. I watched it as I finished my juice. It was creeping along. Then it signaled. As it pulled over into the rest area Dad turned.

"What's that idiot doing?" he said. "There's only one table here. Can't he see?"

He turned back, put his coffee cup down, and took the fox-emblazoned pouch of tobacco from his breast pocket.

The car with the trailer stopped only a few meters from us. The door opened and a fat man dressed in a pair of beige shorts and a yellow T-shirt, with a brown bucket hat, emerged. He opened the door of the trailer and disappeared inside as a woman came out of the other car door. She was also fat and wore light-gray elasticized slacks with a crease and a woolen sweater. From her mouth hung an unlit cigarette, her hair was big and gray and yellow, and over her eyes she wore a pair of large glasses with tinted lenses. She went to stand by the lake, lit her cigarette, and gazed across as she smoked.

I started on the last slice of bread.

The man reemerged with a camping table in his hands. He erected it between the car and our table. Dad turned again.

"Haven't they got any manners?" he said. "We're sitting here eating and he's intruding."

"It doesn't matter," Mom said. "It's beautiful here."

"It was beautiful here," Dad said. "Until that fathead came."

"He can hear you," Mom said.

The man put a clinking cooler bag down beside the table. The woman went over to him.

"They're Germans," Dad said. "They don't understand. We can say whatever we like."

He took a last swig from his cup and jumped to his feet.

"Well, we'd better be moving on."

"The boys haven't finished eating yet," Mom said. "We're not in such a hurry, are we?"

"In fact, we are," Dad said. "Eat up, come on. Be quick about it."

He flicked his half-smoked cigarette to the ground, took the glasses and cups to the lake, rinsed them, and put them in the bag with the plates and thermos. Zipped up the top of the cooler bag and put everything in the trunk. The man and woman said something I didn't understand as they stared up the gentle slope on the other side of the lake. He was pointing. Something was moving in the distance. Mom scrunched up the wax papers from the smørbrød, put them in a bag, and got up.

"Let's go then," she said. "We'll have to eat the cookies the next time we stop."

That was what I had feared.

Dad pushed the seat forward for me and I got in. After the fresh air outside, the smell of smoke inside hit you. Yngve clambered in through the other door. He wrinkled his nose.

"I don't think the car-sickness tablets are working anymore," he said.

"Say if you feel sick," Mom said.

"It would help if you didn't smoke all the time," he said.

"That's enough of that," Dad said. "Don't whine. We're on holiday."

Slowly the car pulled out onto the road. I glanced across, past the lake, up to the spot where the man had been pointing. There was something there. A gray patch in all the green, moving slowly. What on earth could it be?

I nudged Yngve and pointed through the window when I had his attention.

"What's that?" I said.

"Reindeer maybe," he said. "We saw them last year, too. Don't you remember?"

"Oh yes," I said. "But they were much closer. These ones are so small they're like mice!"

Then we sank into the trancelike state car travel can induce.

We crossed the rest of the mountain range, descended into Røldal, and drove on to Odda, the dirty little town at the end of Hardangerfjord, which despite its run-down, polluted appearance still shared some of the magic the far end of the mountains evoked, so dizzyingly and, at bottom, incomprehensibly different from the world we had left only a few hours earlier. While Sørland for the most part consisted of low crags and knolls, small bedraggled forests with a wide-ranging selection of trees standing side by side in countryside that was both wide open and restricted, and while on the island where I lived the tallest mountain was no more than 120 meters high, this countryside here, which you always stumbled on, was remarkable for its immense mountains, so dominating in their purity and simplicity that all other details of the surroundings were forced to adjust to them, they disappeared, utterly and completely: who cared about a birch tree, however tall, when it stood beneath one of these endlessly beautiful and eternally immutable mountains? The most conspicuous difference, however, was not the dimensions but the colors, which seemed deeper here – nowhere is the color green so deep as in Vestland – or so clear – even the sky, even its blue was deeper and clearer than the blue of the sky where I came from. The sides of the valley were green and cultivated, in the spring and early summer the blossoming fruit trees a Japanese white, the mountain peaks a hazy blue, snow-tipped here and there, and, oh, between the ridges, which rose in a long line on both sides, lay the fjord itself, greenish in some places, bluish in others, gleaming in the sun everywhere, as deep as the mountains were high.

To travel in a car through this landscape was always overwhelming because nothing of what you had seen so far prepared you for what was waiting here. And then, as we drove along the northern side of the fjord, all the other unfamiliar features appeared, like the electric fences, like the red barns, like the old, white timber houses, like the cows grazing, like the long rows of hay-drying racks scattered across the sides of the valley. Tractors, forage harvesters, manure cellars, long brown boots on doorsteps, shady farmyard trees, horses, shops in the basements of normal houses. Children selling wild cherries or strawberries from small stands with handwritten signs along the road. Life here was different from life at home: I could see a stooped old woman wearing a flowery dress and a neckerchief, you didn't see that where I came from, or a stooped old man in blue overalls and a black peaked cap in some field or along some gravel track. But however much of an impression the places here made on me, the unusual names they bore played a part, of course – Tyssedal, Espe, Hovland, Sekse, Børve, Opedal, Ullensvang, Lofthus, and Kinsarvik, which because of the strange sound was my favorite: all right, vik was an inlet, but a kinsar, what on earth was that? – and however bright the colors and however different the myriad of details, an atmosphere of extravagance also hung over these regions, not over the people and their activities but over the space they moved in, it seemed much too big for them, perhaps it was the flood of sunlight that did it, perhaps the blueness of the vast sky or perhaps the range of mountains stretching up into it, or else it was simply the fact that we were only passing through, we didn't stop anywhere, apart from at the bus shelter where Yngve staggered out to throw up, we didn't know anyone here and were in no way connected with what we saw. For when we did finally reach Kinsarvik and left the car, which Dad had parked in the queue, this sense of extravagance was no longer noticeable; on the contrary, everything seemed nice and cozy here with the sound of car radios, doors being opened and closed, people stretching, walking to and fro, children quietly kicking a ball about next to the queue or doing what Yngve and I were doing, walking to the kiosk at the end to see whether there was anything we could spend some of our holiday money on.

An ice cream?

Oh yes.

Yngve bought an ice cream in a boat-shaped wafer, I bought a tub with a little red spatula and we ambled over to the quay with them in our hands. We sat on a brick wall and looked down at the water and the seaweed lying in wet, greasy clusters against the rocks. In the distance we saw the ferry arriving. The air smelled of salty water, seaweed, grass, and exhaust fumes, and the sun burned our faces.

"Are you still feeling sick?" I said.

He shook his head.

"Too bad we forgot the soccer ball," he said. "But they've probably got one in Våjen."

He said Våjen the way Grandma did.

"Yes," I said, squinting into the sun. "Do you think we'll get on this one?"

"Don't know. Hope so."

I dangled my legs. Loosened a big chunk with the spatula and put it in my mouth. It was so big and cold that I had to jiggle it to and fro with my tongue to prevent the icy texture from becoming intolerable. While doing this, I turned and glanced at our car. Dad was sitting with the door open and one leg on the ground, smoking. The sun glinted on his sunglasses. Mom was standing beside him with a basket of wild cherries on the roof and helping herself every now and then.

"What shall we do tomorrow?" I said.

"I'm going to be with Grandad in the cowshed anyway. He said he would teach me everything so that I can take over one day."

"Do you think it's possible to swim there now?"

"Are you out of your mind?" he said. "It's as cold in the fjord as it was in the mountain lake."

"Why is that?"

"It's so far north of course!"

Some of the cars started their engines. The bow doors of the ferry opened. Yngve got up and walked toward the car. I ate my ice cream as quickly as possible and followed him.

After the ferry trip to Kvanndal the next high point of the journey was climbing Vikafjellet. The steep, narrow road wound upward, round and round, round and round, so steep in some places I was frightened the car would tip over and fall backward.

"There are probably quite a few tourists who get a bit of a shock here," Dad said as we drove up and I sat trembling and peering down at the precipice beneath us. "They use the brakes to slow down, you see. That could be fatal."

"What do we use?" I said.

"We use the gears," he said.

We weren't tourists, we knew what was what, we weren't the motorists you saw behind clouds of steam issuing from an open hood at the roadside. But immediately afterward things almost did go wrong, because at the next hairpin bend we met a car towing a trailer, we were only a few meters away from a collision, but Dad jumped on the brakes and the other car did the same. Dad reversed down until the road was wide enough for both of us. The other driver waved to us as he passed.

"Did you know him, Dad?" I said.

In the mirror I saw he was smiling.

"No, I didn't know him. He waved to thank me for making room for him."

Then it was on to the next mountain, and down to the next fjord. The mountains here were as high as by Hardangerfjord, but they were gentler in a way, not as steep, and the fjord here was wider, at some junctures almost like a lake. What's the problem? the Hardangerfjord mountains said. Take it easy, these mountains said. Everything's hunky-dory.

"Shall we take turns sleeping?" Yngve said.

"Fine by me," I said.

"Great," he said. "Me first then?"

"Okay," I said. And he laid his head on my lap and closed his eyes. It was good to have him sleeping there, his head was nice and warm, and it was as though something was going on in two places at once, the countryside outside the window, which was changing constantly and I never took my eyes off it, and Yngve's head asleep on my lap.

When we parked in the queue for the next ferry, he woke up. We stood on the deck and enjoyed the wind blowing into our faces. Half an hour later we were back in the car and it was my turn to rest my head on Yngve's lap.

I woke up and knew we were getting close. The nearer we got to the sea, the lower the uplands and the denser the vegetation, but of course nowhere near Sørland's scrubbed-clean terrain and gnarled qualities. None of the roads here had stuck in my mind; I looked out of the window without connecting what I saw with anything until I suddenly recognized Lihesten, the vertical drop that plunged several hundred meters on the other side of the fjord from my grandparents' house. We'd had the mountain in front of us for ages, but it was unrecognizable from all other angles except the one we had now, as we approached it from the side. The excitement constricted my chest. We were there! Oh yes, there's the waterfall! There's the chapel! There's the hotel! There's the Salbu sign! And there's the house! Grandma and Grandad's house!

Dad slowed down and turned into the gravel path. It led first past the neighbor, and then through the gate, with the shed on the right, up the last steep incline to the front of the house. I opened the door almost before the car had stopped and jumped out. On the other side of the enclosed field I saw Grandad. He was standing by the beehives in his beekeeper outfit. White overalls, white hat with a long, white veil around his head. All his movements were slow, also the hand he raised to greet us. It was as if he was submerged beneath water or on an alien planet with different gravity. I lifted my hand and waved, then I ran into the house. Grandma was in the kitchen.

"We almost crashed into a car on Vikafjellet! We were climbing like this," I said, depicting the gradient on the yellow vinyl tablecloth with my finger while she smiled at me with her warm, dark eyes.

"And then a car with a trailer came. Like this . . ."

"I'm glad you got here safe and sound," she said. Mom came in through the other door. In the hall I could hear what must have been Dad carrying in all the baggage. Where was Yngve? Had he gone over to Grandad? With all the bees buzzing around?

I dashed out onto the drive. Nope. Yngve was helping Dad to unload the car. Grandad was still there in his white spacesuit. With infinite patience he lifted some frames from the hive. The sun had gone from the farm, but was shining on the spruces growing on the slope behind the pond. A light wind blew past the house, rustling the treetops above me. Kjartan walked over from the cowshed. He was wearing overalls and boots. Longish black hair, square glasses.

"Good evening," he said, stopping by the car.

"Oh, hi, Kjartan," Dad said.

"Good trip?" Kjartan said.

"Yes, it was fine."

Kjartan was ten years younger than Mom, so in his early twenties that summer. There was something stern, almost angry about him, and even though I had never experienced his anger, I was still afraid of him. He was the only one of the children to live at home: Kjellaug lived in Kristiansand with her husband, Magne, and their two children, Jon Olav and Ann Kristin, who would soon be coming here, while the next youngest, Ingunn, was a student and lived in Olso with Mård and their two-year-old daughter, Yngvild. Kjartan and Grandma quarreled a lot, he was not as she would have liked her only son to be, I gathered. The idea was that he would take over the smallholding when the time came. Now he was training to become a pipe fitter on ships and planning to work at a yard somewhere in their county of Hordaland. But the most important thing to know about Kjartan, which was frequently mentioned when talk turned to him, was that he was a communist. A fervent communist. When he discussed politics with Mom and Dad, which he was wont to do on their visits, for some reason their conversations always ended up there, and his somewhat shy, evasive eyes changed and became fiery. At home when the subject of Kjartan came up, Dad tended to laugh at him, mostly to tease Mom, who was not exactly a communist, but who nonetheless disagreed with Dad on most matters concerning politics. Dad was a teacher and voted for Venstre, a center party.

"I'd better take this off and have a shower so I don't smell of cowshed, now that we have such refined company," Kjartan said. "I think there is food for you in there."

Even outside I could hear the stairs creak when he went up to the bathroom on the first floor. How the stairs creaked here!

And indeed a table had been set for us in the living room. There was a pile of still-hot pancakes and a dish of griddle cakes, as well as bread and various spreads. Mom shuttled to and fro between living room and kitchen. Although she had left home when she was sixteen, married Dad, given birth to Yngve when she was twenty, and lived with her own family ever since, she merged into the household effortlessly as soon as she arrived. Even the way she spoke changed and became much more like the way her parents spoke. With Dad it was the opposite: he was always lost in the background. When he was talking to Grandad, who loved chatting and had a story for every occasion, often from his own experience, there was something formal about Dad that made him so alien but which I still recognized, it was the manner he adopted when he spoke to other parents and colleagues. Grandad wasn't polite in that way, he was completely and utterly himself, so why would Dad sit there nodding and saying, I see, oh yes, really, mhm, mhm? Mom was different here, too, she laughed and chatted more, and these changes amounted to a plus for us, in fact, an enormous plus: Dad was in the background, Mom was livelier, and there were no house rules, and unlike where we came from, here we could do as we liked. If one of us knocked over a glass of milk it wasn't a catastrophe, Grandma and Grandad understood that accidents can happen, we could even put our feet on the table here, well, if Dad wasn't in the room at that point, of course, and we could sit on the brown sofa with orange and beige stripes, as slumped as we wanted, even lie on it if we felt like it. And all the work they did, we did, too, on our own minor scale. We were not unwanted. On the contrary, it was expected of us that we would help as far as we could. Rake the mown hay on the field, lay it on the drying rack, collect the eggs, shovel muck into the cellar, set the table for meals, and pick red currants, black currants, and gooseberries when they were ripe. The doors here were open and people came in without even knocking, they just shouted from the hallway and were suddenly in the living room, made themselves at home and drank coffee with Grandad, who didn't bat an eyelid, just started chatting as though their conversation had only been interrupted for a few seconds. These people who came were strange, one in particular, a fat-bellied, sloppily dressed, and slightly malodorous man with a high voice who used to wobble up the hill on his moped in the evening. His accent was so broad I barely understood half of what he said. Grandad's face lit up when he came, but whether that was because he liked him all that much was hard to say as his face lit up whenever anyone came. I was sure he liked us although I doubted whether the thought had ever struck him; we existed, that was enough for him. For Grandma it must have been different, at least it appeared so from the interest she showed when we talked.

Mom stood staring at the table, probably to check that everything was there. Grandma took the coffeepot off the stove in the kitchen and the steadily increasing noise of the whistle died with a little sigh. Dad deposited the luggage in the room above our heads. Grandad came into the hall after hanging up his beekeeper outfit in the basement.

"The Norwegian population is going through a growth spurt, I see!" he said when he saw us. He came over and patted me on the head as though I were some kind of dog. Then he patted Yngve's head and sat down as Grandma came in from the kitchen carrying the coffeepot, and Dad and Kjartan both came down the stairs.

Grandad was small, his face was round, and apart from a thin wreath of white hair around his head he was bald. The corners of his mouth were often stained with tobacco juice. The eyes behind his glasses were sharp, but were totally transformed once he took them off. Then they were like two small children who had just woken up.

"Looks like I came at just the right moment," he said, putting a slice of bread on his plate.

"We heard you in the basement," Mom said. "Nothing to do with luck."

She turned to me.

"Do you remember the time we heard you in the hall ten minutes before you arrived?"

I nodded. Dad and Kjartan sat down on opposite sides of the table. Grandma went to pour coffee into the cups.

Grandad, who was spreading butter over the bread with his knife, looked up.

"You heard him before he came?"

"Yes, strange, isn't it?" Mom said.

"That's a vardøger, that is. A kind of guardian angel," Grandad said. "It means you'll have a long life."

"Is that what it means?" Mom said with a laugh.

"Yes," Grandad said.

"Surely you don't believe that, do you?" Dad said.

"Did you two hear him when he wasn't there?" Grandad said. "That's what's remarkable. Is it so remarkable that it has some significance?"

"Hm," Kjartan said. "You've become superstitious in your old age, Johannes."

I looked at Grandma. Her hands were trembling, and as she poured, the pot was moving up and down so much it was only with the greatest effort of will that she managed to direct the jet from the spout into the cup without spilling the coffee. Mom looked at her, too, and was on the point of getting up, presumably to take over, only to lean back and reach for the bread basket instead. It was both painful to watch Grandma because she was so slow – in fact some coffee did end up in a saucer – and also unheard of that she, an adult, was unable to manage such a simple task as pouring coffee without spilling it, and the strangeness of seeing someone with hands shaking nonstop, almost with a mind of their own, meant that I couldn't take my eyes off her.

Mom placed her hand on mine.

"Wouldn't you like a griddle cake?" she said.

I nodded. She reached for one and put it on my plate. I spread a thick layer of butter on it and sprinkled sugar. Mom lifted the jug of milk and filled my glass. The milk came straight from the cowshed; it was warm and yellowish with tiny lumps floating round. I looked at Mom. Why had she filled my glass? I couldn't drink that milk, it was disgusting, it had come straight from the cow, and not just any cow but one standing outside and pissing and shitting.

I ate the griddle cake and took another while Dad asked Grandad some questions, which he answered in his own time. Kjartan sighed louder than he would have if he'd been alone. Either he had heard all this before or he didn't like what he heard.

"We were thinking of going up Lihesten this year," Dad said.

"Is that so?" Grandad said. "Well, it's a good idea. Yes, it's nice there. You can see over seven parishes from the top."

"We're looking forward to it," Dad said while Mom and Grandma were talking about an oak and a holly tree they had brought from Tromøya the previous year that they were now growing here.

I decided I would go and have a look at them.

Dad's glare stopped me in my tracks.

"Aren't you going to drink your milk, Karl Ove?" he said. "It's straight from the cow, you know. You won't get better milk anywhere."

"I know," I said.

As I didn't make a move to drink it, he fastened his eyes onto mine.

"Drink the milk, boy," he said.

"But it's warm," I said. "And there are lumps in it."

"Now you're offending your grandparents," Dad said. "You have to eat and drink whatever you're served. And that's that."

"The boy's used to pasteurized milk," Kjartan said. "From a carton in the fridge. They sell it in the shop here, too. Of course he can have some of that! We can buy it tomorrow. He's not used to milk straight from the cow."

"That seems unnecessary," Dad said. "The milk here is just as good. If not better. What nonsense to buy milk just because he's pampered."

"I like pasteurized milk best myself," Kjartan said. "I agree wholeheartedly with your son."

"Okay," Dad said. "Just so long as you're not taking the side of the underdog as usual. But this is more about manners."

Kjartan smiled and studied the table. I put the glass of milk to my mouth, stopped breathing through my nose, tried to think about something other than the white lumps, and drank it all in four long swigs.

"See," Dad said. "It was good, wasn't it?"

"Yes," I said.

After the meal we asked if we were allowed to go for a little walk even though it was late. We were. On with our shoes, into the yard, and down the road to the barn. The dusk was tenuous and hung like a spider's web all around us. The shapes were intact; the colors were absent or had gone gray. Yngve undid the catch of the cowshed door and pushed. The door was stuck and he had to put all his weight behind it to open up. Inside it was dark. Dim light from the dirty peepholes above the stalls made it possible for us to glimpse contours. The cows, lying in their stalls, stirred when they heard us. One turned its head.

"It's okay, cows."

It was nice and warm inside. The small calf, which was isolated in a kind of pen on the other side of the muck channel, was stamping around. We leaned over toward it. It looked at us with frightened eyes. Yngve patted it.

"Don't be scared, little calf," he said.

It wasn't only the door that was overgrown; all the walls and the floor and the windows were as well, as though the room had sunk at some point and was now submerged beneath water.

Yngve opened the barn door. We climbed into the hay that was lying there, clambered up onto the barn bridge, and opened the door to the small henhouse. The floor was covered with sawdust and feathers. The chickens sat motionless on the roosts staring straight ahead.

"Doesn't look like there are any eggs," Yngve said. "Want to go up and have a look at the minks, too?"

I nodded. When he pushed the tall barn door to, a white cat shot past us like an arrow and disappeared under the bridge. We went down and called it, knowing it was hiding somewhere, and finally we gave up and headed for the three mink huts that stood to the far west of the property, right by the forest. The acrid smell that met us as we approached was almost unbearable and I started breathing through my mouth.

There was a rustling and a banging in all the cages as we stopped in front of them.

How unpleasant it was.

It was darker here by the forest. The minks' claws clinked against the metal of the cages as they paced back and forth. We went up close to one. The black animal shrank as far back as it could, turned its head, and hissed at us. Its teeth shone. Its eyes were black like black stones and when, twenty minutes later, I was lying on the bed in our room on the first floor, alongside Yngve, who had his head on the pillow at the other end and was reading a soccer magazine, it was them I was thinking of. Of them moving back and forth in the cages all night while we slept. Suddenly voices were raised in the living room beneath us. It was Mom and Dad talking with Kjartan. Raised voices didn't mean anything worrying; on the contrary, there was something reassuring about them. They wanted something, and they wanted it so much it couldn't be whispered or mumbled, it had to be shouted.

The next morning Grandad came in and asked if we would like to help pull up the fishing nets. We did, and a few minutes later we followed him down the path to the fjord, carrying an empty, white tub between us.

The boat was moored to a red float in the water. The mist was so dense it seemed to be hovering in the air. Grandad pulled the boat ashore, we jumped on board, and after he had shoved off with an oar against the bottom Yngve sat down on the thwart by the oarlocks and began to row. Grandad sat at the stern directing him whenever necessary; I sat in the bow looking into the mist. Lihesten, on the other side, was almost completely lost from view, visible only as something hard and gray in all the moist haze.

"It's very unusual for there to be mist here," Grandad said. "And especially at this time of year."

"Have you been to the top of Lihesten, Grandad?" Yngve said.

"Oh yes, you bet I have," Grandad said. "Many times. But it's a few years now since the last time."

He sat forward with his arms over his thighs.

"Once I went there as part of a rescue mission. It was Norway's first real plane crash. Have you heard about it?"

"No," Yngve said.

"It was misty, like now. The plane flew straight into Lihesten. We heard the bang, you see. We didn't know what it was, though. But then the plane was reported missing, and the local police chief needed men to go up with him. So I went."

"Did you find it?" I said.

"Yes, but there were no survivors. I saw the captain's head. That's a sight I'll never forget. His hair was perfect! Combed back. Not a strand out of place. No, I'll never forget that."

"Where did it crash? Into the wall of the mountain?" Yngve said.

"No, we can't see it from here. But there's a pinnacle on the plateau. It crashed there. We had to climb up to the wreck. Bit to port!"

Yngve's eyes narrowed, presumably trying to work out which side port was.

"That's it, yes," Grandad said. "You're a good oarsman, Yngve! Well, it was a big affair at that time. It was in all the papers. And there was lots of talk about it on the radio."

In front of us, the float above the net shone red through all the gray.

"Grab it, will you, Karl Ove!" Grandad said. I leaned over with a pounding heart and caught it in both hands. But it was slippery and I lost hold at once.

"Scoop your hands underneath," Grandad said. "Let's try again! Row back a bit. That's it, yes."

This time I managed to bring it on board. Yngve drew in the oars. Grandad began to drag in the net. The fish were revealed first as small, twinkling lights deep in the black depths, then they grew in size and clarity until a moment later they were dragged wriggling over the side. So shiny and clean with their gray-brown or bluish markings on their spines, their yellow eyes, pale red mouths, and razor-sharp fins and tails. I held one of them in my hands, where it writhed with such force it was hard to imagine it could be the fish I saw lying still on the boards at my feet the very next moment.

Grandad patiently extricated them from the mesh of the net and threw them into the tub. We had twenty. Mostly saithe but also the odd cod and pollock, plus two mackerel.

When Yngve began to row back I suddenly heard a simultaneous low whoosh and splash, not unlike the noise yachts make when they travel at speed, and I turned my head. Perhaps thirty meters away I could see some dark dorsal fins moving through the water.

I was scared.

"What's that?" Yngve said, raising the oars. "Over there."

"Where?" Grandad said. "Oh! Porpoises. They've been here a few days now. It's quite rare, but not that unusual. Have a good look at them. Seeing porpoises is a good omen, you know."

"Is it?" I said.

"Oh yes," he said.

Grandad gutted the fish over the sink in the basement, which was more like a grotto than a room in the house. The concrete floor was often wet and slippery, the ceiling was so low that Dad couldn't stand up straight – not a problem for Grandad as he was quite short – and the shelves on the walls were crammed with all sorts of objects and tools that had accumulated over their many years there. When he had finished, and the fish that only a few hours earlier had been alive and wriggling were in the freezer wrapped in plastic, we helped him to clean the net, standing in the rain on the grass by the shed, until Mom called us in for dinner.

After eating they usually had a nap. Dad, restless already after just one day, beckoned to me from the hall.

"Join me for a walk," he said.

I put on my boots and waterproof jacket and followed him across the fields. He walked with long strides and appeared to assimilate the countryside in long panoramic sweeps of his eyes. The mist hung over the spruce forest in front of us. The water in the lake shone black between the tree trunks. A tractor came down the road on the other side.

"Are you enjoying yourself here?" Dad said.

"Ye-es," I said, unsure where this was leading.

He stopped.

"Could you imagine living here?"

"Ye-es," I said.

"We might take over the farm here one day. Would you like that?"

"Living here?"

"Yes. When the time comes it's a real possibility."

I thought Kjartan would take over the farm, but I didn't say so, it would have ruined a wonderful moment for him.

"Come on, let's have a look around," he said, striding out again.

Live there?

Oh, that was certainly a novel idea. It was impossible to visualize Dad there, in that house, surrounded by those things. Dad drying hay? Dad mowing hay and putting it in the silo? Dad spreading muck on the fields? Dad sitting in his chair in the living room listening to the weather forecast?

Even though history didn't exist for me when I went there as a child and everything belonged to the moment, I could still feel its presence. Grandad had lived there all his life, and in some way or other that influenced the image I had of him. But if there was one image or notion that embodied Grandad, it was not everything he had done in his life, of that I knew very little, and the little I did know, I had nothing to compare it with, no, the one thing that embodied Grandad was the little two-stroke tractor he used for a multitude of purposes. That tractor was the very essence of Grandad. It was red and a bit rusty, needed to be kick-started, and had a small gear stick, a column with a black ball on top, on one hand lever, while the accelerator was on the other. He used it for mowing, walking behind it while an enormous scissor-like attachment on the front cut down the grass in its path. And he used it to transport heavy items; then he put a trailer on the back with a green seat, from which he steered what all of a sudden had become a truck-like vehicle. There was little I rated higher than being with him then, sitting on the back and chugging toward the two shops in Vågen, for example, where he would collect cans of formic acid or sacks of feed or artificial manure. The vehicle was so slow you could walk beside it, but that didn't matter, speed wasn't of any consequence, all the rest was: the rattle of the engine, the exhaust fumes that smelled so good and wafted across the road as we drove, the feeling of freedom in the trailer, being able to hang over one side, then the other, all the things there were to see on the journey, including Grandad's slight figure and his peaked cap in front of me, and getting out at the shop, where the Bergen boat docked, and being able to walk around, often with an ice cream in our hands while Grandad did whatever he had to do.

They also had a handcart with which they used to transport heavy items over short distances, such as the milk canisters that were trundled down to the milk ramp by the road for collection. The cart was made of metal and the wheels were as big as those on a bike. Other things no one else had at home were: scythes, the three big ones with wooden shafts and the small ones that you had to bend down to use, and the big whetstone outside the shed, where they were sharpened; the pitchforks with their three long, thin prongs. The flat, heavy shovels used to toss cow muck into the cellar, which was beneath a hatch in the floor of the cowshed. The electric fence, which Yngve tricked me into pissing on for the first and last time. The hay racks, these strange, extended, timid creatures standing outside all farms waiting for alms, unless you saw them from a distance or in the darkness, in which case they looked more like military units lined up ready for battle. The large, round griddle Grandma cooked her cakes on. The black waffle maker. The filters and the flat metal filtering devices used for the milk, and even the milk canisters with their plump bodies and short, headless necks, the way they stopped their flustered mumbling and chattering when filled to the top with milk and how they were then placed on the cart and trundled down to the ramp, side by side, suddenly solemn and dignified, that is, if one of them didn't gaily rock to and fro whenever the wheel hit a pothole in the road. And, oh, Grandad standing by the cowshed and singing the cows inside every afternoon.

How could I tell my friends at home about all this when they asked where we had been and what we had done over the holidays? It was impossible, and it was supposed to be impossible, there was a Chinese wall between the two worlds, both in my mind and the world outside.

In the two weeks we were there the unfamiliar became familiar and homely, while home, after a long day of traveling by car, had become unfamiliar, or had been lowered into the pool of unfamiliarity, for as we drove down the hill after Tromøya Bridge and turned into the last stretch up to the house, brown with red frames, surrounded by a lawn parched and scorched, the dark windows staring at us through sorrowful eyes, it was as if I both recognized it yet didn't, because although my gaze was accustomed to all it saw, it put up some resistance, a bit like a pair of new sneakers can, lying there, gleaming in their unused-ness and, as it were, refusing to adapt to their latest surroundings, insisting on their distinctive character, until the resistance has been worn down over a few weeks and they are just one pair among many. Some of this feeling of newness was conferred on the estate when we arrived, it had been stirred up, so to speak, and wasn't to settle for quite a few days.

Dad parked and switched off the engine. A little white kitten lay sleeping on Mom's lap. It had meowed and squealed in the cage all morning, and when it was finally let out it had run around the backseat and on the ledge under the rear window until Mom caught it and at last it fell asleep and was quiet. It had completely red eyes, and although its coat was big and furry, underneath it was tiny. Especially the head, I thought as I was petting it and felt the small cranium in my hand, but also the neck. It was so thin.

"Where's Whitie going to live?" I said.

"Oh, what a name," Dad said, opening the door and getting out.

"We'll have to give it a room in the cellar," Mom said, lifting the kitten to her bosom with one hand and opening the door with the other.

Dad pulled the seat forward and I stepped out onto the gravel, my legs like jelly. Yngve got out on the opposite side, and together we followed Dad to the house. He unlocked the door and went into the laundry room, where he opened the hatch and poked the hose through. He screwed the other end to the tap, and then he walked out with the sprinkler in his hand while Mom, Yngve, and I went into the cellar storeroom, where the kitten, who was still sleeping, was given a basket with a blanket in it, a bowl of water, and a bowl containing some pieces of sausage from the fridge, and then we put a low, plastic tray of sand in the corner.

"Now we'll close all the doors except this one," Mom said. "So he can't run away when he wakes up."

While the thin jets of water from the sprinkler rotated around the lawn and Dad carried in the baggage from the car below us, Yngve, Mom, and I sat having supper in the kitchen. It was Sunday, all the shops were closed, and so Mom had brought a loaf and some butter, meat, and cheese from Sørbøvåg. We drank tea; I had it with milk and three spoonfuls of sugar.

Suddenly we heard the kitten squeaking from the hallway. We got up, all of us, and went out. He was at the top of the stairs. On seeing us, he ran down again. We followed. Mom called him. He shot across the floor, darted past us, bounded up the stairs and into the living room, where he hid. For several minutes we went around searching and calling until Yngve found him. He was in the narrow gap between the bookcase and the wall, impossible to reach unless you moved the whole bookcase.

Mom went downstairs to fetch the bowls of food and water, put them beside the bookcase, and said he would come out when he wanted them. When I went in next morning he still hadn't moved. In the evening he came out and ate something, then he disappeared again. He stayed there for three days. But when he did eventually come out it was for good. He was still a bit jittery at first, but he got more and more used to us and after a week he was running around and playing and jumping onto our laps and purred whenever we stroked him. Every evening he stood in front of the TV smacking whatever appeared on the screen with his paw. He was particularly interested in soccer. He ignored all the players, he only had eyes for the ball, which he watched with the utmost attention. Now and then he padded behind the TV set to look for it.

When school started again, he began to cough. It was comical, it sounded as if there were a person downstairs in the cellar. Slowly and imperceptibly, the mornings became cooler until one day there was a thin, glassy layer of ice on the puddles in the road, which had melted after a few hours, but nevertheless autumn was at the door. The leaves on the trees straddling the hill above our house turned yellow and red and spiraled down from the branches when the wind gusted in. Mom was unwell and in bed when I left for school in the morning and returned some hours later. I went in to talk to her and she could barely raise her head. At the same time Whitie fell ill; he lay in his basket coughing. At school I kept wondering how he was and on my return the first thing I did was to go into the cellar storeroom. If only he would get well soon! But the opposite happened, he got worse and, one day when I ran in to see him, he wasn't in his basket but in the corner, on the concrete floor, writhing to and fro and wheezing. I placed my hand on him, but he kept on writhing.

"Mom! Mom!" I shouted. "He's dying! He's dying!"

I flew up the stairs and wrenched open the door to her room. She turned sleepily to me with a smile.

"You've got to call for a vet!" I shouted. "Right now! It's urgent!" She sat up gingerly.

"What's going on?" she said.

"Whitie's dying! He's writhing around on the floor. He's in so much pain! You've got to call for a vet! At once!"

"But we can't, Karl Ove," Mom said. "I don't think anything will help. And I'm not well . . ."

"You've got to call now!" I shouted. "Mom, Mom, he's dying! Don't you understand?"

"I can't, don't you understand. I'm sorry. It's terrible."

"But Whitie's dying!"

She gently shook her head.

"But Mom!"

She sighed.

"He was probably already ill when we took him with us. He's an albino as well. They're often a bit weaker. There's nothing we can do. Nothing."

I looked at her with my eyes full of tears. Then I slammed the door and ran down to the cellar. He was lying on his side, pulling himself along by his claws on the floor and wheezing. Spasms shook through him. I bent down and stroked him. Then I ran out, down into the forest, right down to the water. Up again on the other side. Crying nonstop. When our house came into sight again I ran as fast as I could, I had to try and persuade her again. She wasn't a vet, what did she know about what they could or couldn't do? I opened the door and paused. Inside the house there was silence. Carefully, I crept into the storeroom. He was back in his basket, lying still, with his head rolled back.

"Mom!" I yelled. "Come here!"

I dashed up the stairs and opened the door to her room again.

"He's not moving," I said. "Could you check to see if he's dead? Or if he's recovered."

"Do you think you can wait until your father comes?" she said. "He won't be long."

"No!" I said.

Mom stared at me.

"Okay, I can do it," she said. She lifted the duvet, placed her feet on the ground, and stood up, all at the same slow speed. She was wearing a white nightgown. Her hair was in a mess, her face pale and softer than when she was well. She steadied herself with one hand against the wardrobe. I ran downstairs and waited for her outside the storeroom. I didn't want to be inside on my own.

She leaned forward and felt the kitten.

"I'm sorry," she said. "But I think he's dead."

She looked at me and got up. I put my arms around her.

"He won't be in any more pain," she said.

"No," I said.

I wasn't crying.

"Should we bury him right away?" I said.

"It's best to wait until Dad and Yngve come home, don't you think?"

"Yes," I said.

And so we did. While Mom was in bed Dad carried the kitten to a corner of the garden, followed by Yngve and me, dug a hole in the ground, put the kitten in, and shoveled earth over him. He wouldn't hear of a cross.

◆ ◆ ◆

There are two pictures of the kitten. In one he's standing in front of the television with a raised paw, trying to catch a swimmer. In the other he's lying on the sofa beside Yngve and me. He has a blue bow tie around his neck.

Who put the bow tie on?

It must have been Mom. That was the sort of thing she would do, I know that, but during the months I have been writing this, in the spate of memories about events and people who have been roused to life, she is almost completely absent, it is as if she hadn't been there, indeed as if she were one of the false memories you have, one you have been told, not one you have experienced.

How can that be?

For if there was someone there, at the bottom of the well that is my childhood, it was her, my mother, Mom. She was the one who made all our meals and gathered us around her in the kitchen every evening. She was the one who went shopping, knitted or sewed our clothes; she was the one who repaired them when they fell apart. She was the one who supplied the bandage when we had fallen and grazed our knees; she was the one who drove me to the hospital when I broke my collarbone and to the doctor's when I, somewhat less heroically, had scabies. She was the one who was out of her mind with worry when a young girl died from meningitis and at the same time I got a cold and a bit of a stiff neck. I was bundled straight into the car, off to Kokkeplassen, her foot flat on the accelerator, concern flashing from her eyes. She was the one who read to us, she was the one who washed our hair when we were in the bath, and she was the one who laid out our pajamas afterward. She was the one who drove us to soccer practice in the evening, the one who went to parents' meetings and sat with other parents at our end-of-term parties and took pictures of us. She was the one who stuck the photos in our albums afterward. She was the one who baked cakes for our birthdays and cakes for Christmas and buns for Shrovetide.

All the things mothers do for their sons, she did for us. If I was ill and in bed with a temperature she was the one who came in with a cold compress and placed it on my forehead, she was the one who put the thermometer up my backside to take my temperature, she was the one who came in with water, juice, grapes, cookies, and she was the one who got up in the night and came in wearing her nightgown to see how I was.

She was always there, I know she was, but I just can't remember it.

I have no memories of her reading to me and I can't remember her putting a single bandage on my knees or being present at a single end-of-term event.

How can that be?

She saved me because if she hadn't been there I would have grown up alone with Dad, and sooner or later I would have taken my life, one way or another. But she was there, Dad's darkness had a counterbalance, I am alive and the fact that I do not live my life to the full has nothing to do with the balance of my childhood. I am alive, I have my own children, and with them I have tried to achieve only one aim: that they shouldn't be afraid of their father.

They aren't. I know that.

When I enter a room, they don't cringe, they don't look down at the floor, they don't dart off as soon as they glimpse an opportunity, no, if they look at me, it is not a look of indifference, and if there is anyone I am happy to be ignored by it's them. If there is anyone I am happy to be taken for granted by, it's them. And should they have completely forgotten I was there when they turn forty themselves, I will thank them and take a bow and accept the bouquets.

Dad knew what the situation was. Lack of self-knowledge was not one of his failings. One evening at the beginning of the eighties, he said to Prestbakmo that it was Mom who had saved his children. The question is whether it was enough. The question is whether she was responsible for exposing us to him for so many years, a man we were afraid of, always, at all times. The question is whether it is enough to be a counterbalance to the darkness.

She made a decision: she stayed with him, she must have had her reasons.

The same applies to him. He also made a decision, he also stayed. Throughout the seventies and the beginning of the eighties this is the way they lived, side by side, in the house in Tybakken, with their two children, their two cars, and their two jobs. They had a life outside the house, a life in the house in the way they were to each other, and a life in the house in the way they were to us. We, as children, were like dogs in a crowd of people, only interested in other dogs or doggy things, we were never aware of what else was happening, over our heads. I had a vague sense of who Dad was outside the house, for something seeped down, even to me, but it never made any sense. He was always well turned out, I was aware of that, but not what significance it carried, only when I was older and met some of his former students could I see him in that role. A young, slim, well-dressed teacher stepping out of his Opel Ascona, walking with a determined stride up to the faculty lounge, putting down his briefcase full of papers, pouring a cup of coffee, exchanging a few words with colleagues, going to his class when the bell rang, hanging his brown cord jacket on the chair and scanning the class, who sat quietly looking at him. He had a well-groomed black beard, sparkling blue eyes, and a handsome face. The boys in the class feared him; he was strict and tolerated no nonsense. The girls in the class were in love with him because he was young, had a strong aura, and looked nothing like any of the other teachers. He liked teaching and was good at it, he held his classes in a spell when he spoke about subjects that engaged him. Obstfelder was his favorite. But he also liked Kinck and, of the contemporary writers, Bjørneboe.

He was very correct in his dealings with colleagues, but also kept his distance. The distance lay in his attire; many of the other teachers would wear smocks and jeans or the same suit for months on end. The distance lay in the impartiality he exhibited. The distance lay in his body language, his posture, his aura.

He always knew more about them than they knew about him. It was a rule in his life, which applied to everyone, even his parents and brothers. Or perhaps especially to them.

When he came home from school he went into his study and prepared the evening meetings; he was a Venstre representative on the council, as well as sitting on several committees, and at one point he was a possible Storting candidate for his party, according to him. But what he said wasn't always true, he was notorious for manipulating the truth in the circles in which he moved, although not in his work at school or in politics, where he was proper and seemly. He was also a member of a philately club in Grimstad and showed his collection at a variety of exhibitions. In the summer he devoted himself to the garden, where he was also ambitious and a perfectionist, if such is conceivable in a garden around a house on an estate in the seventies. He had inherited his interest in everything that grew from his mother, and that was perhaps what they spoke about most: various plants, bushes, and trees and the experiences they'd had with them. Sun, soil, moisture, acidity levels. Grafting, pruning, watering. With no friends, his social intercourse took place in the staff room and the family. He visited his parents, brothers, uncles, and aunts frequently and received frequent visits from them. With them he used a tone of voice that was unfamiliar to Yngve and me, and we therefore viewed it with suspicion.

Mom's life differed in many ways from his. She had lots of friends, mostly because of her job, but also in other places, not least among the neighbors. With them she would sit and chat, or "prattle," as Dad would say, and smoke and eat the cakes they had baked – if, that is, they weren't knitting in the thick cloud of tobacco smoke that hung in so many living rooms in the seventies. She had an interest in politics, was in favor of a strong state, a well-developed health system, and equal rights for all, and was probably committed to women's liberation and the peace movement, was against capitalism and the growing materialism, and sympathized with Erik Dammann's The Future in Our Hands movement, in short she was on the left. She said she had hibernated during her twenties, everything was about her job, her children, and making ends meet, the budget was tight, you had to fight to keep to it, although in her early thirties she focused on herself and the society she was living in. While Dad rarely read anything other than what he had to, she was genuinely interested in literature. She was an idealist, he was a pragmatist; she was contemplative, he was practical.

They brought us up together even if I never experienced my upbringing as such; I always drew a strict distinction between them and perceived them as two utterly separate beings. But for them it must have been different. In the evenings when we were asleep they sat up talking – about the neighbors, colleagues, us, unless they were discussing politics or literature. Once in a while they went on holiday alone, to London, to the Rhine Valley, or into the mountains, while Yngve and I were with either Mom's or Dad's parents. They were more equal than the parents of my friends as far as chores in the house were concerned: Dad cleaned and cooked, which none of the other fathers did, not to mention all the food gathering they did at that time, all the fish he caught on the far side of the island and the hundreds of kilos of berries we picked on trips to the mainland in late summer and autumn, which afterward they converted into juice and jam and poured into bottles and jars to stand on the shelves in the cellar all winter, glowing dimly in the light from the little window at the top of the wall. Raspberries, blackberries, blueberries, cowberries, and cloudberries, which would excite Dad so much he would shout out if he found any. Sloes for wine. In addition, they would pay to pick fruit from gardens on Tromøya, and it was from there we had apples, pears, and plums. Then there was the cherry tree belonging to Dad's uncle Alf in Kristiansand and, of course, both grandmothers had fruit trees. Our days were structured and clear: on Sundays it was lunch with dessert, on weekdays it was generally a variety of shapes and variants of fish. We always knew when we had school on the following day, how many lessons we had in which subjects, and not even the course of the evening was without a framework, as it was seasonally determined: if there was snow or ice on the ground, then it was skiing and skating. If the water temperature rose above fifteen degrees, well then, swimming was the order of the day, come rain come shine. The sole really unpredictable factor in this life, from autumn to winter, spring to summer, from one school year to the next, was Dad. I was so frightened of him that even with the greatest effort of will I am unable to re-create the fear; the feelings I had for him I have never felt since, nor indeed anything close.

His footsteps on the stairs – was he coming to see me?

The wild glare in his eyes. The tightness around his mouth. The lips that parted involuntarily. And then his voice.

Sitting here now, hearing it in my inner ear, I almost start crying.

His fury struck like a wave, it washed through the rooms, lashed at me, lashed and lashed and lashed at me, and then it retreated. Then it could be quiet for several weeks. However, it wasn't quiet, for it could just as easily come in two minutes as two days. There was no warning. Suddenly, there he was, furious. Whether he hit me or not made no difference, it was equally awful if he twisted my ear or squeezed my arm or dragged me somewhere to see what I had done, it wasn't the pain I was afraid of, it was him, his voice, his face, his body, the fury it emitted, that was what I was afraid of, and the terror never let up, it was there for every single day of my entire childhood.

After the confrontations I wanted to die. Dying was one of the best, most enjoyable fantasies I had. He would have fun then. He would be standing there thinking about what he had done. He would be feeling remorse then. Oh, what remorse he would feel! I visualized him standing there and wringing his hands in despair with his head turned to heaven in front of the tiny coffin where I lay, with my prominent teeth, unable to pronounce my r's.

What sweetness there was in that image! It almost put me in a good mood again. And that was how my childhood was; the distance between good and evil was so much shorter than it is now as an adult. All you had to do was stick your head out of the door and something absolutely fantastic happened. Just walking up to B-Max and waiting for the bus was an event, even though it had been repeated almost every day for many years. Why? I have no idea. But when everything glinted with moisture in the mist and your boots were wet from the slush on the road, and the snow in the forest was white and sunken, and we stood in a gang chatting or playing, or we ran after girls to trip them, grab their stocking caps, or simply throw them into a snowdrift, and I felt one of them against me as I squeezed my arms around her waist as tight as I could, perhaps Marianne, perhaps Siv, perhaps Marian, because they were the girls I prized and thought about most, all my nerves were a-quiver, my chest bubbled with joy – and why? Oh, because of the wet snow. Because of the wet down jackets. Because of the many good-looking girls. Because of the bus rattling along with chains on its tires. Because of the condensation on the windows when we went inside, because of the screaming and shouting, because Anne Lisbet was there, as happy and lovely, as dark-haired and red-mouthed, as she had ever been. Every day was a party, in the sense that everything that happened pulsated with excitement and nothing was predictable. Nor was it over when the bus came, it had only just begun, for the whole school day stretched out before us, with the transformation we went through when our wet clothes were hanging on hooks and we shuffled into the classroom in stockinged feet, with red cheeks and messy hair, wet at the tips because it had been outside the hat. The tingling in your body as the break beckoned, and we ran up the stairs, through the corridors, down the outside steps, across the playground, down the slope, and onto the field. And afterward, going home, playing music, reading, perhaps putting on skis and racing down the steep hill to Ubekilen, where the others always were, and all this at the intensity that only exists in childhood, standing at the bottom, back up herringbone style, racing down, until the darkness was so dense we could hardly see a hand in front of our faces and hung over our ski sticks chatting about everything and nothing.

The glimpse of ice on the bay covered by a shallow layer of water. The lights from the houses on the estate, which formed a kind of cupola over the forest above us. All the sounds the darkness amplified whenever someone shifted weight and the blue mini skis scraped against each other or cut into the soft snow. The car that came down the narrow gravel road, it was a Beetle, belonging to the people who lived there, the light shining a path across the ground, making everything spookily visible for a moment or two and then the darkness closing around us again.

Childhood consisted of an infinity of such moments, all equally compact. Some of them could raise me to dizzying heights, like the evening I got together with Tone and half ran, half slid down the hill, which must have just been cleared by the snowplow, judging by the shiny surface, and when I arrived at the dark patch between the roads outside our house, I lay down in the snow on my back and looked up at the dense, clammy, and lightless night above me and was utterly happy.

Others could open a void beneath me, like the evening Mom told us she was going to start studying the following year. We were at the table eating supper when she told us.

"The school's in Oslo," she said. "It's just for one year. I'll come home every Friday and I'll be here all weekend. Then I'll go back on the Monday. So that's three days here and four there."

"Are we going to be alone here with Dad?" Yngve said.

"Yes. It'll be fine. You'll see a bit more of each other."

"Why are you going to go to school?" I said. "You're an adult."

"There's something called further education," she said. "I'm going to learn more about my profession. It's very exciting, you know."

"I don't want you to go," I said.

"It's just for a year," she said. "And I'll be here for three days a week. And all the holidays. I'm going to have long holidays."

"I still don't want you to go," I said.

"I understand," Mom said. "But it'll be fine. Dad wants to spend time with you. And next year it will be the other way around. Dad will do a further education course and I'll be at home."

I took the last mouthful of tea, closed my mouth, and let it seep through, as I blocked the many wet, black tea leaves at the bottom with my lips.

I half-rose and lifted the heavy teapot over to the cup with both hands, poured, and put it back. The tea was almost black, it had been brewing for so long. I added a generous portion of milk and three large spoonfuls of sugar.

"Sugar in tea," Yngve said.

"And?" I said.

At that moment there was the sound of footsteps on the stairs.

Oh, and I had filled the cup to the brim! I would have to sit there until it was drunk. But Yngve had no such reservations; he stood up and was gone.

Dad walked past with a somber step. He switched on the television and sat down on a chair.

"Would you like some supper?" Mom said.

"No," he said.

I poured in more milk to make the tea colder and drank it up in three long swigs.

"Thank you, Mom!" I said, getting up.

"My pleasure," Mom said.

The news was shocking, but I wasn't shocked as I went to my room afterward, it was April now and the course she was doing didn't start until August. That was four months away and for a child four months is an eternity. Mom's further education course belonged to the future in the same vague way that my next school did or confirmation or my eighteenth birthday. We were in midchildhood and time was suspended there. That is, the moments raced along at breakneck speed while the days that contained them passed almost unnoticed. Even when the last day of school arrived and we were no longer in the third class I didn't think that soon she would be off. Wasn't there the whole of the long summer holiday to go yet? It was only when she was in her bedroom taking out her clothes and a suitcase lay open on the floor that I realized. At the same time there were so many other things going on, the next day school would be starting again, when we, the fourth class, would definitively be among the oldest. We would have a new classroom, and more importantly, a new class teacher. Inside my room there was a new satchel, in the wardrobe there were new clothes. The thought of all this made my stomach tingle, and although I was sad watching her pack I was no sadder than I usually was when she went to work.

She stopped packing and looked at me.

"I'll be back on Thursday," she said. "It's only four days."

"I know," I said. "Have you got everything?"

"You know what, I think I have," she said. "Would you mind helping me with the suitcase? Put your knee there so that I can close it properly?"

I nodded and did as she asked.

Dad came up the stairs.

"Are you ready?" he said with a nod at the suitcase. "I'll take it."

Mom gave me a hug and then she followed him downstairs.

I watched them from the bathroom window. As she got into the green Beetle it was exactly like any afternoon when she had to go to work – apart from the suitcase in the trunk, that is. I waved, she waved back, started the engine, reversed up the incline, put the car in first gear, and it beetled down the hill the way it always did and was gone.

What would happen now?

What would the days be like now?

It was Mom who bound us all together, it was Mom who was at the center of Yngve's and my life, we knew that, Dad knew that, but perhaps she didn't. How else could she leave us like this?

Knives and forks clinking on plates, elbows moving, heads held stiff, straight backs. No one saying a word. That is us three, a father and two sons, sitting and eating. Around us, on all sides, it is the seventies.

The silence grows. And we notice it, all three of us, the silence is not the kind that can ease, it is the kind that lasts a lifetime. Well, of course, you can say something inside it, you can talk, but the silence doesn't stop for that reason.

Dad put the bone on the plate with the potato skin and took another chop. Yngve and I were given only one each.

Yngve had finished.

"Thank you, Dad," he said.

"There's dessert," Dad said.

"Don't want any," Yngve said. "Thanks anyway."

"Why don't you want any?" Dad said. "It's pineapple and cream. You like it."

"It makes my face break out," Yngve said.

"I see," Dad said. "You can leave the table."

He looked at me when Yngve got up, as though he didn't exist.

"But you want some, don't you, Karl Ove?"

"You bet," I said. "It's my favorite."

"Good," he said.

I sat looking out of the window waiting for him to finish. Listening to the music from Yngve's room. A crowd of children had gathered in the road, they put two rocks on the ground as a goal, immediately afterward there was the sound of heavy thuds as boots hit an underinflated ball and of low shouts, which always increase in volume when soccer is played, whatever form it takes.

At last Dad got up, took the plates, and scraped them clean over the trash can. He put a bowl of pineapple and cream in front of me and one in front of himself.

We finished the dessert without saying a word.

"Thanks, Dad," I said, getting up. Dad said nothing, but got up as well, filled the coffeepot with water, and took a packet of coffee from the cupboard.

Then he turned.

"Karl Ove?" he said.

"Yes," I said.

"Now don't you tease Yngve about his pimples, do you understand what I'm saying? I don't ever want to hear a word about it again."

"Okay," I said, and stood waiting to see if there was more to come.

Dad turned and cut off the corner of the coffee packet, and I went into Yngve's room, where he was playing his electric guitar, a black Les Paul copy I had been so surprised to hear the first time, as I was convinced not a sound would come from it without an amplifier. But it did, a low plunking sound, he was sitting there and playing with a face full of pimples.

"Want to play something?" I said.

"I already am," he said.

"A game, you chump," I said.

"Fifty-two-card pick-up?" he said.

"Ha ha," I said. "You can only do that once and I've already done it. Can you teach me a chord?"

"Not now. Another time."

"Please."

"Just one then," he said. "Sit here."

I sat down beside him on the bed. He put the guitar in my lap. Placed three fingers on the finger board.

"That's an E," he said, and took his hand away.

I put my fingers where he'd had his.

"Good," he said. "Now strum."

I strummed, but not all the strings made a sound.

"You have to press harder," he said. "And you have to watch your other fingers don't catch the free strings."

"Okay," I said, and tried again.

"That was good," he said. "That's the way. Now you can do E."

I passed him the guitar and got up.

"Do you remember which strings are which?" he said.

"EADGBE," I said.

"That's right," he said. "Now all you need is a band."

"But then I would have to borrow your guitar," I said.

"You can't have it."

I said nothing because things could change so quickly.

"When do you start tomorrow?" I said instead.

"First hour," he said. "And you?"

"No, at eleven, I think."

"Think?"

"Know. Dad?"

"First lesson, dead sure."

That was good news. I would be alone for a few hours.

I turned and went into my room. The new satchel was by the desk leg. The square, blue one I'd had for years had become too small and childish. The one I had now was dark green and made of some synthetic material that smelled wonderful.

I sniffed at it for a while. Then I put on Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band and lay back on my bed staring at the ceiling.

Getting so much better all the time!
It's getting better all the time!
Better, better, better!
It's getting better all the time!
Better, better, better!
Getting so much better all the time!

The music lifted me at once, I beat the air with one hand and rocked my head backward and forward, happy to the core. Bettåh, bettåh, bettåh! I sang. Bettåh, bettåh, bettåh!

There was the school building, black, with all its many windows glinting, as we stormed off the bus. We were among the older pupils now and knew both how to behave and what to expect. While the new kids, hair combed and smartly dressed, stood with their parents listening to the head teacher's welcome talk by the flagpole, we swaggered around and spat or leaned against the wall of the wet-weather shed talking about what we had done that summer. Three cows on a farm was no longer good enough, but even if our only holiday trip had been to Sørbøvåg, where I had stayed with Jon Olav and the others, alone for a week, I definitely had something to offer because there had been a girl there, my second cousin, whose name was Merete, she had blond hair and lived outside Oslo. I went out with her, I said, and although that was not quite as impressive as Liseberg in Gothenburg, northern Europe's biggest amusement park, it was better than nothing.

Some of the girls unfurled their skipping elastic from what were to me hidden places and started jumping.

No, dancing.

We managed to persuade them to play the high jump instead, so that we could join in without losing face in front of the other boys. Two of the girls held the elastic between them, and then, one after the other, we ran toward it, launched both legs, and brought our feet down on it to land on the other side.

It was a pleasure to watch the girls as they took off, legs first, in their elegant, controlled fashion.

Whoosh, you heard, and then they were safely on the other side.

Then the height was raised until there was only one person left.

I hoped it would be me because Anne Lisbet had joined us now as well, but it was, as so often before, Marianne.

Tap, tap, tap, you heard, as she ran forward, whoosh, you heard when she jumped, and then she was over.

She smiled shyly, swept her shoulder-length blond hair to one side with a finger, and I wondered if she would be the one I fell in love with this year.

Probably not. She was in my class.

Perhaps it would be someone in the A class?

Or, hey, future of dreams, perhaps someone from another school?

After we had been given the schedule and some new books in the first lesson we had to tell the class what we had done over the summer, one after the other. In the second lesson we had to hold an election for the new student council. I had been the class rep with Siv in the previous year and I thought being reelected would be a formality until Eivind put up his hand and said he would also like to stand as a candidate. There were six names to choose from. Eivind's involvement led to my breaking the unwritten rule that you never, under any circumstances, voted for yourself.

I thought the election might be touch and go, so one vote could be decisive. I considered the chances of anyone finding out that I had voted for myself unlikely in the extreme. After all, it was a secret ballot, and the only person who would see what we wrote and could spot our handwriting, and could therefore expose me, was Frøken, and she wouldn't say anything.

How cruelly mistaken I was.

I wrote KARL OVE in capital letters on the little scrap of paper, folded it, and gave it to Frøken when she came around with a hat. On the board she wrote the names of the six candidates, and then she called on Sølvi, of all people, to read out the ballot slips. Every time Sølvi read out a name she put a cross by the appropriate person on the board.

It was taking time for my votes to start coming in. At first Eivind got most of the boys' votes. Then I realized to my horror that there were no more votes. I hadn't received a single one! How was that possible?

But there. At last.

"Karl Ove," Sølvi said, and Frøken put a cross behind my name.

"Eivind," Sølvi said.

"Eivind."

"Eivind."

"And that must be it, isn't it? Now let's see. The class reps on the council this year are therefore Eivind and Marianne!"

I looked down at the desk in front of me.

One vote.

How was that possible?

And, to cap it off, the one vote was my own.

But I was the best student in the class! At least in Norwegian! And natural and social sciences! And in math I was the second best, or perhaps the third. But, altogether, who could be better than me?

Okay, Eivind won. But one vote? How was that possible?

Hadn't anyone voted for me?

There had to be a mistake somewhere.

No one?

When I opened our front door Dad was standing inside.

I gave a start of surprise.

How had he managed that?

Had he been waiting for me?

"You've got to go to B-Max for me," he said. "Look."

He passed me a shopping list and a hundred-krone note.

"I want all the change back, okay?"

"Yes," I said, put down my satchel, and ran into the road.

If there was one area in this world where I was meticulous it was with Dad's change. When B-Max had just opened Yngve returned home with less change than there should have been. Dad gave him the beating of his life. And that was no small matter because Yngve had been on the receiving end of quite a few beatings. Many more than me. Yes, I got off lightly with everything. Even my bedtimes were lenient compared with his.

I looked at the list.

1 kilo of potatoes
1 packet of rissoles
2 onions
Coffee (for boiling)
1 tin of pineapple slices
¼ kilo of whipping cream
1 kilo of oranges

Pineapple? Were we going to have dessert again? On a Monday?

I put all the items in a basket, stood flicking through some magazines on the shelf by the counter, paid, put the change in my pocket, and ran home with the heavy bag hanging from my hand.

I passed it to Dad upstairs in the kitchen with the change, which he pocketed while I waited for him to say I could go. But he didn't.

"Sit!" he said, pointing to the chair.

I sat.

"Straighten your back, boy!" he said.

I straightened my back.

He took the potatoes, which were covered in soil, from the bag and started peeling them.

What was it he wanted?

"Well?" he said, turning to look at me while his hands worked under the water from the tap.

I looked at him in surprise.

"What did Frøken have to say?" he said.

"Frøken?"

"Yes, Fwøken. Didn't she have anything to say to all of you on your first day?"

"Yes, she did, she welcomed us back. Then we were given our schedule and some books."

"What's your schedule like then?" he said, walking over to the cupboard by the stove and taking out a saucepan.

"Shall I go and get it?"

"No, no. You must remember some of it, don't you? Did it look good?"

"Yes," I said. "Great."

"That's good," he said.

That evening I realized what Mom's absence meant.

The rooms were lifeless.

Dad sat downstairs in his study, and the living room and kitchen were "out there," dead. I tiptoed toward them, and the feeling that came over me when I was alone in the forest, when the forest was sufficient unto itself and it didn't want to incorporate me, reemerged here as well.

The rooms were only rooms, a gaping space I entered.

But not my room, thank goodness. It wrapped itself around me, soft and friendly as it had always been.

The next day Sverre and Geir Håkon came over to me in B-Max. Several kids from the class were standing around us.

"Who did you vote for yesterday, Karl Ove?" Geir Håkon said.

"It's a secret," I said.

"You voted for yourself. You got only one vote, and that was the one you gave yourself."

"No, it wasn't," I said.

"Yes, it was," Sverre said. "We've asked everyone in the class. No one voted for you. So you're the only one left. You voted for yourself."

"No," I said. "That's not true. I didn't vote for myself."

"Who did then?"

"I don't know."

"But we've asked everyone. No one voted for you. You voted for yourself. Come on, admit it."

"No," I said. "It's not true."

"But we've asked everyone. There's only you left."

"Then someone's lying."

"Why would anyone lie?"

"How should I know?"

"You're the one who's lying. You voted for yourself."

"No, I didn't."

The rumor spread through the school, but I denied everything. And kept denying it. Everyone knew what had happened, but as long as I didn't admit it, they couldn't be absolutely sure. They thought it was typical of me. I thought I was someone. But I didn't think that. A person who votes for himself is a nobody. The fact that I never went scavenging, never did any shoplifting, never fired a slingshot at birds or a pea-shooter loaded with cherry pits at cars or passersby, and never joined in when others locked the gym teacher behind the garage door in the equipment room or when others put drawing pins on the supply teachers' chairs or dunked their sponges until they were sopping wet, plus the fact that I told them they shouldn't do these things, told them it was wrong, did not do a great deal for my reputation, either. I knew, however, that I was right and what the others were doing was wrong. Occasionally I would pray to God to forgive them. If they swore, for example. Then a prayer might come into my mind. Dear God, Forgive Leif Tore for swearing. He didn't mean to. I said things like: heck, blast, golly, gosh, drats, jeez, my foot, goodness, fudge, holy cow, bother, and yikes. But despite this, despite not swearing, not lying, except in self-defense, not stealing or vandalizing or playing up teachers, despite being interested in clothes and my appearance and always wanting to be right and the best, which meant my general reputation was poor and I was not someone others said they liked, I wasn't shunned or avoided, and if I was, by Leif Tore and Geir Håkon, for instance, there were always boys I could turn to. Such as Dag Lothar. Or Dag Magne. And when all the kids got together in big groups no one was rejected, everyone was accepted, including me.

Of course, it was easier to be at home reading.

Nor did it do much for my reputation that I was a Christian. Actually, that was Mom's fault. One day, the year before, she had banned the reading of comics. I had come home early from school, run up the stairs, happy and excited, since Dad was still at work.

"Are you hungry?" she said, sitting on a chair in the living room with a book in her lap and looking at me.

"Yes," I said.

She got up and went into the kitchen, where she took a loaf from the bread box.

The rain outside was like stripes in the air. Some stragglers were coming down the road from the bus, heads bowed beneath the hoods of their rain jackets.

"I was looking at some of your comics today," Mom said, cutting a slice of bread. "What do you read? I'm aghast."

"Aghast?" I said. "What does that mean?"

She put a slice on the plate in front of me, opened the fridge, and took out some mild, white cheese and margarine.

"What you read is absolutely awful! It's just violence! People shooting one another and laughing! You're too young to read stuff like this."

"But everyone does," I said.

"That's no argument," she said. "It doesn't mean you have to."

"But I like it!" I said, spreading the margarine with my knife.

"Yes, that's what's so bad about it!" she said, sitting down. "That kind of magazine gives a terrible view of humanity. Especially of women. Do you understand? I don't want your attitudes to be shaped by that."

"By the killing?"

"For example."

"But it's not meant seriously!" I said.

Mom sighed. "You know Ingunn's writing a university thesis about the violence in comics, don't you?"

"No," I said.

"It's not good for you," she said. "Simple as that. At least you understand. That it's not good for you."

"So am I not allowed?"

"No."

"Eh?"

"It's for your own good," she said.

"I'm not allowed? But Mom, Mom . . . Never?"

"You'll have to read Donald Duck."

"DONALD DUCK?" I yelled. "No one reads DONALD DUCK!"

I burst into tears and ran to my room.

Mom followed me, sat on the edge of the bed, and stroked my back.

"You can read books," she said. "That's much better. You can go to the library, you and me and Yngve. To Arendal, once a week. Then you can borrow as many books as you like."

"But I don't want to read books," I said. "I want to read comics!"

"Karl Ove," she said, "my mind is made up."

"But Dad reads comics!"

"He's an adult," she said. "It's not the same."

"So no more comics ever again?"

"I have to work this evening. But tomorrow we can go to the library," she said, and got up. "Shall we leave it at that?"

I didn't answer, and she left.

She must have stumbled on a comic in the Kamp series or Vi Vinner, which were about war, in which all the Germans, or Fritz or Sauerkraut or whatever they were called, were killed with a smile on their lips, and the pages were littered with Donnerwetters and Dummkopfs or whatever they shouted to one another in the heat of battle, or she could have found Agent X9 or Serie Spesial, where most of the women wore bikinis and often not even that. It was just great to see Modesty Blaise undressing, though only when I was alone, normally nudity was incredibly embarrassing. Every time Agaton Sax was on children's TV I blushed if Mom and Dad were there because in the intro he was ogling a naked woman through binoculars. Sometimes there was actually some sex in the cartoons or films on TV, and if it took place when I was allowed to watch, it all became unbearable. There we were, the whole family, Mom, Dad, and their two sons watching TV, and then a couple screwed – in the middle of our living room, where did you look?

Oh, that was dreadful.

But I kept the comics in my room; Mom had never so much as cast a glance at them.

Now, out of the blue, I wasn't allowed to read them.

How unfair was that?

I cried, I was incensed, I went to see her again and said she had no right to ban them, knowing that the battle was lost, she had made up her mind, and if I didn't stop protesting she would just tell Dad, after which further resistance would be hopeless.

The comics I had borrowed were returned; the others were thrown away. The next day we went to the library, we were each given a membership card, and then it was done, from this moment on books held sway. Every Wednesday I came down the steps outside Arendal Library with a carrier bag full of books in each hand. I went with Mom and Yngve, who had likewise borrowed vast quantities, then it was back to the car, go home, lie down on my bed, read almost every evening, all Saturday and all Sunday, a pattern broken only by shorter or longer excursions outside, all depending on what was going on, and when the week was up it was back to the library with the two bags of finished books and two new bags. I read all the series they had, I liked Pocomoto best, the little boy who grew up in the Wild West, but also Jan, and the Hardy Boys, of course, and the Bobbsey Twins and Nancy Drew, the Girl Detective. I liked the Famous Five series and I plowed through a series of books about real people, reading about Henry Ford and Thomas Alva Edison, Benjamin Franklin and Franklin D. Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, John F. Kennedy, David Livingstone, and Louis Armstrong, always with tears in my eyes over the last pages, because, naturally enough, they all died. I finished the Vi Var Med series, about all the known and unknown expeditions of discovery in the world, I read books about sailing ships and space travel, Yngve got me into books by von Däniken, who thought that all the great civilizations had come about as a result of encounters with extraterrestrial creatures, and books about the Apollo program, starting with the astronauts' fighter-plane pasts and their attempts to set speed records. I also read all Dad's old Gyldendal books for boys, of which the one that made the greatest impression was probably Over Kjølen i Kano, where a father goes on a camping trip with two boys and sees a great auk everyone thought was extinct. I also read a book about a boy who was picked up by a zeppelin in England during the years between the wars, I read Jules Verne's many books, my favorites being Twenty Thousand Leagues under the Sea and Around the World in Eighty Days, also one called The Lottery Ticket about a poor family in Telemark who won a fortune in a lottery. I read The Count of Monte Cristo and The Three Musketeers, Twenty Years After and The Black Tulip. I read Little Lord Fauntleroy, I read Oliver Twist and David Copperfield, I read Nobody's Boy and Treasure Island and The Children of the New Forest, which I loved and read again and again as I had been given it and didn't borrow it. I read Mutiny on the Bounty, Jack London's books, and books about the sons of Bedouins and turtle hunters, stowaways and race car drivers, I read a series about a Swede who was a drummer boy in the American Civil War, I read books about boys who played soccer and I followed them season after season, and I read the more social-issue-style books that Yngve brought home, about girls who got pregnant and were going to have a baby, or who ended up on Skid Row and started taking drugs, it made no difference to me, I read everything, absolutely everything. At the annual flea market in Hove I found a whole series of the Rocambole books, which I bought and devoured. A series about a girl called Ida was another I read even though there must have been all of fourteen titles. I read all Dad's old copies of Detektivmagasinet, and bought books about Knut Gribb, the Oslo detective, when I had enough money. I read about Christopher Columbus and Magellan, about Vasco da Gama and about Amundsen and Nansen. I read A Thousand and One Nights and Norwegian folk tales, which Yngve and I were given one Christmas by Grandma and Grandad. I read about King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table. I read about Robin Hood, Little John, and Maid Marian, I read about Peter Pan and about poor boys who swapped their lives for those of rich men's sons. I read about boys who participated in sabotage operations during the German occupation of Denmark, and about boys who rescued someone from an avalanche. I read about a strange little man who lived on a beach and survived on what he could salvage from shipwrecks, and about young English boys who were cadets on naval vessels and Marco Polo's adventures at the court of Genghis Khan. Book after book, bag after bag, week after week, month after month. From everything I read I learned that you had to have courage, that courage was perhaps the supreme attribute, that you have to be honest and sincere in all your dealings and that you must never let others down. In addition, that you must never give in, never give up, because if you have been resolute, upright, brave, and honest, however lonely it has made you and however alone you stand, in the end you are rewarded. I thought a lot about that, it was one of the thoughts I embraced when I was alone, that one day I would be back here and be someone. That I would be someone big whom everyone in Tybakken would be forced, whether they liked it or not, to admire. It wouldn't come any day soon, I knew that, for it wasn't respect I won when Asgeir made a derogatory comment about me and a girl I liked – I went for him and he simply forced me to the ground, straddled me, and started prodding my chest and cheeks, laughing and jeering. I happened to have a yellow Fox in my mouth and I tried to spit it out at him, to no avail, which was underhanded, everyone knew that, but the sticky yellow mess went all over my face. You smell of piss, you shit, I said to him, and it was true, he did. And, if that wasn't enough, he had two sets of teeth, just like a shark, one row inside the other, and I pointed this repugnant sight out to the crowd milling around, not that it helped, I was on my back, vanquished, utterly powerless. You couldn't get further from the ideals I had acquired through reading – which in fact were also valid among children, there were many of the same concepts of honor, although that precise word was not used, but that was what it was about. I was weak, slow, cowardly; not strong, quick, courageous. What good was it that, unlike them, I had been in contact with the ideals, that I knew them inside out, better than any of them ever would, when I couldn't live up to them? When I cried for no reason? It felt unjust that I, of all people, who knew so much about heroic bravery, should be saddled with such frailties. But then there were books about frailties as well, and one of them carried me on a wave that would last several months.

One autumn I fell ill, during the day I lay in bed and was bored and one morning before going to work Dad brought me some books. He'd had them in the cellar, they were from his childhood in the fifties and I was free to borrow them. A handful had been published by a Christian company and for some reason they were the ones that made the strongest impression on me, one of them indelibly. It was about a boy whose father had died and who stayed at home to look after his sick mother; they lived in poverty and were completely dependent on the boy's efforts to make ends meet. He was confronted by a group, or a gang more like, of boys. Not only did they hound and beat up this boy who was so different from them, they swore and stole as well and the inequity of this gang's successes, in the light of the constant setbacks suffered by the honest, loving, and upright protagonist, was almost impossible to bear. I cried at the unfairness of it, I cried at the evil of it, and the dynamics of a situation whereby good was suppressed and the pressures of injustice were approaching bursting point shook me to the core of my soul and made me decide to become a good person. From then on I would perform good deeds, help where I could, and never do anything wrong. I began to call myself a Christian. I was nine years old, there was no one else in my close vicinity who called himself a Christian, neither Mom nor Dad nor the parents of any of the other kids – apart from Øyvind Sundt's parents, who warned him off Coke and candy and watching TV and going to the cinema – and of course no young people, so it was a fairly solitary undertaking I initiated in Tybakken at the end of the seventies. I began to pray to God last thing at night and first thing in the morning. When, in the autumn, the others gathered to go apple scrumping down in Gamle Tybakken I told them not to go, I told them stealing was wrong. I never said this to all of them at once, I didn't dare, I was well aware of the difference between group reactions, when everyone incited each other to do something or other, and individual reactions, when each person was forced to confront an issue head-on with no hiding place in a deindividuated crowd, so that was what I did, I went to those I knew best, my peers, and said to each one that apple scrumping was wrong, think about it, you don't have to do it. But I didn't want to be alone, so I accompanied them, stopped by the gate, and watched them sneak across the age-old fields in the dusk, walked beside them as they scoffed apples on the way back, their winter jackets bulging with fruit, and if anyone offered me anything I always refused, because dealing was no better than stealing.

When one Easter I made a new friend while visiting my grandparents in Sørbøvåg, I implored him again and again to stop swearing. I can remember how afraid I was that he would disobey my instructions when he came in with me and said hello to Grandma and Grandad, and how many times I had told him to promise not to swear. Afterward he avoided me and I coped with this by thinking that I had done the right thing. I offered my seat to elderly people on the bus, asked if I could carry something for them when they came out of supermarkets, never held on to the back of cars, never broke anything, never fired a slingshot at birds, looked where I walked so as not to tread on ants or beetles, and even when I picked flowers in the spring with Geir or anyone else to give to Mom or Dad, my heart sank at the thought of the lives I was taking.

In winter, after snowfalls, I wanted to help old people shovel it away. On one such day – it was a Monday after school and it had snowed heavily all night – I tried to persuade Geir to come with me to clear someone's drive. It was only by hinting that the old man would probably give us a tip for helping him out that I managed to get Geir to join me. Dad had just bought a new snow shovel, the type called the Sørland shovel, red and shiny, and as he had shoveled our drive that morning I assumed he wouldn't need it any more that day, so I went off with it, side by side with Geir, who was pushing his family's green Sørland shovel in front of him. The house I had chosen was on the bend and, when we rang, the face of the old man opening the door lit up when he realized that we weren't there to throw snowballs at his house, which many did, but to help him clear his drive. It was heavy work but fun; we dug a channel along which we could push the snow, over the edge into the ditch, we tipped it here and it rushed down like mini avalanches. The sky was a leaden gray, the snow so wet that water ran from it if you packed it together. From Torungen we heard the blare of the foghorn. Children raced downhill on sleds or skis, cars going up the hill on their way home from work skidded and spun. It took us an hour to finish the drive. We went to the front door and told the old man, he thanked us, and then he closed the door. Geir sent me an accusatory look.

"Weren't we supposed to get money for this?" he said.

"Ye-es. Actually we were. But it's not my fault he didn't give us any . . ."

"Have we done all this for nothing?"

"Looks like it," I said. "Doesn't matter. Come on, let's go."

He followed me, grumbling. As we reached the road in front of our house I saw Dad standing in the doorway. My heart felt as though it had stopped beating. My stomach contracted and I could hardly breathe. His eyes were wild.

"Now you come here this minute!" he shouted when I was in the drive. I fixed my eyes on the ground over the last few steps.

"Look at me!" he said.

I raised my head.

He slapped my face.

I gasped.

Then he grabbed the lapels of my jacket and pressed me against the wall.

"Did you take my Sørland shovel?" he said. "It's brand new! And it's mine! Don't touch my things! Do you understand? You didn't ask me for permission! I thought it had been stolen!"

I was crying and sobbing so much I barely heard what he said. He grabbed my jacket again, pushed me through the door, and sent me flying into the wall on the other side.

"Don't you ever do that again! Never! Go up to your room and stay there until I tell you otherwise! Have you understood?"

"Yes, Dad," I said.

He slammed his study door and I began to remove my outdoor clothes. My hands were shaking. I took off my mittens and hat, I wriggled out of my boots, then the Puffa pants, then the jacket, then the thick sweater. In my room I lay down on my bed. Everything inside me was red raw. I sobbed and tears streamed down over my pillow as a fearful anger took hold of me, tore me this way and that, I didn't know what to do with it. I hated him and I had to get my revenge. I would get my revenge. He'd soon see. I would crush him. Crush him.

Then it struck me: what would a nice boy do? What would a true Christian do?

He would forgive.

Once the thought was there, a warmth spread through me.

I would forgive him.

It was a big thought.

And it made me a big person.

But only when I was alone. When I was in the same room as him it was as though he swallowed up everything inside me, there was only him left, I couldn't think about anything else.

The first day alone with Dad was to form a pattern for all the other days of the year to follow. Breakfast ready on the table, packed lunch in the fridge, off shopping when I came home, sitting and answering questions while he cooked, interspersed with little jibes followed by the constant Straighten your back, boy – sometimes I had to stay there until he had finished, sometimes he could suddenly say, Off you go, as though he did actually understand what a torment I found these half-hour sessions where I was supposed to keep him company – then we ate and for the rest of the evening I was alone with Yngve upstairs, or outdoors, while he was either at meetings or working in his study. Once a week we went to Stoa after school to do a big shop. In the evenings he would sometimes watch TV with us. We gave him nothing: we sat stiff-backed, without moving and without speaking. If he asked us something we answered in monosyllables.

Gradually he began to turn away from Yngve and spend more and more time with me. I never dared to be as sullen and tight-lipped as my brother.

But it didn't always work.

His footsteps on the stairs, they were an ominous sign. If I was playing music I kept it down low. If I was reading on my bed I sat up so as not to seem too casual.

Was he coming here?

He was.

The door opened, there he stood.

It was eight o'clock; he hadn't been upstairs since the meal at four.

His eyes took in the room. And stopped at the desk.

"What have you got there?" he said. Came in, lifted the pack of cards. "Shall we play?"

"Yes, if you like," I said, putting down my book.

He sat beside me on the bed.

"I'll teach you a new game," he said. Lifted the pack and threw all the cards around the room.

"Fifty-two-card pick-up, it's called," he said. "Away you go. Pick them up!"

I had thought he really wanted to play cards and was so disappointed he was only messing around and I had to go down on my knees and pick up all the cards while he sat on the bed laughing that I muttered an expletive.

I would never have said it if I had been thinking.

But I hadn't been, and it slipped out.

"Bloomin' heck!" I said. "Why did you do that?"

He stiffened. Grabbed my ear and stood up as he twisted.

"Are you swearing at your own father?" he said, and twisted harder and harder until I burst into tears.

"Now you pick the cards up, boy!" he said, keeping hold of my ear while I bent down and started picking up the cards.

Once it was done he let go and left. When it was time for supper he was in his study and when we went into the kitchen he had prepared everything.

The next day he didn't call me in while he was cooking, as he usually did. A call from the kitchen only came when the food was ready. We sat down, helped ourselves without a word, whale steak with gravy and onions and potatoes, we ate in total silence, thanked him, and left the table. Dad washed up, ate an orange in the living room, I could tell by the aroma, and drank a cup of coffee, I could hear from the hiss of the coffeepot, went down to his study, where he played some music before putting on his coat, going to the car, and driving off.

As the drone of the car faded down the hill, I opened the door and went into the living room. Draped myself over the brown leather chair and put my feet on the table. Got up, went into the kitchen, opened the fridge, and looked inside: two plates of sandwiches, ready-made, that was our supper. Opened the cupboard next to it, took out the box of raisins, filled my hand, and tossed them into my mouth with one hand while flattening the level of the raisins in the box with the other. Munching, I walked into the living room and switched on the TV. At half past six there was a repeat of Blindpassasjer. It was a series about a spaceship, unbelievably scary, broadcast on Friday night, and we weren't allowed to watch, but neither Mom nor Dad knew anything about the repeats, which, to our great good fortune, were on when they weren't here.

Yngve came in and reclined on the sofa.

"What are you eating?" he said.

"Raisins," I said.

"I want some, too," he said.

"Don't take too many," I said as he got up, "or Dad'll notice."

"All right," Yngve said. He opened the cupboard door.

"Do you want some almonds as well?" he called.

"Yes, please," I said. "But not many."

The streetlamp outside shone orange in the darkness. The pavement beneath glistened the same color. And some of the spruce tree behind it. But the forest behind that was as dark as the grave. From the steepest part of the hill came the whine of a moped.

"There you go," Yngve said, releasing some almonds into my palm. I could clearly recognize his odor. It was acrid yet faint, almost metallic. Not his sweat, that smelled different, but his skin. It smelled of metal. When we wrestled I could smell it, when he tickled me I could smell it, and sometimes when he was lying down and reading, for example, I could put my nose to his arm and breathe in the smell. I loved him, I loved Yngve.

Five minutes before Blindpassasjer started, Yngve got up.

"Let's lock the front door," he said. "And then let's switch off all the lights to make it scary."

"No!" I said. "Don't do that!"

Yngve laughed.

"Are you scared already?"

I got up and stood in his way. He fastened his arms around me, lifted me up, and sat me back down and continued toward the stairs.

"Don't!" I said. "Please!"

He laughed again.

"I'm going downstairs now to lock the door," he said from the stairs.

I ran after him.

"I mean it, Yngve," I said.

"I know you do," he said. Locked the door and stood by it. "But I'm in charge when we're on our own."

He switched off the light.

In the murk, illuminated only by the light from the adjacent room, there was something satanic about his smile. I ran upstairs and sat in the chair. Listened to him switching off light after light. The hall, the lamp over the living-room table, the ceiling lamp in the kitchen. Then the four small wall lamps above the sofa and, finally, the lamp on top of the television. Apart from the faint shimmer from the outside lamp and the blue flickering glow from the screen it was completely dark when the episode began. It was scary right from the opening scene, a man was standing and swinging a scythe somewhere, and then he turned, and his face wasn't a face but a mask. I felt a tingle at the very tips of my fingers and toes and my innards were taut with fear. But I watched, I had to watch. When it was over, half an hour later, Yngve got up behind me.

"Don't say anything," I pleaded. "Don't do anything!"

"Do you know what, Karl Ove?" he said.

"Oh, no!" I said.

"I'm not who you think I am," he said, coming toward me.

"Yes, you are!" I said.

"I'm not Yngve," he said. "I am another."

"No, you're not!" I said. "You're Yngve! Tell me you're Yngve."

"I'm a cyborg," he said. "And this . . ." He stretched out his hand and lifted his sweater. "This is not flesh and blood. This is metal and cables. It looks like flesh and blood, but it isn't. I am not a human being."

"Yes, you are!" I said, starting to cry. "You are Yngve! Yngve! Say you're Yngve!"

"Now you will come down to the cellar with me," he said. "Heh heh heh . . ."

"YNGVE!" I screamed.

He smiled at me.

"I'm only joking," he said. "You didn't seriously think I was a cyborg, did you?"

"Don't do that," I said. "Switch the light on right now."

He took a step toward me.

"NO!" I shouted.

"Okay, okay," he laughed. "Let's switch on the light then. Shall we eat now or what? Are you hungry?"

"Switch on the light first," I said.

He switched on the wall lights and the lamp on the TV, where the news had already started. Then we went into the kitchen and had our supper. Yngve made us some tea, which was fine as long as we made sure to clear up after us, it must have been inconceivable for Dad that we could actually use the stove and boil water when he wasn't here. Afterward we unpacked our soccer game on the living-room table, with the door to his room open and my favorite Queen record – A Night at the Opera – playing.

When we heard Dad's car outside we hurriedly cleared the table and went into our separate rooms. Sometimes he summoned Yngve if we had been alone and asked what we had been doing and how it had been, but this evening he walked straight into the living room and sat down in front of the television.

It was actually a relief that he kept his distance the way he did, but there was more to it than that, I had a sense he didn't want things to be like this, it was as though the air in the house was weighed down with this feeling, a demand no one could fulfill.

When he came up to us next time it was dreadful. I had been under the weather, I had a cold and a temperature that had risen dramatically in the last hour, and I was sitting in Yngve's bed, leaning against the wall and reading one of his magazines. He was doing his homework at the desk, and the Boomtown Rats were playing on the turntable.

Bang, the door opened, and there was Dad looking at us.

He was in a good mood, his eyes beaming with energy.

"You're playing music," he said. "It sounds good. What's their name?"

"The Boomtown Rats," Yngve said.

Dad translated the name into Norwegian. "Do you remember how you laughed when I said Crystal Palace was Krystallpalasset? You didn't believe me!"

He smiled and came into the room.

"Do you like the music, too, Karl Ove?" he said.

I nodded.

"Come on. Let's dance," he said.

"I'm sick, Dad. I think I've got a temperature. I don't feel like it."

"Course you do," Dad said, grabbing my hands, dragging me to my feet, and swinging me round.

"Stop it, Dad!" I said. "I'm sick! I don't want to dance!"

But he carried on, swung me round, faster and faster, wilder and wilder. It was unbearable and I was on the point of throwing up.

"PACK IT IN, DAD!" I shouted in the end. "PACK IT IN!"

He stopped as quickly as he had started, threw me down on the bed, and left.

Every Friday Mom came home, I would always be close at hand so that I could be with her first because if I was first Dad couldn't send me to my room, which he could do if they were sitting and talking. By the time she left again on Sunday night or Monday morning it was as if Dad had come closer to us, or at least me, for again he called me to the kitchen to tell him what had happened during the day while he cooked. We ate in silence and after doing the dishes he disappeared down to his study without fail. Occasionally he came to watch TV with us, but usually he was downstairs until supper, and so it was as if Yngve and I were on our own at home. Not that I spent my time much differently from how I would have done if he hadn't been there. Mostly I lay on my bed reading. As Mom no longer drove us regularly to the library, and I had read all the books in the school library, I started on Mom and Dad's shelves. I read Agatha Christie and I read Stendhal, Le Rouge et Le Noir, I read a book of French short stories, I read a book by Jon Michelet and a biography of Tolstoy. I started writing a book myself, it was going to be about a sailing ship, but after I had written the first ten pages, which consisted largely of listing all the people on board, what kinds of provisions they had, and what cargo they were carrying, Yngve said no one wrote books about sailing ships nowadays, they did when sailing ships existed, now people write about what it's like to be alive today, and so I stopped. I also compiled a newspaper that autumn, in triplicate, which I put in three mailboxes, one for Karlsen, one for Gustavsen, and one for Prestbakmo, but I never heard any more, they just seemed to disappear into a void, as if they had never existed.

I lived one life indoors and another outdoors, as it had always been and as I suppose it was for all children; in front of the TV on Saturday night, surrounded by their parents and brothers and sisters, they were probably very different, much gentler and more accepting than when I saw them down in the forest, where freedom was total and nothing prevented them from following their smallest inclinations. The difference was particularly pronounced in the autumn. In the spring and summer so much of life was lived outdoors, the degree of contact between a child's life and an adult's life was changed, but when autumn came and the nights drew in so early it was as if the ties were cut and we slipped into our own worlds as soon as the front door closed behind us. The brief, dark, cold evenings were laden with all the excitement that exists in the unseen and the hidden. The autumn was darkness, earth, water, and hollow spaces. It was breathing, laughter, torchlight, dens, bonfires, and a flock of children drifting here and there. And not least the bedrooms afterward. Even though I never got permission to have anyone at home and none of the kids on the estate had ever been to my bedroom, I was always allowed to go to theirs. To some occasionally, to others often. That autumn it was the turn of Dag Lothar's bedroom. Red-faced after running through the darkness, we would sit in his room and play Monopoly while listening to one of his two Beatles albums, the red one or the blue one, on the cassette recorder. I liked the red one better, with their first songs, they were simple and happy, we would sing along loudly with the chorus, almost shouting, in English, not bothering too much about the semantics, only the sound, although the blue one was played more and more as we began to enjoy the somber, more unfamiliar tunes on it.

These evenings are among the happiest in my life. It is strange because there was nothing exceptional about them, we did what all young people did, sat playing games, listening to music, chattering away about whatever came into our heads.

But I liked the smell in their house, I liked being there. I liked the darkness we had just come from, which lent everything an unaccustomed quality, especially when it was damp and you could feel it in your whole body, not only see it with your eyes. I liked the light from the streetlamps. I liked the atmosphere that arose when there were lots of us together, the voices in the night, the bodies moving around me. I liked the sound of the foghorn from the open sea. My thinking on these evenings: anything can happen. I liked just dashing around, coming across the unexpected – objects, features, situations. The huts that had been erected in the forest above the pontoons, they were empty in the evening, the windows were lit, and we peered in. Were those porn mags lying there? Yes, they were. No one dared to smash a window and go in and take them, but now all of a sudden it was a possibility, and we knew someone would do it soon, perhaps even we would. This was a time when one morning there could be a centerfold from a porn magazine lying in the road outside the house. This was a time when you could find porn mags in the ditches, in fields, and under bridges. Who had left them there we had no idea, they were scattered as if by God's hand, a part of nature, like wood anemones, catkins, swollen streams, or rain-smooth rocks. And the elements marked them, too: they were either spongy with moisture or bone dry or the paper had cracked after having dried out again, often they were sun-faded, soil-stained, and discolored.

A thrill went through me when I thought about the magazines. It had nothing to do with the way we talked about them, we talked tough, we laughed and ogled them greedily, but the thrill lay somewhere else, so deep that rational thought never reached it.

There were many young guys on the estate you could imagine would have pornographic magazines at home, and they were without exception the same ones you could imagine buying a moped when the time came, starting to smoke and playing hooky from school, in short, the ones who hung out at the Fina station. The bad boys. So within me there were two incompatible entities. The magazines belonged to the bad, but what they filled me with, the intense thrill that forced me to gulp again and again, was also something I desired with a wild urgency. I went weak at the knees when I got to see one of the naked women. It was fantastic, it was terrible, it was the world opening and hell revealing itself, the light shining and the darkness falling, we just wanted to stand there flicking through the pages, we could have stood there for all eternity, beneath the heavy boughs of the spruce trees, with the aroma of damp earth and wet mountain, leering at the pictures. It was as though these women rose from the bog, straight up from the autumn-yellow grass, or at least were closely related to it. Parts of the pictures were often obliterated, but we saw enough of both the soft and the hard to know with certainty that these feelings existed and never left us, and every rumor of the existence of a magazine was always followed up at once.

Geir was one of the keenest in this regard. Already in the second class he had borrowed a copy of his father's Vi Menn and we sat down in the forest to study the topless women while, to ward off any suspicions, we talked in high-pitched voices about what Donald and Dolly were doing as though we were reading cartoon strips.

Now there were porn mags in the huts.

We circled them, but the doors were locked and we didn't have the nerve to smash the glass, undo the catch on the windows, and steal the magazines.

But the desire was aroused and it cast around in other directions. The clumps of trees around the car wreck in the forest?

The ditch behind the bus stop by B-Max?

The trees under the bridge?

The garbage dump, but of course! There had to be some there, didn't there? Hundreds? Thousands?

Sunday morning, the end of September, Dad fishing in his boat, Mom in the living room, Yngve on his bike somewhere on the east of the island, and me out of the door and across the wet gravel, wearing my beige jacket and my blue jeans, on my way up to Geir's, butterflies in my stomach, we were finally going to the garbage dump. The sun was shining, but it had rained early in the morning and the pavement was still black and wet in those places the sun didn't reach, such as in the shade under the spruce trees outside our house.

Geir was standing outside, ready, when I arrived, and we sprinted off. Up the hill, over the long plain where there were boats under tarpaulins in front gardens, mostly plastic boats but also some small dinghies, and one cabin cruiser, renowned far and wide. The lawns were brown, the trees behind the houses orange and red, the sky was blue. We had taken off our jackets and knotted them around our waists. Walked up past Ketil's house, onto the gravel road and through the gate that marked the end of the road and the start of the path. On the other side of the field was the new parish hall, where Ten Sing, with all the blond girls, rehearsed and had their meetings.

The stream alongside the path was full, cool green water, flowing lazily down the gentle slope. It got its color from the heather, the grass, and the plants the water flowed and lay across. Only minor ripples on the surface revealed that it was moving. Where the hill became steeper and the stream fell with a roar we began to run. The white stones littering the path were a matte gray in the shadow, a gleaming yellow in the sun. Ahead of us someone was walking uphill and we slowed down. It was an elderly couple. She had gray hair and a cardigan; he had a cord jacket with leather patches on the elbows and a cane in his hand. His mouth was open and his jaw trembled.

We turned and looked after them.

"That was Thommesen, that was," Geir said.

We hadn't seen him since he had us in the second class.

"I thought he'd died ages ago!" I said.

We took the old shortcut through the forest and emerged on the edge above the garbage dump. The mountain of white plastic bags and black garbage bags glinted in the full sun. A dozen or so seagulls were screaming and flapping their wings. We clambered down the slope and wove our way between all the objects, which in some places were stacked high, perhaps four times higher than us, and in others lay strewn about with nothing on top. We were looking for bags and cardboard boxes, and there was no shortage of them, also containing magazines, weeklies that the elderly read: Hjemmet and Allers and Norsk Ukeblad, weeklies for girls: Starlet and Det Nye and Romantikk, piles of newspapers, mostly Verdens Gang and Agderposten, but also Vårt Land and Aftenposten and Dagbladet; we found A-Magasinet and Kvinner og Klær, horsey magazines for girls, Donald Duck comics and a fat Fantomet album from the late sixties that I immediately put to one side, a Tempo album as well, some Kaptein Miki comics, and one Agent X9 paperback, which I was pretty pleased with, but it didn't alter the fact that what we were searching for, that is, magazines like Alle Menn, Lek, Coctail, and Aktuell Report, and perhaps even a few foreign magazines, because there were quite a few Danish ones in circulation, one called Weekend Sex, for example, and some Swedish and English ones, was nowhere to be found. We didn't find a single porn magazine! What was going on? Had someone beaten us to it? They had to be here!

After an hour's searching we gave up and flopped down in the heather to read the normal magazines we had found. Perhaps because I'd had my mind set on something quite different and had felt the expectation all day, I wasn't really happy about just sitting there. Something was missing, and I got up, paced between the trees, looked down at the stream, perhaps a wade in the water was the answer?

"Want to go for a wade?" I called.

"Sure. Just got to read this first," Geir said without looking up from his magazine.

I went over to the two bags of bottles we had found. Most of them were the long, brown ones with the yellow Arendals Bryggeri label, but there was also the odd dumpy, green Heineken bottle. I took one of them out. There was a bit of earth and grass stuck to the outside, and I wondered if it had been lying on the edge of a lawn for a while and had been picked up when the garden was being prepared for winter.

The lust was still there in my stomach.

I rotated the bottle in my hand. The dark-green glass lit up in the sun.

"Do you think it's possible to stick your willy in this?" I said.

Geir rested the magazine on his lap.

"Ye-eah," he said. "If the neck's not too narrow. Are you going to try?"

"Sure," I said. "Are you?"

He got up and came over. Took a bottle.

"Think anyone can see us here?" he said.

"No, are you crazy?" I said. "We're in the middle of the forest. But we could move over there, to be on the safe side."

We walked toward the trunk of a large pine tree. I undid my belt and dropped my trousers to my knees, took out my willy with one hand, and held the bottle in the other. I pressed my willy into the top, the glass neck was cold and hard against my soft, warm skin, and actually too narrow, but with a bit of humping and pumping and wriggling, it slipped inside. A tingle ran down my back as my willy throbbed and the bottle seemed to tighten around it, harder and harder.

"I can't get it in," Geir said. "It won't go."

"I've done it!" I said. "Look!"

I turned to him.

"But I can't budge it," I said. "There's no room. It's stuck!"

To show how stuck it was, I let go of the bottle. It hung between my legs.

"Ha ha ha," Geir laughed.

I was about to pull my willy out when I felt a sharp pain shoot up.

"Ow. Ow, ow, ow, shit!"

"What's the matter?" Geir said.

"Ow! Ow! Oh, FUCK!"

It was a stabbing pain, as if from a knife or a jagged piece of glass. I pulled as hard as I could and got my willy out of the bottle.

On the tip of it there was a black beetle.

"OH! FUCK! FUCK! FUCK!" I howled. I gripped the beetle or whatever it was, it was black with big claws, pulled it off, and hurled it as far as I could, while running back and forth waving my arms.

"What's the matter?" Geir said. "What's the matter? What's the matter, Karl Ove?"

"A beetle. It was biting my willy!"

At first he stared at me, slack-jawed. Then he burst into laughter. It was exactly his kind of humor. He rolled around in the heather laughing.

"Don't tell anyone!" I said, doing up my belt. "Have you got that?"

"Yeah-heh-heh-heh!" Geir said. "Ha ha ha ha!"

Three times I made him promise he wouldn't tell anyone as we walked uphill, each carrying a bag and with the sun beating down on our necks. I also said a short prayer to apologize for my swearing.

"Should we go down and get the deposit on the bottles at Fina now?" Geir said.

"Do they take beer bottles there?" I said.

"Oh, that's right," Geir said. "We'd better hide them then."

We walked back across the field, jumped over the stream, and there, on the other side, in a clump of trees below the chapel, we left the bags of bottles. Pulled up some ferns and tufts of grass and covered them as well as we were able, glanced around to make sure no one was nearby, then calmly moved away, knowing that if you ran you drew attention to yourself, up the road next to the chapel, which we then started to follow.

Outside the cellar door of the house where he lived stood Ketil, his bike turned upside down in front of him. He was revolving the rear wheel with a pedal in one hand while lubricating the chain with a small plastic bottle of oil he was holding in the other. His smooth, black hair hung down in front of his face.

"Hi," he said.

"Hi," we said.

"Where've you been?"

"To the dump."

"What were you doing there?"

"Searching for porn mags," Geir said. I sent him a glare. What was he doing? This was a secret!

"Did you find any?" Ketil said, smiling at us.

Geir shook his head.

"I've got a pile of them in my room," he said. "Would you like to borrow them?"

"Oh yes!" Geir said.

"Is that true?" I said.

He nodded.

"Do you want them now?"

"I've got to go home and eat," I said.

"Me, too," Geir said. "But we can take them with us and hide them in the forest."

Ketil shook his head.

"No chance. Then they'd be ruined. You'll have to take them home. But that's okay. I can bring them over this afternoon."

"That's great. But then we'll have to meet you outside. No ringing the bell. Agreed?"

"Oh?" he said, smiling with narrowed eyes. "Are you frightened I'll show the mags to your dad, or what?"

"No, but . . . he asks a lot of questions. And you haven't been there before."

"Fine," he said. "Be outside at five and I'll be there. Okay?"

"That's when the soccer's on," I said.

"Six then. And don't tell me you want to watch children's TV!"

"Okay. Six."

Mom was sitting in the kitchen reading a book with the radio on and rice boiling on the stove. The whole of one side of the pan was white with milk and in the area between the hotplates there was also milk and rice, almost dried up from the heat, so I could see it had boiled over.

"Hi," I said.

She put the book down.

"Hi," she said. "Where have you been?"

"Mm," I said. "Around and about. We found some bottles and we're going to get the money back on Monday."

"Nice," she said.

"Are you going to make pizza this evening?" I said.

She smiled.

"That's what I'd planned."

"Great!" I said.

"Have you started the book you got?"

I nodded.

"I started yesterday. It seems really good. I'm going to go to my room and read some now in fact."

"You do that," she said. "Food'll be ready in a quarter of an hour."

She always brought something when she came on Fridays, and this time it had been a book. A Wizard of Earthsea, written by someone called Ursula K. Le Guin, and already after the first few pages I knew that this was an absolutely fantastic book. Yet I didn't settle down with the book without some hesitation, because Mom was at home and I wanted to be with her as much as possible. On the other hand, she was here and almost all the qualities her presence brought to my life were in place, not least the fact that Dad never did anything awful when she was here, never had one of his furious outbursts, always controlled himself, even though I was lying on my bed and she was in the kitchen.

I watched the English Football League match with Yngve and Dad. He had bought toffees as usual, and both Yngve and I had been given a pools coupon with eight rows of twelve matches each. I got five correct results, which the others laughed at because that was less than half and I might just as well have rolled a dice. Dad said it was as hard to get five as it was ten. But whereas those who got ten right were sent money by Norsk Tipping, those who got five had to pay money to them, he said. Yngve got seven right and Dad got ten, but unfortunately this time there was no payout for ten.

By the time all the results were in it was two minutes to six. Outside, Ketil came whizzing down the hill on his bike with a bulging plastic bag strapped to the luggage rack. I jumped up and said I had to go.

"What are you going to do now?" Dad said. "Children's TV is starting."

"I'm not in the mood for it," I said. "And I'm meeting Geir."

"Meeting, eh?" Dad said. "Well, that's fine. Just make sure you're back home by eight."

"Are you going out?" Mom said from the doorway. "And here I was thinking you could help me make the pizza."

"I'd love to, but I've arranged to meet someone," I said.

"Our son has started making arrangements," Dad said. "Are you sure it's Geir? Not a little sweetheart?"

"Yes, I'm absolutely sure about that," I said.

"Be back home by eight then," Mom said.

Dad stood up.

"Soon we'll be all alone in the evenings, Sissel," he said, hauling his trousers up by the belt loops and running a hand through his hair. I was already on my way down the landing and didn't hear what she answered. My throat was thick with excitement, my whole body tingling. In the hallway, I put on my sneakers – if we were lucky the forest would be dry now – the blue sweater, and the blue quilted vest Mom had made for me, opened the door, and rushed out to meet Ketil, who was sitting on his bike with one foot on the pedal and one on the ground, and Geir, who was standing next to him. Both glanced toward me.

"Let's go to the boathouse," I said. "No one will see us there."

"Okay," Ketil said. "I'll cycle round. See you down there."

Geir and I ran down the slope and onto the path, jumped over the stream, and scurried down the hill, which seemed to vibrate beneath our feet, crossed the field, the gravel road, and only slowed down when we reached the grassy incline at the same time as Ketil hove into view at the top of the hill, beside the old, white house.

Ketil was two years older than us and kept himself very much to himself, at least that was how it appeared to us. The high cheekbones, the narrow eyes, and the gleaming, black hair made him look like an Indian and caused a stir among the girls. It wasn't long since that had started. From one day to the next Ketil became the one they talked about and looked at, suddenly you heard his name all over the place, and the strange thing about this was not the way that he suddenly existed now, having existed before in a kind of vale of shadows, but that there was a certain pride in the girls who talked about him and eyed him, as if they were the ones who became interesting by making such an unexpected selection, almost more interesting than he was. For he just carried on with his life, cycling round, one day here, one day there, invariably alone, and always friendly to us.

He kicked down the stand on his bike, an orange DBS racer with drop handlebars and the tape hanging off one end, lifted the spring flap on the luggage rack, took the bag, and strolled over to where we were lying in the grass, each with a sprig of grass in our mouths.

"It's porn time!" he said, grabbing the bag from the bottom and spilling the magazines over the grass.

The sun was low in the sky over the ridge behind us, and his shadow stretched a long way across the ground. From the islet in the bay came the sound of screeching gulls. Feeling weak all over, I took a magazine and rolled onto my stomach. Even though I looked at the pictures one at a time, and focused on one part, such as the breasts, which I only needed to catch a glimpse of to feel an electric shock of excitement shoot through me, or such as the legs and the wild thrill aroused by the sight of the slit between them, more or less open, more or less pink and glistening, often accompanied by a finger or two nearby, or near the mouth, which was often open, often contorted into a grimace, or such as the buttocks, sometimes so wonderfully round that I couldn't lie still, this wasn't about the parts in themselves, this was more like bathing in the totality, a kind of sea in which there was no beginning and no end, a sea in which, from the first moment, from the first picture, you always found yourself in the middle.

"Can you see a big mons anywhere, Geir?" I said.

He shook his head. "But there's one here with enormous tits. Do you want to see?"

I nodded, and he held up the magazine for me.

Ketil sat some meters from us, with his legs crossed and a magazine in his hands. But after only a few minutes he threw it down and got to his feet.

"I've looked at them so many times," he said. "I'll have to get some new ones."

"Where did you get them?" I said, gazing up at him and shielding my eyes from the sun.

"I bought them."

"BOUGHT THEM?" I said.

"Yes."

"But they're old, aren't they?"

"They're used, you chump. There's a hairdressing salon in town that also sells old magazines. They've got loads of porn mags."

"Are you allowed to buy them?"

"Obviously," he said.

I stared at him for a few seconds. Was he pulling my leg?

Didn't look like it.

I flicked through. There were photos of two girls on a tennis court. They wore short skirts, one light blue, the other white, white shirts, a sweat band over their wrists, white socks, and white sneakers. Each was holding a racket. Surely they weren't going to . . . ?

I flicked on.

One was lying on the grass and had opened her shirt so you could see her breasts. Her head was back. Was she wearing any panties?

Nope.

Soon they were both naked, on their knees by the net, with their bottoms in the air. It was fantastic. Fantastic. Fantastic.

"Look, Geir," I said. "Two playing tennis!"

He glanced at me and nodded, too absorbed in his own pictures to waste any time.

Ketil had walked down to the old, tumbledown pontoon, where he stood skimming stones he must have found on the beach nearby. The water was like a mirror, and every time a stone hit the water, small circular ripples spread outward.

I had flicked through three or four magazines when he reappeared in front of us. I looked up at him.

"It feels good to lie on your stomach and read them," I said.

"Ha ha ha! So you like rubbing yourself?" he said.

"Yes," I said.

"I can imagine," he said. "But I've got to be off now. Keep the mags if you like. I'm sick of them."

"Can we have them?" Geir said.

"Be my guest."

He kicked the bike stand, raised a hand to say goodbye, and set off up the hill with one hand in the middle of the handlebars. It looked as if he were leading an animal.

It was so obvious to us both that Geir would have to hide the magazines in his room that we didn't even talk about it when we parted outside my house an hour later.

Mom's pizzas had thick bases that rose around the edges, making the filling of minced meat, tomato, onions, mushrooms, peppers, and cheese look like a plain surrounded by long ranges of mountains on all sides. We were sitting at the living-room table, as always on Saturday evenings. We had never eaten in front of the television; that belonged to the realm of the unimaginable. Dad cut a piece for me and put it on my plate, I poured myself a glass of Coke from the liter bottle where the words "Coca-Cola" were printed in white on the greenish glass, not on a red label, which you also saw. Pepsi-Cola wasn't sold in Sørland, I had drunk it only at the Norway Cup, and apart from the Metro and the breakfast where we could help ourselves to as many bowls of cornflakes as we wanted, that had been one of the tournament's biggest attractions.

When the pizza was finished, Dad asked if we felt like playing a new game.

We did.

Mom cleared the table; Dad fetched a pad of paper and four pens from his study.

"Would you like to join in, Sissel?" he shouted to Mom, who had started washing up.

"Love to," Mom said, and joined us. She had soap lather on one arm and her temple. "What are we going to play? Yahtzee?"

"No," Dad said. "We each have a piece of paper and we write down six headings: country, town, river, sea, lake, and mountain. One column for each. Then we choose a letter and the idea of the game is to jot down as many names as we can that begin with the respective letter in three minutes."

We hadn't played this one before. But it seemed like fun.

"Is there a prize?" Yngve said.

Dad smiled.

"Only the honor. Whoever wins becomes the family champion."

"You start," Mom said. "I'll put some tea on for us."

"We can do a trial run," Dad said. "Then we can actually play when you're back."

He looked at us.

"M," he said. "So, the letter M. Are you with me?"

"Yes," Yngve said, and was already writing, with one arm shielding his work.

"Yes," I said.

Mont Blanc, I wrote under mountain. Mandal, Morristown, Mjøndalen, Molde, Malmö, Metropolis, and Munich under town. I couldn't think of any seas, or rivers. Next was countries. Were there any countries beginning with an M? I went through all the countries I could think of. But no. Moelven. Was that a river? Mo in Rana, that was a town anyway. Midwest? Oh, right, Mississippi!

"Time's up," Dad said.

A quick glance at their pieces of paper was enough to confirm that they had beaten me.

"You read yours out, Karl Ove," Dad said.

When I got to Morristown both Dad and Yngve were laughing.

"Don't laugh at me!" I said.

"Morristown only exists in The Phantom," Yngve said. "Did you think it really existed?"

"Sure. And why not? Sala works in the UN building in New York, and that exists, doesn't it? Why shouldn't Morristown?"

"Good answer, Karl Ove," Dad said. "You get half a point for that."

I made a face at Yngve, who smirked back.

"Tea's ready," Mom said. We went into the kitchen and took a cup. I added milk and sugar.

"Okay, let's play properly now," Dad said. "We'll do three letters. That's probably as much as we can manage before bedtime."

Mom knew almost as few names as I did, it turned out. Or else she wasn't concentrating as much as Yngve or Dad. However, it was good for me; it was the two of us against them.

After Dad had counted the points from the first round, Mom said she had changed her name.

"I've gone back to my old maiden name. So now I'm Hatløy and not Knausgaard anymore."

My blood ran cold.

"You're not called Knausgaard anymore?" I said, staring at her with my mouth open. "But you're our mother!"

She smiled.

"Yes, of course I am! I always will be!"

"But why? Why aren't you going to have the same name as us?"

"I was born Sissel Hatløy, as you know. That's my name. Knausgaard is Dad's name. And your names!"

"Are you getting divorced?"

Mom and Dad smiled.

"No, we're not getting divorced," Mom said. "We're just going to have different names."

"But a rather stupid consequence of this," Dad said, "is that we can't meet Grandma and Grandad for a while. My parents don't like your mother changing her name, so they don't want to see us anymore."

I gaped at him.

"What about at Christmas?" I said.

Dad shook his head.

I started crying.

"This is nothing to cry about, Karl Ove," Dad said. "It'll pass. They're just angry now. And then it'll pass."

I scraped my chair back, got up, and ran to my room. After closing my door I heard someone follow. I lay down on the bed and bored my head into the pillow while sobbing loudly with tears flowing as they had never flowed before.

"But, Karl Ove," Dad said behind me. He sat on the edge of the bed. "Don't get so upset. Is it that much fun with Grandma and Grandad?"

"Yes!" I shouted into the pillow. My whole body was contorted in convulsive sobs.

"But if they don't want to see your own mother. It's not much fun seeing them then, is it? Surely you understand, don't you? They don't want to see us."

"Why should she change her name?" I shouted.

"It's her real name," Dad said. "It's what she wants. And neither you nor I nor Grandma nor Grandad can deny her that right. Can we?"

He placed his hand on my shoulder for a fleeting moment. Then he stood up and left the room.

When the tears had dried up I picked up the book Mom had bought me and carried on reading. At the back of my mind I was aware that Yngve had gone to bed, that the sliding door was closed, that they were playing music in the living room, but without a scrap of it sticking. From the first sentence I plunged headlong into the story and fell deeper and deeper. The main character was Ged, a boy who lived on an island and had special gifts, and when this was discovered he was sent to a school for wizards. There it came out that his gifts were extra-special, and once when he had to perform for the others, in an act of excessive arrogance, he opened the door to the other world, the underworld, the kingdom of death, and a shadow stole out. Ged was dying, he was weak, with failing powers, for many years afterward, marked for life, and the shadow pursued him. He fled from it, hid in some obscure place somewhere in the world, abandoned all his ambitions knowing that what he had done, the simple wizardry tricks, was just empty gestures and pretense, that there was another, a more profound kind of magic woven into all existence, and it was to maintain the balance here that was a wizard's real responsibility. All objects and all creatures had names corresponding to their essence, and only by knowing the objects' and creatures' real names could they be controlled. Ged could do that, but he didn't reveal that he could, because every spell, every act of wizardry, affected the balance, something else could happen somewhere else, which could not be foreseen. The villagers where he had settled thought therefore that he was a poor wizard; after all he wouldn't perform even the simplest tricks with which every village wizard plied his trade. He was young, serious, there was a large scar across his face, he was sensitive to cold, but when the chips were down, when he really had to use his gifts, he did. Once there was a child dying. He followed it into the kingdom of death and brought it back, even though he shouldn't have, even though it was dangerous, for if there was one balance that should not be upset, it was that between life and death. But he did it and almost died in the process. The villagers saw for the first time who he was. And the shadow that he had released from beyond, who all this time had been flitting around the world after him, saw him, because whenever he used his powers, it noticed and came closer. He had to leave. And he did, in a boat on the sea between islands to the farthest shore. The shadow came closer and closer. After several confrontations, with Ged near to death, came the final showdown. All the while he had been trying to find the name of the shadow. He had scoured reference works about creatures from the oldest times, asked other, more intelligent wizards, but in vain, the creature was unknown, nameless. Then he knew. On the sea, alone in a boat, with the shadow getting closer and closer, he knew. The shadow was called Ged. The shadow had his name. The shadow was himself.

When I turned off the light, after reading the last page, it was nearly twelve o'clock and my eyes were full of tears.

He was the shadow!

At least once, often twice a week during that autumn and winter I was on my own in the house. Dad was at meetings, Yngve was at rehearsals with the school band or training with the volleyball or soccer teams, or at his friends' houses. I liked being at home on my own, it was a wonderful feeling not to have someone telling me what to do, yet I didn't like it that much either because the nights were drawing in and the reflection from the windows, of my figure wandering around, was extremely unpleasant to see, it smacked of death and the dead.

I knew this was not how it was, but what good did this knowledge do?

It was especially spooky when I was engrossed in what I was reading because it was as if I wasn't attached anywhere when I lifted my head from my page and got up. All alone, that was the feeling I had, I was absolutely alone, isolated by the darkness that rose like a wall outside.

Oh, I could always run the bath if I had enough time before Dad returned, he didn't like me having a bath at all hours, once a week he felt was enough and he kept a beady eye on this, like everything else I did. But if I took a liberty now and ran the bath, got in, switched on my cassette recorder, and let the hot water wash over my body, I could see myself from the outside, my mouth agape, as it were, as though my head were a skull. I sang, the voice rebounded, I submerged my head and was terrified: I couldn't see anything! Someone could sneak up on me! Was anyone there? The two, three, four seconds I had been underwater represented a hole in time, and someone might have snuck in through that hole. Perhaps not into the bathroom, no, there was no one there, but they could have snuck into the house.

The best I could do in this situation was to switch off the kitchen light, or my bedroom light, and look out because outside, when there was no reflection from the windows, there were the other houses, there were the other families, and sometimes the other children, too. Nothing made you feel more secure than that.

On one such evening I was kneeling on a kitchen stool in the darkness and staring out, it was snowing and a gale was blowing. The wind was howling across the landscape, rushing down the chimney, and the roof gutters were rattling. It was pitch black outside, under the yellow glow from the streetlamps, there wasn't a soul, only gusting snow.

A car drove up. It turned into Nordåsen Ringvei, coming toward our house. Was it coming here?

It was. It came into our drive and parked.

Who could it be?

I ran out of the kitchen, down the stairs, and onto the porch.

There I stopped.

Surely no one was coming to visit us?

Who could it be?

I was frightened.

Went to the door and pressed my nose against the wavy glass. I didn't need to open the door; I could stand there and see if I recognized the late-night visitor.

The car door opened and a figure fell out!

The figure was moving on all fours!

Oh no! Oh no!

Swaying from side to side like a bear, it came toward me. It stopped by the bell and rose onto two legs!

I backed away.

What sort of creature was this?

Ding dong, the bell went.

The figure dropped to all fours again.

The abominable snowman? Lightfoot?

But here? In Tybakken?

The figure raised itself again, rang the bell, and fell back onto all fours.

My heart was pounding.

But then it hit me.

Oh, of course.

It was the local councilman, the one who was paralyzed.

It had to be.

The abominable snowman didn't drive a car.

I opened the door as the figure was starting to crawl away. It turned.

It was him.

"Hello," he said. "Is your father at home?"

I shook my head.

"No," I said. "He's at a meeting."

The man, who had a beard and glasses and a bit of saliva at the corners of his mouth, and who often drove around with young people in his custom-designed car, sighed.

"Say hello and tell him I was here," he said.

"Okay," I said.

He dragged himself to the car using his arms, opened the door, and lifted himself up into the seat. I watched him through widened eyes. In the car, his slow, helpless movements were transformed, he revved the engine and reversed up the incline at speed, shot down the road, and was gone.

I closed the door and went to my room. No sooner was I lying on the bed than the door downstairs opened.

From the sounds I worked out that it was Yngve.

"Are you here?" he shouted up the stairs. I got up and went out.

"I'm so hungry," he said. "Want to have supper now?"

"It's only a little after eight," I said.

"The earlier, the better," he said. "And I can make some tea for us. I'm absolutely ravenous."

"Call me when it's ready," I said.

A quarter of an hour later we were at the table eating bread, each with a big mug of tea in front of us.

"Was there a car here this evening?" Yngve said.

I nodded. "The paralyzed guy on the council."

"What did he want?"

"How should I know?"

Yngve looked at me.

"Someone was talking about you today," he said.

My blood ran cold.

"Oh?" I said.

"Yes, Ellen."

"What did she say?"

"She said you had a funny walk."

"She didn't!"

"Yes, she did. But it's true, isn't it. You do have a funny walk. Haven't you ever noticed?"

"I do NOT!" I shouted.

"Oh yes, you do," Yngve said. "Little shrimp can't even walk normally."

He got up and walked across the kitchen floor, falling forward with every step. I watched him with tears in my eyes.

"There's nothing wrong with my walk," I said.

"Ellen said it, not me," he said, sitting down. "They talk about you, you know. You're a little weird."

"I AM NOT!" I shouted, throwing my bread at him as hard as I could. He moved his head to one side, and it hit the stove with a soft splat.

"Is Karlikins upset now?" he said.

I stood up with my mug in my hand. When Yngve saw that he got up, too. I hurled the hot tea at him. It hit him in the stomach.

"You're so sweet when you're angry, Karl Ove," he said. "Poor little shrimp. Want me to teach you how to walk? I'm good at walking, you know."

My eyes were filled with tears, but that wasn't why I couldn't see anything, it was because I was seething with anger inside and the red mist had descended.

I flew at him and punched him with all my strength in the stomach. He grabbed my arms and twisted me round, I tried to wriggle loose, he held me tight, I kicked out, he pulled me harder to him, I tried to bite him on the hand, and he pushed me away.

"Now, now," he said.

I flew at him again, intent only on punching him in the face, smashing his nose, and if there had been a knife there I wouldn't have hesitated to plunge it into his stomach, but he knew all that, it had happened many times before, so he did what he always did, held me tight and squeezed while calling me a little shrimp and saying I was so sweet when I was angry until I tried to bite him and he couldn't keep my head at a distance and he pushed me away. This time I didn't go for him again; instead I ran out of the kitchen. On the living-room table there was a fruit bowl from which I took an orange and I flung it at the floor with all my might. It split open and a thin jet of orange juice spurted up and sprayed the wallpaper.

Yngve stood in the doorway watching.

"What have you done?" he said.

I looked at him. Then I saw the line of juice on the wallpaper.

"You'd better wash it off, you idiot," I said.

"It won't wash off," he said. "The stain will just get bigger. Dad will be livid when he sees that. What's wrong with you?"

"He might not see it," I said.

Yngve just gawped at me.

"Well, we can hope," he said, bending down and taking the orange into the kitchen. From the rustling noises that followed I gathered he was putting it at the very bottom of the garbage can. He came back with a cloth and wiped the floor.

I was trembling so much I could barely stand upright.

The juice ran in a thin line and I couldn't imagine how Dad could avoid seeing it when he came home.

Yngve washed the kettle and the two cups. Threw away the bread, picked up the crumbs. I sat in the chair by the dining table with my head in my hands.

Yngve stopped near me.

"Sorry," he said. "I didn't mean to make you cry."

"Yes, you did."

"It's just that you get so angry," he said. "Surely you can see that it's tempting? I have said sorry."

"It's not that," I said.

"What is it then?"

"My funny walk."

"Come on," he said. "Everyone walks in a different way. The main thing is to move forward. I was only kidding, really. I wanted to make you angry. And I succeeded. The way you walk is no stranger than anyone else's."

"Sure?"

"Sure as eggs are eggs."

When Dad came home I was in bed. In the darkness I lay listening to his footsteps. They didn't stop on the landing as I had expected but continued into the kitchen. He fiddled around in there for a while before coming out again. And he didn't stop on the landing this time, either.

He hadn't seen anything.

We were saved.

The next evening I went to the swimming class with Geir. We caught the bus from Holtet to the bus station in Arendal and walked up the hills to Stintahallen, each carrying a bag over our shoulders. In my bag I had some dark-blue Arena swim trunks, a white Speedo cap with the Norwegian flag on the side, a pair of Speedo goggles, a bar of soap, and a towel. We had been members of Arendal Swim Club since the previous winter. We could barely swim then, just getting from one end of the pool to the other was an enormous effort, bordering on the impossible, but since it was actually expected of us, as an absolute minimum in a swim club, and the coach, a man with tattoos on his arms who wore clogs, followed us along the side of the pool shouting, it took us a surprisingly short time to get by without any problems. We weren't good, at least not if you compared us to the older boys who sometimes walked around inside, with their slim, long-limbed yet muscular bodies, and who powered through the water with open mouths and bug-eye goggles. In comparison to them we were more like tadpoles, I sometimes mused, splashing and straining and just as likely to swim sideways as forward. But even though we gradually improved and could soon swim a thousand meters in the course of a training session it wasn't thanks to my progress that I continued, I knew I would never be a competitive swimmer because when the competitions came and I gave everything it was never enough, I couldn't even overtake Geir – no, it was all the rest I liked, starting the moment we clambered onto the bus and continuing through the evening darkness on the road to Arendal, the deserted town we passed through, the shops we always stopped outside on our way to the class, and inside the hall, this large public building with its strange mixture of inside and outside, which we were funnelled through from standing at the entrance wrapped up in winter clothes to standing almost naked, fifteen minutes later, wearing only a strip of cloth at the edge of the pool, after having passed through the minor ritual of undressing, showering, and dressing, and then throwing ourselves into the wonderfully transparent, cold water that smelled of chlorine. That was what I liked. The sounds echoing around the pool, the night outside the windows, the coral-jewel partition between lanes, the diving boards, the thirty-minute-long hot showers we had afterward. Then the process was reversed and we went from being pale, fragile, semi-naked boys with big heads to once again standing fully clothed in the winter outside, with wet hair under our hats and the smell of chlorine on our skin, our limbs deliciously tired.

I also liked the feeling of being enclosed inside myself when I put on my swimming cap and goggles, not least during competitions, when I had a whole lane of my own waiting for me beneath the starting blocks, but often the thoughts waiting there, in swimming's astronaut-like loneliness, became chaotic and sometimes also panicked. There could be water in the goggles, it slopped against my eyes, making them sting and preventing me from seeing, which of course upset the purity of my thoughts. I could swallow water and I could make a mess of the turn, which left me so breathless that I swallowed more water. And I could see that the swimmers in the adjacent lanes were already way ahead, which I was told by the voice inside me intent on winning, and I started a discussion with it. But even though this inner dialogue, which carried on calmly while I was swimming and fighting for all I was worth, and was therefore lent an almost panic-stricken aura, a bit like a military HQ deep in an underground bunker with officers speaking in controlled tones while the battles raged overhead, had the effect of me increasing the tempo, and for a few seconds I really gave it my all, it didn't help in the slightest, Geir was ahead of me and would remain so, and I couldn't understand that, I was obviously better than him, I knew so much more than him, also about the will to win. Nevertheless, he was the one to touch the pool wall then, and I touched it . . . . then.

When the coach blew his whistle and the session was over for another week, it was not without some relief that I put my hands on the edge of the pool and heaved myself up, to run with Geir across the tiled floor into the shower, where the pace seemed to be slower, at least our pace was released as we took off our caps and trunks and entered the showers, to feel with closed eyes the heat spreading through our bodies, no longer needing to say or do anything, not even having to bother to laugh as one of the men on his way into the pool, which was now open for all comers, began to sing. There was something dreamlike about the atmosphere inside, the white bodies that appeared in the doorway and stood under the showers with slow, introspective movements, the sound of water beating against the tiles and mingling with the muffled noise from outside, the steam saturating the air, the hollow resonance of voices whenever anyone spoke.

Normally we stood around long after those we had trained with had gone. Geir with his face to the wall, me with my face to the room, to hide my backside. I snatched occasional glances at him when he wasn't paying attention. He had thinner arms than me, yet he was stronger. I was a little taller than him, yet he was faster. That wasn't why he swam faster than me, though. It was because he wanted it more. It was different with his drawings, they were just something he could do, it was in him, it had always been there. Apart from people, he could reproduce everything in precise detail. Houses, cars, boats, trees, tanks, planes, rockets. It was a mystery how he could do it. He never copied, as I did, his mother never let him use either a ruler or an eraser. Now and then his Norwegian could throw up oddities, such as fantisere and firkanti instead of fantasere and firkantet, and en appelsin instead of et appelsin, and even though I corrected him every time, he continued to say them as though these terms were a feature of him that was as permanent as the color of his eyes or the set of his teeth.

Then he noticed my glance and his eyes met mine. With a smile on his lips he stretched up and pressed the palm of his hand against the shower head, stopping the jet, and the water appeared to bulge beneath it. He laughed and turned to me. I held my hands out. My fingertips were red and swollen from the water.

"They look like raisins," I said.

He examined his.

"Mine, too," he said. "Imagine if your whole body had gone like that when we were swimming!"

"My ball bag always goes all wrinkly," I said.

We bent forward and peered down. I ran a finger slowly over the hard yet sensitive folds of skin and a tingle went through me.

"Stroking it feels nice," I said.

Geir looked around. Then he turned off the shower, went to the row of hooks, and began to dry himself. I grabbed a bar of soap and squeezed hard. It skidded along the floor of the room, hit the wall in the corner, and finished up over one of the grids. I turned off the shower and was about to follow Geir when I suddenly couldn't bear the thought of the soap lying there in the middle of the floor. I picked it up and threw it in the bin by the wall. I pressed my face against the dry frotté material of the towel.

"Imagine what it will be like when we've got pubes," Geir said, walking with his legs wide apart.

I laughed.

"Imagine what it will be like if they're really long!" I said.

"Right down to your knees!"

"Then we'd have to comb them!"

"Or make a ponytail!"

"Or go to the hairdresser's! I'd just like a trim round my dick, please!"

"Oh, yes. And how would you like it, sir?"

"Crew cut, please!"

At that moment the door opened and we stopped laughing. A fat, elderly man with sad eyes came in and the vacuum the laughter had left in us was soon filled with giggles as he first nodded to us and then turned away in embarrassment to remove his trunks. As we grabbed our swimming things and were leaving the shower room, Geir said loudly:

"I bet he's got a whopper!"

"Or a teeny-weeny one!" I said, just as loudly, and then we slammed the door behind us and ran into the changing room.

We sat laughing, wondering whether he had heard us or not, until the normally quiet atmosphere also impacted on us and we sluggishly began to pack our gear and get dressed. The only sounds you could hear inside were feet on linoleum, rustling noises as legs were slipped into trousers, arms into jackets, the metallic clink as lockers were opened or closed, someone sighing to himself, perhaps drained by the heat in the sauna.

I took my bag from the locker and put my swimming things inside. First, the goggles, which I held in my hand and examined for a second, because they were new and filled me with such pleasure that they were mine. Next, trunks, cap, and towel and, last of all, the soap case. With its gently rounded lines, greenish color, and faint aroma of perfume, the case belonged to another world from the rest of my swimming equipment, intimately connected with Mom and the items in her wardrobe: earrings, rings, flasks, buckles, brooches, scarves, and veils. She herself was unaware there was such a world, she had to be, otherwise she would never have bought me a woman's bathing cap that time. Because a woman's cap belongs to that world. And if there was one thing everyone knew it was that one world should never be associated with the other.

Beside me Geir was almost ready. I stood up, pulled on my underpants, took my long johns, and put one leg in, followed by the other. Then I pulled them up tight to my waist before turning and starting to search through my clothes for my socks. I found only one and searched through the pile again.

It wasn't there.

I looked in the locker.

Nothing, empty.

Oh no!

No, no, no.

I frantically went through my clothes again, shook item after item in the air, hoping desperately to see it drop out onto the floor in front of me.

But it wasn't there.

"What's up?" Geir said. He was sitting, fully clothed, on the opposite bench watching me.

"I can't find my other sock," I said. "Can you see it?"

He leaned forward and looked under the bench.

"It's not there," he said.

Oh no!

"But it's got to be somewhere," I said. "Can you help me look? Please!"

I could hear my voice quivering. But Geir didn't let on that he'd noticed, if indeed he had heard anything at all. He leaned over and looked under all the benches while I walked toward the showers in case it had got caught up in my towel and dropped out. It wasn't there, either. Perhaps, inadvertently, I had packed it in my bag with the other swimming things?

I hurried back and emptied the contents of my bag on the floor.

But no. No sock.

"It wasn't anywhere there?" I said.

"No," Geir said. "But we have to get going, Karl Ove. The bus is leaving soon."

"I have to find the sock first."

"Well, it's not here. We've looked everywhere. Can't you just go without it?"

I didn't answer. Once again I shook all the clothes, crouched down, and scanned the floor under the benches; once again I went into the shower room.

"We've got to go now," Geir said. He held his watch in front of me. "They'll be angry if I miss the bus."

"Can you search while I get dressed?" I said.

He nodded and halfheartedly wandered around examining the floor. I put on my T-shirt and sweater.

On the top shelf perhaps?

I stood on the bench and peered along.

Nothing.

I put on my trousers and quilted vest, zipped up my jacket, and sat down to tie my laces.

"We've got to go now," Geir said.

"I'm getting there," I said. "You wait outside."

After he had left I hurried back into the shower room. I looked in the trash can, ran my hand along the windowsills, and even opened the door to the pool.

But no.

Geir was standing by the hill when I went out. He started running down before I had even caught up with him.

"Wait for meee!" I cried. But he showed no signs of stopping, he didn't even turn, and I sprinted off after him. Down into the darkness, past the gray trees, into the light on the road below. For every step I took the bare foot rubbed against the coarse leather of my boot. I've lost my sock, a voice inside me said. I've lost my sock. I've lost my sock. A ticking started in my head. It happened now and again when I was running, my head ticked, somewhere inside my left temple, tick tick, it went, but although it was alarming, sounding as if something had come loose or perhaps it was rubbing against something else, I couldn't tell anyone, they would just say I had a screw loose and laugh.

Tick, tick, tick.

Tick, tick, tick.

I ran behind Geir all the way down to the candy shop where we went; the bag of candy we came out with was always the high point of these trips. Geir was waiting outside, impatiently shifting from one foot to the other. I stopped in front of him. As a result of the snowplows' work we were standing half a meter higher than usual, and the new angle changed our view of the candy shop. It had a cellar-like feel to it, and this feel transformed everything, at a glance I saw the shelves were only "shelves," that the goods were "goods," displayed in a very ordinary room in a house, in short that the shop was a "shop," although I didn't articulate this to myself, it was just an idea that struck me and disappeared as quickly as it had come.

Geir opened the door and went in.

I followed.

"Are we very short of time?" I said.

"Yes," he said. "It goes in eleven minutes."

In the back room the assistant put the newspaper down, came into the shop, and stood behind the counter with a bored, even slightly disdainful expression on her face. She was old and repulsive; there were three long, gray hairs growing out of a mole on her chin.

The whole of one wall was covered with pipes and pipe cleaners, cigarette rolling machines and papers, tobacco pouches and cigarette packets, cigar boxes and snuff tins of various shapes and colors, all with different writing and small, stylized images of dogs, foxes, horses, sailing ships, racing cars, black men smiling, sailors smoking, and women in casual poses. The candy shelf, which we were both looking at now, covered the whole of the second wall. Unlike the tobacco products, the candy had no packaging; chocolates, hard candies, and gumdrops were in transparent plastic jars and represented themselves, with no pictures between them and us: what you saw was what you got. The black ones tasted of salt or licorice, the yellow ones of lemon, the orange ones of orange, the red ones of strawberry, the brown ones of chocolate. The small, square pieces of chocolate with the hard surfaces, called Rekrutts, were filled with hard caramel, just as the promised shape; the heart-shaped chocolates, for their part, were filled with a soft, jelly-like mass tasting of apricot, also as expected. The color codes applied to the candies and the gumdrops, with a few exceptions, which on these evenings we tried to narrow down. Some black candies could taste dark green while some dark-green ones tasted green in a throat pastille or eucalyptus kind of way – in other words lighter – and not a sweet-type green, which you would imagine from the color. And then there were the black candies that actually tasted like the King of Denmark aniseed candies, an orangey brown. The strange thing was that it was never the other way around, there were no orangey-brown King of Denmark candies that tasted black, nor had we ever come across any eucalyptus-green candies that tasted like sweet green or black ones.

“What would you like?” the assistant said.

Geir had put the money he would spend on the glass counter and leaned forward to see the range of candies better, the signs of time pressure evident on his face.

“Errr . . .” he said.

“Hurry up!” I said.

Then it all came out in a rush.

“Three of those, three of those, and three of those, and four of those and one of those and one of those,” he said, pointing to the various jars.

“Three of . . . ?” the assistant said, opening an empty paper bag and turning to the stand.

“The green ones. Oh, make that four. And then three of the red-and-white ones. You know, polka d . . . and then five babies’ dummies . . .

When we emerged from the shop, each with a small bag in hand, there were just four minutes to go before the bus left. But that was enough time, we told each other, running down the stairs. The steps, covered with hard-trodden snow and ice, were slippery, so we had to hold on to the banisters, which was at odds with the speed we were after. Beneath us lay the town, the white streets appearing almost yellow in the reflection from the lamps, the bus station, where the buses skidded in and out like sleds in the snow, and the tall church with the red tiles and green spire. The black sky arched above everything, strewn with twinkling stars. When there were only ten to fifteen steps left Geir let go of the banister and set off at a sprint. After a couple of strides he lost balance and his only chance to stay upright was to run as fast as he could. He swept down the hill at a blistering pace. Then he changed tactics and decided to slide instead, but his upper body had more momentum, he was pitched forward and plunged headlong into the drift beside the road. It had all happened so fast that I didn’t start laughing until he was lying in the snow.

"Ha ha ha!"

He didn't move.

Was he seriously hurt?

I walked as briskly as I could over the last stretch and stopped beside him. At first he drew breath in short, sob-like bursts. Then came a long, hollow groan.

"Shit," he whispered, holding his chest. "Shit. Shit. Shit."

"I wish you wouldn't swear," I said.

He sent me a brief, withering glare.

"Did you hurt yourself?" I said.

He groaned again.

"Did it knock the breath out of you?"

He nodded and sat up and started breathing normally again. He had tears in his eyes.

"We've missed the bus now anyway," I said.

"It knocked the breath out of me," he said. "I'm not crying."

He held his side as he struggled to his feet with a grimace.

"Can you walk?" I asked.

"Yep," he said.

From the entrance of the Arena Shopping Center we saw our bus depart, turn onto the road, and disappear around the street corner. The next bus would be in half an hour.

We sat down inside the bus station, on a bench beside a photo machine, and ate our candy. There weren't many people around. Two youths buying hamburgers and fries while their car idled outside, a drunk sitting on the floor with his head down, asleep, and a friend of the girl working in the kiosk.

Geir put one of the red-and-white candies in his mouth.

"What color does it taste like?" I said.

He looked at me with raised eyebrows.

"Red and white, of course!" he said. "It was a red-and-white candy."

"It doesn't necessarily follow," I said. "Suppose I ate it and it tasted green."

"What are you talking about now?" he said.

"Suppose it tasted of jam, for example," I said.

"Jam?"

"Don't you understand anything?" I said. "We can't know if a piece of candy tastes the same as the color!"

But he didn't understand. I wasn't absolutely sure I even understood myself. But Dag Lothar and I had once put a piece of candy shaped like a black bolt in our mouths, exchanged glances, and said, both at the same time, it tastes green! And later that autumn we'd had visitors, Grandma, Grandad, Gunnar, Dad's uncle Alf, and his wife, Sølvi, had been staying at our house, we ate shrimp, crab, and a lobster, which Dad had caught in the net only a few days before, and while we were eating Sølvi looked at Dad and said:

"Imagine you catching this lobster yourself. It tasted delicious."

"It really was delicious," Grandma said.

"Nothing tastes as good as lobster," Dad said. "But we can't know if it tastes the same for all of us."

Sølvi stared at him.

"What do you mean by that?"

"I know how it tastes to me," Dad said. "But I have no idea how it tastes to you."

"It tastes of lobster, of course!" Sølvi said.

Everyone laughed.

I didn't understand what they were laughing about. What they said was right. But I laughed, too.

"But how can you know that lobster tastes the same to me as it does to you?" Dad asked. "For all you know, it could taste like jam to me."

Sølvi was about to say something, but held back, looking down at the lobster, then up at Dad. She shook her head.

"I don't understand," she said. "The lobster's there. And it tastes of lobster. Not jam!"

The others laughed again. I knew Dad was right, but I didn't know exactly why. For a long time I sat musing. It was as if I was constantly on the point of understanding, but then as I was beginning to comprehend, it slipped from my grasp. The thought was too big for me.

But it had been even bigger for Geir, I remembered, and looked up as the door opened. It was Stig. His face lit up when he saw us and he came over.

"Hi," he said.

"Hi," Geir said.

"Hi," I said.

"Missed the bus?" he said, sitting down beside us. Geir nodded.

"Want one?" he said, holding out the bag to him. Stig smiled and chose a baby's dummy. So I had to offer him one afterward, too. Why on earth had Geir done that? We didn't exactly have a lot of candy.

Stig was in the class above ours and did gymnastics training in Arendal three times a week. He competed at the national level, but there wasn't a touch of arrogance about him, as there was with Snorre, who swam for the national squad and wanted nothing to do with us. Stig was nice, one of the nicest boys I knew, in fact. When the bus came he sat in the seat in front of Geir and me. By the end of Langbrygga the conversation had petered out, he turned round and sat like that for the rest of the journey. Geir and I were quiet, too, and the thought of the missing sock returned with renewed vigor.

Oh no, oh no.

What was going to happen?

What was going to happen?

Oh no oh no oh no.

No, no, no!

Perhaps he had noticed that we were late. Perhaps he would be standing there waiting. On the other hand, he might not be, he might be busy with something else, in which case I was safe; if I could get from the hall to the boiler room unnoticed everything would be fine because I had my other socks there and I could change into them.

The bus drove onto Tromøya Bridge and was buffeted by the wind. The windows vibrated. Geir, who always wanted to be the first to pull the bell cord, reached up and rang, even though we were the only passengers to get off here. The bus stop was right at the bottom of the hill, and I always felt guilty when I alighted here because the bus would have to set off again and wouldn't be able to pick up speed until it had passed the brow of the hill a few hundred meters farther on. Sometimes this feeling was so strong in me that I didn't get off until the next stop, up by B-Max, especially when I was on my own. Even now, with thoughts of the sock burning in my consciousness, I felt a little pang as Geir pulled the cord and the bus braked with a sigh of irritation to drop us off.

We stood by the drifts of snow and waited until the bus had pulled out again. Stig raised his hand to say goodbye. Then we crossed the road and walked up the path to the estate.

Usually I would kick my boots against the doorstep a couple of times to shake the snow off and then brush my trousers with the broom leaning against the wall for that very purpose, but this time I skipped the kicks, fearing he might hear, just brushed my trousers and cautiously opened the door, sidled in, and closed it behind me.

But that was enough. From inside, I heard his study door open, and then the door to the porch.

He stood in front of me.

"You're late," he said.

"Yes, I'm sorry," I said. "But Geir fell and hurt himself on the road, so we missed the bus."

I started undoing the boot with a sock in it.

He didn't show any sign of wanting to leave.

I pulled the boot off and placed it by the wall.

Looked up at him.

"What is it?" he said.

"Nothing," I said.

My heart was pounding in my ears. Getting up and walking with one boot on across the floor was obviously not an option. Standing still and waiting for him to leave was not an option, either, because he wasn't going anywhere.

Slowly I began to untie my laces. While doing so I had a brainwave. I unwound my scarf, placed it beside my boot, and, after undoing the laces, I pulled it off, took the scarf, and casually tried to cover my naked foot.

Then, with the scarf half-covering my foot, I stood up.

"Where's your sock?" Dad said.

I looked down at my foot. Glanced at him.

"I couldn't find it," I said, my eyes downcast again.

"Have you lost it?" he said.

"Yes," I said.

The next instant he was up close to me, grabbing my arms in an iron grip and pinning me to the wall.

"Have you LOST your sock?"

"Yes!" I shouted.

He shook me. Then let me go.

"How old are you now? And how much money do you think we've got? Do you think we can afford to lose items of clothing?"

"No," I said to the floor, my eyes full of tears. He held my ear and twisted it.

"You little brat!" he said. "Keep an eye on your things!"

"Okay," I said.

"You can't go to the swimming pool anymore. Is that understood?"

"Eh?"

"YOU CAN'T GO TO THE SWIMMING POOL ANYMORE!" he said.

"But . . ." I sobbed.

"NO IFS OR BUTS!"

He let go of my ear and marched to the door. Turned to me.

"You're not old enough. You've shown that tonight. You can't go there again. This was the last time. Have you got that?"

"Yes," I said.

"Good. Go to your room. There'll be no supper for you. You can go straight to bed."

The following week I didn't go swimming, but I missed it so much that the next week I acted as if nothing had happened, packed my things, and caught the bus with Geir and Dag Lothar. My fears trickled through at various points, but something inside me said I would be fine, and I was, on my return everything was as normal and so it stayed, he never said another word about my not being able to continue the class.

At the start of December, three days before my birthday and two days before Mom came home again, I was sitting on the toilet, taking a dump, when the familiar sound of Dad's car turning and parking in the drive was not followed by the equally familiar sound of a door being opened and closed but by the doorbell ringing.

What could this be?

I hurriedly wiped myself, pulled the chain, yanked up my trousers, opened the window above the bathtub, and poked my head out.

Dad was standing beneath me wearing a new anorak. On his legs he wore knee-length breeches and long, blue socks, and on his feet a pair of blue-and-white boots, all equally new.

"Come on!" he said. "We're going skiing!"

I got dressed in a flash and went outside, where he was tying my skis and sticks to the roof rack beside a pair of brand-new, long, wooden Splitkein skis.

"Did you buy some skis?" I said.

"Yes," he said. "Isn't it great? So we can go skiing together."

"Okay," I said. "So where are we going?"

"Let's go to the west of the island," he said. "To Hove."

"Are there slopes there?"

"There? Oh yes!" he said. "They've got the best."

I doubted it, but didn't say anything, got in the car beside him, how unfamiliar he looked in his new clothes, and then we left for Hove. Not a word was said until he parked and we got out.

"Here we are!" he said.

He had driven through Hove Holiday Center, which consisted of a large number of red houses and huts originating from the last war, most probably built by the Germans, like the firing range, which, I had heard rumored, had been an airfield, like the concrete gun placements towering above the sea-smoothed rocks and the pebble beaches close to the edge of the forest, and the fascinating low bunkers among the trees, where we used to play on the roofs and in the rooms when we were here in the afternoon on seventeenth of May celebration days, he had driven past all this, along a narrow road into the forest, which came to an end by a small sand quarry, where he stopped and parked.

After taking the skis off the roof, he came over with a little case full of ski-waxing equipment he had also bought, and we waxed the skis with blue Swix, which, after reading the back of one of the tubes, he said had to be the best. Apparently unfamiliar with bindings, it took him a bit longer to put on his skis than it did me. Then he put his hands through the loops on the poles. But he didn't do it from underneath so that the loop wouldn't slip off even if he lost hold of the pole. No, he put his hands straight through.

That was how little kids who didn't know any better held them.

It hurt me to watch, but I couldn't say anything. Instead I took my hands out and then threaded them through again so that, if he was paying attention, he could see how it was done.

But he wasn't watching me; he was looking up at the little ridge of hills above the sand quarry.

"Let's get going then!" he said.

Although I had never seen him ski before, I could never have dreamed in my wildest imagination that he couldn't ski. But he couldn't. He didn't glide with the skis, he walked as he normally walked, without skis, taking short, plodding steps, which on top of everything else were unsteady, which meant that every so often he had to stop and poke his poles into the snow so as not to topple over.

I thought perhaps this was just the beginning and soon he would find his rhythm and glide as he should glide along the piste. But when we reached the ridge, where the sea was visible between the trees, gray with frothy white-flecked waves, and started to follow the ski tracks he was still walking in the same way.

Occasionally he would turn and smile at me.

I felt so sorry for him I could have shouted out aloud as I skied.

Poor Dad. Poor, poor Dad.

At the same time I was embarrassed, my own father couldn't ski, and I stayed some distance behind him so that potential passersby wouldn't associate me with him. He was just someone out ahead, a tourist, I was on my own, this was where I came from, I knew how to ski.

The piste wound back into the forest, but if the view of the sea was gone its sounds lingered between the trees, rising and falling, and the aroma of salt water and rotten seaweed was everywhere, it blended with the forest's other faintly wintry smells, of which the snow's curious mixture of raw and gentle was perhaps the most obvious.

He stopped and hung on his ski poles. I came alongside him. A ship was moving on the horizon. The sky above us was light gray. A pale, grayish-yellow glow above the two lighthouses on Torungen revealed where the sun was.

He looked at me.

"Skis running well?" he said.

"Pretty well," I said. "How about you?"

"Yes," he said. "Let's go on, shall we? It'll soon be time to head home. We have to make dinner as well. So, away you go!"

"Don't you want to go first?"

"No, you head off. I'll follow."

The new arrangement turned everything in my head upside down. If he was behind me he would see how I, someone who knew how to ski, skied and realize how clumsy his own style was. I saw every single pole plant through his eyes. They cut through my consciousness like knives. After very few meters I slowed down, I began to ski in a slower, more staccato style, not unlike his, just not as clumsy, so that he would understand what I was doing, and that was even worse. Beneath us, the white, frothy breakers washed lazily onto the pebble beach. On the rocks, in some places, the wind whirled snow into the air. A seagull floated past, its wings unmoving. We were approaching the car, and on the last little slope I had an idea, I changed the tempo, and went as fast as I could for a few meters, then pretended to lose balance and threw myself into the snow beside the piste. I got up as quickly as possible and was brushing my trousers down as he whistled past.

"It's all about staying on your feet," he said.

We drove home in silence, and I was relieved when we finally turned into our drive and the skiing trip was definitively over.

Standing in the hall and taking off our skiing gear, we didn't say anything, either. But then, as he opened the door to the staircase, he turned to me.

"Come and keep me company while I'm cooking," he said.

I nodded and followed him up.

In the living room he stopped and looked at the wall.

"What on earth . . ." he said. "Have you noticed this before?"

I had forgotten all about the streak of orange juice. My surprise as I shook my head must have had a dash of authenticity about it because his attention wandered as he bent down and ran his finger over the thin line of orange. Even his imagination would hardly stretch far enough to guess it was caused by my flinging an orange at the floor just there, on the landing outside the kitchen.

He straightened up and walked into the kitchen, I sat down on the stool as usual, he took a packet of pollock from the fridge, placed it on the counter, fetched flour, salt, and pepper from the cupboard, sprinkled them on a plate, and began to turn the soft, slippery fillets in the mixture.

"Tomorrow after school we'll go to Arendal and buy you a birthday present," he said without looking at me.

"Shall I go with you? Isn't it supposed to be a secret?" I said.

"Well, you know what you want, don't you?" he said. "Soccer uniform, right?"

"Yes."

"You can try it on and then we'll know if it fits," he said, pushing a knob of butter from the knife into the frying pan with his finger.

What I wanted was Liverpool colors. But when we went to the Intersport shop they didn't have Liverpool uniforms on the stand.

"Can't we ask one of the people working here? Perhaps they've got some in stock?"

"If it's not hanging up, they haven't got it," Dad said. "Take one of the others."

"But I support Liverpool."

"Take Everton then," he said. "It's the same town."

I looked at the Everton shirt. Blue with white shorts. Umbro.

I looked at Dad. He seemed impatient, his eyes were wandering.

I put on the shirt over my sweater and held the shorts in front of me.

"Well, it looks good," I said.

"Let's take it then," Dad said, grabbing the shirt and shorts and going to pay. They wrapped them up while he counted the notes in his fat wallet, combed his hair back with his hand, and looked into the street outside, which was crowded with shoppers, now, three weeks before Christmas.

On my birthday I woke up very early. The parcel containing the soccer uniform was in my wardrobe. I couldn't wait to try it on. Tore off the paper, took out the outfit, pressed it against my nose, was there any better smell than new clothes? I put on the glistening shorts, then the shirt, which was rougher, a bit uneven against your skin, and the white socks. Then I went into the bathroom to look at myself.

Turned from side to side.

It looked good.

It wasn't Liverpool, but it looked good, and they were from the same city.

Suddenly Dad swung open the bathroom door.

"What are you up to, boy?" he said.

He eyed me.

"Have you opened your present?" he shouted. "On your own?"

He grabbed my arm and hauled me into my bedroom.

"Now you wrap it up again!" he said. "NOW!"

I cried and took off the uniform, tried to fold it as well as I could, placed it in the paper, and stuck it together with a bit of the tape that was still sticky.

Dad oversaw everything. As soon as I had finished, he snatched the parcel out of my hands and left.

"Actually I should have taken it from you," he said. "But now I'll keep it until we give you the rest of your presents. It is your birthday, after all."

As I knew what I was getting and I had even tried the uniform on in the shop, I had been sure it was the day that was important and that on the day I could wear it. I hadn't seen it as one of the presents I would be given when we ate the birthday cake in the afternoon. It was impossible to make him understand. But I was right, he wasn't. The uniform was mine when all was said and done! On that day it became mine!

I lay in bed crying until the others got up. Mom was in high spirits and wished me a happy birthday when I went into the kitchen, she had baked fresh rolls the evening before, which she was warming up in the oven, and she was boiling some eggs, but I didn't care, my hatred for Dad cast a cloud over everything.

In the afternoon we ate cake and drank pop. I had never been allowed to invite friends on my birthday, and nor was I on this one. I was sullen and surly, I ate the cake without a word, and when Dad put the presents in front of me, with a smile that showed no insight into what had happened that morning, as though it were possible to start afresh, I looked down and unwrapped the Everton uniform without showing any sign of pleasure.

"How nice," Mom said. "Are you going to try it on?"

"No," I said. "I tried it on in the shop. Fits perfectly."

"Put it on," Dad said. "So Mom and Yngve can see."

"No," I said.

He eyed me.

I took the uniform to the bathroom, changed, and went back in.

"Excellent," Dad said. "I bet you'll be the coolest on the field this winter."

"Can I take it off now?" I said.

"Wait till we've finished with the presents," Dad said. "Here's one from me."

He passed me a small, square packet that had to be a cassette.

I opened it.

It was the new Wings cassette. Back to the Egg.

I looked at him. He looked out of the window.

"Do you like it?" he said.

"Oh yes," I said. "It's the new Wings cassette! I'll play it now!"

"Hang on a moment," he said. "You've got a couple of presents left."

"Here's a tiny one from me," Mom said.

It was big but light. What could it be?

"Just something for your room," she said.

I unwrapped it. It was a stool. Four wooden legs and a kind of net seat between them.

"What a great stool," Yngve said.

"Thanks, Mom," I said. "It'll be good for when I read!"

"And here's one from me," Yngve said.

"Really?" I said. "I wonder what you've come up with this time?"

It was a book on how to play the guitar.

I looked at him with moist eyes.

"Thank you very much," I said.

"It's got scales, solos, everything," he said. "Very simple. There's a black dot for where you have to press. Even you can follow that."

For the rest of the day I listened to Back to the Egg.

Yngve came in and said that John Bonham, the drummer in Led Zeppelin, was on one of the songs. And he had read in the newspaper that a Norwegian priest spoke at the beginning of one of the songs. It had to be at the start of the LP, we figured out, "Reception," where there was a recording off the radio.

"There!" Yngve said. "Play it again!"

And then I heard it, too.

"Men la oss nå prøve et øyeblikk å se i dette lys av Det nye testamentet," a faint, grating old man's voice said.

The thought that neither Paul McCartney, Linda McCartney, Denny Laine, Steve Holly, nor Laurence Juber had a clue what was being said there, but that Yngve and I did, as we were Norwegian, sent my senses into free fall.

As always, Dad was kind all Christmas, even in the morning. As New Year's Eve approached and the shops finally opened for a few hours, Mom drove to Arendal to buy some food and fireworks. She must have intimated that perhaps it wasn't necessary to spend hundreds of kroner on rockets, as Dad always did, at any rate, it was she who had the responsibility for buying fireworks while Dad kept well in the background.

It wasn't a great success.

Dad usually showed us the rockets he had bought and said, well, this year we were going to knock Gustavsen into a cocked hat, for instance, or there were going to be a few really big bangs this year! When New Year's Eve came we would see him standing outside on the shimmering snow astutely and meticulously arranging the launch site. With a strand of hair hanging down over his face, which his beard almost blotted out in the darkness, he would set up the clothesline in the snow and line the biggest rockets up against it, and place the others in a whole battery of bottles and hollow objects. Once the preparations had been made, he would wait until half past eleven. Then he would call us outside and the New Year was brought in with several salvoes. He started small, with a few little firecrackers or sparklers that Yngve and I were allocated, and then he gradually stepped up the power until the biggest rocket was launched at twelve. Afterward he would declare that there had been lots of wonderful rockets this year but we, as usual, had had the best. That, of course, was open to debate because we were not the only ones to invest money in fireworks, Gustavsen and Karlsen did, too.

But this New Year's Eve Dad, the King of Fireworks, had abdicated.

I pondered quite a bit on the cause. Whatever it was, I suspected that the consequences would be of major significance. No, it wasn't a suspicion, I knew.

When it was a few minutes after half past eleven and Mom said perhaps it was time to go out and light the rocket, my jaw dropped.

"The rocket?" I said. "Do we only have one? One rocket?"

"Yes," Mom said. "Surely that's enough? It's a big one. They said in the shop it was the biggest and best they had."

Dad smirked to himself. He went out after Yngve and me, stood beside us on the terrace at the back of the house where the launch was to take place.

The rocket really was big, she was right about that.

She put it in a bottle, but the bottle was too small, and both the bottle and rocket tipped over. She stood it up and looked around. Her light-colored leather coat was open, the zippers in her high boots were undone, making them seem as if they were unfolding as she moved, like two exotic plants. Around her neck she had wound her thick, rust-brown scarf.

"We could use something bigger to put this rocket in," she said.

Dad said nothing.

"Dad normally uses the clothes horse," Yngve said.

"That's true!" Mom said.

The clothes horse, which was only used in the summer, was made of wood and leaned against the wall. Mom fetched it and set it up in the snow. She crouched down and positioned the rocket against it, but, seeing at once that it wouldn't work, she stood up with the rocket in her hand. Around us fireworks were going off everywhere. The sky was lit with explosions, which we sensed rather than saw because it was overcast and misty, so of the showers of stars and all the colors and patterns not much more than flashes of light were to be seen.

"What about if you lay it on its side," Yngve said. "Dad usually does that."

Mom did as he suggested.

"It's twelve o'clock now," Dad said. "Aren't you going to light our rocket soon?"

"Yes," Mom said. She took a lighter from her pocket, crouched down, shielded the tiny flame with her hand, and averted her whole body, ready to run. The second the fuse was lit she dashed toward us.

"Happy New Year!" she said.

"Happy New Year," Yngve said.

I said nothing because the rocket, which the burning fuse had reached now, sounded as if it was going to fizzle out. Then the flame died and the hiss stopped.

"Oh no," I said. "It didn't work! It was a dud! And we've only got one. Why did you buy only one? How could you do that?"

"That was New Year's Eve then," Dad said. "Perhaps I should be in charge of the fireworks next year?"

I had never felt so sorry for Mom as I did then, when we left the rocket and went into the warm, surrounded by neighbors' exultant shouts and explosions. What hurt most was that she had done the best she could. She couldn't do any better.

One afternoon two weeks later I was down by Lake Tjenna and my legs were absolutely freezing. Framlaget, the Socialist Party's children's organization, which I and almost all the other kids on the estate were in, had arranged a ski race. There were numbers on chests and medals for everyone, but above all else it was numbingly cold standing there and waiting your turn. And when my turn did come, my skis were slippery, I could never really get a decent speed going, and I finished way down the results list. As soon as I had passed the line and received my medal I set course for home. The darkness hung between the branches, the cold chafed at my toes, the skis kept slipping and sliding, I couldn't even manage the steepest hill using the herringbone technique and had to ascend sideways. But at last the road was there with its illuminated streetlamps like a luminous ribbon in the dusk, and our house was on the other side. I staggered across and into the drive, undid my skis and leaned them against the house, opened the door, and stopped.

What was that smell?

Grandma?

Was Grandma here?

No, out of the question, that was impossible.

Perhaps Dad had been to Kristiansand and had brought the fragrance back with him?

No, for Pete's sake, there was someone talking in the kitchen!

I had my boots off in a flash, registered that my socks were wet, so I couldn't walk in them, they would leave marks, and I jogged through the hall into the boiler room, where there was a fresh pair hanging from a line, put them on, strode up the stairs as fast as I dared, stopped.

The fragrance was stronger here. There was no doubt: Grandma was here.

"Is that you, champ?" Dad said.

"Yes," I said.

"Come in here a moment!" he said.

I went into the kitchen.

There was Grandma!

I ran over and hugged her.

She laughed and ruffled my hair.

"How big you've grown!" she said.

"What are you doing here?" I said. "Where's the car? Where's Grandad?"

"I caught the bus," she said.

"The bus?" I said.

"Yes. My son is alone with his children, I thought, so I can go and give him a bit of a hand. I've already made some dinner for you, as you can see."

"How long are you staying?"

She laughed.

"Well, I'm catching the bus back tomorrow, I think. Someone has to look after Grandad as well. I can't leave him alone for too long."

"No," I said, hugging her again.

"All right," Dad said. "You go to your room for a while and I'll call you when the food's ready."

"But he must have his present first," Grandma said.

"Thank you for my Christmas present, by the way," I said. "It was great."

Grandma leaned forward, lifted her bag, and took out a little packet, which she passed to me.

I tore off the paper.

It was an IK Start mug.

It was white, with the Kristiansand club logo on one side and a soccer player in a yellow shirt and black shorts on the other.

"Wow, a Start mug!" I said, and gave her another hug.

It was strange having Grandma there. I had hardly ever seen her without Grandad, and hardly ever on her own with Dad. They sat chatting in the kitchen; I could hear them through the door, which I had left ajar. There were intermittent pauses when one of them got up to do something. Then they chatted a bit more, Grandma laughed and told a story, and Dad mumbled. He called us, we ate, he was quite different from how he normally was, coming closer to us and distancing himself all the time. Sometimes he was completely in tune with what Grandma was saying, then he would be gone, looking elsewhere or getting up to do something, then he would look at her again and smile and make a comment that would make her laugh, and then he was gone again.

She left the following evening. She gave Yngve and me a hug, then Dad drove her to the bus station in Arendal. I put on Rubber Soul and lay down with a biography of Madame Curie. When the second song came, "Norwegian Wood," I took my eyes off the book and gazed at the ceiling as the mood of the music in some incomprehensible way got into me and raised me to where it was. It was a fantastic feeling. Not only because it was beautiful, there was something else present that had nothing to do with the room I lay in or the world I was surrounded by.

I once had a girl, or should I say, she once had me
She showed me her room, isn't it good, Norwegian wood?

Fantastic, fantastic.

Then I went on reading about Madame Curie until ten and I switched off the light. As I drifted into sleep, as whatever existed in my room was somehow diluted with images, where they came from I had no idea, but I accepted them nonetheless, the door was suddenly thrust open and the light switched on.

It was Dad.

"How many apples have you had today?" he said.

"One," I said.

"Are you sure? Grandma said she gave you one."

"Really?"

"But you had one after dinner, too. Do you remember?"

"Oh yes! I'd forgotten that one!" I said.

Dad switched off the light and closed the door without another word.

The next day after dinner he called me. I went into the kitchen.

"Sit down," he said. "Here's an apple."

"Thanks," I said.

He handed me an apple.

"Sit here and eat it," he said.

I glanced up at him. He met my gaze, his eyes were serious, and I looked down, started to eat the apple. Once it was finished, he handed me another.

Where had he got it from? Had he got a bag behind his back or what?

"Have another," he said.

"Thanks," I said. "But I only eat one a day."

"You had two yesterday, didn't you?"

I nodded, took it, and ate it.

He handed me another.

"Here's another," he said. "This is your lucky day."

"I'm full," I said.

"Eat your apple."

I ate it. It took me longer than the first two. The bite-sized chunks seemed to be lying on top of the food from dinner; it was as though I could feel the cold apple flesh down below.

Dad handed me another.

"I don't want it," I said.

"There were no limits yesterday," he said. "Have you forgotten? You must have had two apples because you wanted them. Today you can have as many as you want. Eat."

I shook my head.

He leaned down. His eyes were cold.

"Eat your apple. Now."

I started eating. Whenever I swallowed my stomach contracted and I had to swallow several times not to throw up.

He was standing behind me, there was no way I could trick him. I cried and swallowed, swallowed and cried. In the end, I couldn't go on.

"I'm so full!" I said. "I simply can't eat any more!"

"Eat up," Dad said. "You like apples so much."

I tried a couple more bites, but it was no good.

"I can't," I said.

He looked at me. Then he took the half-eaten apple and threw it in the trash can in the cupboard under the sink.

"You can go to your room," he said. "Now I hope that has taught you a lesson."

Inside my room there was only one thing I longed for, and that was to grow up. To have total control over my own life. I hated Dad, but I was in his hands, I couldn't escape his power. It was impossible to exact my revenge on him. Except in the much-acclaimed mind and imagination, there I was able to crush him. I could grow there, outgrow him, place my hands on his cheeks, and squeeze until his lips formed the stupid pout he made to imitate me, because of my protruding teeth. There, I could punch him in the nose so hard that it broke and blood streamed from it. Or, even better, so that the bone was forced back into his brain and he died. I could hurl him against the wall or throw him down the stairs. I could grab him by the neck and smash his face against the table. That was how I could think, but the instant I was in the same room as he was, everything crumbled, he was my father, a grown man, so much bigger than me that everything had to bend to his will. He bent my will as if it were nothing.

That must have been why, unwittingly of course, I was converting the inside of my room into an enormous outside. When I read, and for a while I did hardly anything else, it was always the world outside I moved in as I lay still on my bed, and not just the world that existed in the here and now, with all its foreign countries and foreigners, but also the one that had been, from Stokke's Bjørneklo, the Stone Age boy, to the one in the future, such as in Jules Verne's books. And then there was the music. It, too, opened my room with its moods and the strong emotions it evoked in me, which had nothing to do with those I normally felt in life. Mostly I listened to the Beatles and Wings, but also to Yngve's music, which for a long time was bands and solo artists like Gary Glitter, Mud, Slade, the Sweet, Rainbow, Status Quo, Rush, Led Zeppelin, and Queen, but who in the course of his secondary school years were changing, as other, quite different, music began to sneak its way between all these old cassettes and records, like the Jam single and a single by the Stranglers, called "No More Heroes," an LP by the Boomtown Rats and one by the Clash, a cassette by Sham 69 and Kraftwerk, as well as the songs he recorded off the only radio music program there was, Pop Spesial. He started to have friends who were interested in the same music and also played the guitar. One of them was called Bård Torstensen, and one day at the beginning of May when Dad was out for a few hours and thus the house was left unguarded, he joined Yngve in his room. They sat playing guitar and listening to records. After a while there was a knock at my door, it was Yngve, there was something he wanted to show Bård. I was reclined on the bed reading and got up when they came in.

"Look," Yngve said, going over to the Elvis poster I had on the wall over the desk. "Can you guess what's on the back?"

Bård shook his head.

Yngve loosened the drawing pins, took the poster down, and turned it around.

"Look," he said. "Johnny Rotten! And he hangs it up with Elvis on the front!"

Both of them laughed.

"Can I buy it off you?" Bård said.

I shook my head.

"It's mine."

"But you've got it up the wrong way round!" Bård said, laughing again.

"I haven't," I said. "That is Elvis, you know!"

"Elvis is the past!" Bård said.

"No, he isn't. Not Elvis Costello," Yngve said.

"That's true," Bård said.

After they had gone I looked at the two pictures for a while. The one called Johnny Rotten was ugly. Elvis was good-looking. Why should I swap the ugly one for the good-looking one?

Outdoors, we did what we always do every spring: cut branches off the birch trees, tie bottles onto the remaining stumps, collect them the next day, full of light-colored, viscous sap, and drink it. We cut branches off the willow trees and made flutes from the bark. We picked large bunches of white wood anemones and gave them to our mothers. Well, we were too big for the latter really, but it was a gesture, it was us being good, then one morning, when we had only three hours, I dragged Geir with me into the forest, I knew a place where there were so many anemones that from a distance it looked like snow on the ground. Not without some self-torment, though, for flowers were living beings, picking them was killing them, but the cause was good, with their help I could spread happiness. The light fell in shafts through the branches, the bog was a luminous green, and we each picked an enormous bunch, which we ran home with.

When I arrived Dad was at home. He was in the laundry room at the bottom of the house. He turned to me, anger in every movement.

"I picked you some flowers," I said.

He reached out with his hand, took them, and threw them in the large sink.

"Little girls pick flowers," he said.

He was right. And he was probably ashamed of me. Once some of his colleagues had come home and they had seen me on the stairs, with my blond hair quite long, because it was winter, and I was wearing red long johns.

"What a nice girl you've got," one of them said.

"It's a boy," Dad answered. He had smiled, but I knew him well enough to know the comment had not gladdened his heart.

There was my interest in clothes, my crying if I didn't get the shoes I wanted, my crying if it was too cold when we were in the boat on the sea, indeed my crying if he raised his voice in situations when it would have been absolutely normal to raise your voice. Was it so strange he thought: what kind of son have I got here?

I was a mama's boy, he was constantly telling me. I was, too. I longed for her. And no one was happier than I when she moved back for good at the end of the month.

When summer was over and I was about to start the fifth class it was Dad's turn. He was going all the way to Bergen, to stay at something called the Fantoft Student Town, to major in Nordic literature and become a senior teacher.

"I'm afraid I won't be able to come home every weekend," he said during dinner just before leaving. "Perhaps no more than once a month."

"That's a shame," I said.

I went into the drive to see him off. He put his suitcases in the trunk, and then he got in on the passenger side because Mom was driving him to the airport.

It was one of the strangest sights I had seen.

Dad didn't look right in a VW Beetle, he didn't. And if he was going to sit in one, it definitely shouldn't be as a passenger, it verged on the grotesque, especially when Mom got in beside him and started the engine, turned her head, and reversed.

Dad wasn't a passenger; that much was obvious.

I waved, Dad raised a hand, and they were gone.

What should I do now?

Go into the workshop room, hammer and saw, chop and cut for all I was worth?

Go into the kitchen and make waffles? Fry an egg? Brew up some tea?

Sit with my feet on the table?

No, I knew what.

Go into Yngve's room, take out one of his records, and put it on full volume.

I chose Play by Magazine.

Turned up the volume almost full blast, opened the door, and went into the living room.

The bass was making the walls vibrate. Music was belting out of the room. I closed my eyes and I swayed back and forth to the rhythm. After doing that for a while I went into the kitchen, took the bar of cooking chocolate, and ate it. The music was booming out around me, but I wasn't inside it, it was more like part of the house, the dining-room table, or the pictures on the wall. Then I started swaying back and forth again and it was as though I were devouring the music and had it inside me. Especially when I closed my eyes.

Someone downstairs was calling me.

I opened my eyes and gasped.

Had they forgotten something and come back?

I dashed into the bedroom and turned the volume right down.

"What are you doing?" Yngve called from downstairs.

Oh. What a relief.

"Nothing," I said. "I borrowed one of your records."

He came up the stairs. Followed by another boy. I hadn't seen him before. Perhaps someone from volleyball?

"Have you gone completely nuts?" Yngve said. "You can burst the speakers. They're probably ruined now. You damned idiot!"

"I didn't know," I said. "Sorry. Really sorry."

The other boy smiled.

"This is Trond," Yngve said. "And this is my stupid little brother."

"Hi, little brother," Trond said.

"Hi," I said.

Yngve went into his room, turned up the volume, and placed his head against the speakers.

"You haven't burst them, fortunately," he said, straightening up. "You were lucky. You'd have bought me some new ones otherwise. I would have personally made sure you did."

He looked at me.

"Have they been gone long?"

I shrugged.

"Half an hour," I said.

Yngve closed his bedroom door, and I hung around in the living room for a while until I spotted Marianne and Solveig outside. They were pushing a stroller. I went out and ran after them.

"Why don't we walk together?" I said.

"All right," they said. "Where are you going?"

"Up."

"Who are you going to see?"

I shrugged.

"Whose baby is that?"

"The Leonardsens'."

"How much are you getting?"

"Five kroner."

"Are you saving up for something?"

"Nothing special. A jacket maybe."

"I'm going to buy a new jacket, too," I said. "A black Matinique. Have you seen it?"

"No."

"The sleeves are long and they're made of a different material from the rest. Sort of wavy. And it's got a little flap down the middle covering the zipper. What kind of jacket are you going to get?"

Marianne shrugged.

"A coat, I was thinking."

"A coat? A light color?"

"Maybe. Quite short."

"You're the only boy who talks about clothes," Solveig said.

"I know," I said. And it was something I had discovered recently. It was so difficult to talk to girls. Once you had taken their hats or shouted a few bad words after them that was where it usually ended. Well, you could talk to them about homework. But nothing else. Then I suddenly realized. Clothes, that was what they were interested in. All you had to do was chat away.

As we got closer to B-Max, I said bye and ran down the slope to the play area, which was deserted, then up the grass slope to the old car wreck, which was deserted, then over to the soccer field, which was deserted, and over the fence to Prestbakmo's and the front of the house, where I rang the bell. But Geir was having dinner, and afterward he was going up to Vemund's.

Oh, yes.

The road, too, was deserted. It was Sunday, dinnertime, kids were eating or they were out visiting or they were on a trip with their parents.

Then I had a sudden brainwave: Yngve had a friend with him! Perhaps I could join them?

I ran down the hill, but their bikes had gone, they must have already left.

What could I do?

It was cloudy and not very warm. There probably wasn't anyone at the Rock.

Slowly I started walking down to the pontoons. Probably no one there, either, but if nothing else I could look at the various boats and breathe in the distinctive smell of fiberglass and wood, gasoline and salt water.

No, a whole crowd was there.

I mingled with them unobtrusively. Some of them had boats, they were sitting on board and spitting into the water while listening to those on the pontoon who didn't have a boat but had come to be close to those who did. I stood with them although I had no dreams of ever owning a boat, it was so unrealistic that I might just as well have dreamed about waking up in the Viking Age the next morning, as a boy had done in one of the books I was reading. No, if I dreamed about anything, it was a pair of new, white sneakers with the light-blue Nike logo, like the ones Yngve had, or new light-blue Levi's jeans, or a light-blue Catalina jacket. Or a new pair of Puma soccer cleats, an Admiral tracksuit, or a pair of Umbro shorts. Or Speedo trunks. I thought a lot about the black-and-white Adidas Olympia sneakers. Then there was a pair of shin pads with instep protection I wanted, and a Puma bag, and for winter Atomic slalom skis and Dynastar slalom poles. I wanted slalom pants and a genuine down jacket. Splitkein fiberglass skis, new Rottefella bindings. And light-colored, Sami reindeer-hide boots, the ones with the little curled-up toe. I wanted a new, white shirt and a red college sweater. I had mentally chosen white rubber boots instead of the dark-blue ones I had now. I would also have liked a pink coral necklace I had seen, white in a pinch.

Boats, mopeds, and cars interested me less. But as I couldn't say this to anyone I had a few favorite brands among them, too. Boat: a ten-footer With Dromedille with a five-horsepower Yamaha engine. Moped: Suzuki. Car: BMW. These choices had a lot to do with the unusual letters. Y, Z, W. For the same reason I was drawn to Wolverhampton Wanderers, it was the first soccer team I supported, and even after Liverpool took over that role, my heart still beat for the Wolves, who else when their ground was called Molineux and their logo was a wolf's head on an orange background?

Trousers, jackets, sweaters, shoes, and sports gear were on my mind a lot because I wanted to look good and I wanted to win. When John McEnroe, whom I rated as perhaps the all-time greatest, got that dangerous glint in his eye after a line judge's decision, when he glared up at the umpire while bouncing the ball on the court before serving, I thought desperately, No, don't do it, don't do it, it won't help, you can't afford to lose the point, don't do it! – and could barely watch when he did it anyway and started to swear at the line judge, perhaps even sling his racket to the ground so hard it bounced up several meters. I identified with him to such a degree that I cried every time he lost, and couldn't bear to be indoors, but had to go out onto the road, where I sat on the concrete barriers mourning the defeat, my cheeks wet with tears. The same applied to Liverpool. A defeat in the FA Cup Final drove me outside onto the road with my face streaming. On that team I liked Emlyn Hughes best, he was the one I rooted for, but I liked the others, too, of course, especially Ray Clemence and Kevin Keegan, before he went to Hamburg and Newcastle. In one of Yngve's soccer magazines I had read a comparison of Kevin Keegan and his replacement, Kenny Dalglish. They were compared point by point, and even though they had their own strengths and weaknesses, they came out of it fairly even. But one thing that had been written left a searing mark on me. The article said that Kevin Keegan was an extrovert while Kenny Dalglish was an introvert.

Just seeing the word "introvert" threw me into despair.

Was I an introvert?

Wasn't I?

Didn't I cry more than I laughed? Didn't I spend all my time reading in my room?

That was introverted behavior, wasn't it?

Introvert, introvert, I didn't want to be an introvert.

That was the last thing I wanted to be, there could be nothing worse.

But I was an introvert, and the insight grew like a kind of mental cancer within me.

Kenny Dalglish kept himself to himself.

Oh, so did I! But I didn't want that. I wanted to be an extrovert! An extrovert!

An hour later, after I had taken the road through the forest and climbed a tree to find out how far I could see, I ran onto the road the moment Mom's Beetle came up the hill. I waved, but she didn't see me and I ran as fast as I could after the car, up the hill, across the short, flat stretch, and into the drive, where she got out of the car, hitched her bag over her shoulder, and shut the door.

"Hi," she said. "Would you like to help me bake some bread?"

That might have been the year Dad lost his grip on us.

Many years later he was to say Bergen was where he started drinking.

It came up casually, I was visiting him one summer at the beginning of the nineties, he was drunk, and I said I was going to move to Iceland that winter, and he said, Iceland, I've been there, to Reykjavik.

"Have you really?" I said. "When would that have been?'

"It was when I was living in Bergen, you remember," he said. "I had a girlfriend there, she was Icelandic, and we went to Reykjavik together."

"While you were with Mom?"

"Yes. I was thirty-five and living in student housing."

"You don't have to make an excuse. You can do what you like."

"Yes, I can. Thank you, son."

None of this came to our ears at the time, of course, and we didn't have the experience to imagine it, either. All that counted for me was that he wasn't at home. But even though the house opened up, and for the first time in my life I could do what I wanted, in a strange way he was still there, the thought of him went through me like a lightning strike if I brought dirt in with me to the hall or if I dropped crumbs on the table while eating or even if juice ran down my chin while eating a pear. Can't you even eat a pear without making a mess, boy, I could hear him saying. And if I did well in a test it was to him I wanted to bring the news, not Mom, that wasn't the same. However, what was happening outside was slowly changing character, it was becoming both better and worse, it was as though the gentle world of the child, where the blows that fell were muted and somehow untargeted, in the sense that they were intended for everything and nothing, became sharper and clearer, any doubt was removed, it is you and what you say that we dislike, and this was a red line, while something else opened and this something else had nothing to do with me personally, although perhaps it affected me to an even greater degree, because I was a part of it, and that part had nothing to do with my family, it belonged to us, to those of us who were out there. I was tremendously attracted to almost all the girls that autumn as I started the fifth class, but I didn't perceive them as radically different, I had something inside me that enabled me to approach them. I had no idea this was a huge blunder, actually, the biggest blunder a boy can commit.

We had an older woman teacher that year, her name was Fru Høst, she taught us a range of subjects and she liked to set up role plays. Often she chose little events for dramatization, and I always volunteered, it was my favorite activity, everyone looked at me and I could be someone else. I had a special talent for acting girls' parts. I was good at it. I flicked my hair behind my ears, pouted a little, swung my hips as I walked, and spoke in a slightly more affected voice than normal. Fru Høst sometimes laughed so much tears were rolling down her cheeks.

One evening I was hanging out with Sverre, who also liked role plays and was also a good student and bore a strong enough resemblance to me for two substitue teachers to think, independently of each other, that we were twins, and I suggested going to visit Fru Høst. She lived three kilometers or so east of the estate.

"Good idea," Sverre said. "But my bike's got a flat. And it's a bit of a hike on foot."

"Let's hitch," I said.

"Okay."

We walked down to the crossroads and stood by the curb. I had hitchhiked quite a lot the previous year, mostly with Dag Magne, to Hove or up to Roligheden or some of the other places we found appealing, and we had never stood there for more than an hour without getting a lift.

This evening the first car stopped.

There were two guys inside.

We got in. They were playing loud music; the windows were vibrating from the bass. The driver turned to us.

"And where are you going?"

We told him, he put the car in gear, and drove off so fast we were pinned back against the seat.

"Who lives out there?"

"Fru Høst," Sverre said. "She's our teacher at school."

"Aha!" the one in the passenger seat said. "You're going there to cause some mischief. We did that, too, when we were younger. Went to the teachers' places and tormented the hell out of them."

"Well, we're not going to do that exactly," I said. "We're just going to visit her."

He turned and looked at me.

"Visit her? Why? Something to do with homework or what?"

"No-o," I said. "We just felt like it."

He turned back. They were silent for the rest of the journey. Braked sharply at the crossroads.

"Looks like the end of the road," the driver said.

I had a bit of a bad conscience, knowing we had disappointed them, but lying wasn't an option. So I thanked them as warmly as I could.

They raced off into the darkness with the bass pounding.

Sverre and I trudged up the gravel driveway. Large leafy trees with outstretched branches on both sides. We had never been to her house, but we knew where it was.

There were two cars outside and all the windows were lit.

I rang the bell.

"My goodness," Fru Høst said in surprise, opening the door.

"We thought we would visit you," I said.

"Can we come in?" Sverre said.

She hesitated.

"I'm afraid I have visitors here. It's not such a convenient time. But did you come all this way just to visit me?"

"Yes."

"Come on in then! You can stay for half an hour if you like. In fact, I have some cookies. And some juice!"

We went in.

The living room was full of adults. Fru Høst introduced us, we sat down at the table, on stools, and she gave us a plate with three cookies on it and a glass of juice.

She said we were her favorite students and we were such good actors.

"Could they perform something for us now?" someone asked.

Fru Høst glanced at us.

"Could do," I said. "Okay with you?"

"Of course," Sverre said.

I tucked my hair behind my ears, pouted, and we were off, improvising, and it made everyone there laugh. After the performance we bowed, slightly flushed but happy to hear the applause.

I repeated the success at the fancy dress party just before Christmas when both Dag Magne and I dressed up as women, complete with makeup, dress, and handbag, and my impersonation was so good that no one recognized me, not even Dag Lothar, who I was standing next to for at least five minutes before he suddenly realized who the stranger really was.

Although I wasn't ashamed about dressing up as a girl, nor about discussing girlish things with them, I also actually went out with some of them. The best was Mariann, it lasted two weeks, we went skating together, she sat on my lap and kissed me, I went to her birthday party, the only boy, and she sat on my lap and I held her while she chatted to her friends, we made out there, too, but after a while I grew tired of it – she was without doubt one of the best-looking girls at school, although not at the absolute top – and perhaps I also felt a little sorry for her because she lived alone with her mother and sister and they were quite poor, for example, she almost never had any new clothes, her mother did the best she could with old ones and hand-me-downs, so I felt an emptiness when I was in her room and claustrophobia when we kissed, I just wanted to leave as soon as possible, and finally I persuaded Dag Magne to tell her it was over. That same day I made a terrible mistake, she was running behind me in the wet weather shelter, and as a purely reflex action I stuck my foot out, she tripped, and hit her face on the pavement, there was blood and she cried, but that wasn't the worst, the worst was the ensuing fury she poured over me, which the other girls united behind as they gathered round to help her. It would be wrong to say that I was popular for the next few weeks. That I hadn't meant anything by it, that I had only done it for fun, didn't get much of a sympathetic response. At times it was as though the girls really hated me, considered me some sort of scum; at others it was the opposite, not only did they want to talk to me but at the class parties we had begun to arrange, in one another's houses and at school, they also wanted to dance with me. My attitude to them was also ambivalent, at least as far as the girls in my class were concerned. On the one hand, I knew them so well that after close to five years at school I was completely indifferent toward them; on the other hand, they had started changing, the bulges under their sweaters were growing, their hips were widening, and they were behaving differently, they had risen above us, suddenly when they looked at boys, they were from two or three classes up. With our high-pitched voices, more or less furtive glances, as we admired all the attributes they now possessed, we were no more than air to them. But even though they were so important, they knew nothing about the world they were moving toward. What did they know about men and women and desire? Had they read Wilbur Smith, where women were taken by force under stormy skies? Had they read Ken Follett, where a man shaves a woman's pussy while she lies in a foam-filled bathtub with her eyes closed? Had they read Insect Summer by Knut Faldbakken, the passage that I knew by heart, when he takes her panties off in the hay? Had they ever gotten their hands on a porn magazine? And what did they know about music? They liked what everyone liked, the Kids and all the other crap on the hit lists, it meant nothing to them, not really, they had no idea what music was or what it could be. They could barely dress, they turned up at school wearing the strangest combinations of clothes and didn't realize. And they were looking down on me? I had read Wilbur Smith and Ken Follett and Knut Faldbakken, I had been flicking through porn mags for years, I listened to bands who really counted, and I knew how to dress. And was I supposed to be inferior to them?

To demonstrate the true state of affairs, I pulled off a little coup in the music lesson. Every Friday we had something we called "Class Top of the Pops." Six of us would bring along a song that everyone voted on afterward. Mine always came last, whatever I played. Led Zeppelin, Queen, Wings, the Beatles, the Police, the Jam, Skids – the result was the same, one or two votes, last. I knew they were voting against me and not the music. They weren't really listening to the music. This irritated me beyond endurance. I complained to Yngve and he not only understood how irritating it was, because he disliked hit list music, too, but he also came up with a way to trick them. The Kids' second record hadn't been released yet. One Friday I took with me the Aller Værste!'s first LP, Materialtretthet, which Yngve had bought a few days before, and said that I had an advance copy of the Kids' new record. The music teacher was in on my ruse and played the first song off the LP, which was still in a white inside sleeve because, as I told them, the record was so new that the cover hadn't been designed yet. For them the Aller Værste! was the worst of the lot, the last time I had played a song by them, the single "Rene Hender," they had shouted, Rene Hender! Rene Hender! after me for several days, but when the first notes of the band's first song sounded in the classroom it was to mumbles of appreciation and mounting enthusiasm, which culminated when the vote was taken and it transpired that the Aller Værste!, under the pseudonym of the Kids, had won hands down. How the triumph shone in my eyes as I was able to stand up and say that they had not voted for the Kids but for the Aller Værste! I said this proved that they weren't interested in the music, there were other issues determining their votes. How angry they were! But there was nothing they could say. I had fooled them too well for that.

Of course, I never heard the last of it. I was conceited, I thought I was quite something, I always had to like weird things, not what everyone else liked. That wasn't true, though, in fact I liked good music and not bad music, surely that wasn't my fault? – and I learned more and more about it, thanks to Yngve and his music magazines, which I plowed through, and to the records he played me. Bands like Magazine, the Cure, the Stranglers, Simple Minds, Elvis Costello, Skids, Stiff Little Fingers, XTC, the Norwegian groups Kjøtt, Blaupunkt, the Aller Værste!, the Cut, Stavangerensemblet, DePress, Betong Hysteria, Hærværk. He also taught me more and more chords on the guitar, and when he wasn't at home, I would play by myself with the black Gibson plectrum in my hand and the black Fender strap over my shoulder. To be on the safe side, I also bought a teach-yourself drums book, carved two sticks, placed some books around me in a circle on the floor, the one on the left was the hi-hat, the one next to it the snare drum, and the three books above them the tomtoms. The only person on my wavelength was Dag Magne, with whom I was spending more and more time. We were mostly up at his house, playing records and trying to copy the songs on his twelve-string guitar, but he also came down to ours, where we read magazines because Mom's ban was no longer absolute, while listening to my cassettes and talking about girls or the band we were going to start, especially what we were going to call it. He wanted it to be Dag Magne's Anonymous Disciples; I wanted it to be Blood Clot. Both were equally good, we agreed, and we didn't need to make a decision until the time was ripe and we were performing on a stage.

In this way winter passed, with the first class parties, where we played spin the bottle and danced slow ones, round and round on the floor holding some of the girls we had been in the same class with for five years and knew better than our sisters, and my head almost exploded when I held Anne Lisbet's body so close to mine. The fragrance of her hair, the sparkling eyes that were bursting with life. And, oh, the little breasts under the thin, white blouse.

Wasn't that a fantastic feeling?

It was completely new, unknown for all these years, but now I knew it, now I wanted to go there again.

Winter passed, spring came, with its light, which every day held the passage to night open for a little longer, and with its cold rain, causing the snow to slump and dwindle. One of these March mornings, oppressed by the darkness and the rain, I went into the kitchen to have breakfast as usual. Mom had already left, she was on the early shift. She had forgotten to switch off the radio. Even in my room I had gathered that something had happened in the night because the voices on the radio – I could hear the resonance but not the words – sounded unusually dramatic. I buttered a piece of bread, added a slice of salami, and poured milk into a glass. There had been an accident in the North Sea, an oil platform had capsized. Raindrops slid slowly down the outside of the windows. The faint thrum of the rain on the roof surrounded the house like a membrane. The gutters were running. Up at Gustavsen's a car was started, the headlights were switched on. It was a catastrophe, a number of people were missing, no one knew how many. When I arrived at B-Max half an hour later, my trousers tucked into my boots and my waterproof hood tied tightly around my face, no one spoke of anything else. Everyone knew someone who knew someone who had a father or a brother working on that particular platform. Alexander Kielland, it was called, and apparently one leg had given way. Was it a hundred-year wave that had caused it? A bomb? A construction fault?

In the first lesson the teacher talked about the accident, even though it was a math class. I wondered what Grandad would be saying now. He always told us we should find a job in oil. Oil was the future. But other signals were coming in from elsewhere: an item on the news had opened with a forecast that the oil reserves would soon be running out, it was happening faster than anyone would have believed, within a mere twenty-five years it would all be gone. I was fascinated by the year that was quoted, 2004, because it was so far into the future, and actually unreal, but treated here as a sober reality, different in kind from the one you met in science fiction books and magazines and hence shocking: would 2004 ever really arrive? In our lifetimes? At the same time I was also unnerved by the doom and gloom in these men's voices warning of terrible things to come and despondent that something was going to come to an end. I didn't like that; I wanted everything to last and go on forever. All ends were frightening. Therefore I hoped that Jimmy Carter would get a second term and that Odvar Nordli and the Socialist Party would win the next election. I liked Jimmy Carter. I liked Odvar Nordli even though he was always so drained and exhausted. I didn't like Mogens Glistrup or Olof Palme, there was something smarmy about them, about their lips and eyes. Einar Førde and Reuilf Steen also had it, though not so much. But I liked Hanna Kvanmo. Not Golda Meir and not Menachem Begin, despite the Camp David Agreement. It was hard to judge Anwar Sadat. The same applied to Brezhnev, on quite a different scale, though. When I saw him standing there in his fur coat and hat, with the bushy eyebrows above the narrow Mongolian eyes in his expressionless face, mechanically waving to the parade below, as one artillery rocket after the other rolled past, surrounded by thousands of identical goose-stepping soldiers, I didn't see him as human, he was something else, impossible to relate to.

Did I like Per Kleppe?

Yes, in a way, I certainly hoped with a passion that Kleppe's anti-inflation packages would work.

I liked Hans Hammond Rossbach, but I considered Trygve Bratteli a bit odd with that low, whispering voice of his and his strange r's, the narrow shoulders and the big, skull-like head with the thick, black eyebrows.

The accident in the North Sea was the main topic of conversation for a quarter of an hour, then the lesson proceeded as usual, that is, we worked on sums in our books while the teacher walked between the rows of desks helping whoever needed it as the hand of darkness outside released its grip on the morning and it slowly became lighter. In the break someone said there might be air pockets inside the platform where you could survive for several days. Others said no parents from our school had been on board, but the father of a pupil at Roligheden was missing. It was hard to know where all the rumors were coming from, or how true they were. In the next lesson we had Norwegian. When Frøken sat down at her desk I put up my hand.

"Yes, Karl Ove?"

"Have you corrected our essays?"

"You'll have to wait and see," she said.

But she must have because the next thing she did was to go through some words and rules on the blackboard, which presumably were examples of the mistakes we had made in the essays we had handed in the Thursday before.

Yes indeed. The big pile of exercise books was taken from her bag and put on the desk.

"There were lots of excellent essays this time," she said. "I could have read out all of them, but there wasn't enough time, so I chose four. This doesn't necessarily mean they are the best, as you know. Everyone in the class writes good essays."

I stared at the pile to see if I could recognize mine. It wasn't the one on top, that was for sure.

Anne Lisbet put up her hand.

She was wearing a white sweater. It suited her so well. Her black hair and black eyes went well with white, and her red lips and the redness in her cheeks, which always flushed when she came into the warm, did too.

"Yes?" Frøken said.

"Can we knit while you read?" Anne Lisbet said.

"Yes, I don't have a problem with that," Frøken said.

Four of the girls leaned forward and took out some knitting from their satchels.

"Can we do our homework as well?" Geir Håkon said.

Someone giggled.

"Put your hand up like everyone else, Geir Håkon," Frøken said. "But the answer is, of course, no."

Geir Håkon smiled, blushing, not because he had been put in his place but because he had ventured to speak. He was always pink-faced when he spoke in class.

Frøken began to read. The first was not mine. But there were three left, I thought, stretching my legs out under the desk. I liked the first lessons, when it was dark outside and it was like we were sitting in a bright capsule, all of us with slightly messy hair and sleepy eyes and these soft-focus movements that the day seemed to sharpen until everyone was running around shouting over one another with wide-open eyes and flapping limbs.

The second essay wasn't mine, either. Nor the third.

I peered up uneasily as she lifted the fourth book. That wasn't mine, was it?

Oh. She wasn't going to read it.

Something inside me slumped with disappointment. While something else soared. My essay was the best, I knew that, and she knew that. Yet she hadn't read it the previous time, nor this. What was the point of writing well if that was what happened? The next time I would write as badly as I could.

Finally she put the wretched essay down.

I put up my hand.

"Why didn't you read mine?" I said. "Wasn't it any good?"

Her eyes narrowed for a second, then opened, and she smiled.

"I have received twenty-five essays. I can't read all of them out. Surely you can understand that? Your essays are in fact among those I read out most often. This time it was someone else's turn."

She clapped her hands.

"And they were really fantastic this time. What imagination you have! I really enjoyed all of them."

She nodded to Geir B, who jumped to his feet and went to the desk. He was the class monitor and had to hand out the essays. I scanned mine. About a mistake a page. At the end she had written: Imaginative and elegant, Karl Ove, but perhaps the story finished a little abruptly? Very few mistakes, but you have to work on your writing more!

We had to write about something in the future. I had written about a journey in space. That is, I had spent so much time describing the various training programs the astronauts went through that ten pages were already covered before the day of the launch, so after some deliberation I decided the trip would be cancelled at the last moment because of a fault and the astronauts would go home with their work left undone.

Somewhere in the essay I had written Hotel, and she had added an extra l in her red looped script. I put up my hand and she came over.

"'Hotell' is spelled with one l. I know that. I saw it in a book, so I'm absolutely sure."

She leaned over. Soap fragrance rose from her hands, and from her neck a faint scent of a summery perfume.

"Ah, well, in one way you're right. 'Hotel' with one l is English. There are two l's in Norwegian."

"Hotel Phønix has one l," I said. "And that's in Norway. And on top of that, it's in Arendal!"

"You're right."

"So it's not a mistake after all?"

"No. Let's say that. And it was a good essay, Karl Ove."

She straightened up and went back to her desk. Her words were warming, even though they were only meant for my ears.

Outside, the rain and the wind continued. The trees beyond the school grounds swayed and creaked, and when we went into the gym at the end of the break, the wind was gusting against the external walls with such force that it sounded like waves hitting them. The ventilation grilles howled and wheezed as though the building were alive, a huge beast full of rooms, corridors, and shafts that had settled here beside the school, and in its despondency sang lonely laments. Or perhaps it was the sounds that were alive, I wondered, sitting on the bench in the changing room and undressing. They rose and fell, whirled around for a while, drifting here, drifting there, as if in the middle of a game. I stood up, naked, took my towel, and went into the shower, which was already hot with the steam. I found a place among the throng of pale, almost marble-white boys' bodies, and was engulfed by the hot water that first hit the top of my head and then ran in steady streams down my face and chest, neck and back. My hair stuck to my forehead and I closed my eyes. That was when someone shouted.

"Tor's got a hard-on! Tor's got a hard-on!"

I opened my eyes and looked over at Sverre, the boy who had shouted. He was pointing across the narrow room to where Tor was standing, with his arms down by his sides, his dick in the air, and a smile on his face.

Tor had the biggest dick in the class, well, perhaps, in the whole school. It dangled between his legs like a classic pork sausage and it was no secret because he always wore tight trousers and he placed it at an angle, pointing upward, so that everyone could see. Yes, it was big. But now, in its erect state, it was enormous.

"Jumpin' Jehoshaphat," Geir Håkon shouted.

Everyone looked at him, there was a sudden excitement in the atmosphere, and it was obvious something had to be done. Such an extraordinary circumstance could not be allowed to go to waste.

"Let's take him to Fru Hensel!" Sverre shouted. "Come on, quick, before it's too late!"

Fru Hensel was our gym teacher. She came from Germany, spoke broken Norwegian, was strict, neat, and prim, which was emphasized by her narrow glasses and her tightly pinned-up hair. She was meticulous yet distant, in sum what we called snooty. As a teacher she was a nightmare because she had a predilection for gym apparatus and hardly ever let us play soccer. When Sverre suggested taking Tor to her – she was tidying up in the gymnasium, still with her whistle around her neck, wearing her blue tunic and white tights – we all knew it was perfect.

"No," Tor said. "Don't do that!"

Sverre and Geir went over and grabbed him by the arms.

"Come on!" Sverre shouted. "We need a couple more of you!"

Dag Magne went over, and with Geir B, they grabbed Tor's legs and lifted him. Tor protested and writhed as they carried him out of the shower, but rather halfheartedly. The rest of us followed. And it was quite a sight. Tor, stark naked with an enormous bone, carried by four boys, also naked, followed by a procession of more naked boys, through the changing room and into the large, cold gymnasium where Fru Hensel, who was around thirty years old, turned to us from the stage at the far end.

"What do you want?" she said.

Those carrying Tor ran over with him. Once in front of Fru Hensel, they straightened him up as though he were a statue to be examined, left him like that for five seconds or so, then laid him down, and charged back to the changing room.

Fru Hensel said nothing, other than No, no, boys, this really is not a good idea and she did nothing. There were no screams, no howls, no bulging eyes, and no gaping mouth, as perhaps we had hoped. Nevertheless, it had been a success. We had shown her Tor's massive hard-on.

In the changing room afterward we discussed what would happen now. Few believed there would be any consequences, for the simple reason that it would be embarrassing for her to take the matter any further. We were wrong. It turned into a big affair, the headmaster came to the class, the four boys who had carried Tor were given detentions, and the rest of us a lecture we would never forget. The only person to come out of this with his honor intact was Tor, who now emerged as a victim – the headmaster, the class teacher, and Fru Hensel regarded the incident as a case of bullying – and a winner, for now everyone knew, also the girls, this sensational detail of his physique without his having to lift a finger.

That night I posed naked in front of the mirror for a long time.

It was easier said than done. The only full-length mirror we had was in the hall by the stairs. I couldn't exactly stand there naked, even if there was no one in the house because someone could come at any moment and even if I reacted quickly they would still see my butt beating a swift retreat up the stairs.

No, it had to be the bathroom mirror.

But it was designed solely for faces. If you got up close and had your legs as far back as possible you could catch a glimpse of your body but from such a bizarre angle that it told you nothing.

So I waited until Mom had finished washing up after dinner and taken a seat in the living room with the newspaper and a cup of coffee. Then I went into the kitchen and fetched a chair. If she asked what I was doing with it, I could say I was going to put the cassette recorder on it while I was in the bath. If she asked why it couldn't be on the floor as usual, I could say I had heard water and electricity were dangerous if they came into contact, and water often slopped on the floor when I had a bath.

But she didn't ask.

I locked the door, undressed, placed the chair by the wall, and clambered up.

First I looked at the front of my body.

My dick wasn't like Tor's, not at all. More like a little cork. Or a kind of spring because it quivered when you flicked it lightly.

I put it in my hand. How big was it?

Then I turned and looked at it from the side. In fact, it seemed a bit bigger then.

Anyway, it looked like all the dicks in our class, apart from Tor's, didn't it?

I fared worse with my arms. They were so thin. And my chest was thin. I had a sudden image of it from a Norway Cup photo and the way it tapered the closer it came to my head. And that was definitely not how it was meant to be. I was supposed to do push-ups in training, but I always cheated because in reality, and only I knew this, I couldn't do a single one.

I climbed down from the chair, ran the water into the bath, and while it splashed out from the tiny mouth under the miniature iron girder construction that the two eyes, one red and one blue, rested on, I hurried into my bedroom, grabbed the cassette recorder, inserted Outlandos d'Amour, which for me was bath music, put it on the chair, pressed PLAY, and carefully stepped into the bathtub. The hot water stung my skin so much it was impossible to sit. But I managed. I sat, got up, sat, got up, sat, got up until my skin was used to the temperature and I could lie there letting the heat wash over me while the music poured from the little recorder and I sang "So Lonely" by the Police at the top of my voice, dreaming about becoming famous and what all the girls I knew would say then.

I caught every little nuance in Sting's voice, even the whimper at the end. Now and then I banged my fists on the edge of the bath in my enthusiasm. When the song had finished I dried my hands on a towel, turned the cassette over, and wound forward to "Masoko Tanga," another favorite of mine.

Oh, "Masoko Tanga"!

Afterward I stood in front of the wardrobe in my bedroom looking for clothes to wear. There were still some hours of the evening left.

It had to be the light-blue shirt with the white buttons and the dark-blue Levi's.

"When are we going to buy clothes for the seventeenth of May?" I said to Mom, stopping in front of her in the living room.

"It's only the end of March now," she said. "We've got plenty of time."

"Perhaps it would be cheaper now?" I said.

"We'll have to see," she said. "We haven't got much money now, either, you know, as Dad is studying."

"But we've got a little?" I said.

She smiled.

"Of course you'll have new clothes for the seventeenth."

"And shoes."

"And shoes."

The seventeenth of May was still the high point of spring for us, as Christmas was of the winter. At school we sang "Vi Ere En Nasjon Vi Med," "Norge I Rødt," "Hvitt og Blått," and "Ja, Vi Elsker," we learned about Henrik Wergeland and what happened at Eidsvoll in 1814. At home, ribbons and flags were taken out and all the flutes and horns we could find. On the day itself flags were hoisted on all the masts, and from very early morning families came out of their houses wearing traditional costume, dresses or suits, covered with capes or coats if it was cold or raining, children with flags in their hands, now and then an instrument case, for quite a few of my neighbors played in marching bands and wore uniforms instead of their finery, which they changed into later. The uniform of the Tromøya school band consisted of a mustard-yellow jacket and black trousers with a white stripe down the sides and a black Foreign Legion–style kepi on top. Their chests were festooned with medals acquired at the innumerable gatherings they had attended. Then car after car left front drives, onto the road and into Arendal, where you had to park well outside the center because people were trickling in from every direction and the streets were packed with crowds lining the long road along which the procession would pass. And the procession, that was us. We assembled in Tyholmen, beneath the standard of Sandnes School, which we were proud to walk behind in an almost endlessly long line consisting not only of all Arendal's schools but all the schools in the district. Then we walked in two lines up and down the streets, in a sea of people, which you had to keep a constant eye on, because your parents, whom you had to wave to and who had to take a photo of you, could be anywhere.

That day, the seventeenth of May, 1980, was different from all the other Constitution Days I had experienced. It was raining when we got up, and I was upset about that because I had to wear a waterproof anorak and trousers over my new clothes. I had been given light-blue Levi's, a pair of white Tretorn tennis shoes, and a grayish-white, waist-length jacket. I was especially pleased with the jeans. Outside the houses up the hill there were sporadic protracted laments from the instruments the kids were carrying. Car doors slammed, shouts carried across garden paths, the atmosphere was feverish but expectant. As we approached the assembly area in Tyholmen, with the skies opening in unfailingly regular bursts of drizzle, it became clear that we would be walking side by side with a class from Roligheden School. I played soccer with some of them, but I had never seen many of the faces.

A girl turned.

She had wavy blond hair, large blue eyes, and she smiled at me.

I didn't smile back, but I held her gaze and then she turned forward.

The procession began to move. Somewhere far ahead a band was playing. One of our teachers began to sing and we joined in. After marching for perhaps twenty minutes many began to find their patience waning, especially the boys, we started laughing and fooling around, and when some boys used the flag to lift girls' skirts, and the idea caught on, I made my way toward the blond girl, along with Dag Magne, fortunately, so that I was part of something and not just on my own. I put the flag under the pleat of her skirt and lifted, she spun on her heel, held it down with one hand, and shouted, Don't you dare, don't you dare. But the eyes that looked at me were smiling.

I did it to some other girls as well, until it would no longer be suspicious if I approached her again.

"Don't do that!" she said this time, and ran ahead, away from me. "Don't be so childish!"

Was she really angry?

Seconds passed. Then she turned and smiled. Briefly, but it was enough, she wasn't angry, she didn't think I was childish.

But wasn't that an Østland accent?

Was she not from here? Was she only visiting?

Then I would never see her again.

No, no, no. Relax. Visitors wouldn't be allowed in the school procession!

I suddenly noticed the flag I was holding and raised it. Last seventeenth of May Dad was annoyed I had let the flag droop as I passed them.

Dag Magne beamed his broadest smile. A camera flashed. His parents were in the front row. They were unlike their normal selves, their Sunday best looked strange on them.

I observed the girl again.

She wasn't very tall and she was wearing a pink jacket, a light-blue skirt, and thin, white stockings. Her nose was small, her mouth large, and she had a little cleft in her chin.

I felt pains in my stomach.

When she spun round to stop her skirt being lifted I had seen that she had big breasts, her jacket had been open and the white sweater beneath insubstantial.

Oh, dear God, please let me go out with her.

"Hi, Karl Ove!" Mom shouted from somewhere. I scanned the rows of people. There they were, on the other side of the street from Hotel Phønix. Mom waved and lifted her camera to her eye, Dad sent me a nod.

On our way back to the center she turned and looked at me again. Straight afterward the procession broke up and she was lost in the crowd.

I didn't even know her name.

After the school procession in Arendal everyone drove back home to the estate, where clothes were changed, food was eaten, and perhaps also TV broadcasts of the children's processions around the country were watched before everyone piled into their cars, rather more informally dressed, and headed for Hove, where the climax of the celebrations would take place. Here there were stalls selling hot dogs, ice cream, and pop, stalls where you could buy a lottery ticket and play tombola, organized games, and a huge crowd of children with ten-krone notes burning a hole in their pockets, running here to buy a hot dog, running there to jump in a sack race, with ketchup on their sleeves and ice cream smeared around their mouths and a bottle of Coke with a straw in their hands. We hadn't quite outgrown that, but the speed with which we did everything had perhaps dropped, compared with the previous year. For my part, I searched for the girl in the procession all afternoon, if I caught sight of a pink jacket or a blue skirt my heart almost stopped beating, but it was never her, she wasn't there. Even if I knew which class she was in and even if I played soccer with two boys who were in the same class as her, I couldn't ask them, they would realize straightaway what was going through my mind and wouldn't hesitate for a moment, they would spread it far and wide. However, sooner or later I would see her again, that much I did know, Tromøya was not that big.

Dad moved home two weeks later, proud to have finished his studies in a matter of months. He had sold his stamp collection, he had given up his political commitments, the garden was immaculate, he was so on top of his teaching it was boring. What he was doing was applying for new jobs. And if he got one, we would move. He hoped the coming year as a bog-standard ungdomskole teacher would be his last.

He bought himself a boat at the beginning of the summer, a Rana Fisk 17 with a twenty-five-horsepower outboard motor. Mom, Yngve, and I were standing on the pontoons when he came back from Arendal for the first time. He was standing behind the wheel as the boat skimmed across the water and although he didn't smile or wave to us I could see he felt proud.

He eased back on the throttle and the prow of the boat sank, but not enough for him to be able to turn into our berth as he had planned, the boat overshot and bumped into the pontoon. He reversed, put the engine into gear, and glided in. Threw the mooring rope to Mom, who didn't quite know what to do with it.

"Does it go well?" I said.

"Yes, it certainly does," he said. "You saw, didn't you?"

He jumped ashore with a red gasoline canister in his hand. Secured the tarpaulin, stood for a moment inspecting the boat, then we got into the car and drove up toward home, with Dad at the wheel even though it was Mom's car.

When the school year began I had to join him casting nets in the afternoons and pulling them up at the crack of dawn. We gulped down a couple of pieces of bread, our faces drawn with tiredness, and then we went into the darkness. He started the car and drove down to the pontoons, which lay quiet and deserted, undid the green tarpaulin on the boat, put the red canister of gasoline in its place, loosened the mooring ropes, got the engine going, and carefully reversed out. I sat at the front, behind the windshield, shoulders hunched, arms close to my body, and hands in my pockets because it was cold, and even though the boat was faster than the old double-ender, the trip to the far side of the island still took over half an hour. Dad stood at the wheel concentrating on steering through the narrow passage between the shore and the island of Gjerstadholmen, where there was some sunken rock he had run onto earlier that summer. As we emerged into Tromøya Sound he sat down and we plowed across, with the waves thumping against the underside of the plastic propeller and spray hurtling through the air. He usually set the nets quite close to the shore and it was my job to sit in the bow and grab the floats to which they were attached. It was difficult, they were slippery, and if I didn't succeed the first time Dad told me to get my act together, all I had to do was pick them up. My hands were already freezing, the water was obviously ice cold, and out here, in open sea, there was always a wind blowing early in the morning. Dad's hair was in wild disarray, his eyes flashed with annoyance as he reversed and steered into the wind again, and if I didn't grab the float this time, he would shout at me and I would start to cry, and then he would become even more angry and perhaps stomp forward to grab it himself, while telling me to take the wheel, steer into the fricking wind, he would say, into the wind, I told you, you idiot! Can't you do anything! Steering's not so easy, I said, and he replied, it's not steewing, it's steering! RRR. STEERING! I was crying and frozen and Dad leaned over the railing and pulled the float on board. Then, as we rocked on the waves, with the dawn light a stripe on the horizon, and he pulled up the net, the glow of fury in his eyes gradually abated and he would try to mitigate the effect of his outburst, but it was too late, the cold was as deep in my soul as it was in my hands, I hated him as you can only hate your father, and on the way back, with the fish still squirming in the white tub, not a word passed between us. While he gutted the fish in the utility room I packed my satchel and left for the day, which for my classmates had only just begun, but which for me had already lasted several hours.

That same autumn our band finally became a reality. The name I chose won the day, it was to be Blood Clot we wrote on our jackets and satchels, and we practiced in the basement of the new chapel. Dag Magne had arranged it, his mother did the cleaning for a doctor who was also on the church committee. He was also the only one of us who could play or evince anything that was redolent of musical talent. He played the guitar and sang, I played the guitar, Kent Arne played the bass his mother had bought for him, Dag Lothar played the drums. At the end-of-term Christmas party we were lined up to play in the gymnasium. Yngve had taught me the chords for "Forelska I Lærer'n," the Kids' big hit, "In Love with the Teacher," and even though playing that song of all songs was like sucking up, at least for me, it was the easiest song Yngve knew, and probably the only song in existence that was simple enough for us to play. Although the band came apart at the seams in the process, everyone played at their own tempo, and Kent Arne started tuning the bass in the middle, and although most of the audience was critical, even the fourth-years ventured a few remarks, and rightly so, we couldn't play, the feeling among us afterward, standing in the school playground, dressed in ripped jeans and denim jackets, and with scarves around our necks, could not be surpassed. We were in the sixth class, would soon be in the ungdomskole, and we were in a band. The fact that the band split up straight afterward, as neither Dag Lothar nor Kent Arne wanted to continue, was a setback, but Dag Magne and I carried on as a duo, for as long as it lasted, recording songs in his house, listening to music, dreaming of a breakthrough, for example at the locally famous Saga Nights, which would be in Arendal during the summer and at which new bands were allowed to play. I went up to see Håvard, who played in the town's only punk band, was five years older than us, and lived by Tromøya Bridge, and asked him if he could help us to get in. He couldn't promise anything, but he would put in a good word and we would have to wait and see.

That spring, at a school parents' evening, we performed two songs, Dag Magne on guitar and me on snare drums, first of all one I had written myself, "Tramp på en Soss," Stamp on a Snob, and then Åge Aleksandersen's "Ramp," Riff-Raff. Before we played, I gave a little introductory talk about punk to the parents.

"In recent years a completely new form of music has sprung up in the English working classes," I explained. "Some of you may have heard about it. It's called punk. Those who play punk are not great musicians but rebels who want to rebel against society. They wear leather jackets and studded belts and they've got safety pins everywhere. You could say the safety pin is their symbol."

I gazed enthusiastically across the assembly of hairdressers, secretaries, nurses, house helpers, and housewives. I was twelve years old and before every Christmas and summer for the last five years they had seen me standing on the stage, either as Joseph in the Nativity play or the mayor in Borgmester I Byen, and now here I was again, this time as a spokesman for punk and a member of Blood Clot.

"We're going to give you a sampler of this type of music. We'll begin with a song we wrote ourselves. It's entitled 'Tramp på en Soss.'"

Then Dag Magne, who had been standing beside me with his twelve-string guitar over his shoulder, started to play while I hit the snare drum when the whim took me.

Our next performance was in a lesson. We played the same two songs. After we had finished, most of the class whistled and the teacher, the red-bearded Finsådal, went over to Dag Magne and said his guitar playing was beginning to take off.

That hurt.

In response, in the deepest secrecy, I sent a letter to NRK, who broadcast a program where children could perform with their idols, and I wrote that I would like to play "Ramp" with Åge Aleksandersen.

For a long time I lived in hope, but no answer ever came, and slowly the dream of overnight fame as a pop star faded while another appeared: our coach, Øyvind, gathered us together at the end of a training session and said that we might be playing the pre-match game before IK Start versus Mjøndalen. For me, who, the year before, had been at the League Cup Final in Kristiansand Stadium and had seen Start win the match in the dying seconds, who had charged onto the field with several hundred others, stood under the building where the changing rooms were, singing and cheering and paying tribute to the players and even getting my hands on Svein Mathiesen's shirt, only to have it ripped from my grasp by a grown man with piggy eyes a second later, for me, who every alternate Sunday over many years had been to all the home games and whose uncle Gunnar actually knew Svein Mathiesen a little, enough to get an autograph for Yngve, for me, playing at Kristiansand Stadium, with the opportunity to be seen not only by the whole of the immense crowd but also by the players themselves, this was charged with enormous significance. The team I played for was one of the region's best, we won most matches by several goals, and had won the league every single year I had been involved, and I always thought my being one of the worst players on the team, slow and without much skill, was a temporary state of affairs, actually I was good, actually I could do everything as well as the others, it was just a question of time before it would become evident. I felt like this because in my mind I could knock in goals from every conceivable and inconceivable angle, like John, and steam past whoever was on the wing, like Hans Christian. All I needed to do was align my actions with my thoughts, making them one and the same, and then it was done. Why couldn't that happen during a pre-match game at Kristiansand Stadium just as easily as at a training session in Hove? Was it not the case that I always got better over the weeks in the autumn? In fact, from out of nowhere could I not actually ghost past one player after the other?

Yes, that was how it was. It was all in my head. And despite the fact that I still hadn't shown any of what I hoped for, strangely enough, I still had a regular spot in the midfield. Early that spring we had played our first practice match on the shale field outside the new Tromøya Sports Hall above Roligheden School, and when I was brought off at some point during the second half, my eyes were full of tears as I left the field. Even though I was looking down, the trainer realized and ran after me as I headed for the changing room. I should have stayed to see the rest of the match, but partly I was so disappointed to have been taken off that I couldn't be bothered, and partly I didn't want anyone else to see me crying.

"What's up, Karl Ove?" he said.

"Nothing," I said.

"Is it because you were taken off? Everyone has to have a go, you know. It doesn't mean you've been dropped from the team. It doesn't. It was just for today. It's a practice match."

I smiled through my tears.

"It's nothing," I said. "It's okay."

"Sure?"

"Yes," I said, feeling fresh tears building up.

"Good," he said.

After that I wondered perhaps if I would be allowed to play because he felt sorry for me, or if he didn't want to repeat the experience. It wasn't a pleasant thought, but actually being on the team meant a great deal to me, my shortcomings notwithstanding.

We trained and played home games at Kjenna, a ground immediately below the big estate in Brattekleiv and most of the boys I played with came from there.

That was when I saw her again.

The beginning of June, blue sky, not a cloud in sight. We played between cones placed in the middle of one half of the field because around the goals and in the center circle the grass was already cut up and the soil eroded, and even though the sun was low and the shadows from the trees stretched across the field it was so hot that sweat ran down my face and neck as we ran around after the ball. Birds sang in the trees on both sides of the field, gulls screamed, the occasional car roared past, somewhere in the distance the drone of a lawnmower rose and fell, and down by the makeshift changing rooms came squeals and laughter, a group of children in the hot, brown water of the Tjenna, all while we panted and puffed and kicked and the ball thudded between us. I was on the best team this season, playing with boys a year older than me whereas, because of how my birthday fell, I would be doing the same next year as last year, playing with boys a year younger. We were on top of the league by some distance, and in a month's time we would be going to the Norway Cup again, not without some hope of going all the way and playing the final in Ullevål Stadium. I had white Umbro shorts and a pair of Le Coq Sportif boots, which I polished after every session and could still turn round in my hand and admire with immense pleasure and satisfaction.

This evening four girls jumped off their bikes at the end of the field, pressed down the kickstands, and strolled laughing and chatting over to the side by the rocks, where they sat down to watch us. Girls did sometimes come and watch us like this, but I had never seen her there before. For it was her, there was no doubt. This time she was wearing blue jeans and a white T-shirt.

For the rest of the session my awareness of her never left me for a moment. Everything I did, I did for her. When we had finished playing, done our stretching exercises, and the XL1 bottles had been passed around I sat down on the grass below them with Lars and Hans Christian. They shouted some insults up to the girls and received laughter and more insults in return.

"Do you know them?" I said as warily as I could.

"Yes," said Lars, bored.

"Are they in your class?"

"Yes. Kajsa and Sunnva. The others are in HC's class."

So she was called either Kajsa or Sunnva.

I leaned back with my hands behind my head on the grass and my eyes squinting into the rays of the orange sun. One of the others ducked the whole of his head into a bucket of water by the touchline. He straightened up and tossed his head. The drops of water formed a glittering arc in the air for a brief instant before dissipating. With prong-like fingers he plowed both hands through his wet hair.

"I've seen one of them before," I said. "The one on the far right. What's her name?"

"Kajsa?"

"Oh, really?"

Lars glanced at me. He had curly hair, freckles, and a slightly cheeky expression, but his eyes were warm and always had a glint.

"We're neighbors," he said. "I've known her since I learned to walk. Are you interested?"

"No-oo," I said.

Lars bored a rigid finger in my chest a few times.

"Ye-es," he grinned. "Shall I introduce you?"

"Introduce?" I said, my mouth suddenly dry.

"Isn't that what it's called, you who knows everything?"

"Yes, I suppose it is. No. Not now. That is, not at all. I'm not interested. I was just wondering. I thought I had seen her before."

"Kajsa's nice, she is," Lars said. Then he whispered: "And she's got big breasts."

"Yes," I said. I turned without thinking and looked at her. Lars laughed and got up. She looked at me.

She looked at me!

I got up, too, and followed Lars down to the changing rooms.

"Can I have some?" I said.

He threw me the XL1 bottle, I leaned back and squirted the greenish liquid through the long, narrow plastic pipe and down my throat.

"Are you going for a shower?" he said.

"No, I've got to go home," I said.

"Perhaps Kajsa will be in the showers, too," he said.

"You think?" I said. He eyed me. I shook my head. He smiled. Behind us the others straggled in. In the changing room I just put on my T-shirt, tracksuit top, and shoes, then I placed my bag on the rack of my bike and cycled home along the old gravel road through the forest where the air soon cooled in places the sun hadn't been shining for a while, and I had to close my mouth because these cool, gray pockets buzzed with large swarms of insects. The sun shone on the ridge close by, still bare after a fire the previous year, before it disappeared where the hills began and tall, dense spruce trees lined both sides of the road like a wall. My bike was the same one I'd had since I was small, a DBS kombi, with the seat and the handlebars raised as far as they would go, which made it look like a kind of mutant, a bike's first, clumsy transition from a bike. I sang at the top of my voice as I raced between all the bumps and potholes and sometimes skidded sideways with a static rear wheel.

Shoot, Shoot!
Dodiddilidodo
Shoot, Shoot!
Dodiddilidodo
Shoot, Shoot!
Dodiddilidodo

You come all flattarp he come
Groovin' out slowly he got
Ju ju eyeball he won
Holy roller he got
Here down to his knees
Got to be a joker, he just do what he pleases

Shoot, Shoot!
Dodiddilidodo
Shoot, Shoot!
Dodiddilidodo
Shoot, Shoot!
Dodiddilidodo

That was the opening track on the Abbey Road LP, "Come Together," or at least how it sounded to my ears. Well, I knew it wasn't exactly what they sang, but what did it matter as I whizzed down the hill in the forest, absolutely throbbing with happiness? Down at the crossroads I braked in front of a car, then picked up speed and pedaled as hard as I could up the gravel on the other side. I swallowed a midge or two and tried in vain to cough them up, crossed the main road at the top of Speedmannsbakken, and followed the cycle path down to the Fina station, where a gang of kids was sitting at the tables outside and not, as in winter, in the café. Their bikes and mopeds were parked a little way from them. I wasn't frightened of going in there anymore, the worst that could happen was that someone might make a comment, but I still didn't like it, so when I passed them it was on the other side of the road. There were three from my class with them this evening, John, and I also saw Tor and Unni, and then Mariann from the parallel class. I had been out with her. No one took any notice of me, if indeed they saw me at all.

The quickest way to cycle home was along the main road, but I jumped off on the way up to the path and began to push my bike uphill. As soon as the trees closed off the view of the main road behind me the scenery became rural and I liked the change enough to relish the extra minutes it took.

Then it was all forest, not a house or a road to be seen, there were trees everywhere, tall, broad-crowned deciduous trees, crammed with green leaves, full of chattering birds. The path, which was no more than beaten earth and bare rock face, was crossed in several places by huge roots resembling prehistoric animals. The grass growing alongside the bed of a stream was thick and lush, in the wilderness at the bottom there were fallen trees with smooth trunks, and many plants covered the bed between the dry, lifeless branches, which had been there for as long as I could remember, and behind them there was a ridge of stumps between the long grass and the new trees that had shot up. Walking down the first hundred meters of the path, you could imagine the forest was deep, indeed, endlessly deep, and full of mystery. It wasn't hard to dismiss the thought that between the branches in autumn and winter you could glimpse the long, rocky slope down from the road that went around the estate or glimpse the orange roof of one of the houses. The problem is not so much that the world limits your imagination as your imagination limits the world. But this time I was not outside to play but to surround myself with nature and to cultivate the feeling of liberation Kajsa's gaze had given me.

Kajsa, her name was Kajsa!

With my bike bumping along beside me, I trudged up the hills, across the gentle slope, then jumped on my bike again when I emerged on the road, just below the parish hall. Outside Ketil's house the road teemed with kids playing soccer. His father sat in a camping chair on the terrace wearing shorts, with his belly bulging out of an open, short-sleeved shirt. Smoke wafted over from a barbecue not far away from him.

Oh, the smell!

On the other side, Tom was washing his car. He was wearing large aviator glasses and denim shorts with long, frayed threads hanging down his thighs, otherwise nothing. I recognized the music blaring out through the open doors, which made the car look like a small, plump airplane, it was Dr. Hook. Then I reached the hill and saw the distant blue of Tromøya Sound behind the green trees, and the white gas holders on the other side. The wind forced tears from my eyes as I hurtled downhill. Another crowd of kids was playing on the road outside our house. Marianne's little brother, Geir Håkon's little brother, Bente's little brother, and Jan Atle's little brother. They said hello, I didn't say hello back, I jumped off my bike, and trundled it down the drive, where there were two cars. There was Anne Mai's big Citroën and Dagny's 2cv. I had completely forgotten they were coming, and a little shiver of pleasure went through me when I saw them.

They were sitting in the living room with Mom. She had baked a cake, perhaps there was a third left, and she had made coffee. Now they were chatting, wreathed in clouds of smoke. I said hello, they asked how I was, I said fine, I had been at soccer practice, had the school holiday started, they asked, I answered yes, and it was wonderful. Anne Mai took out a packet of Freia Ms.

"I suppose you're too old for these now?"

"Not for Ms," I said. "You're never too old for them, are you?"

I took the bag and turned to go into the kitchen when Anne Mai said: "What on earth's that on your back? Trauma?"

She laughed.

"His soccer team's called Trauma," Mom said.

"Trauma!" Dagny said. Now all three of them were laughing.

"What's wrong with it?" I said.

"That's what we work with, you know. It's when something terrible happens. You can have trauma. It was quite funny to see it on your back."

"Oh," I said. "But that's not what it means. It comes from Thruma, the old name for Tromøya. From Viking times."

They were still laughing when I went to my room. I put the Specials on the cassette recorder and lay down to read while the last rays of sun were shining on the wall beyond the bed, and the estate outside was slowly draining of noise.

Kajsa was constantly on my mind over the following weeks. I had two recurrent images of her. In one she was turning to me, with her blond hair and blue eyes, wearing the pink and light-blue clothes of the seventeenth of May. In the second she was lying naked in front of me in a field. The latter I saw every night before I went to sleep. The thought of her big, white breasts with the pink nipples made my body ache. I lay writhing while imagining various indistinct but intense things I did with her. The second image aroused something else in me, and at other moments: jumping from a cliff on the island, floating in the air with the sun on my face, I caught a glimpse of her and a wild cheer broke free from my innards, more or less at the same instant as my feet hit the surface and my body plunged into the bluish-green seawater, breaking my fall of several meters, and, surrounded by a rush of bubbles and with the taste of salt on my lips, I headed for the surface again with slow arm movements and a quiver of happiness in my chest. Or at the dinner table, while I was peeling the skin off a piece of cod, for example, or chewing a mouthful of hashed lung, which had such an unpleasant consistency, it swelled and filled my mouth at first, but when I chewed, my teeth went right through the mass, which only resisted at the last, when it stuck to my gums, then the image of her could suddenly appear and she was so radiant that everything else was pushed into the shadows. But I didn't see her at all in reality. The distance as the crow flew between our two estates could have been only a few kilometers, but the social distance was greater and could not be covered by either bike or bus. Kajsa was a dream, an image in my head, a star in the firmament.

Then something happened.

We were playing a match on the Kjenna field, the spring season was actually over, but a game had been cancelled and moved forward, so there we were, running around the grass in the heat with the usual ten to fifteen spectators when from the corner of my eye I espied three figures walking along the touchline, and I knew at once it was her. For the rest of the match I watched the spectators standing on the slope as much as the ball.

After the match a girl came over to me.

"Can I have a word with you?" she said.

"Yes, of course," I said.

A hope so wild it made me smile was lit inside me.

"Do you know who Kajsa is?" she said.

I reddened and looked down.

"Yes," I said.

"She wants me to ask you a question," she said.

"Pardon," I said.

A wave of heat surged up inside me, as though my chest were filling with blood.

"Kajsa was wondering if you would like to go out with her," she said. "Would you?"

"Yes," I said.

"Great," she said. "I'll tell her."

She made a move to leave.

"Where is she?" I said.

She turned.

"She's waiting over by the changing room," she said. "Will we see you there afterward?"

"Yes," I said. "That's fine."

As she went away I looked down at the ground for a second.

Thank God, I said to myself. Because now it had happened. Now I was going out with Kajsa!

Was it true?

Was I really going out with Kajsa?

With Kajsa.

Dazed, I began to walk along the touchline. Suddenly it struck me that I had a big problem. She was there and waiting for me. I would have to speak to her. We would have to do something together. What would it be?

On my way into the changing room I could either pretend I didn't see her or just flash a fleeting smile because I had to go in and change. But when I had to go out again . . .

It was a mild evening, the air smelled of grass and was filled with birdsong, we had won, and the voices rising from the changing room were animated. Kajsa was standing in the road nearby with two other girls. She was holding her bike and glanced at me when I looked over. She smiled. I smiled back.

"Hi," I said.

"Hi," she said.

"I'll just get changed," I said. "Be out afterward."

She nodded.

In the shedlike changing room I undressed as slowly as possible while feverishly trying to find a way to extricate myself with honor. To go off with her, unprepared, was inconceivable, it would never work. So I had to find a convincing excuse.

Homework? I wondered, loosening a shin pad, slippery with sweat on the inside. No, that would give a bad impression of me.

I put one shin pad in the bag and took off the other, staring at the lake through the small window. Unwound the bandage from my foot and rolled it up. The first boys had already gone out. "Jesus Christ, are you crazy or what?" John said to Jostein, who was smacking John's face with a goalie's glove. "Give it up, you bastard," John shouted. I'm going out with Kajsa, I felt like saying, but I didn't, of course. Got up and put on my light-blue jeans instead.

"What posh pants," Jostein said.

"You're the one with posh pants," I said.

"These?" he said, motioning toward his red-and-black-striped trousers.

"Yes," I said.

"They're punk trousers, you jerk," he said.

"They're not," I said. "They're from Intermezzo, and that is definitely a posh shop."

"Is the belt posh, too?" he said.

"No," I said. "It's a punk belt."

"Good," he said. "But your pants are definitely pretty posh."

"I am not posh," I said.

"But you are a bit of a jessie," John piped up.

A jessie? What did that mean?

"Ha ha ha!" Jostein laughed. "Come on, Jessie!"

"What did you say, you daddy's boy?" I said.

"Is it my fault my father has a lot of money?" he said.

"No," I said, zipping up the blue-and-white Puma top.

"Bye," I said.

"Bye," they said, and I went out to Kajsa, without having prepared anything.

"Hi," I said, stopping in front of them, with my hands around the handlebars.

"You were so good, all of you," Kajsa said.

She was wearing a white T-shirt. Her breasts bulged beneath it. Levi's 501 with a red plastic belt. White socks. White Nike sneakers with a light-blue logo.

I swallowed.

"Do you think so?" I said.

She nodded.

"Are you coming back with us?"

"In fact, I don't have a lot of time this evening."

"No?"

"No. I really should be going now."

"Oh, that's a shame," she said, meeting my eyes. "What have you got to do?"

"I promised I would help my father with something. A wall he was building. But can't we meet tomorrow?"

"Of course."

"Where then?"

"I can go to your place after school."

"Do you know where I live?"

"Tybakken, right?"

"Yes, that's right."

I swung a leg over my bike.

"Bye!" I said.

"Bye!" she said. "See you tomorrow!"

I cycled off, casually to the observer, until I was out of sight, then I stood on the pedals, leaned forward, and began to pump like a wild man. It was absolutely fantastic and absolutely awful. Go to your place, she had said. She had known where I lived. And she wanted to be with me. Not only that. We were going out. I was going out with Kajsa! Oh, everything I wanted was now within reach! Though not yet. What would I talk to her about? What would we do?

When I turned into our drive half an hour later, Mom was sitting on the terrace behind the house reading the newspaper with a cup of coffee on the camping table in front of her. I went over and sat down.

"Where's Dad?" I said.

"He's gone fishing," she said. "How was the match?"

"Good," I said. "We won."

Brief silence.

"Has something happened?" Mom said, looking at me.

"No," I said.

"Something on your mind?"

"No, not really," I said.

She sent me a smile and went on reading the newspaper. The sound of a radio wafted over from Prestbakmo's. I looked up. Martha was sitting, like Mom, in a camping chair with a newspaper spread out in front of her. Nearby, next to the stone wall facing the forest, Prestbakmo himself was bent over a bed in the vegetable garden with a trowel in his hand. Then a movement on the path made me turn my head. It was Freddie, I saw at once, he was an albino and his white hair was unmistakable. He was in the fourth class and had an archery bow on his back.

I looked at Mom again.

"Do you know what a 'jessie' is, Mom?" I said.

She lowered the newspaper.

"A jessie?" she said.

"Yes."

"No, not really. But it is a girl's name."

"So, like a girl?"

"I suppose so. Why do you ask? Have you been called a 'jessie'?"

"No, not at all. I just heard it after the match today. Someone else was called it. I just hadn't heard it before."

She glanced at me, I could see she was on the point of saying something, and I got up.

"Oh well," I said. "Better bring my soccer gear in."

After supper I went into Yngve's room and told him what had happened.

"I got together with Kajsa this evening," I said.

He looked up from the school books spread over his desk and smiled.

"Kajsa? I haven't heard her name before. Who's she?"

"She's at Roligheden. In the sixth class. She looks really good."

"I don't doubt that," Yngve said. "Congratulations."

"Thanks," I said. "But there's just one thing . . . I need some advice . . ."

"Yeah?"

"I don't know . . . Well, I don't know her at all. I don't know . . . what should we do? She's coming over tomorrow, and I don't even know what to say!"

"It'll be fine," Yngve said. "Just don't think about and it'll be fine. You can always make out instead of talking!"

"Ha ha."

"It'll be fine, Karl Ove. Relax."

"Do you think so?"

"Goes without saying."

"Okay," I said. "What are you doing?"

"Homework. Chemistry. And then geography."

"I'm looking forward to starting at gymnas," I said.

"Lots of reading to do," Yngve said.

"Yes," I said. "All the same."

Yngve turned back to his book and I went to my room. Yngve had just finished the first year at gymnas and I understood he wanted to do social studies while Dad wanted him to do natural sciences, so that was what he had to do. It was a bit odd because Dad's subjects were Norwegian and English.

I put on McCartney II and lay down on the bed wondering what I could say and do the next day. Every so often I had an attack of the shivers. Imagine me actually going out with her! Perhaps she was lying in bed, in her room, in her house, thinking about me this very minute? Perhaps she had gone to bed, perhaps she was wearing only panties in bed? I rolled over onto my stomach and rubbed my groin against the mattress while singing "Temporary Secretary" and thinking about all that lay in store for me.

She arrived an hour after we'd had dinner. I had been pacing by the windows facing the road and was as prepared as I could be. Nevertheless, it was a shock to see her cycling up the hill. For a few seconds I was unable to breathe normally. Kent Arne, Geir Håkon, Leif Tore, and Øyvind were outside, hanging over the handlebars of their bikes, and when they all turned to look at her a rush of pride surged through me. No one had ever seen a more attractive girl in Tybakken. And it was me she had come to see.

I put on my shoes and jacket and went out.

She had stopped by them and was chatting.

I grabbed my bike and pushed it over.

"She was asking where you lived, Karl Ove!" Geir Håkon said.

"Oh yes?" I said to him. Meeting Kajsa's gaze. "Hi," I said. "You found your way here?"

"Yes, it was no problem," she said. "I didn't know exactly which house it was, but . . ."

"Shall we go?" I said.

"All right," she said.

I mounted my bike. She mounted hers.

"See you!" I said to the four boys. I turned to her. "We can go up there."

"Fine," she said.

I knew they were watching us and that they were more than ordinarily envious of me. How on earth had he done it? they were thinking. Where had he met her? And how in the name of all things living and moving had he managed to land her?

After we had cycled part of the way up, Kajsa got off her bike. I did the same. A wind rose through the forest, rustling the leaves beside us, and then it dropped. The sound of tires on pavement. Trouser legs rubbing against each other. The cork heels of her sandals on the road.

I waited for her to come alongside.

"That's a nice jacket," I said. "Where did you get it?"

"Thank you," she said. "At Bajazzo's in Kristiansand."

"Oh," I said.

We reached the crossroads with Elgstien. Her breasts were swaying; my eyes were permanently drawn to them. Did she notice?

"We can go over to the shop and see if anyone's there," I said.

"Sure," she said.

Was she regretting this already?

Should I kiss her now? Would that be right?

We were at the top of the hill and I swung a leg over the bike saddle. Waited until her feet were on the pedals, then I set off. Another gust of wind blew past us. I cycled with one hand and half-turned to her.

"Do you know Lars?" I said.

"Lars, yes," she said. "We're neighbors. And we're in the same class. Do you know him? Of course you do. You're on the same team."

"Yes," I said. "Did you watch the whole match last night?"

"Oh yes. You're a very good team!"

I didn't answer. I put my other hand on the handlebars and freewheeled down the little hill to B-Max. It was closed and there was no one around.

"Doesn't seem to be anyone here," I said. "Want to go to your house?"

"All right," she said.

I decided I would kiss her if a glimmer of a chance arose. And definitely hold her hand. Something had to happen. After all we were girlfriend and boyfriend now.

Kajsa was my girlfriend!

But no chance arose. We cycled along the old gravel road up to Kjenna, which was deserted, up the hills to her house, and stopped outside. We hadn't exchanged many words on the way, but enough to know it hadn't been a disaster.

"Mom and Dad are home," she said. "So you can't come in."

Did that mean I could when they weren't?

"Okay," I said. "But it's late. Maybe I should be getting back."

"Yes, it's pretty far!" she said.

"Shall we meet again tomorrow?" I said.

"I can't," she said. "We're going out in the boat."

"On Thursday then?"

"Yes. Will you come up here?"

"Yes, of course."

The bikes were between us the whole time. It wasn't possible to lean over and kiss her. And perhaps she wouldn't have wanted it either, right in front of her house.

I got back on my bike.

"I'll be off then," I said. "See you!"

"Bye," she said.

And I cycled off as fast as I could.

Well, it could have been worse. I hadn't gotten very far, but nothing had been ruined forever. It couldn't continue like this, I realized, we couldn't just talk, if we did, everything would wither and die. I had to kiss her; we had to do what real boyfriends and girlfriends did. But how to make the move? I had fooled around with Mariann, but I hadn't been that excited about her, it hadn't been a problem, I had just put my arms around her, pulled her to me, and kissed her. I had just taken her hand when we walked side by side. I couldn't do that with Kajsa, though, couldn't just put my arms around her, out of the blue. Imagine she didn't want it! Imagine if I couldn't pull the move off! It had to happen, and it would have to happen next time, that much was certain. And in a suitable place where no one could see us.

Thank God for the boat trip. It gave me two whole days to plan.

As I was about to fall asleep I remembered we had soccer practice on Thursday. That meant I would have to call and tell her. For all of the next day I dreaded it. Our telephone at home was in the hall, everyone could hear what was said, unless I closed the sliding door, but that was bound to arouse their curiosity, so the best would be to call from a telephone booth. There was one by the bus stop opposite the Fina station and I cycled down as late as I could, to be precise, a little after eight. If there was nothing special going on, I had to be home by half past eight, because I had to be in bed by nine-thirty on weekdays, the rule was still inflexible, even though everyone I knew stayed up later.

Having parked my bike outside, I searched for their home number in the telephone directory. What I was going to say had been reverberating around my head.

I dialed the whole number, apart from the last digit, very quickly. Then I waited a few seconds to get my breathing under control and dialed the last digit.

"Pedersen," a woman's voice said.

"May I speak to Kajsa please?" I said hurriedly.

"Who's calling?"

"Karl Ove," I said.

"Just a moment."

There was a pause. I heard footsteps fading into the distance, voices. A bus came down the hill and slowly pulled into the bus stop. I pressed the receiver tighter against my ear.

"Hello?" said Kajsa.

"Is that Kajsa?" I said.

"Yes," she said.

"This is Karl Ove," I said.

"I could hear that!" she said.

"Hi," I said.

"Hi," she said.

"I have to go to soccer tomorrow," I said. "So I can't make it to your house as we agreed."

"Then I'll see you down there. You'll be at Kjenna, won't you?"

"Yes."

Pause.

"Was it nice?" I said.

"Was what nice?"

"The boat trip? Was it nice?"

"Yes."

Pause.

"See you tomorrow then!" I said.

"Yes. Bye," she said.

"Bye."

I put down the receiver and my eyes were met by those of an old teacher in his forties who worked with Dad; he was on the bus and looked away when I saw him. I opened the dusty door and went out. The air was warm and full of the fumes from the idling bus engine. A family with two children was sitting outside the Fina station eating ice cream. As I cycled by, John came out the door. He was holding a helmet in one hand. Bare chest, clogs on his feet.

"Hi, Karl Ove!" he called.

"Hi," I shouted back.

He put on his helmet, it was black with a black visor, and he got on the back of a motorbike. The driver started it up with two hefty kicks. Afterward they roared up the hill behind me. John waved an arm in the air as they raced past. My forehead was soaked with sweat. I ran my hand through my hair. My hand was sweaty, too. But my hair was fine; I had washed it the night before so that it would be perfect for the following day and the date with Kajsa. At the bus stop, on the crest of the hill, outside B-Max, I stopped. Rested my foot against the curbstone.

Suddenly I knew how I would do it.

Only a few weeks ago I had been here, surrounded by a whole crowd of people, with Tor as the center of attention. He had built his own bicycle, mounted a motorbike saddle and an enormous, new cogwheel at the front. He was doing wheelies, back and forth, spitting great gobbets of saliva across the pavement. Merethe, his girlfriend, was also there. I had just been hanging out, with Dag Magne, and we had bumped into them and stayed there. Tor cycled over to Merethe and kissed her. Then he took a watch from his inside pocket, it was on a chain, glanced at it, and said, "Want to see how long we can make out?" Merethe nodded, and then they leaned toward each other and kissed. You could see their tongues working in each other's mouths. She had her eyes closed and her arms around him; he stood with his hands in his pockets and his eyes open. Everyone was watching them. After ten minutes he held up his watch and straightened his back. Wiped his mouth with the back of his hand. "Ten minutes," he said.

That was how to do it. I would take off my watch and ask if we could see how long we could kiss. And then all we had to do was kiss.

I pushed off with my foot and cycled down to Holtet. It was important to find a suitable place. In the forest, of course, but where? Up at her place? No, I didn't know my way around there. It should be somewhere nearby here.

Perhaps not too close to either of us.

We were meeting at her house.

But of course. Oh, yes. In the forest, by the path up from Fina. Under the trees there. That was perfect. No one would see us. The ground was soft. And the light was so wonderful as it fell between the treetops.

So as not to be the very first to arrive at soccer practice the next afternoon, I pushed my bike up all the hills, not that it made much difference, because when I saw the field in front of me it was deserted, covered with clicking, murmuring jets spraying water around, each at its own rhythm. Christian and Hans Christian were sitting on the gate by the entrance squinting at me in the sunshine.

"Anyone have a ball?" I said.

They shook their heads.

"Is it true you're going out with Kajsa?" Christian said.

"Yes," I said, biting my lip to stop myself smiling.

"She's pretty," he said.

Christian had never gone out with any girls, he wasn't the type. But at the Norway Cup the previous summer he had bought a porn magazine from the kiosk outside the school the evening we arrived. Unfortunately for him his father, who coached the juniors, found him lying in his sleeping bag ogling the hypnotic pictures. With everyone on the team watching, he had to go and throw the magazine in the trash and apologize to his father.

"Ye-es," I said.

Soon after, Øyvind came with the balls and keys, and we ran out between the sprinklers to the goal farthest away and we began to take shots while Øyvind switched off the water and moved the sprinklers off the field. When everyone was there we ran around the field a couple of times, did some stretching exercises, and practiced some set pieces before playing seven against seven on half of the field. Kajsa didn't come until close to the end, with the three girls she had been with before. She waved to me; I waved back.

"Concentrate, Karl Ove!" Øyvind shouted. "Training first, girls later!"

After the session I dipped my head in the bucket of water on the touchline and tried to act as normal. But it wasn't easy; the knowledge that she was up there, and not just her, but also her friends, looking at me, was burned into my consciousness.

Then she came down.

"Are you going to get changed?" she said.

I nodded.

"I'll come with you. I've got something to tell you afterward."

Tell me? Was she going to finish it?

I started walking. She stretched out her hand. It brushed against mine. Had it been by chance? Or could I hold it?

I looked at her.

She smiled at me.

I grabbed her hand in one swift movement.

Someone was whispering behind us. I turned. It was Lars and John. They were rolling their eyes. I smiled. She gently squeezed my hand.

The walk across the field had never been as long as it was this evening. Holding her hand was almost more than I could bear; all the time I felt an urge to withdraw my hand to bring this unbearable happiness to an end.

"Hurry up," she said when we were there.

"Okay," I said.

On the bench I leaned back against the wall. My heart was pounding and pounding. Then I pulled myself together, threw on my clothes, and left. Kajsa's friends were standing on the road beneath the field with their bikes. I went over and stood beside Kajsa. She looked happy. She stroked a strand of hair from her face with her small hand. Her nails were painted in a semi-transparent pink varnish. Her friends got on their bikes as if at a signal and cycled off.

"This Saturday I'll be at home without my parents," she said. "I've told Mom that Sunnva's coming. So she's going to make a pizza and buy Coke for us. But Sunnva isn't coming. Would you like to come?"

I swallowed.

"Sure," I said.

Some of the other boys on the team cheered us from the shed. Kajsa stood with one hand on the handlebars and the other down by her side.

"Shall we go?" I said.

"Let's," she said.

"Down?" I said.

She nodded and we got on our bikes. We pedaled along the shaded gravel road, me in front, Kajsa right behind. At the crest of the long hill I braked so that we could race down side by side. The sun lit up the ridge on the other side. The insects swarming in the air were like glitter someone had scattered. Halfway down, there was an old forest track to the right and it suddenly struck me that it might lead to a suitable place, so with the wind streaming through our hair I shouted to Kajsa that we would go up there, she nodded, we turned off and must have gone ten meters before our bikes slowed down and we dismounted. She said nothing, I said nothing, we walked up the grassy track strewn with bark and bits of tree. Reaching the top and looking into the forest I could see it wasn't suitable. The ground was covered with tree stumps and where they stopped, the spruces were so close together it was like a wall.

"No," I said. "That's no good. Let's go on."

Kajsa still said nothing, just got on her bike as well and coasted down, standing on the pedals and braking harder than me.

No, the path above the Fina station was the place to be.

The thought sent a wave of terror through me. It was like having climbed up a rock too high and looking down at the water, knowing you either had to conquer your fear and dive or chicken out.

Did she know what was going to happen?

I sneaked a glance at her.

Oh, the ripple of her breasts.

Oh, oh, oh.

But her face was serious. What did that mean?

We jumped off our bikes and walked up the hill to the main road, beneath the deep shadows from the trees whose tops stretched far above us. We hadn't said a word since we were in Kjenna. If I said something now it had to be important, it couldn't be some triviality.

Her trousers were cotton, a pastel green color and secured around the waist by a rope belt. They hung loose over her thighs but were tighter around the groin and across the bottom. On her chest, she was wearing a T-shirt with a thin cardigan over it, which was white with a hint of yellow. Her sandaled feet were bare. Her toenails were painted with the same polish as her fingers. She had a chain around one ankle.

She looked fantastic.

When we came to the main road and only a long hill down and a long hill up separated us from what was to happen, what I most wanted to do was cycle off and leave her. Just step on the pedals and cycle out of her life. And then why stop at that? I could cycle from our house. Tybakken, Tromøya, Aust-Agder, Norway, Europe, I could leave everything behind me. I would be called the Cycling Dutchman. Damned forever to cycle around the world, with a ghostly light from the lamp on the handlebars illuminating the country roads.

"Where are we going actually?" she said as we sped down the hill.

"I know somewhere nice," I said. "It's not far."

She didn't say anything. We cycled past the Fina station, I pointed up the hill between the trees, again she jumped off as soon as the road became steeper. A thin layer of sweat glistened on her forehead. We walked past the old, white house and the old, red barn. The sky was clear and blue. The sun hung over the ridges to the west, a silent blaze. Its light gave the leaves on the trees in front of us an intense glow. The air was filled with birdsong. I was close to throwing up. We entered the path. Light filtered down between the treetops, as I had imagined it. It was refracted in a similar way to the way it was refracted under water. Pillars of light sloped into the ground.

I stopped.

"We can put our bikes here," I said.

We did. Both of us kicked out the stands and stood our bikes upright. I started walking. She followed. I looked for a suitable place to lie down. Grass or moss. Our footsteps sounded unnaturally loud. I didn't dare look at her. But she was right behind me. There. There was a good spot.

"We can lie down here," I said. Without looking at her I sat down. After some hesitation she sat down next to me. I put my hand in my pocket and located my watch. I took it out and held it in my open palm in front of her.

"Shall we time how long we can kiss?" I said.

"What!" she said.

"I've got a watch," I said. "Tor managed ten minutes. We can beat that."

I put the watch down on the ground, it was eighteen minutes to eight, I noted, placed my hands on her shoulders, and gently leaned her back while pressing my lips against hers. When we were both lying down I inserted my tongue in her mouth, it met hers, pointed and soft like a little animal, and I began to move my tongue round and round inside. I had my hands alongside my body, I wasn't touching her with anything except my lips and my tongue. Our bodies lay like two small boats laid up on land beneath the treetops. I concentrated on getting my tongue to go round as smoothly as possible while the thought of her breasts, which were so close to me, and her thighs, which were so close to me, and what was between her thighs, under her trousers, under her panties, was seared into my consciousness. But I didn't dare touch her. She lay with her eyes closed rotating her tongue around mine, I had my eyes open, groped for the watch, found it, and held it within reach. Three minutes so far. Some saliva ran down from the corner of her mouth. She wriggled. I pressed my groin against the ground letting my tongue go round and round, round and round. This wasn't as good as I had imagined, in fact, it was quite strenuous. Some dry leaves crunched beneath her head as she shifted position. Our mouths were full of thick saliva. Seven minutes now. Four left. Mmm, she said, but this was not a sound of pleasure, there was something wrong, she stirred, but I didn't let go, she moved her head while I continued to rotate my tongue. She opened her eyes, but didn't look at me, they were staring up at the sky above us. Nine minutes. The root of my tongue ached. More saliva from the corners of our mouths. My braces occasionally knocked against her teeth. Actually we didn't need to continue for more than ten minutes and one second to beat Tor's record. And that was now. We had beaten him now. But we could beat him by a large margin. Fifteen minutes, that ought to be possible. Five left then. But my tongue ached, it seemed to be swelling, and the saliva, which you didn't notice much when it was hot, left you with a slight feeling of revulsion when it ran down your chin, not quite so hot. Twelve minutes. Isn't that enough? Enough now? No, a bit more. A bit more, a bit more.

At exactly three minutes to eight I took my head away. She got up and wiped her mouth with her hand without looking at me.

"We did fifteen minutes!" I said, getting up. "We beat him by five minutes!"

Our bikes gleamed at the far end of the path. We walked toward them. She brushed leaves and twigs off her trousers and cardigan.

"Hang on," I said. "There's something on your back as well."

She stopped and I picked off bits and pieces that had got caught in her cardigan.

"There you go," I said.

"I'd better go home now," she said as we reached the bikes.

"Me, too," I said, pointing upward. "There's a shortcut through the forest."

"Bye," she said, getting on her bike and coasting down the bumpy path.

"Bye," I said, grabbing the handlebars and walking up.

That night I lay fantasizing about her breasts, milky-white and large, and all the things we could have done on the forest floor, until I fell asleep. I had to ring her because we hadn't arranged when I should go to her house on Saturday, but I put off doing it all the next day and also part of the Saturday until there was no avoiding it and at two o'clock I jumped on my bike and pedaled down to the telephone booth again. There was another problem as well, which was that I had to be home by half past eight, which was not at all in tune with the life I was leading now. I couldn't leave her place at eight because I had to go home to bed, what would she think of me? I hinted to Mom that I had something important to do that evening; couldn't I come home at nine-thirty, or even ten? She wanted to know what and I said I couldn't tell her. If you can't tell me, you can't have permission, she said. We have to know where you are and what you are doing. Then perhaps you can have permission. You do understand, don't you? Yes, I did understand and I was prepared to toe the line and tell her about Kajsa. But first I had to get in touch with her.

The sky was overcast and the gray, matte cloud cover seemed to suck the colors out of the countryside. The road was gray, the rocks in the ditch were gray, even the leaves on the trees had a weft of matte gray in their greenness. Also the heat from the previous days had gone. It wasn't cold, it was maybe sixty degrees, but enough for me to button up to the neck as I cycled down. My jacket ballooned out in the air. Two vehicles were at the bus stop, which in fact was a mini bus station, with buses often parked there all night. Now they were standing there, engines idling, ready to proceed on their way, one to the other side of the island, the other to Arendal, and the two drivers had parked so that they could chat to each other through the open windows.

I stood my bike behind the green, hat-shaped fiberglass shelter. A stream flowed nearby, through branches and bushes and litter, mostly candy wrappers, probably from the Fina station; I could see Caramello, Hobby, Nero, Bravo, and a blue Hubba Bubba wrapper, but there were also some shiny bottles without labels, some newspapers, and there was a cardboard phone booth full of assorted junk. I took the money from my pocket, went into the phone booth and placed it on top of the machine, ready. Dialed the number in the directory as various jokes went through my head. Why are there so many Hansens in the phone book? They've all got phones. Followed by: Why don't the Chinese have a phone book? Too many Wings and Wongs, and you might wing a wong number. Operator, operator, call me an ambulance. Okay, you're an ambulance. With my finger under the number and the receiver in my hand I stood for a long time staring through the dusty glass without quite registering what I saw until I plucked up the courage, put the phone to my ear, and dialed.

"Hello?" a voice said.

It was Kajsa's!

"Hi," I said. "This is Karl Ove. Is that Kajsa?"

"Yes," she said. "Hi."

"We forgot to talk about when I should come," I said. "Is there any particular time that would be good? It makes no difference to me."

"Errrm," she said. "Well, in fact, it's all off."

"Off," I said. "Can't you make it? Aren't your parents going out after all?"

"What I mean to say is," she started. "Erm . . . erm . . . I can't . . . well, go out with you any longer."

What?

Was she ending it? But . . . we'd only been going out for five days!

"Hello?" she said.

"Is it over?" I said.

"Yes," she said. "It's over."

I said nothing. I could hear her breathing at the other end. Tears were running down my cheeks. A long time passed.

"Well goodbye," she said suddenly.

"Bye," I said, and put down the phone and went to the bus stop. My eyes were blinded by tears. I wiped them with the back of my hand, sniffed, got on my bike, and began to pedal homeward. I barely saw the road in front of me. Why had she done that? Why? Now that things had started to click? On the day we were going to be alone in her house? She liked me a few days ago, so why didn't she like me now? Was it because we hadn't talked much?

And she was so good-looking. She was so unbelievably good-looking.

Jesus Christ.

JesusfuckingChrist.

JesusfuckingshittingChrist.

When I got to B-Max I dried my tears on the sleeves of my jacket, it was Saturday just before closing time, the parking lot was full of cars and people with shopping bags and kids, loads of kids. But if they saw my tears, could they have been caused by the wind? I was cycling after all.

I plodded up the little hill before the flat stretch. Completely empty, neutral spaces were developing inside me, ten seconds could pass without my thinking a single thought, without knowing that I even existed, and then the image of Kajsa was suddenly there, it was over, and a sob shook through me, impossible to stop.

I locked my bike and put it in its place outside the house, stood still inside the house listening to hear where the others were, now was not the time to bump into anyone, and when it sounded as if the coast was clear I went upstairs and into the bathroom, where I washed my face carefully before going into my room and sitting down on the bed.

After a while I got up and went to Yngve's room. He was on the bed playing the guitar and glanced up when I entered.

"What's up? Have you been crying?" he said. "Is it Kajsa? Did she end it?"

I nodded and started crying again.

"It's all right, Karl Ove," he said. "It'll soon pass. There are so many girls out there waiting. The world is full of girls! Forget her. It's no big deal."

"Yes, it is," I said. "We only went out for five days. And she's so good-looking. She's the only one I want to be with. No one else. And today of all days. When we were going to be alone at her place."

"Hang around," he said, getting up. "I'll play a song for you. It might help."

"What kind of song?" I said, sitting down on the chair.

"Hang on," he said, flicking through a pile of singles on the shelf. "This one," he said, holding up one of the Aller Værste!'s. "'No Way Back.'"

"Oh, that one."

"Listen to the lyrics," he said, removing the single from the sleeve, placing the plastic core in the middle of the turntable, then the forty-five, lifting up the stylus, and putting it down on the first groove, which was already whizzing around. After a second's scratching the energetic drums pumped into life, then came the bass, the guitar, and the Farfisa organ with the rest, followed by the jangling, unbelievably exciting guitar riff and then the voice of the singer with the Stavanger accent:

I'm not lying when I say I knew
That me and you were already through
I saw you were trying to hide it
Until the sensi thin condom split
Long-term plans and our shared visions
Blown to bits in one minute flat
You gave me a hug; I wanted to give you more
But you certainly put paid to that

"Listen now!" Yngve said.

All things pass – all things must decay
You go to sleep; you wake up to a new day
No way back now, nuthin' to thank you for
Nuthin' to say, there's your coat, there's the door

"Yes," I said.

We were on the point of going banal
I heard myself speaking and got irritated
We had one too many and went sentimental
But the words were still infected
You broke my heart and gave me the clap
I still haven't finished the penicillin rap
Why must we bang our heads against the same old wall
When we know deep down we hate it all

All things pass – all things must decay
You go to sleep; you wake up to a new day
No way back now, nuthin' to thank you for
Nuthin' to say, there's your coat, there's the door

"'All things pass,'" Yngve said when the song was over and the stylus had returned to its little rest. "'All things must decay. You go to sleep; you wake up to a new day.'"

"I understand what you're saying," I said.

"Did it help?"

"Yes, a bit. Could you play it again?"

Fortunately Mom and Dad didn't notice that I had been crying when we were having dinner. Afterward, too restless to stay inside, I went out and as the road was empty and the children I knew best were on vacation I ambled down to the pontoons. There was a whole crowd standing around Jørn's boat, which was brand new. Lots of people had a new boat that spring, both Geir Håkon and Kent Arne had one, a GH 10 and a With Dromedille respectively, a ten-footer as well, both with a five-horsepower Yamaha outboard motor.

I walked over to them.

"Here's our jessie," Jørn said as I stopped.

That word again.

They laughed, from which I concluded it wasn't well meant.

"Hi," I said.

Jørn started the engine after a few tugs on the cord.

"Come here, Karl Ove," he said.

"No," I said. "Not likely."

"I want to show you something," he said, looking at his little brother. "You reverse when I tell you, right."

His little brother nodded.

"Come on," he said, moving to the bow.

I took a few hesitant steps forward. When I was on the edge of the pontoon he threw himself around my legs.

"Reverse!" he shouted to his brother.

The boat reversed, I went into a crouch, my legs were pulled away from beneath me, I fell and was dragged over the edge because Jørn didn't let go and the boat continued to reverse. I made a grab for the edge and clung on by my fingers. Jørn's brother accelerated, the engine revved, and I hung there with my legs on board the boat, my body over the water, and my hands on the pontoon. I shouted to them to stop. I started to cry. The bystanders smiled and looked on calmly at what was happening.

"That's enough!" Jørn shouted.

The whole incident had lasted maybe a minute. Jørn's brother revved forward, Jørn let go of my legs, and I climbed up and walked off as quickly as I could, crying. The tears didn't stop until I was up by the rock face, where I sat down in the hot, perfectly still air, saturated with aromas of the sun-warmed rocks, dry grass, and wildflowers.

I mulled over whether I should call Kajsa and ask her why she had broken up with me, so that I could learn from it for the next time, but it was too complicated, I could hear it all now, her hesitation and my groping for words, for what? It was over, she didn't want to be with me, simple as that.

Still weak at the knees and shaking, I got up and walked home. Washed my face slowly in cold water in the bathroom, drew the curtains, didn't want anything from outside to slip in, put on Motörhead, Ace of Spades, but it felt wrong, so I took it off and put on the new solo record by Paul McCartney instead and started a Desmond Bagley book I had bought with my own money called The Vivero Letter. I had read it before, but it was about the pyramids in South America, the enormous underwater grottos, where the protagonists dived in search of a hoard of gold others were also after . . .

When I sat down to have supper Mom looked at me and smiled.

"It might be time for you to start wearing a deodorant, Karl Ove?" she said. "I can buy you one tomorrow."

"Deodorant?" I repeated stupidly.

"Yes, don't you think so? You'll be starting at the new school soon."

"You do stink, in fact," Yngve said. "No girls like that, you know."

Was that why?

But when I asked Yngve about it afterward, he smiled and said he doubted it was that simple.

The next morning Dad came in and told me I couldn't spend the whole summer in bed reading, I had to get out, what about a swim? he said.

I closed my book without a word and walked past him without a second glance.

I sat on the concrete barriers for a few minutes throwing pebbles into the road. But I couldn't stay there, everyone would see that I had nothing to do or anyone to be with, so I trudged down toward the big cherry tree at the edge of the forest by the road, where Kristen's field started, to see if the cherries were ripe enough to eat yet. Who owned this tree was unclear, some said it was a wild cherry, others said it belonged to Kristen, but we had still stripped it every summer since we were old enough to climb, and no one had complained so far. Knowing every branch, I climbed almost to the top and along a branch until it began to bend. The berries weren't quite ripe yet, the skin was hard and green on one side, but the other exhibited a faint redness and that was enough for me to bite into their skins, chew and swallow, and spit the pits as far as I could afterward.

Sitting there, I saw Jørn come cycling toward me. He was holding a canister of gasoline on the luggage rack with one hand and steering with the other. When he spotted me he braked gently and stopped.

"Karl Ove!" he shouted.

I climbed down as fast as I could. It took roughly the same time to clamber down as it took him to get off his bike and come to the tree because by the time I was on the ground he was only a few meters from me. Our eyes met, then I hared off, up toward the forest.

"I only wanted to say I was sorry!" he said. "About yesterday! I heard you crying."

I didn't turn.

"I didn't mean it!" he said. "Come back down, so that we can shake hands on it!"

Ha ha, I thought, and stumbled on up between thickets and bushes until I was at the top and could watch him amble back to his bike, get on, and continue on his wobbly way down to the boats. Then I went back down. But the hard, bitter cherries had lost their fascination, so I gave up on the tree, and instead wandered off in the hope that someone would appear on the road after a while. Sometimes people came out if they saw you from a window, so I went for a walk up the hill, staring into the gardens on both sides as I went. Not a soul anywhere. People were in their boats or they had driven to swimming holes on the far side of the island or they were at work. Tove Karlsen's husband was lying on a sunbed in the middle of their yellowing lawn with a radio beside him. Fru Jacobsen, the mother of Geir, Trond, and Wenche, was sitting under a parasol on the veranda smoking. On her head she was wearing a white bucket hat. She had covered the rest of her body in light, white clothes. Their two-year-old brother was sitting on the floor beside her; I glimpsed him between the bars of his playpen. Behind me, someone called my name. I turned. It was Geir; he sprinted up with his palms facing inward.

He stopped in front of me.

"Where's Vemund?" I said.

"On vacation," Geir said. "They left today. Are you coming in the boat?"

"All right," I said. "Where do you want to go?"

Geir shrugged.

"Gjerstadsholmen. Or one of the small islands beside it?"

"Okay."

Geir only had a row boat, so the radius of his activities was much more limited than that of the other boat owners. Nevertheless, it took us out to the islets and on occasion we had rowed several kilometers along the coast of the island. He wasn't allowed to row in Tromøya Sound.

We scrambled on board, I pushed off, he positioned the oars in the rowlocks, applied force with his feet, and rowed so hard, with his oars so deep, that a grimace distorted his entire face.

"Ugh," he groaned at every pull. "Ugh. Ugh."

We glided along the light-blue surface of the sea, which was sporadically ruffled by gusting shoreward winds. The waves farther out in the sound had white tips.

Geir turned and located the little island, adjusted his course with one oar, and then resumed his grunts while I hung my hand in the water and rested my eyes on the little there was of a wake.

As we approached, I stood up, leaped ashore, and pulled the boat into a tiny inlet. I didn't know how to tie any knots, so it was Geir who tethered the rope to one of the metal rods that appeared to be fixed to every single little crag in the archipelago.

"Feel like a swim?" he said.

"Fine by me," I said.

On the side facing Tromøya Sound, a rock rose from the sea into a two-meter-high pinnacle from which we jumped and dived. It was cold in the wind but warm in the water, so we swam for almost an hour before getting out and lying on the cliff to dry.

When we had dressed, Geir took a lighter from his pocket and showed it to me.

"Where did you get hold of that?" I said.

"It was in the cabin," he said.

"Want to set fire to something?"

"Yes, well, that was the idea."

Grass grew in all the cracks on the rock face, and in the middle of the islet there was a grass plain.

Geir crouched down, cupped his hand around the lighter, and set fire to a little tuft. It caught at once with a clear, transparent flame.

"Can I try?" I said.

Geir stood up, swept his stiff bangs to one side, and passed me the lighter.

"Hey!" I said. "Watch out! It's spreading!"

Geir laughed and stamped on the fire. It was as good as out when flames suddenly flared up farther away, where he had already put it out.

"Did you see that?" he said. "It started all on its own!"

He stamped it out, and I walked over to the plain and lit the grass there. At that moment a strong wind gusted in. The fire was raised like a little carpet.

"Give me a hand," I said. "There's so much to put out."

We jumped and stamped for all we were worth, and the fire was suffocated.

"Give me the lighter," Geir said.

I passed it to him.

"Let's light the grass in lots of places at once," he said.

"Okay," I said.

He lit it where he was, passed me the lighter, I ran to the other side and lit it there, ran over to him, to where he had moved, and he lit it there.

"Can you hear it crackling!" he said.

It was indeed. The fire crackled and spat as it slowly ate its way across. Where I had lit the grass the fire resembled a snake.

Another rush of wind blew in off the sea.

"Ooooh yikes!" Geir said as the flames rose and took a substantial chomp out of the middle.

He started stamping like a wild man. But suddenly it didn't help.

"Give me a hand," he said.

I heard a growing panic in his voice.

I started stamping as well. Another blast of wind, and now some of the flames were up to our knees.

"Oh, no!" I shouted. "It's burning like hell over there, too!"

"Take your sweater off! We'll put it out with those. I saw them do it in a film once!"

We took off our sweaters and began to beat the ground with them. The wind continued to whip up the flames, which spread even farther with every gust.

Now the grass was well alight.

We stamped and beat at the flames like crazy men, but it was no use.

"It's no good," Geir shouted. "We won't be able to put this out."

"No," I said. "It's just getting worse and worse!"

"What shall we do?"

"I don't know. Can we use the bailer, do you think?" I said.

"The bailer? Are you completely stupid or what?"

"No, I am not stupid," I said. "It was just a suggestion."

Oh, no. The fire was burning out of control. I could feel the heat from several meters away.

"Let's get out of here," Geir said. "Come on!"

And so, as the flames danced and crackled across the grass, with ever greater ferocity, we shoved out the boat. Geir got behind the oars and began to row, even harder than before.

"God Almighty," he kept saying. "What a fire! What a fire!"

"Yes," I said. "Who would have thought it?"

"Not me anyhow."

"Me neither. Hope no one sees it."

"Makes no difference," Geir said. "The important thing is that no one saw us."

On reaching land we dragged the boat deep into the forest to hide any possible traces. There was soot on our T-shirts; we dipped and wrung them in the water, and for safety's sake we removed our shorts and rinsed them as well. If anyone asked we would say we had been swimming in our shorts and our T-shirts had fallen in the sea. Then we dived in to get rid of the smell of fire and walked home.

From a distance I could see there was no one in the front garden. I stopped in the hall: not a sound. Slipped into the boiler room, hung up the T-shirt, and went up to my room bare-chested, took another T-shirt from the wardrobe, and changed my shorts.

From the window in Yngve's room I saw Dad lying on the sunbed on the lawn. He could lie in the sun for hours without moving, like a lizard. And the tan he had bore witness to it. The sound of a radio drifted over from somewhere; Mom must have been sitting on the terrace under the living-room window.

An hour later she came into my room with some deodorant for me. MUM for Men, it was called. It was a glass bottle, blue, and smelled sweet and good. I thought: for men. I was a man. Or a young man at least. I would be starting a new school in a few weeks and would use the deodorant.

She explained I should rub it in under my arms after washing, but always after washing, never without, otherwise the smell would be worse.

After she had gone I did as she said, inhaled the new aroma for a while, then resumed the book I was reading, it was Dracula, my all-time favorite, I was reading it for the second time, but it was just as exciting now.

"Supper's up!" Mom called from the kitchen, I put it down and went in.

Dad was sitting in his place, dark-skinned and dark-eyed. Mom poured boiling water in the teapot and put it down on the table between us.

"Martha has invited us to their cabin today," she said.

"Out of the question," Dad said. "Did she say anything else?"

Mom shook her head.

"Nothing special."

I looked down at the table and ate as fast as I could without giving the appearance of haste.

An engine was started up nearby, it coughed a couple of times, then died. Dad got up to look out the window.

"Isn't Gustavsen away?" he said.

No one answered; he looked at me.

"Yes," I said. "But not Rolf or Leif Tore. They're the only ones at home.

The car was started again. This time the engine was revved hard. Then it was put into first gear, and the drone rose and sank and stuttered.

"Someone's driving their car anyway," Dad said.

I stood up to see.

"Sit down!" said Dad.

I sat down.

"What's going on?" Mom said.

"The brats are taking their parents' car without asking."

He turned and looked at Mom.

"Isn't that incredible?" he said.

Jerking and stuttering, the drone went up the hill.

"Have they no control over their kids?" he said. "Leif Tore is in Karl Ove's class. And he goes and steals his parents' car?"

I gulped down the last bit of bread, poured a drop of milk in my tea to cool it enough to drink. Got up.

"Thanks, Mom," I said.

"Pleasure," Mom said. "Are you going to bed?"

"Think so," I said.

"Good night then."

"Good night."

He came in before I switched off the light.

"Sit up," he said.

I sat up.

He fixed me with a long stare.

"I hear you've been smoking, Karl Ove," he said.

"What?" I said. "I have not! I promise you. I'm telling the truth."

"That's not what I've heard. I've heard you've been smoking."

I glanced up and met his eye.

"Have you?" he said.

I looked down.

"No," I said.

There it was, his hand around my ear.

"You have," he said, twisting it. "Haven't you."

"Noooo!" I yelled.

He let go.

"Rolf told me you had," he said. "Are you telling me Rolf was lying?"

"Yes, he must have been," I said. "Because I have never smoked."

"Why would Rolf lie?"

"I don't know," I said.

"And why are you crying? If you have a clear conscience? I know you, Karl Ove. I know you've been smoking. But you won't do it again. So that'll have to do this time around."

He turned and left, as darkly as when he came.

I dried my eyes with the duvet cover and lay staring at the ceiling, suddenly wide awake. I had never smoked.

But he had known I had done something.

How did he know?

How could he have known?

The next day we were unable to keep away and rowed past the islet.

"It's all black!" Geir said, resting on the oars.

We laughed so much we almost fell in the water.

Even if, on the outside, this summer was like all previous summers – we went to Sørbøvåg, we went to Grandma and Grandad's cabin, and for the rest of the time I hung around the estate and headed off with anyone who was around, if I wasn't on my own reading – on the inside, it was quite different, for what awaited me, when it was over, was not only a new school year like all the other new school years, no, at the end-of-term party in June the head teacher had given a speech, and he had done this because we were leaving Sandnes *Barne*skole, our time there was past, after the summer vacation we would be starting the seventh year at Roligheden *Ungdoms*skole. We were no longer children, but youths.

I worked in a market garden all July, standing in the fields from dawn under the burning-hot sun picking or packing strawberries, thinning carrots, sitting on a knoll eating my packed lunch as fast as I could in the middle of the day so that I could cycle to Lake Gjerstad and have a swim before work resumed. Everything I earned I would use for pocket money during the Norway Cup. For the week the tournament lasted Mom and Dad went walking in the mountains. There was a heat wave that summer, we played one of the matches on shale, it was so hot I collapsed and was taken to a kind of field hospital on the plain, where I came round that night; someone was playing Roxy Music's "More Than This" in the distance, I looked up at the tent ceiling and was as happy as I had ever been for some reason I did not comprehend but acknowledged.

Could it have been because I'd hung around with Kjell during those days, sung Police songs on the Metro so loud the walls reverberated, hit on girls, and bought lots of band badges from a street-seller, including ones of the Specials and the Clash, as well as a pair of black sunglasses I wore every waking hour?

Yes, it certainly could. Kjell was one year older and the most popular boy with the girls in the school. His mother was Brazilian, but he was not only brown-eyed, black-haired, and attractive, he was also tough and someone everyone respected. So it was an enormous boost that he didn't seem to mind me, it elevated me at once to somewhere higher than Tybakken and the kids there. They didn't want to have anything to do with me, but Kjell did, so what did it matter? I also went to Oslo with Lars, which was more than I could actually have hoped for.

This was possibly why I was so incredibly happy where I was. But it may have been the song by Roxy Music, "More Than This." The song was so captivating and so beautiful, and around me in that pale, bluish summer night lay a whole capital, not only crowded with people, of whom I knew nothing, but also record shops with hundreds, perhaps even thousands, of good bands on their shelves. Concert venues where the bands I had only read about actually played. The traffic hummed in the distance, everywhere there was the sound of voices and laughter, and Bryan Ferry singing More than this – there is nothing. More than this – there is nothing.

Late one evening in mid-August, we all went to the island of Torungen, south of Hisøy, to go crabbing. Dad had bought a powerful underwater flashlight and he had brought along a rake, as well as a diving mask, flippers, and an empty white tub. A whole colony of gulls took off when we went ashore, flew above our heads screaming, some diving so close they almost brushed us, it was intense and frightening, but it eased as we moved to the far side of the island and the night-black sea lay still before us. Mom lit a fire, Dad undressed, put on the flippers, and glided into the water with a flashlight in his hand, slipped on the mask, and swam under the surface. The water cascaded off the snorkel as he reemerged.

"None there," he said. "Let's try a bit farther up."

Yngve and I walked slowly along the smooth rocks. The gulls were still screaming behind us. Mom was preparing food for us.

There he was, coming up again, this time with a big crab with splayed claws in one hand.

"Bring the tub!" he said, Yngve went down to the water's edge, Dad put the crab in, and swam off again.

I was a bit embarrassed, that wasn't how you should catch crabs, you did it with a rake on land and a flashlight. On the other hand, there was no one else on the island but us.

Afterward, with the tub brimful of crawling crustaceans, Dad sat down and warmed himself by the fire while we grilled sausages and drank pop. On the way down to the boat, after he had extinguished the fire with a bucket of seawater, and a hiss, I discovered a dead gull lying in a hollow in the rock face. I felt it. It was warm. A quiver went through its leg and I was startled. Wasn't it dead? I leaned forward and poked a finger in its white breast. No reaction. I stood up. Its lying there was spooky. Not so much because it was dead but because its colors and lines seemed almost obscenely precise to me. The orange beak, the black and yellow eyes, the large wings. And its feet, scaly and reptilian.

"What have you found?" Dad said from behind me.

I turned and he shone the flashlight on my face. I raised a hand in defense.

"A dead seagull," I said.

He lowered the flashlight.

"Let me see," he said. "Where is it?"

"There," I said, pointing.

The next instant it was the focus of the light, as if it were on an operating table. Its eyes flashed in the reflection.

"There may be some chicks in distress somewhere," Dad said.

"Do you think so?" I said.

"Yes, they still have chicks in the nests. That was why they were so angry at us. Come on."

Back toward the glittering lights of Arendal, through Tromøya Sound to the quay, with the constant clicking of the crabs and the ghostly rattle from the two full tubs. Dad boiled them as soon as he got home, and there was a sense of liberation at witnessing the pitilessness of the operation: they were taken from the tubs alive, they were dropped into the boiling water alive, and, dead, they floated around slowly on their backs in their bone-white and leaf-brown shells.

Two days after our nocturnal trip Dad was transferred to Kristiansand. He had been offered a job at a gymnas in Vennesla, it was too far to commute, so he had rented a flat in a block in Slettheia. He took all the things he needed in three loads of a hired trailer, and from then on he turned up at home every weekend, and after a while barely that. The idea was that he would look for a house in the Kristiansand area and we would move there the following summer.

It was a great relief when he left. And an incredible stroke of luck that he would change his job the precise autumn I started at the school where he had been employed for thirteen years. If he had been working there I would have felt his eyes on me the whole time and hardly dared to lift a finger without first considering the consequences. That was how it had been for Yngve. But that was not how it would be for me.

The first days at my new school reminded me of those we had experienced when we started the first class six years earlier. All the teachers were new and unfamiliar, all the buildings were new and unfamiliar, and apart from those in our class, all the other students were new and unfamiliar. Here, other rules and codes held sway; here, other rumors and stories circulated; here, the atmosphere was quite different. No one played at this school. No one did French skipping, no one did any skipping, no one played ball, no one played tag or any of the games we played on the playground. The sole exception was soccer. No, what kids did during the break here, in the new school, was lounge about. The smokers hung around in a corner on their own by the wet weather shelter, chatting and laughing and flicking their lighters and smoking their cigarettes, some of them in leather jackets, some in denim jackets, almost all with a moped of some description because a vehicle was part of the life they led. Rumors circulated about some of them, that they had been involved in burglaries, for example, that they had turned up at school drunk, or even that they had tried drugs, which of course they didn't deny, but nor did they confirm it, they were somehow surrounded by an air of mystery and danger, and who else but John should stand side by side with them on the very first normal school day, laughing his gruff laugh? All of those standing there despised bookish learning, hated school, most were good with their hands, and already wanted to be out in the world of work in the eighth year, and they were given permission, all lost causes were given permission, the school was only too happy to get rid of them. But, the cigarette hanging from the corner of the mouth aside, in practice they behaved no differently from any of the other students because they hung around in gangs as well and chatted and laughed. The girls stood in groups, the boys in other groups. Sometimes the boys baited the girls and there could be a bit of running back and forth and jeering, and on rare occasions fights broke out between two boys, which attracted everyone on the playground to the two of them, like swimmers on a tidal wave, it was impossible to resist.

It took us several weeks to adjust to our new school life. Everything had to be tested. We had to explore the teachers' limits and preferences. We had to explore the boundaries. Of what went on inside the classroom walls and what went on outside.

In natural sciences we had Larsen, the teacher who had come to school drunk, he always looked as if he had spent the night on the sofa in his clothes and had just been awoken, whatever time of day we had him, he was always a bit torpid and unfocused, but he loved experiments, smoke, and bangs, so we liked his lessons. In music we had Konrad, he was in charge of the youth club, he wore blouse-like shirts under a black vest, had glasses, a round face, moustache, and a little bald patch, was jovial and youthful, so he was on first-name terms with all of us; for math we had Yngve's previous form teacher, Vestad, a ruddy-faced, bald man with glasses and gimlet eyes; in domestic science, we had Hansen, a bespectacled, gray-haired, strict, missionary-type Frøken who seemed to be genuinely interested in teaching us to fry fishcakes and boil potatoes; in English, Norwegian, history, and social sciences we had our form teacher, Kolloen, a tall, thin man in his late twenties with pointed features and very little patience, who generally kept a distance from us but who could show flashes of empathy and sympathy.

These teachers not only gave general comments and evaluations, as the teachers at our first school had done, no, here they gave us grades for everything we did. This created a very new tension in the class for now we were all given our ideas of one another's strengths and weaknesses in black and white. It was impossible to keep your grades secret, or it was possible, but it was regarded as bad form. I averaged around a B or B+ and on rare occasions achieved an A, and dropped to a C, but if I didn't keep the grades quiet inside the classroom, I began to tone them down outside as in recent months I had begun to detect signs that it was not cool to be good at school, that an A, despite what one might assume, was indicative of a character flaw, a deficiency, and not the opposite, which originally it had been meant to express. My status had long been on the wane, now I tried to reverse the process and reestablish a good reputation without of course thinking of anything specific or tangible, it was all based on hunches and intuition according to the social codes people confronted everywhere. In this task I had a huge advantage, namely soccer, where I had met many of the boys in the eighth and ninth classes, among whom there were four or five who were really respected by both boys and girls. I was the only person in my class who could go over to the gang Ronny was in, for example, or Geir Helge, or Kjell, or all of them at once, without them staring at me with eyebrows raised or starting to harass me. They didn't think that much of me either, I didn't get a lot from them, but that wasn't the main point, the main point was that I could actually stand there and be seen standing there. Geir and Geir Håkon and Leif Tore had gone overnight from being little nabobs to becoming little idiots, here they were nobody, here they had to build themselves up anew, and God knows whether they would manage that in the course of the three years they had. I didn't look their way any longer, except in class, which no longer counted.

During the first weeks of school Lars became my new best friend. He was in the parallel class and so represented something new: he lived in Brattekleiv, where we from Tybakken seldom went, and he played soccer. He was sociable, knew a lot of people, and got along well with everyone. He had curly, auburn hair, was permanently in a good mood, had a loud, ringing, confident laugh, and teased everyone, rarely in a malicious way. His father was a former European skating champion, had participated in various world championships and Olympic tournaments, among them Squaw Valley, their basement was full of cups, medals, diplomas, and a large, dried-up and faded laurel wreath. He was a friendly and considerate though firm man, married to a Dane who couldn't do enough for those around her.

With Lars as a friend everything that Tybakken could throw at me bounced off. At the same time I had changed, it happened almost from one day to the next, I was no longer interested in good deeds, quite the contrary, I started swearing, I went apple scrumping, I threw stones at streetlamps and shed windows, I was prone to talking back in class and I stopped praying to God. The freedom there was in that! I loved apple scrumping, and the greater the risk the better. Stopping my bike by the curb in the morning on the way to school, sprinting into a garden and helping myself to five or ten apples in broad daylight and then just straddling my bike and continuing on my way as though nothing had happened gave me a good feeling I hadn't known before and hadn't even known existed. One of the gardens I passed was newly established, and in the middle there was a little apple tree, with a single apple on it, and it didn't require much imagination to see that the apple had special significance for the father who had planted the tree that spring and for his two children who were looking forward to the day the apple, which for them must have been the apple, became ripe. It was their apple that I saw dangling there every morning on the way to school and that in the end I grabbed.

Not in the evening when it was dark and the odds of doing it unseen were good, no, I did it in the morning on the way to school, just dropped the bike, climbed over the fence, walked across the lawn, snatched the apple, and sank my teeth into it as I was walking back. A world had opened. I wasn't stealing from shops yet, but it was on my mind, I was considering the possibility. At home, however, the only way I had changed was that I behaved more freely, was happier, chatted more, which Mom didn't appear to find unusual since a lack of liberty was strongly attached to Dad's presence and his anger only found its most extreme expression when we were alone with him. With Mom and Yngve I had always been like that. With Mom I had always talked about everything, that is, seldom about things directly concerning the world outside, I spoke more about things that I was thinking at any given point, all kinds of ideas and notions, but these days I was beginning to become aware of what I said and what I didn't say to her, for I understood that it was important that one world had to be light and clean and exclude any of the other world's many, long shadows.

This autumn both these worlds opened, but it was no mechanical garage door being raised, this was a living, organic process governed by a muscle: every Friday when Dad came home the world closed around me again, the old patterns were resumed, and I stayed there as little as possible. But whereas the world at home was familiar and always the same, the world outside was completely unpredictable, or, to be precise, what happened, happened clearly and unequivocally and without any ambivalence; it was the causes of these events that were so murkily unclear.

Every Friday there was a youth club meeting in the school's old gymnasium. It was open to all the students in the school. For a couple of years it had been a mythological place for me, as fascinating as it was unattainable. I had seen Yngve dress with meticulous care before going there, even with a scarf once, I knew they had dancing there, table tennis, and billiards, sold Coke and hot dogs, sometimes showed films, held concerts, and put on special events. There was quite a lot of talk about us being allowed to enter this miraculous place one day, mostly by the girls, for in some strange way they were the ones who identified with it most closely, as though it were primarily for them, but only now and then for us boys.

The first time I cycled there it felt as though I was about to go through a rite of passage. The evening air was cool, up the hill toward the school I passed some year-seven girls, all of them had made a special effort with their appearances, none looked as they did every day. I parked the bike outside, ambled past the crowd of kids smoking, bought an admission ticket, and entered the dark converted gymnasium with kaleidoscopic spotlights, flashing disco balls, and music pounding out from two enormous loudspeakers. I looked around. There were lots of year-eight and year-nine girls there, none of whom dignified me with a glance, of course, but most people were year-sevens like me. We were the only ones for whom the club had novelty value.

The dance floor was empty. Most of the girls were sitting at tables by the wall; most of the boys were hanging out in other rooms, where the table tennis and pool tables were, or outside the exit where kids always gathered with mopeds during the evening. Many belonged to boys who had left school, but not so long ago that they had stopped keeping an eye on the girls.

But I wasn't there to play table tennis or hang around the parking lot with a Coke in my hand. I liked music, I liked girls, and I liked dancing.

I didn't dare dance on my own on an empty floor. But when a couple of girls I was friends with tentatively began to dance and two more joined them, I also ventured out.

Captivated by the rhythm and the pleasurable awareness that I was so visible, I danced away. One song, two songs, and then I went to find someone I knew. Bought a Coke and sat down with Lars and Erik.

My whole being, with my liking for clothes, my long eyelashes, and soft cheeks, my know-all attitude, and poorly concealed academic prowess, was fertile and ready ground for a pre-puberty catastrophe. My behavior on these evenings didn't exactly improve matters. But of that I knew nothing. I saw nothing from the outside, I experienced everything from the inside, where all that counted was the seductive, pumping rhythm of "Funkytown," the Bee Gees' strange falsetto singing, Springsteen's catchy "Hungry Heart," the glittering darkness, all the girls moving around inside it, with their breasts and thighs, mouths and eyes, the exciting aromas of perfume and sweat, that was what this was about. I could return home after these Friday evenings with my head totally in a spin, where normality had been cast under some mysterious spell and suddenly appeared in a murky light, unclear in a shadowy way, but endlessly rich and alluring, full of hope and possibilities. Because, hey, this was the gym we were talking about! This was Sølvi, Hege, Unni, and Marianne! Geir Håkon, Leif Tore, Trond, and Sverre! This was hot dogs and ketchup and mustard! The tables and chairs were the same ones that were in our classrooms. The bars on the walls, the ones we had in gym class. But they were of no significance when the darkness came and the flashing lights filled it, when everything was sucked into the dark circle of magic, so full of promise, when everything was dusky eyes and lovely, soft bodies, pounding hearts, and jangling nerves. I left the youth club after the first Friday in a daze, I arrived there on the next, tense and full of expectancy.

What was brilliant about the place was that it made it easier for you to approach girls. Usually they were out of your reach, in recent months the majority had a blasé, world-weary air about them, they sat there in the sun chatting or knitting during the breaks with their cassette recorders on, most of what we did was childish, they were impossible to reach. Even though I tried, because I still spoke their language, it never led to anything. As soon as the bell rang we went our separate ways.

But at the youth club it was different, there you could go straight up to a girl and ask her to dance. So long as you didn't set your sights too high and approach the most attractive year-nine with boys buzzing round her, it always went well, they said yes and all you had to do was step onto the floor, press yourself against her warm, soft body, and sway from side to side until the song had finished. The hope was that it would develop into something more, perhaps being followed by stolen glances and tiny mischievous smiles, but even if it didn't, these moments had value in themselves, not least because of all the promises they bore of a future paradise in complete nakedness. All the girls I had gone out with so far, Anne Lisbet, Tone, Mariann, and Kajsa, went to school and were at the youth club, but even though I could still feel a stab in the heart when I saw them with boys, they were dead to me, history, from them I wanted nothing except that they shouldn't say anything to others about the person I had been. Especially in Kajsa's case. I had realized that what happened in the forest was ridiculous, I had behaved like a complete clod, I was deeply ashamed, and had decided long ago that I would never tell anyone, not even Lars. Especially not Lars. But she had no reason to feel ashamed, and I kept a bit of an eye on her when she was in the vicinity, to see whether she would lean forward and whisper, and everyone would look at me. It didn't happen. Instead the body blows came from other, unexpected sources. Right from the fourth class I'd had my eye on Lise in the parallel class, she was good-looking and I liked watching her, the way she smiled, what she wore, the sharpness in her character, she was one of those who would say if she didn't agree, she was fearless, but her facial expressions were gentle, and when we started the seventh class, her figure was beautifully rounded. More and more my eyes were drawn to her. She was Mariann's best friend, and after the arguments since I had ended it with her had subsided Mariann and I would often sit together and chat or walk together back from school, and it was on one of those occasions she repeated something Lise had said about me that day.

I had gone into the old gymnasium, which during the day was used as a dining hall where we could tuck into our lunch boxes in the breaks. I had gone in, and when Lise, who was sitting at a very full table, saw me coming she had said, "Yuck, he's so revolting! I get the heebie-jeebies whenever I see him!"

"Well, I don't agree," Mariann added after she had told me. "I don't think you're a jessie, either."

"Jessie?" I said.

"Yes, that's what everyone says."

"What?"

"Didn't you know?"

"No."

And as if there had been some secret pact not to call me a jessie to my face, before I had been properly but discreetly informed, after the conversation with Mariann it began to be used against me, spreading with the speed of sound. Suddenly I was the jessie. Everyone called me that. The girls in the class, the girls from other classes, some of the boys in the class, boys from other classes, in fact, even on the soccer team they would call me that. One day John turned to me in training and said, "What a damned jessie you are." Even younger kids, fourth-years on the estate, had picked it up and would shout it after me. "Jessie, jessie, jessie," I heard all around me. A sentence had been passed, and it could not have been worse. If I was arguing with someone, for example Kristin Tamara, she swept away all the arguments and crushed me totally by just saying: "You're such a jessie. You jessie. Hey, Jessie! Come here, Jessie." This got me down, I thought of almost nothing else, it was like a black wall in my consciousness and impossible to escape. It was the worst; there was nothing I could do.

It wasn't as if I could behave in a less effeminate way for a couple of days and then everyone would say, "Oh, you aren't a jessie after all!" No, this went deeper, and it would be there forever. They had something on me and they used it for all it was worth. Apart from Lars, he just said I shouldn't take any notice, and for that I was grateful, one of my first thoughts when this all started was that Lars would no longer want to be seen with me, suddenly he had a lot to lose. But it didn't bother him. Neither Geir nor Dag Magne nor Dag Lothar said it. And of course none of the teachers or parents. But everyone else did. The term undermined any other qualities I had, it made no difference what I could or couldn't do, I was a jessie.

In a biology lesson, as we were about to focus on human reproduction, as Fru Sørsdal called it, Jostein from the parallel class, our goalkeeper, came into the class and sat down at a free table. At first he wasn't noticed, the lesson began, Fru Sørsdal talked about homosexuality, and Jostein said, Karl Ove knows all about that! He's one himself! You should ask him to tell you. The laughter that followed was desultory, he had gone too far and was at once ejected, but a seed was sown. Was I perhaps homosexual as well? Was that what was wrong with me? I began to ponder on that. I was a jessie, perhaps even a homo, and, if so, all hope was lost. Then there would be nothing to live for. Dark times, they had never been as dark as now.

I said nothing to Mom, of course, but after a few weeks I plucked up courage and told Yngve. He was on his way up the hill to the shop when I caught him.

"Are you in a hurry or what?" I said.

"Pretty much," he said. "What's the matter?"

"I've got a problem," I said.

"Oh, yes?" he said.

"They're calling me names," I said.

He glanced at me as though he didn't really want to know.

"What names?"

"Yeah . . ." I said. "Well, it's . . ."

He stopped.

"What are they calling you? Tell me!"

"Well, they call me a jessie," I said. "I'm the jessie."

Yngve laughed.

How could he laugh?

"That's no big deal, Karl Ove," he said.

"Jesus Christ," I said. "Of course it is! Don't you understand?"

"Think about David Bowie," he said. "He's androgynous. It's a good thing in rock, you see. David Sylvian as well."

"Androgynous?" I said, so disappointed that he hadn't understood a thing.

"Yes, ambiguous sexual identity. A bit woman, a bit man."

He looked at me.

"It'll pass, Karl Ove."

"Doesn't seem like it," I said, turning and walking back home while Yngve continued up the hill.

I was right, it never stopped, but somehow I became accustomed to it, that was how it was, I was the jessie, and even if thoughts about it tormented me in a way I had not experienced before, and the shadows it cast were long, there was enough happening around me, most of such an intensity it nullified everything else while this carried on.

We drifted around, that was what we did. Actually I always had but whereas the point for Geir and me during all these years had been to seek out secret places, places for ourselves, the opposite was now the case, with Lars we sought places where something might happen. We hitchhiked everywhere, to Hove if there was something going on there, over to Skilsø, to the east of the island, hanging around outside B-Max in the hope that something might happen, someone might come, hanging out around the Fina station, drifting around town, cycling up to the new sports hall even though we weren't going to do any training, up to the parish hall where Ten Sing had their rehearsals, because at the sports hall there were girls, at Ten Sing there were girls, and that was all we talked and thought about. Girls, girls, girls. Who had big breasts and who had small ones. Who might become attractive and who was attractive. Who had the nicest butt. Who had the best legs. Who had the nicest eyes. Who we might have a chance with. Who was unattainable.

One dark winter evening we caught the bus to Hastensund, where there was a girl who went to Ten Sing, she had blond hair, was a bit on the chubby side, but was stunningly beautiful, we were interested in her even if she was a year older, we knocked at the door, and then we sat there in her room, chatting shyly about this and that, burning with lust, and on the bus home we were so full of emotion we could barely utter a word.

One weekend Mom visited Dad in Kristiansand and Lars stayed over with me, we ate potato chips, drank Coke, ate ice cream, and watched TV, it was in the spring, the night before the first of May, the TV was showing a rock concert that night to keep Oslo kids indoors who might otherwise be wandering the streets and throwing stones. We didn't have any porn magazines, I didn't dare keep any in the house despite the fact that we were on our own, so we had to make do with Insect Summer by Knut Faldbakken, the passage I had read so many times the book automatically opened at the right page. We decided we couldn't be alone, we had to invite some girls, and Lars suggested Bente.

"Bente?" I said. "Which Bente?"

"The one who lives up here," Lars said. "She's lovely."

"Bente?" I almost shrieked. "But she's younger than us!"

I had seen her all my life, she had always been smaller, never a girl I had considered. But now she had developed, Lars declared, he had seen, she had breasts and everything. And she was a beauty. A real beauty!

I hadn't noticed, but now that he said it . . .

We threw on our jackets and ran up the hill and rang her doorbell. She was surprised to see us, but down to our house, no, she couldn't do that, not tonight.

Okay, we said, another time then!

Yes, another time.

So back we went and sat down in front of the TV to watch one band after the other while discussing what we saw and all the girls we would have liked to watch it with. Siv from our class, whom I hadn't considered either, suddenly became the focus of our interest, we rang her doorbell, too. What would happen afterward we had no idea.

And so we went on, drifting around, restless, full of ungovernable desire. We read porn magazines, it physically hurt to look at the pictures, they were so close and yet so far, so endlessly far away, not that that prevented them from arousing all these tremendously powerful feelings in us. I felt like shouting as loudly as I could every time I saw a girl, knocking her over, and tearing off all her clothes. The thought made my throat constrict and my heart pulsate. It was incredible, the thought that they were naked under the clothes they were wearing beside us, all of them, and they could, theoretically, remove them themselves. It was an impossible thought.

How could everyone walk around knowing that, without ultimately running completely amok?

Did they repress it? Were they acting cool?

I couldn't do that. I thought of nothing else, it was all I had in my head from the moment I woke up in the morning to the moment I went to bed at night.

Yes, we looked at porn magazines. We also played cards, we pulled out the pack everywhere and in all situations, we went to friends' homes, we went to the youth club, listened to music, played soccer, went swimming for as long as it was possible, went apple scrumping, drifted around, hung out here, hung out there, and chatted nonstop.

Kjersti?

Marianne?

Tove?

Bente-Lill?

Kristin?

Lise?

Anne Lisbet?

Kajsa?

Marian?

Lene?

Lene's sister?

Lene's mother?

Never, later in life, have I had my finger on the pulse the way I had then with the girls living around us in those years. Later I may have doubted whether Svein Jarvoll's Journey to Australia was a good or a bad novel, or whether Hermann Broch was a better writer than Robert Musil, but I was never ever in any doubt that Lene was a good-looking girl and that she was in quite a different league from, for example, Siv.

Lars had a lot going on around him as well, he sailed quite a bit, with his mother and father, and alone in the Europe dinghy. He was good at skiing, light years better than me, sometimes he went with his father to Åmli or Hovden and he had his old pals out there, too, Erik and Sveinung. When he was busy I stayed in my room, played music, read books, talked to Yngve or Mom. I never went into the forest, up into the hills, down to the pontoons, or into Gamle Tybakken anymore.

One Sunday at the end of the winter I cycled out to see Lars. He was going to Åmli with his father and Sveinung to ski down the slalom slope there. I couldn't join them as it had already been planned for a long time. I was so disappointed and it came so unexpectedly that my eyes filled with tears. Lars saw, and I turned away and cycled off. Tears, that was no good, that was the worst.

He called when I got home. There was room for me, too. They could drop by and pick me up. I should have said no, to show that I wasn't upset and should have explained to him that the tears – I had seen from his expression that he didn't like them – were not tears, I had something in my eye, the wind had upset my cornea. But I couldn't, Åmli was a big slalom slope with a lift and everything, I had never been there, so I swallowed my pride and joined them.

His father skied with a fifties elegance I had never seen before.

But the tears had disappointed Lars, and they had disappointed me. Why couldn't they stay away now that I was thirteen years old? Now that they could not be excused?

One woodworking lesson John started to tease me, I cried, and was so angry I hit him over the head with a wooden bowl as hard as I could, it must have hurt and I was thrown out of the classroom, into the corridor, but he just laughed and came over to me afterward and apologized, I didn't realize it would make you cry, he said. I didn't mean it. Everyone had seen how feeble and pathetic I was, and suddenly all the efforts I had made to appear tough, to be one of the tough boys, had gone down the drain. John, who had shown his butt to the teacher on the first day at the new school and who had come in one morning with his eyebrows shaved off and who had started ditching classes. Everyone was expecting him to be one of those looking for a job while still in the eighth class. He had to be rescued. I tried to rescue myself. Lars had weights in his father's garage, but he pumped iron, too, and one afternoon I asked if I could have a try.

"Be my guest," he said.

"How much do you lift?" I said.

He told me.

"Can you put the weights on for me?" I said.

"Can't you do that yourself?"

"I don't know how to."

"Okay. Come with me."

I went downstairs with him. He added the weights and put the bar in position. Looked at me.

"I have to do this on my own," I said.

"Are you kidding?" he said.

"No. Go ahead, I'll be up soon."

"Okay."

When he had gone I lay down on the bench. I couldn't budge the bar. I couldn't lift it a centimeter. I removed half of the weights. But I still couldn't lift it. A fraction, though, perhaps two or three centimeters.

I knew you had to lower the bar onto your chest and raise it with your arms fully stretched.

I removed two more.

But I still couldn't do it.

In the end, I had removed all of the weights and lay there lifting the bar, and nothing but the bar, up and down a few times.

"How was it?" Lars said as I emerged. "How much did you manage?"

"Not as much as you," I said. "I had to take off two of the weights."

"Hey, that's not bad!" Lars said.

"Isn't it?" I said.

Through all these years, right from the time when I was with Anne Lisbet in the first class, I thought I had learned something each time. That it would get better and better with every new girl I was with. After Kajsa there would be no more setbacks. After her, yes, it would all be fine, now I knew what it was about and could avoid any more mistakes.

But that was not how it turned out.

I fell in love with Lene. She was in the parallel class. She was the best-looking girl in the school. No contest, she won hands down. She was more beautiful than anyone else, but also shy, and I had never experienced that before. There was a fragility about her it was hard not to be attracted by and dream about.

She had a sister who was in the ninth class called Tove and she was the complete antithesis, although also beautiful, but in a boisterous, provocative, mischievous way. Both were very popular with the boys.

Lene only indirectly, though, she was the kind you looked at and pined for in secret. At least I did. Her eyes were narrow, her cheekbones high, cheeks soft and pale, often with a slight flush, she was tall and slim, she held her head at an angle, and often interlaced her fingers as she walked. But she also had something of her sister in her, you could occasionally see it when she laughed, the glint that appeared in her turquoise eyes, and in the obstinacy and unshakable certainty that sometimes shone through, so difficult to reconcile with the otherwise predominant impression of dreamy fragility. Lene was a rose. I looked at her and started to tilt my head the same way she did. That's how I made contact with her, that's how we had something in common. I couldn't hope for more really, because I had set her on too high a pedestal to dare make any kind of approach. The thought of asking her to dance, for example, was absurd. Talking to her was unthinkable. I contented myself with looking and dreaming.

Instead I went out with Hilde. She asked me, I said yes, she was in the same class as Lene, she had a broad, powerful body, almost masculine, was half a head taller than me, with delicate features and a lovely, friendly personality, and she ended it with me two days later because, as she put it, you're not in the slightest bit in love with me. With you, there is only Lene. No, I said, you're wrong, but of course she was right. Everyone knew, I thought of nothing else, and when we were in the playground during the break I always knew where she was and who she was with, and that attentiveness couldn't go unnoticed.

One day Lars said he had heard someone say they had heard her say she wasn't at all ill-disposed toward me. Despite the fact that I was a jessie. Despite the fact that I had cried in the woodworking class. Despite the fact that I was slow on the soccer field and could barely manage a bench lift.

I looked at her on the playground, she met my eyes and smiled and turned away with pink cheeks.

I decided that I should strike while the iron was hot. I decided that it was now or never. I decided that I had nothing to lose. If she said no, well, nothing had changed.

If she said yes, on the other hand . . .

One Friday, therefore, I sent Lars over to her with a question. They had been in the same class for six years, he knew her well. And he returned with a smile playing around his lips.

"She said yes," he said.

"Really?"

"Yes, really. Now you're going out with Lene."

Then it started again.

Could I go over to her now?

I looked in her direction. She smiled at me.

What should I say when I was there?

"Off you go now," Lars said. "Give her a kiss from me."

He didn't push me across the playground, but it wasn't far from it.

"Hi," I said.

"Hi," she said.

She looked down; one foot squirmed around on the pavement.

God, how beautiful she was.

Ay yay yay yay.

"Thank you for saying yes," my mouth said.

She laughed.

"My pleasure," she said. "What class do you have now?"

"Class?"

"Yes."

"Err . . . is it Norwegian?"

"Don't ask me," she said.

The bell rang.

"Will we see each other afterward?" I said. "After school, I mean?"

"All right," she said. "I've got training in the sports hall. We can see each other afterward."

The question was not how this would go, the question was how many days it would last before it stuttered and she brought it to an end. I knew that, but I tried anyway, I had to put up a fight, you could never be sure, and she was present inside me for every single waking minute, partly as a kind of unconstrained, excited feeling, a constant sensation, partly as a more nebulous perception of her essence and character. Yes, I would have to fight, even though I didn't really have anything to fight with. I didn't even know what the fight was about. To keep her, yes, but how? By being myself? Don't make me laugh. No, I would have to draw on others, I realized that, and during these days I sought out the company of others with her so that all the conversation didn't rest on my shoulders. Up to the sports hall with Lene, over to Kjenna's with Lene, over to the Skilsø ferry with Lene. We had all been given a Bible at school, the preparations for our confirmation would start next autumn, and it struck me that I could ask her what she had done with her Bible and then I could say I had ditched mine, and I would have a theme going, so that I could ask people I met what they had done with their Bible. Lene listened, Lene followed me, Lene started to get bored. She was a rose, we kissed at a crossroads, and we walked hand in hand on the playground, but I was only a little boy and even though I had perfectly even, white teeth after my braces had been taken off, that wasn't enough, Lene was bored with me, and one evening when she came to soccer practice with me I saw her leave the spectators' stand and disappear, she was gone for the whole of the last hour, I went in and changed with the others, suspecting that something was wrong, stopped in the entrance hall where the reception desk and the Coke machine were, and looked outside: there was Lene Rasmussen, there was Vidar Eiker, they were chatting and laughing, and I could see from the way she was laughing it was over. Vidar Eiker had left school the year before, he was one of the group who hung around at the Fina station, and he had a moped, which he was leaning on at this minute.

I went up into the stand and sat down.

After half an hour or so Hilde came over. She sat down beside me.

"I've got bad news, Karl Ove," she said. "Lene's ended it."

"Yes," I said, averting my head so that she couldn't see the tears streaming down my cheeks. But she saw them because she stood up as if she had been burned.

"Are you crying?" she said.

"No," I said.

"You really do love her, don't you?" she said with surprise in her voice.

I didn't answer.

"But Karl Ove," she said.

I wiped my tears away with one hand, sniffled, and drew a slow, quivering breath.

"Is she out there now?"

She nodded.

"Shall I walk out with you?"

"No, no. You just go, Hilde."

As soon as she had gone through the door at the end of the stand I got up, swung my bag onto my back, and left. Wiped my tears again, hurried along the corridor, emerged in the entrance hall, and opened the door to where they had been standing before.

I bowed my head and walked past.

"Karl Ove!" she said.

I didn't answer, and as soon as they were out of sight I burst into a run.

Lene went out with Vidar, I was crushed for several months, but then spring came and with its immense power it washed everything aside. The year-eights and the year-nines were at school camp for a week, there were only the year-sevens left at school, and a kind of mania spread through the ranks of the boys in those days, we began to attack the girls, one stole up on them from behind and lifted their sweaters while another came at them from the front and groped their naked breasts as they screamed and struggled to get away, but never so loudly that any of the teachers heard. We did this in the corridors between the classrooms, we did it in the playground, and we did it on the unpopulated parts of the road to school. There were rumors that Mini, Øystein, and others in the Fina crowd had frigged Kjersti, held her down, pulled down her trousers, and stuck a finger inside her, so one evening Lars and I went up to her house, thinking perhaps that we could experience some of the same, but when we rang the bell it was her father who answered, and when Kjersti came down and we asked if we could come in, her lips formed a clear no, we would certainly not be allowed in, what were we thinking about?

But the glint in her eyes was even more brazen than that in our own; she understood exactly what we were after. A few weeks later we met at the Boat Fair in Hove where Lars and I had been at the Trauma stall selling lottery tickets, among them a winning ticket that we put aside and took with us when our stint finished, and we walked around looking at boats and people so as not to arouse suspicion, because we had a little scam in mind, then casually stopped by the stall, bought a ticket each, and opened them, and while I leaned forward with mine to ask if I had won a prize, Lars swapped his for the winning ticket. Christian and John were manning the stall now and they refused to believe Lars when he passed them the winning ticket. They said it was an old one. We denied this with such vehemence that in the end they agreed to give us half the winnings. We said fine and walked off with the enormous box of chocolates under one arm, bubbling with laughter and tremulous with fear at what we had done. Nearby, we bumped into Kjersti.

"Feel like a walk?" Lars said.

"Okay," Kjersti said, and my body felt so strange when she said that.

We walked through the forest and down to the pebble beach where we lay down and started on the chocolates.

She was wearing red trousers and a blue padded jacket and she said nothing as I gently stroked the outside of her thigh with my hand. Nor when I stroked the inside. Lars was doing the same on the other side.

"I know what you want," she said. "But you're not going to get it."

"We don't want anything," I said, swallowing, my throat thick with desire.

"Nothing," Lars said.

I stroked her crotch, placed my whole hand against it, and could have screamed out with happiness and frustration. Lars snuck a hand up to her jacket zipper and pulled it down, then put his hand up her sweater. I did the same. Her skin was hot and white, and I felt her breasts in my hand. The nipples were stiff, her breasts firm. I stroked her thigh again, put my hand on her crotch again, but then, gulping repeatedly, I made the mistake of pulling down the zipper of her trousers.

"No," she said. "What are you thinking of?"

"Nothing," I said.

She straightened up and pulled down her sweater.

"Any more chocolate?" she said.

"Yes, help yourself," Lars said, and we sat there eating chocolate and staring across the sea as if nothing had happened. The breakers resembled white snowdrifts the second they crashed against the smooth, low rocks. Some seagulls swept past with their wings flapping. When the box was empty we got up and walked back through the forest to the fair. Kjersti said goodbye, see you later perhaps, and we decided to go home. But to do that we had to drop by the lottery stall to collect our bikes. Øyvind, our coach, was there, and he didn't look happy when he caught sight of us. We denied everything. He said he couldn't prove anything, but he knew what we had done. Why else would we have been content with half the prize? We denied it point-blank. He said he was disappointed, he didn't want to have to look at us any more that day, and we cycled home.

On Monday, before school began, Lars lifted up Siv's sweater and I pressed both my hands against her breasts. She screamed and said we were childish and calmly walked off.

In the first lesson, which was Norwegian, we had to borrow a book from the library, read it during the week, and then write about it in an essay. I said I had read all the books in the library. Kolloen didn't believe me. But it was true. I could tell him about every book he pulled out. In the end he allowed me to write about another book. Which meant I had nothing to do that lesson. I took out a history book and sat at the desk under the window. Outside, it was misty but warm. The playground was deserted. I flicked through the book and looked at the pictures.

Suddenly I saw one of a naked woman. She was so thin her hips protruded like bowls. All her ribs were visible. Between her legs there was a small, black tuft. Behind her there were rows of bunk beds in which I glimpsed other female figures.

My insides shook.

Not because she was so thin but because there was nothing attractive about her, although she was naked, and because on the next page there was a picture of an enormous pile of corpses in front of a deep grave where many bodies lay strewn. What I saw was this: the legs were only legs, the hands were only hands, the noses were only noses, the mouths were only mouths. Something that had been shaped and formed elsewhere was now here, scattered across the ground. When I stood up I felt nauseous and confused. As I had nothing to do I went out and sat against the wall. The sun warmed, despite being covered by mist. The grass growing in the cracks and hollows of the boulder in the middle of the playground, surrounded by walls and pavement, was long and swayed to and fro in the gentle breeze. The nausea didn't pass, it became associated with what I saw, it became a part of them. The green grass, the yellow dandelions, Siv's bare breasts, Kjersti's fat thighs, the skeletal woman in the book.

I got up and went back in, called Geir, and he came over with a quizzical look.

"I've found a picture of a naked woman," I said. "Do you want to see it?"

"Of course," he said, and I opened the book in front of him and pointed to the skeletal woman.

"That's her," I said.

"Oh, my God," Geir said. "Ugh."

"What's the matter?" I said. "She's naked, isn't she?"

"Oh, yuck," Geir said. "She looks as if she's dead."

That was exactly how she looked. Like the living dead. Or death in living form.

The next weekend Mom and I went to visit Dad. It was odd to see him in his flat. It was on a higher floor in a tower block, it was all white, the sun shone in through the windows, filling it completely, and there was so little furniture it almost seemed as if no one were living there.

What did he do here?

He drove us to Grandma and Grandad's, where we ate, and then he drove us home. No one quite seemed to know when we were going to move, it was dependent on so many factors, the house had to be sold, a new one had to be bought, Mom had to find a job, we had to change schools, so I didn't think too much about it. But I had no objection to leaving the estate or the school. It felt as if all my cards had been played. I made mistake after mistake. One day after gym, for example, when I was standing in the corridor outside the classroom, Kjersti came over to me.

"Do you know what, Karl Ove?" she said.

"No," I said, fearing the worst, for her expression was sardonic.

"We've just been talking about you," she said. "And we discovered that not one of the girls in the class likes you."

I said nothing, I glared at her, filled with a sudden, enormous fury.

"Did you hear me?" she continued. "Not one of the girls in the class likes you!"

I smacked her cheek as hard as I could. The flash of my arm and the following slap, which turned her cheek crimson, caused people to turn their heads.

"You bastard," she shouted, and punched me in the mouth. I grabbed her hair and pulled. She hit me in the stomach, kicked me in the calf, and grabbed my hair, too, we were a whirl of blows and kicks and hair-pulling, and I, poor, pathetic, miserable little shit, I burst into tears, it all became too much for me, a pathetic sob escaped my mouth; all those who had gathered around us within the space of seconds shouted, he's crying, I heard them, but I couldn't stop myself, and then I felt a heavy hand on my collar, it was Kolloen, he was holding Kjersti in the same way and asked what on earth was going on, are you fighting? I said it was nothing, Kjersti said it was nothing, and then we were frog-marched into the classroom, each with a teacher's hand in the middle of our backs, me a laughingstock, for I had not only broken the rule about never crying but also the one about never fighting with a girl, Kjersti now had the status of a hero, for she had been hit and hit back, and she didn't cry.

How low can you sink?

Kolloen said we had to shake hands. We did, Kjersti apologized, and smiled at me. The smile was not sardonic, it was heartfelt, in a way, as though we were complicit in something.

What did it mean?

In the last week of May the heat came, the whole class set off for Bukkevika to go swimming, the sand was white, the sea blue, and the sun burned in the sky above us.

Anne Lisbet emerged from the sea.

She was wearing a bikini bottom and a white T-shirt. It was wet, and her round breasts were visible. Her wet, black hair shone in the sun. She beamed her broadest smile. I watched her, I couldn't keep my eyes off her, but then I noticed something beside me, and turned my head, and there was Kolloen, he was watching her, too.

There was no difference in our gazes, I realized that at once, he saw what I saw and he was thinking what I was thinking.

About Anne Lisbet.

She was thirteen years old.

The moment didn't even last for a second, he looked down as soon as I noticed him, but it was enough, and I'd had an insight into something that a moment before I didn't even know existed.

Three days later Dad picked me up from school early, we were going off to look at a house, it was twenty kilometers from Kristiansand, by a river, we were considering buying it, now I had to say what I thought, and I had to be honest. From the way Dad was talking – it had a barn, the house was old, from the 1800s, it was on a big piece of land, you could have a normal garden and a vegetable garden, too, there were big, old fruit trees growing there, and perhaps we could keep hens, as well as grow our own potatoes, carrots, and herbs – I had already decided, I would tell him I liked it, whether I did or not.

When we arrived, with the sky blue, the grass green, and the river glinting down below I ran from window to window and peered in so that he could see how enthusiastic I was, which was not entirely insincere, just somewhat exaggerated, and the matter was decided. If it was available we would buy it. Mom applied for a job at the nursing college, Dad would continue at the gymnas, and I would start at a new school here. What Yngve would do was less clear. He refused to move. For the first time in his life he stood up to Dad. They argued, and that had never happened before. We had never argued with Dad. He was the one who told us off, and we were on the receiving end.

But there was Yngve saying no.

Dad was furious.

But Yngve continued to say no.

"I don't want to spend my last year in Kristiansand," he said. "Why should I? All my friends are here. I've only got one year of school left. It would be ridiculous to start afresh somewhere new."

They stood face-to-face in the living room. Yngve was as tall as Dad.

I hadn't noticed before.

"You might think you're grown-up, but you're not," Dad said. "You have to stay with your family."

"No, I do not," Yngve said.

"All right," Dad said. "Can you tell me how you're going to manage? You won't be getting one øre from me, you know."

"I'll take out a loan," Yngve said.

"Who do you think will give you a loan?" Dad said.

"I can apply for a study loan," Yngve said. "I've checked."

"Are you going to take a study loan before you begin to study?" Dad said. "That's very clever."

"If I must, I must," Yngve said.

"Where are you going to live?" Dad said. "The house will be sold, you know."

"I'll rent a bedsit," Yngve said.

"You do that then," Dad said. "But you won't get any help from us. Not so much as a krone. Do you understand? If you want to live here, you can, but don't you come running to us for any help. You'll have to manage on your own."

"Okay," Yngve said. "I'll be fine."

And that was what happened.

When the last day of the seventh class came, it had been announced that I was moving and my classmates of seven years had bought farewell presents. First of all, I was given a cabbage head as my name, Karl, as some called me, sounded in the broad dialect we spoke like "Kål," cabbage, which became a nickname. Then I was given a cloth monkey because I looked like a monkey.

That was it.

Then we went through the doors, and I never saw my classmates again.

But it wasn't quite over. That evening there was to be a class party at Unni's. Some of the girls met early that afternoon to get everything ready, and at around six the rest of us cycled over. The party was held in the garden and in the cellar, and as the summer night fell over the hills we could see across and all the red roofs of the houses on the estate glinted in the light of the setting sun, and the party slowly began to degenerate, even though no one was drinking. A year's secret thoughts and desires began to stir. It was simply in the air. Hands wandered under sweaters, not as part of an assault or any brutality, it went on close by, among the lilac bushes in the garden, amid hot panting, mouths met, mouths kissed, and then some of the girls took off their tops, they walked around with their breasts bobbing, it was a kind of early puberty orgy that had been slowly building up steam and the very same girls who only one month earlier had said they didn't like me offered themselves to me, one after the other, they sat on my lap, they kissed me, they rubbed their breasts against my face. The hierarchy the girls had been placed in, with some slowly climbing during autumn and others falling, had no significance here, it didn't make any difference who it was, I pressed my face against their soft, white breasts, kissed their dark, erect nipples, ran my hands over their thighs and between their legs, and they didn't say no, there wasn't a no in their mouths on this night, instead they leaned forward and kissed me, their eyes were warm and dark, but also surprised, as mine must have been, is it really us doing this?

I haven't seen any of them since that summer, and if I search for them on the Net to see what they look like or how life has treated them, there are no hits. They don't belong to that class there, they belong to the class of blue- or white-collar parents who grew up outside the center and who have presumably remained outside the center of everything but their own lives. Who I am to them I have no idea, probably a vague memory of someone they once knew in their childhood years, for they have done so much to one another in their lives since then, so much has happened and with such impact that the small incidents that took place in their childhoods have no more gravity than the dust stirred up by a passing car, or the seeds of a withering dandelion dispersed by the breath from a small mouth. And, oh, wasn't the latter a fine image, of how event after event is dispersed in the air above the little meadow of one's own history, only to fall between the blades of grass and vanish?

After the moving van had left and we got into the car, Mom, Dad, and I, and we drove down the hill and over the bridge, it struck me with a huge sense of relief that I would never be returning, that everything I saw I was seeing for the final time. That the houses and the places that disappeared behind me were also disappearing out of my life, for good. Little did I know then that every detail of this landscape, and every single person living in it, would forever be lodged in my memory with a ring as true as perfect pitch.

"One of the most anticipated books of the year (or the decade)."

A FAMILY OF FOUR—a mother, a father, and two boys—moves to the south coast of Norway, to a new house on a newly developed site. It is the early 1970s and the family's trajectory is upwardly mobile: the future seems limitless. In painstaking, sometimes self-lacerating detail, Karl Ove Knausgaard paints a world familiar to anyone who can recall the intensity and novelty of childhood experience, a world in which children and adults lead parallel lives that never meet. My Struggle: Book 3 gives us Knausgaard's vivid recollections of childhood and his emerging self-understanding, and explores the multilayered nature of time, memory, and existence.

"[Knausgaard's] work ranks as one of the most memorable reading experiences of my life. There has been, for me, nothing quite like it. Karl Ove makes me see better."

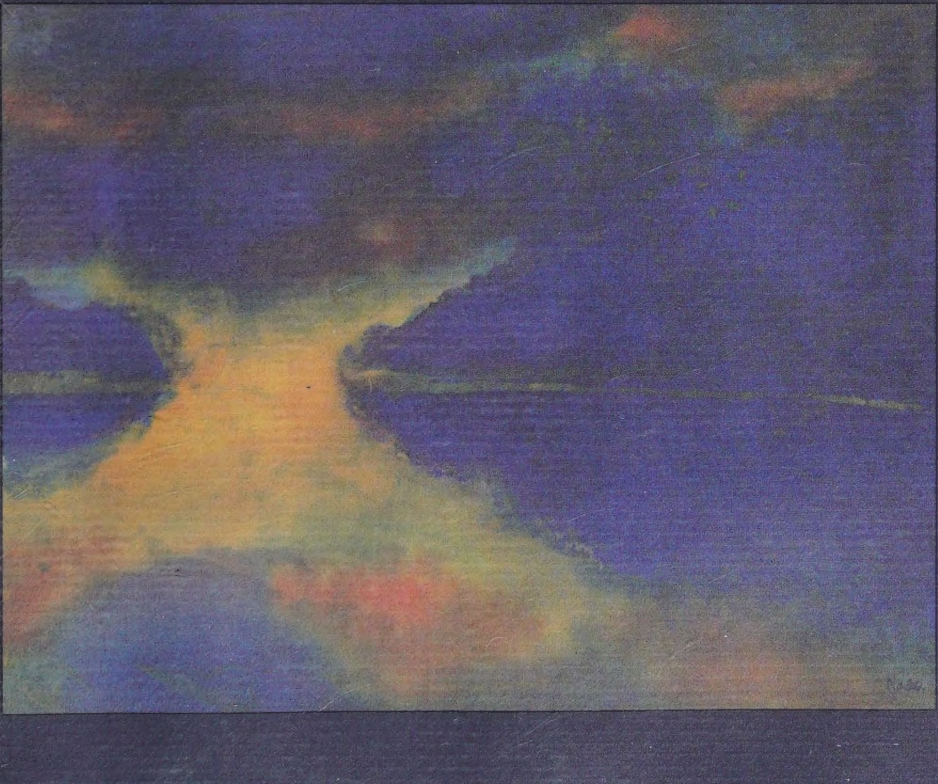
Karl Ove Knausgaard

BOOK FOUR

My Struggle



Translated from the Norwegian by Don Bartlett

archipelago books

The fourth installment in the eagerly awaited, internationally celebrated My Struggle series. Book Four finds an eighteen-year-old Karl Ove in a tiny fishing village in Northern Norway, where he has been hired as a schoolteacher and is living on his own for the first time. When the ferocious winter takes hold, Karl Ove – in the company of the Håfjord locals, a warm and earthy group who have spent their lives working, drinking, and joking together in close quarters – confronts private demons, reels from humiliations, and is elated by small victories. We are immersed, along with Karl Ove, in this world – sometimes claustrophobic, sometimes serenely beautiful – where memories and physical obsessions burn throughout the endless Arctic winter. In Book Four, Karl Ove must weigh the realities of his new life as a writer against everything he had believed it would be.

My Struggle

Slowly my two suitcases glided around on the carousel in the arrivals hall. They were old, from the end of the 1960s, I had found them among Mom's things in the barn when we were about to move, the day before the removal van came, and I immediately commandeered them, they suited me and my style, the not-quite-contemporary, the not-quite-streamlined, which was what I favored.

I stubbed the cigarette out in the ashtray stand by the wall, lifted the cases off the carousel, and carried them outside.

It was five minutes to seven.

I lit another cigarette. There was no hurry, there was nothing I had to do, no one I had to meet.

The sky was overcast, but the air was still sharp and clear. There was something alpine about the landscape even though the airport I was standing outside was only a few meters above sea level. The few trees I could see were stunted and misshapen. The mountain peaks on the horizon were white with snow.

Just in front of me an airport bus was quickly filling up with people.

Should I catch it?

The money Dad had so reluctantly lent me for the journey would tide me over until I got my first paycheck in a month. On the other hand, I didn't know where the youth hostel was, and wandering blindly around an unfamiliar town with two suitcases and a backpack would not be a good start to my new life.

No, better take a taxi.

Apart from a short walk to a nearby snack bar stand, where I consumed two sausages with mashed potatoes in a cardboard tray, I stayed in the youth hostel room all evening, lying with the duvet over my back and listening to music on my Walkman while writing letters to Hilde, Eirik, and Lars. I started one to Line as well, the girl I had spent all summer with, but set it aside after one page, undressed, and switched off the light, for all the difference that made, it was a light summer night, the orange curtain glowed in the room like an eye.

Usually I would fall asleep at once wherever I was, but that night I lay awake. In just four days I would be starting my first job. In just four days I would be entering a classroom in a small village on the coast of Northern Norway, a place I had never been and knew nothing about, I hadn't even seen any pictures.

Me!

An eighteen-year-old Kristiansander, who had just finished gymnas, who had just moved away from home, with no experience of working other than a few evenings and weekends at a parquet flooring factory, a bit of journalism on a local paper, and a month at a psychiatric hospital this summer, I was about to become a teacher at Håfjord School.

No, I couldn't sleep.

What would the pupils think of me?

When I went into the classroom for the first lesson and they were sitting there in their chairs in front of me, what would I say to them?

And the other teachers, what on earth would they make of me?

A door was opened in the corridor, releasing the sound of music and voices. Someone walked along quietly singing. There was a shout: "Hey, shut the door." Afterward all the noise was enclosed again. I rolled over onto my other side. The strangeness of lying in bed under a light sky must have played a part in my not being able to fall asleep. And once the thought was established that it was difficult to sleep, it became impossible.

I got up, pulled on my clothes, sat in the chair by the window, and began to read. Dead Heat by Erling Gjelsvik.

All the books I liked were basically about the same topic. White Niggers by Ingvar Ambjørnsen, Beatles and Lead by Lars Saabye Christensen, Jack by Alf Lundell, On the Road by Jack Kerouac, Last Exit to Brooklyn by Hubert Selby, Jr., Novel with Cocaine by M. Ageyev, Colossus by Finn Alnæs, Lasso Round the Moon by Agnar Mykle, The History of Bestiality trilogy by Jens Bjørneboe, Gentlemen by Klas Östergren, Icarus by Axel Jensen, The Catcher in the Rye by J. D. Salinger, Humlehjertene by Ola Bauer, and Post Office by Charles Bukowski. Books about young men who struggled to fit in to society, who wanted more from life than routines, more from life than a family, basically, young men who hated middle-class values and sought freedom. They traveled, they got drunk, they read, and they dreamed about their life's great passion or writing the great novel.

Everything they wanted I wanted too.

The great longing, which was ever present in my breast, was dispelled when I read these books, only to return with renewed vigor the moment I put them down. It had been like that all the way through my latter years at school. I hated all authority, was an opponent of the whole limited society I had grown up in, with its bourgeois values and materialistic view of humanity. I despised what I had learned at gymnas, even about literature; all I needed to know, all true knowledge, the only really essential knowledge, was to be found in the books I read and the music I listened to. I wasn't interested in money or status symbols; I knew that the essential value in life lay elsewhere. I didn't want to study, had no wish to receive an education at a conventional institution like a university, I wanted to travel down through Europe, sleep on beaches, in cheap hotels, or with friends I made on the way. Take odd jobs to survive, wash dishes at hotels, load or unload boats, pick oranges . . . That spring I had bought a book containing lists of every conceivable, and inconceivable, kind of job you could get in various European countries. But all of this was to culminate in a novel. I would spend some time writing in a Spanish village, go to Pamplona and run the bulls, continue on down to Greece and write on one of the islands, and then, after a year or two, return to Norway with a novel in my backpack.

That was the plan. That was why I didn't do my military service when gymnas was over, like so many of my friends had done, nor did I enroll at university, as the rest had done, instead I went to the employment office in Kristiansand and asked for a list of all the teaching opportunities in Northern Norway.

"Hear you're going to be a teacher, Karl Ove," people I saw at the end of the summer said.

"No," I answered. "I'm going to be a writer. But I have to have something to live off in the meantime. I'll work up there for a year, put some money aside, and then travel down through Europe."

This was no longer an idea in my head but the reality I was in: tomorrow I would go to the harbor in Tromsø, catch the express boat to Finnsnes and then the bus south to the tiny village of Håfjord, where the school caretaker would be waiting to welcome me.

No, I couldn't sleep.

I took the half bottle of whiskey from my suitcase, got a glass from the bathroom, poured, drew the curtain aside, and took a first shivering sip as I gazed at the strangely light housing estate outside.

When I woke around ten the following morning my nerves were gone. I packed my things, called for a taxi from the pay phone in the reception, stood outside with my suitcases at my feet, and smoked as I waited. This was the first time in my life I had traveled anywhere without having to return. There was no "home" to return to. Mom had sold our house and moved to Førde. Dad lived with his new wife farther north, in Northern Norway. Yngve lived in Bergen. And, as for me, I was on my way to a first flat of my own. There I would have my own job and earn my own money. For the very first time I had control of all the elements in my life.

Oh, how incredibly good it felt!

The taxi came up the hill, I threw the cigarette butt to the ground, crushed it, and put the suitcases in the trunk, which the driver – a plump elderly man with gray hair and a gold necklace – had opened for me.

"The harbor, please," I said, climbing into the back.

"The harbor's a big place," he said, turning to me.

"I'm going to Finnsnes. On the express boat."

"That can be done, no problem."

He set off downhill.

"Are you going to the gymnas there?" he asked.

"No," I said. "I'm going on to Håfjord."

"Oh? Fishing? You don't look much like a fisherman!"

"Actually, I'm going there to teach."

"That's right. A lot of southerners do that. But aren't you pretty young to have a job like that? Don't you have to be eighteen?"

He laughed and looked at me in the mirror.

I gave a short laugh too.

"I left school in the summer. I figure that's better than nothing."

"Yes, I'm sure you're right," he said. "But think of the kids growing up there. Teachers right out of gymnas. New ones every year. No wonder they give up on school after ninth grade and go fishing!"

"Yes, I guess it isn't that surprising," I said. "But it's not my fault."

"No, not at all. And fault? Who's talking about blame! Fishing's a much better life than studying, you know! Much better than hanging around studying until you're thirty."

"You're right. I'm not going to study."

"But you're going to be a teacher!"

He looked at me in the mirror again.

"Yes," I said.

There was silence for a few minutes. Then he took his hand off the gearshift and pointed.

"Down there, there's your express boat."

He stopped outside the terminal, set my suitcases on the ground, and closed the trunk again. I gave him the money, not knowing what to do about a tip, I had been dreading this the whole journey and solved the problem by saying that he could keep the change.

"Thank you!" he said. "And good luck!"

Bye-bye, fifty kroner.

As he rejoined the road, I stood counting the money I had left. I didn't have much, but I could probably get an advance, surely they would understand that I wouldn't have any money before the job started?

With its one main street, numerous plain concrete buildings, probably hastily erected, and its barren environs girdled by mountain ranges in the distance, Finnsnes, it struck me a few hours later, sitting in a patisserie with a cup of coffee in front of me and waiting for the bus to leave, looked more like a tiny village in Alaska or Canada than Norway. There wasn't much of a center, the town was so small that everything had to be considered the center. The atmosphere was quite different here from in the towns I was used to, because Finnsnes was so much smaller, of course, but also because no effort had been made anywhere to make the place look inviting or homey. Most towns had a front and a back, but here everything looked pretty much the same.

I leafed through the two books I'd bought in the nearby shop. One was called The New Water by a writer unfamiliar to me, Roy Jacobsen; the other was The Mustard Legion by Morten Jørgensen, who had played in a couple of the bands I had followed a few years ago. Perhaps it hadn't been such a good idea to spend my money on them, but after all I was going to be a writer, I had to read, if only to see how high the bar was set. Could I write like that? This was the question that kept running through my brain as I sat there flipping through the pages.

Then I ambled over to the bus, had a last smoke outside, put my suitcases in the luggage compartment, paid the driver, and asked him to tell me when we were in Håfjord, walked down the aisle and sat on the penultimate seat on the left, which had been my favorite for as long as I could remember.

Across from me sat a lovely fair-haired girl, perhaps one or two years younger than me, she had her satchel on the seat, and I imagined she went to the gymnas in Finnsnes and was on her way home. She had looked at me when I got onto the bus, and now, as the driver shifted into first gear and pulled away from the stop with a jerk, she turned to look at me again. Not lingeringly, no more than a glance, and barely a fleeting one at that, but still it was enough to give me a boner.

I put on my headset and inserted a cassette into the Walkman. The Smiths, The Queen Is Dead. So as not to appear intrusive, I concentrated on staring out the window on my side for the first few kilometers and resisted all impulses to look in her direction.

After passing through a built-up area, which began as soon as we left the center and extended for quite a distance, where around half the passengers got off, we came to a long, deserted, straight stretch. Whereas the sky above Finnsnes had been pale, covering the town beneath with its vapid light, here the shade of blue was stronger and deeper, and the sun hanging over the mountains to the southwest – whose low but steep sides obscured a view of the sea that had to be there – caused the red-flecked, in places almost purple, heather, which grew densely on either side of the road, to glow. The trees here were for the most part deformed pines and dwarf birches. On my side the green-clad mountains the valley rose up to meet were gentle, hills almost, while those on the other were steep and wild and alpine, although of no great height.

Not a person, not a house, was to be seen.

But I hadn't come here to meet new people; I had come to find the peace I needed to write.

The thought sent a flash of pleasure through me.

I was on my way, I was on my way.

A couple of hours later, still engrossed in music, I saw a signpost up ahead. From the length of the name I concluded it had to be Håfjord. The road it pointed to led straight into the mountainside. It was not so much a tunnel, more a hole, the walls seemed to have been blasted out, and there was no light in there, either. Water streamed down from the roof of the tunnel in such quantities that the driver had to turn on the windshield wipers. When we emerged on the other side, I gasped. Between two long rugged chains of mountains, perilously steep and treeless, lay a narrow fjord, and beyond it, like a vast blue plain, the sea.

Ohhh.

The road the bus followed hugged the mountainside. To see as much of the landscape as I could I stood up and crossed to the other row of seats. From the corner of my eye I noticed the fair-haired girl turn toward me and smile when she saw me standing there with my face pressed against the window. Below the mountains opposite there was a small island, densely packed with houses on its inner landward side, completely deserted on the outer side, at least that was how it looked from this distance. There were some fishing boats moored inside a harbor with a mole around it. The mountains continued for perhaps a kilometer. Closest to us, the slopes were clad in green, but farther away they were completely bare and gray and fell away with a sheer drop into the sea.

The bus passed through another grotto-like tunnel. At the other end, on a relatively gentle mountain slope, in a shallow bowl, lay the village where I would be spending the next year.

Oh my God.

This was spectacular!

Most of the houses huddled around a road that wound its way through the village like a U. Beneath the road at the bottom was what looked like a factory building in front of a quay, it must have been the fish-processing plant, beyond it there were lots of boats. At the end of the U stood a chapel. Above the road at the top was a line of houses, behind them were dwarf birches, heather, and scrub up to the point where the valley stopped and a large mountain rose on either side.

That was it.

Well, almost: above the point where the top road met the lower one, right by the tunnel, there were two large buildings, which had to be the school.

"Håfjord!" said the bus driver. I stuffed my headset into my pocket and walked up the aisle, he followed me down the steps and opened the door to the luggage compartment, I thanked him, he said no problem without a smile and climbed back up, whereupon the bus turned in the square and reentered the tunnel.

With a suitcase in each hand and a seaman's kitbag on my back, I first looked up, then down the road for the caretaker while drawing the fresh, salty air deep into my lungs.

A door in the house right opposite the bus stop opened. Out came a small man dressed in only a T-shirt and jogging pants. From the direction he was heading, I could see this was my man.

Apart from a little wreath of hair around his ears, he was completely bald. His face was gentle, his features were pronounced, as happens when you are in your fifties, but the eyes behind the glasses were small and piercing, and it struck me as he approached that in a way they didn't quite match the rest.

"Knausgaard?" he said, proffering his hand but without looking me in the eye.

"Yes," I said, and took it. Small and dry and pawlike. "And you must be Korneliussen?"

"That's right," he said with a smile, his arms down by his sides, taking in the view. "What do you think?"

"About Håfjord?" I asked.

"Nice, isn't it?" he said.

"Fantastic," I said.

He turned, looked up and pointed.

"You'll be living there," he said. "So we'll be neighbors. I live just there, you see. Shall we go up and have a look?"

"Yes," I said. "Do you know if my things have arrived?"

He shook his head.

"Not as far as I know," he said.

"They'll be here on Monday then," I said, and set off up the road beside him.

"You'll have my youngest son at school, from what I've heard," he said. "Stig. He's in the fourth grade."

"Do you have many children?" I said.

"Four," he said. "Two live at home. Johannes and Stig. Tone, my daughter, and Ruben live in Tromsø."

I scanned the village as we walked. Some people were standing outside what must have been a shop, where a couple of cars were also parked. And outside a snack bar stand on the top road there were a few people with bikes.

Far out in the fjord a boat was coming in.

Seagulls were screeching down by the harbor.

Otherwise all was still.

"How many people live here actually?" I said.

"Two hundred and fifty or so," he said. "It depends on whether you include the kids going to school."

We stopped in front of a black, 1970s timber house, by the porch.

"Here it is," he said. "Go ahead and step in. The door should be open. But you might as well have the key right away."

I opened the door and went into the front hall, put down my suitcases, and took the key he handed me. It smelled as houses do when they haven't been inhabited for a while. A faint, vaguely outdoor, whiff of damp and mold.

I pushed a half-open door and went into the sitting room. The floor was fitted with an orange wall-to-wall carpet. A dark brown desk, a dark brown coffee table, and a suite upholstered in brown and orange, also dark wood. Two large panoramic windows facing north.

"This is great," I said.

"The kitchen's in there," he said, pointing to a door at the end of the tiny room. He turned. "And the bedroom's in there."

The wallpaper in the kitchen was a familiar '70s pattern: gold, brown, and white. There was a little table under the window. A fridge with a small freezer compartment at the top. A sink set in a short laminate counter. The floor, gray linoleum.

"And, last of all, the bedroom," he said, standing in the doorway while I went in. The carpet on the floor was darker than the one in the sitting room, the wallpaper light, and the room empty except for an enormously wide low bed made of the same wood as the other furniture. Teak or imitation teak.

"Perfect!" I said.

"Do you have any bed linen with you?"

I shook my head. "It's being sent."

"You can borrow some of ours if you like."

"That would be great," I said.

"I'll drop some off then," he said. "And if you have any questions, anything at all, come down and see us. Visitors are welcome here!"

"OK," I said. "Thank you."

From the sitting-room window I watched him walking down toward his house, which was maybe twenty meters down the road from mine.

Mine!

Unbelievable, I had my own place.

I walked around inside, opened a few drawers, and glanced into some cupboards until the caretaker returned carrying a pile of sheets in his arms. After he'd left I started unpacking the little I had brought with me: my clothes, a towel, the typewriter, a few books, and some typing paper. I placed the desk beneath the sitting-room window, put the typewriter on top, moved the standard lamp, arranged the books on the windowsill, as well as a literary magazine, Vinduet, which I had bought in Oslo and decided I would subscribe to. Next to them I stacked the fifteen, maybe twenty, cassettes I had brought along, and beside the pile of paper on the table I laid the Walkman and the spare batteries for it.

When my writing alcove was finished I put my clothes in the bedroom wardrobes, shoved the empty cases onto the top shelf, and stood in the center of the room for a while, not sure what to do next.

I felt an urge to call someone and tell them what it was like here, but there was no telephone. Should I go out perhaps and look for a phone booth?

I was hungry too.

What about the snack bar stand? Should I go over there?

There was nothing to do here anyway.

In front of the mirror in the little bathroom that led off the hall I put on my black beret. On the doorstep I stood for a few seconds looking down. In one sweeping gaze you could scan the whole village and everyone who lived in it. There was nowhere to hide. Walking down the road, the surface of which was gravel underneath asphalt, I felt utterly transparent.

Some teenage boys were hanging around outside the snack bar. Their conversation froze as I approached. I walked past without looking at them, went up the steps to the veranda and over to the serving hatch, which shone bright yellow in the wan late-summer evening light that seemed to hang over the landscape. The window was smeared with grease. A boy around the same age as the ones behind me appeared at the hatch. A couple of long black hairs grew from his cheek. His eyes were brown, his hair was black.

"Hamburger with everything, fries, and a Coke," I said. Listened intently to hear if any of the mumbling behind was about me. But it wasn't. I lit a cigarette and paced up and down the veranda while I waited. The boy lowered a landing-net-style receptacle full of thin potato sticks into the boiling fat. Slapped a hamburger down on the hotplate. Apart from the low sizzle of the meat and the by-now excited voices behind me, there was no sound. The houses on the island across the fjord were illuminated. The sky, which hung low there, higher by contrast above the mouth of the fjord, was a bluish gray and rather heavy, though far from dark.

The silence was not oppressive, it was open.

But not to us, I thought for some reason. The silence had always been like this here, long before people existed, and would remain so long after they had disappeared. Lying here in this mountain bowl, with the sea spread out before it.

Where did it end actually? America? Canada?

Yes, that had to be it. Newfoundland.

"Here's your burger," the kid said, placing a Styrofoam tray containing a hamburger, a few strips of lettuce, a quarter of a tomato, and a pile of fries on the shelf outside the serving hatch. I paid, grabbed the tray, and turned to go.

"Are you the new teacher?" asked one of the boys hanging over the handlebars of his bike.

"Yes," I said.

"You're going to have us," he said, spat, and pushed his cap farther up his forehead. "We're in ninth grade. And him, he's in eighth."

"Oh yeah?" I said.

"Yeah," he said. "You're from the south?"

"Yes, from Sørland," I said.

"OK," he said, nodding, as though indicating the audience was over now, and I was free to go.

"What are your names?" I said.

"You'll find out soon enough," he said.

They laughed at that. I gave an unabashed smile but felt stupid as I walked past them. He had outmaneuvered me.

"And what's your name?" he called out after me.

"Mickey," I said. "Mickey Mouse."

"He's a comedian as well!" he shouted.

After I had eaten the hamburger, I got undressed and went to bed. It was still only around nine o'clock, the room was as light as if it were the middle of a gray day, and the silence that was everywhere magnified the sounds of every movement I made, so even though I was tired, it took me a few hours to fall asleep.

I woke in the middle of the night to a door banging somewhere. Immediately afterward I heard footsteps on the floor above. Half awake, I imagined I was sleeping in Dad's office in Tybakken and it was him walking above me. How on earth had I ended up here, I found myself thinking, before I sank back into the darkness. The next time I woke I was in a state of panic.

Where was I?

In the house in Tybakken? The house in Tveit? Yngve's studio? The youth hostel in Tromsø?

I sat up in bed.

The glances I cast around the room didn't find anything to hold them; nothing I saw gave any meaning. It was as though my whole person were sliding down a slippery wall.

Then I remembered.

Håfjord. I was in Håfjord.

In my own flat in Håfjord.

I lay back in bed and mentally retraced my journey here. Then I imagined the village as it was outside the windows, all the people in all the houses whom I didn't know and who didn't know me. Something that could have been expectation, but could also have been fear or insecurity, erupted inside me. I got up and went into the tiny bathroom, showered, and put on a green silky shirt, baggy black cotton trousers, stood in front of the window for a while looking down toward the shop, I would have to go there to buy something for breakfast, but not right now.

There were several vehicles in the parking lot. A little cluster of people was gathered between them. Now and then someone came out the door carrying shopping bags.

Well, might as well dive right in.

I went into the hall and put on my coat, beret, and white basketball shoes, glanced at myself in the mirror, straightened my beret, lit a cigarette, and went out.

The sky was as serene and gray as yesterday. The mountains plunged into the water on the other side of the fjord. There was something brutal about them, I saw that in a flash, they didn't care, anything could happen around them, it meant nothing, it was as though they were somewhere else at the same time as being here.

There were five people gathered outside the shop now. Two were old, at least fifty, the other three looked a few years older than me.

They had seen me from way off, I knew, it was inevitable, it wasn't every day a stranger in a long black coat came down the hill, I imagined.

I raised the cigarette to my mouth and inhaled so deeply that the filter became hot.

Either side of the door hung a white plastic flag advertising the newspaper Verdens Gang. The window was full of green and orange paper plates emblazoned with a variety of special offers, written by hand.

I was fifteen meters away from them now.

Should I say hello? A chirpy, easygoing "hi"?

Stop and talk to them?

Say I was the new teacher? Make a little joke about it?

One of them looked at me. I gave a slight nod.

He didn't nod back.

Hadn't he seen it? Had my nod been so slight that it had been perceived as an adjustment of the way I held my head, or a twitch?

Their presence felt like knives in me. A meter away from the door I threw the cigarette to the ground, stopped, and stepped on it.

Could I leave it there? Litter the sidewalk? Or should I pick it up?

No, that would look just a bit too pedantic, wouldn't it?

To hell with it, I'll leave it, they're fishermen, I'm sure they toss their cigarette butts away when they've finished with them!

I placed my hand on the door and pushed, took one of the red shopping baskets, and began to move down the aisle between the various shelves. A rotund lady in her midthirties was holding a packet of sausages in her hand and saying something to a girl who must have been her daughter. Thin and gangly, she stood there with a sullen, obstinate expression on her face. On the other side of the woman there was a boy of around ten leaning over a rack, rummaging. I put a whole-wheat loaf in the basket, a packet of Ali coffee, and a box of Earl Grey tea bags. The woman glanced at me, put the sausages in her basket, and continued to the other end of the shop with the boy and girl in tow. I took my time, wandered around looking at all the food items, added a brown goat's cheese from a cabinet, a tin of liver paste, and a tube of mayonnaise. Then I picked up a carton of milk and a packet of margarine and went over to the counter, where the woman was now packing her items into a bag while her daughter stood reading a notice board by the door.

The assistant nodded to me.

"Hello," I said, and started to empty the basket in front of him.

He was short and stocky, his face was broad, his nose curved, and his powerful chin covered with a patch of grizzled bristles.

"Are you the new teacher?" he said as he was entering the prices on the till beside him. Over by the notice board, the girl had turned to look at me.

"Yes," I said. "Arrived yesterday."

The boy was tugging at her arm, she yanked it free and went out the door. The boy followed her, and a moment later so did the mother.

I needed oranges. And apples.

I hurried over to the modest fruit counter, filled a bag with some oranges, grabbed a couple of apples, and went back to the till, where the assistant was ringing up the last item.

"And a pouch of Eventyr tobacco and rolling papers. And Dagbladet."

"You're from the south?" he said.

I nodded. "Kristiansand."

An elderly man wearing a cloth cap entered the shop.

"Good morning, Bertil!" he shouted.

"Oh, so it's you!" the assistant said, giving me a wink. I squeezed a smile, paid, put my purchases in a bag, and left. One of the people standing outside nodded, I nodded back, and then I was out of their range.

Up the hill, I gazed at the mountain rising from the end of the village. It was completely green, all the way to the top, and that was perhaps the most surprising feature of the countryside here, I had expected something bleaker, with less color, not this green which seemed to resonate everywhere, drowned out only by the grays and blues of the vast sea.

It was a good feeling going back into my flat. It was the first place I'd ever been able to call mine, and I enjoyed even the most trivial activities, like hanging up my jacket or putting the milk in the fridge. Admittedly, I had lived for a month in a small flat next to Eg Psychiatric Hospital earlier in the summer, that was where Mom had driven me when I moved from the house we had occupied for the past five years, but it wasn't an actual flat, only a room off a corridor with other rooms where in the old days the unmarried nurses had lived, hence its name the Henhouse, in the same way that the job I had there wasn't an actual job either, just a short summer temp job without any real responsibility. Also it was in Kristiansand. For me it was impossible to feel free in Kristiansand, there were too many ties with too many people, real and imagined, for me ever to do what I wanted in that town.

But here! I thought, lifting a slice of bread to my mouth while looking out the window. The reflection of the mountains across the fjord was broken kaleidoscopically by the ripples in the water below. Here no one knew who I was, here there were no ties, no fixed patterns, here I could do as I liked. Hide away for a year and write, create something in secret. Or I could just take it easy and save up some money. It didn't really matter. What mattered was that I was here.

I poured some milk into a glass and drank it in long swigs, placed the glass next to the plate and the knife on the counter, returned the food to the fridge, and went into the sitting room, plugged the typewriter in, put on my headset, turned the volume up full, inserted a sheet of paper into the typewriter, centered it, and typed a 1 at the top. Looked down at the caretaker's house. A pair of green rubber boots stood on the doorstep. A broom with red bristles leaned against the wall. There were some toy cars lying in the mixture of gravel and sand covering the area in front of the door. Between the two houses grew moss, lichen, some grass, and a few slender trees. I tapped my forefinger against the table edge to the rhythm of the music. I wrote one sentence: "Gabriel stood at the top of the hill looking over the construction site with an expression of disapproval on his face."

I smoked a cigarette, brewed a pot of coffee, and looked out across the village and fjord and up at the mountains beyond. I wrote another sentence: "Gordon appeared behind him." Sang along to the chorus. Wrote. "He grinned like a wolf." Pushed back my chair, put my feet on the table, and lit another cigarette.

That was pretty good, wasn't it?

I picked up The Garden of Eden by Hemingway and browsed through it to get a feel for the language. I had been given it by Hilde as a graduation present two days before, at the Kristiansand railway station when I was about to leave for Oslo to catch a plane to Tromsø. Lars was there too, and Eirik, who went out with Hilde. Not forgetting Line. She was going to travel with me to Oslo and say good-bye there.

It was only now that I saw there was a dedication on the copyright page. She had written that I meant something special to her.

I lit a cigarette and sat looking out the window while I chewed that over.

What could I mean to her?

She saw something in me, I felt that, but I didn't know what she saw. To be friends with her was to be taken care of. But the care that resides in understanding always makes the recipient smaller too. It wasn't a problem, but I was aware of it.

I wasn't worth it. I pretended I was, and the strange thing was that she rose to it, because there was nothing wrong with her intelligence in such matters. Hilde was the only person I knew who read decent books, and the only person I knew who herself wrote. We had been in the same class for two years and at once she caught my attention, she had an ironic, sometimes also rebellious, attitude to what was said in the classroom, which I had never seen in a girl before. She despised the other girls' mania for makeup, the way they always did their best to be proper, their often affected childishness, but not in any aggressive or bitter manner, she wasn't like that, she was kind and caring, she had a fundamentally gentle nature, but there was a sharpness to it too, an unusual stubbornness, which made me look in her direction more and more often. She was pale, she had pale freckles on her cheeks, her hair was a reddish-blond color, she was thin and there was something physically fragile about her, fragile in the sense of the opposite of robust, which in another, less sharp, less independent soul would perhaps evoke a need in those she met to take her under their wing, but there was definitely no need for this, quite the contrary, it was Hilde who took whoever crossed her path under her wing. She often went around in a green military jacket and plain blue jeans, which signaled politically that she was on the left, but culturally she was on the right because what she was against was materialism while what she was for was the mind. In other words, the internal rather than the external. That was why she scorned writers like Solstad and Faldbakken, or Phallusbakken as she called him, and liked Bjørneboe and Kaj Skagen and even André Bjerke.

Hilde had become my closest confidante. Actually she was my best friend. I was in and out of the house where she lived, I got to know her parents, sometimes I stayed the night and had dinner with them. What Hilde and I did, occasionally with Eirik, occasionally on our own, was talk. Sitting cross-legged on the floor of her cellar flat, with a bottle of wine between us, the night pressing against the windows, we talked about books we had read, about political issues that interested us, about what awaited us in life, what we wanted to do and what we could do. She was very serious about life, she was the only acquaintance of my age who was, and she probably saw the same in me, while at the same time she laughed a lot and irony was never far away. There was little I liked better than being there, in their house, with her and Eirik and sometimes Lars; however, there were other things happening in my life which were irreconcilable, and this caused me to have a permanent guilty conscience: if I was out drinking at discos and trying to pick up girls, I felt bad about Hilde and what I stood for when I was with her; if I was at Hilde's place and talked about freedom or beauty or the meaning of everything, I could feel pangs of guilt toward those I went out with, or toward the person I was when I was with them, because the duplicity and hypocrisy that Hilde, Eirik, and I talked so much about was also present in my own heart. Politically, I was way out on the left, bordering on anarchy, I hated conformity and conventionality, and like all the other alternative young people growing up in Kristiansand, including her, I despised Christianity and all the idiots who believed in it and went to meetings with their stupid charismatic priests.

But I didn't despise the Christian girls. No, for some strange reason it was precisely them I fell for. How could I explain that to Hilde? And although I, like her, always tried to see beneath the surface, on the basis of a fundamental yet unstated tenet that what lay beneath was the truth or the reality, and, like her, always sought meaning, even if it were only to be found in an acknowledgment of meaninglessness, it was actually on the glittering and alluring surface that I wanted to live, and the chalice of meaninglessness I wanted to drain – in short I was attracted by all the town's discos and nightspots, where I wanted nothing more than to drink myself senseless and stagger around chasing girls I could fuck, or at least make out with. How could I explain that to Hilde?

I couldn't, and I didn't. Instead I opened a new subdivision in my life. "Booze and hopes of fornication" it was called, and it was right next to "insight and sincerity," separated only by a minor garden-fence-like change of personality.

Line was a Christian. Not ostentatiously so, but she was, and her presence at the railway station, close to me, somehow made me feel ill at ease.

She had curly black hair, pronounced eyebrows, and clear blue eyes. She moved with grace and was independent in that rare way that does not impinge on others. She liked drawing and did it a lot, perhaps she had some talent; after she'd said good-bye to me she was going to study creative arts at a folk high school. I wasn't in love with her, but she was good-looking, I was incredibly fond of her, and occasionally, after we'd shared some white wine, passionate feelings for her could rise inside me anyway. The problem was that she had clear boundaries as to how far she would go. During the weeks we had been together I had asked her twice, begged her, to let me as we lay there, seminaked, kissing in bed at her house or in my room at the Henhouse. But no, it wasn't me she was saving herself for.

"Couldn't I do it from behind then!" I once burst out in my desperation, without really knowing what that involved. Line snuggled up to me with her supple body and smothered me in kisses. Not many seconds later I felt the hated spasm from down below as my underpants filled with semen and I discreetly moved away from her; fired still by a driving passion, she didn't realize that my mood had changed completely from one moment to the next.

On the station platform she stood beside me, hands in her rear pockets and a little backpack on her back. There were six minutes to go before the train was due to leave. People were still getting on board.

"I'm just going to run over to the kiosk," she said, eyeing me. "Need anything?"

I shook my head.

"Oh, maybe a Coke."

She dashed over to the Narvesen kiosk. Hilde looked at me and smiled. Lars's eyes were wandering. Eirik was gazing in the direction of the harbor.

"Now that you're venturing out into the big wide world, I'll give you a piece of advice," he said, turning to me.

"Oh yeah?" I said.

"Think before you act. Make sure you're never caught with your pants down. And you'll survive. If, for example, you want some of your pupils to suck you off, for God's sake do it behind the teacher's desk. Not in front. OK?"

"Isn't that a double standard?" I said.

He laughed.

"And if, while you're up north, you've got to slap a girlfriend around, do it so the bruises don't show," Hilde said. "Never the face, however much you might feel like it."

"Do you think I should have two, then? One down here and one up there?"

"Why not?" she said.

"One you hit and one you don't," Eirik said. "Can't get a better balance than that."

"Any more advice?" I said.

"I saw an interview with an old actor on TV once," Lars said. "He was asked whether there was anything he'd learned over the course of a long life that he'd like to pass on to the viewers. He said yes, there was. The shower curtain. Make sure it was inside the bath, not outside. Otherwise when you turned the water on it would go all over the floor."

We laughed. Lars, pleased with himself, looked around.

Behind him, Line came back empty-handed.

"The line was too long," she said. "But I guess they'll have a bar on board."

"They do," I said.

"Shall we go?"

"OK," I said. "Thet was thet, as Fleksnes used to say. No more Kristiansand!"

They hugged me one after another. That was something I had started doing in my junior year: whenever we met we hugged.

Then I slung my kitbag over my shoulder, grabbed my case, and followed Line onto the train. They waved a few times, the train set off, and they strolled down to the parking lot.

It was unbelievable that was only two days ago.

I put down the book and, while rolling another cigarette and taking a swig of lukewarm coffee, read the three sentences I had written.

Down the hill the shop was less busy. I went for an apple from the kitchen and sat down at the typewriter again. In the course of the next hour I wrote three pages. About two boys on a construction site, and it was good as far as

I could judge. Perhaps three more pages and it would be finished. And that wasn't bad, finishing a short story on the first whole day up here. At that rate I could have a collection ready by Christmas!

As I was rinsing the dregs from the coffeepot, I saw a car coming up the road from the shop. It stopped outside the caretaker's house and two men, who looked to be in their midtwenties, got out. Both were well built, one was tall, the other shorter and rounder. I held the pot under the tap until it was full and put it on the burner. The two men were walking up the hill. I stepped to the side so they couldn't see me through the window.

Their footsteps stopped outside the porch.

Were they coming to see me?

One of them said something to the other. The ring of the doorbell pierced the silence of the flat.

I wiped my hands on my thighs, went into the hall, and opened the door.

The shorter of the two stretched out a hand. His face was square, his chin curved and jutting, his mouth small, his eyes alert. He had a black moustache and stubble on his jaw. A heavy gold chain around his neck.

"I'm Remi," he said.

Embarrassed, I shook his hand.

"Karl Ove Knausgaard," I said.

"Frank," the tall one said, reaching out a hand, which was enormous. His face was as round as the other man's was square. Round and fleshy. His lips were thick, the skin was delicate, pink almost. Hair blond and thinning. He looked like an overgrown child. His eyes were kind, also like a child's.

"Can we come in?" the one called Remi said. "We heard you were on your own up here and thought you might like some company. I suppose you don't know anyone in the village yet."

"Oh," I said. "That was kind of you. Do come in!"

I took a step back. Kind! Do come in! Where the hell did that come from? Was I fifty?

They stopped in the sitting room and looked around. Remi nodded a few times.

"Harrison lived here last year," he said.

I looked at him.

"The last temporary teacher," he said. "We were here a lot. He was a great guy."

"A good guy," Frank said.

"No wasn't in his vocabulary," Remi said.

"He's already deeply missed," Frank said. "Can we sit down?"

"Yes, of course," I said. "Would you like a cup of coffee? I just made some."

"Coffee? Yes, please."

They took off their jackets, laid them across the arm of the sofa, and sat down. Their bodies were like barrels. The upper arms of the one called Frank were as wide as my thighs. Even with my back to them, in front of the counter, I could feel their presence, it filled the whole flat and made me feel weak and girly.

That was kind of you. Would you like a cup of coffee?

For Christ's sake, I didn't have any cups! Only the one I'd brought with me.

I opened the cupboards above the counter. Empty, of course. Then I opened the lower ones. And there, next to the downpipe from the sink, was a glass. I rinsed it, sprinkled some coffee in the pot, banged it on the tabletop a few times, carried it into the sitting room, and looked around for something to put it on.

It had to be The Garden of Eden.

"Well?" Remi said. "What do you think, Karl Ove?"

I was uncomfortable at hearing my name used so familiarly by a man I had never seen before and felt my cheeks flush.

"I don't really know," I said.

"We're going to a party tonight," Frank said. "Over'n Gryllefjord. How'd you like to come along?"

"There's a place free in the car, and we know you won't've had time to go to the liquor store, so we've got some booze for you too. What do you say?"

"Not sure," I said.

"What? Would you rather mope around here in this empty room?"

"Let the man make his own mind up!" Frank said.

"Yeah, OK."

"I'd planned to do some work," I said.

"Work? On what" Remi said. But his eyes were already fixed on the typewriter. "Do you write?"

I flushed again.

"A little," I said with a shrug.

"Ah, a writer!" Remi said. "Not bad."

He laughed.

"I've never read a book in my life. Not even when I went to school. I always got out of it. Have you?" he said, looking at Frank.

"Sure, lots. Cocktail."

They both burst into laughter.

"Does that count?" Remi said, looking at me. "You're a writer. Does porn count as literature?"

I gave a strained smile.

"Fiction is fiction, I guess," I said.

There was a silence.

"You're from Kristiansand, I hear," Frank said.

I nodded.

"You have a girl down there?"

I mulled that one over.

"Yes and no," I said.

"Yes and no? That sounds interesting!" Remi said.

"Sounds like something for you," Frank said with a glance at Remi.

"For me? No. I'm more the either-or type."

There was another silence as they took a mouthful of coffee.

"Any children?" Remi said.

"Children?" I said. "Jesus. I'm only eighteen!"

At last, a comment from the heart.

"It's happened before in the history of the world," Remi said.

"And do you two have children?" I said.

"Frank doesn't. But I do. My son's nine. He lives with his mother."

"He's from the 'or' time," Frank said.

They laughed. Then they both looked at me.

"Well, we shouldn't bother him any more on his first day here," Remi said, and got up. Frank got up too. They took their jackets and went into the hall.

"Think about the party tonight," Remi said. "We'll be at Hege's if you change your mind."

"He doesn't know where Hege lives," Frank said.

"You walk up the top road. Then it's the fourth house on the left. You can't miss it. There'll be cars outside."

He held out a hand.

"Hope you'll come. Thanks for the coffee!"

After I'd closed the door behind them, I went into the bedroom and lay down. Stretched out my arms and legs and closed my eyes.

A car came up the hill and stopped outside.

I opened my eyes. More visitors?

No. A door banged somewhere else in the house. It was my neighbors, whoever they were, coming home. After shopping in Finnsnes maybe.

Oh, I was dying to call someone I knew!

I couldn't sleep, which I was also eager to do, to get away from all of this. Instead I went to the bathroom, undressed, and had another shower. It was a way of tricking myself into believing something new was beginning. Not as good as sleeping, it was true, but better than nothing. Then, with wet hair and my shirt sticking to my back, I sat down and went back to writing. I had the two ten-year-olds walking around in the forest. They were scared of meeting foxes and had cap guns in their hands to frighten them away if they showed up. Suddenly they heard a shot. They ran over to where the sound had come from and saw a garbage dump in the middle of the forest. There were two men lying on the ground shooting at rats. That's when something seemed to flash through me, an arc of happiness and energy; now I couldn't write fast enough, the text lagged slightly behind the narrative, it was a wonderful feeling, shiny and glittering.

The men shooting at the rats went on their way, the two boys pulled up two chairs and a table in the forest and sat there reading porn magazines. One of them, the one called Gabriel, stuck his dick in a glass bottle and suddenly felt a terrible stinging pain, he pulled it out and there was a beetle on the end of it. Gordon laughed so much he fell back into the heather. They forgot all about time, then Gabriel realized, but it was too late, his father was furious with him when he got home, punched him in the mouth, which began to bleed, and locked him in the tiny room with the hot-water tank, where he had to stay all night.

When I had finished, it was almost eight, and seven closely written pages lay in a pile beside the typewriter.

So great was my sense of triumph that something inside me screamed out to tell someone. Anyone! Anyone!

But I was all alone.

I turned off the typewriter and buttered some slices of bread, which I ate standing in front of the kitchen window. A figure hurried past on the road under the graying though still blue sky. Two cars emerged from the tunnel, one right after the other. I had to go out. I couldn't stay inside any longer.

Then there was a knock at the door.

I answered it. A woman of around thirty, in a T-shirt and slacks, stood outside. Her face had gentle features, her nose was big though not obtrusively so, her eyes were warm and brown. Her hair was dark blond and tied in a knot at the back.

"Hi!" she said. "I just had to say hello. We're neighbors. I live upstairs. And we're also colleagues. I'm a teacher too. I'm Torill."

She held out her hand. Her fingers were thin, but her grasp was firm.

"Karl Ove," I said.

"Welcome to Håfjord," she said with a smile.

"Thank you."

"You arrived yesterday, I hear?"

"Yes, by bus."

"Yes, well, we'll have to talk another time. I just wanted to say that if there's anything you need just ring the bell. I mean, sugar or coffee or bed linen or whatever it is you're short of. A radio, for example. Do you have one? We've got at least one we don't use."

I nodded.

"I have a Walkman," I said. "But thanks anyway. It was very kind of you to come down!"

Very kind.

She smiled.

"I'll see you later," she said.

"Yes, see you," I said.

I stood in the hall long after she had gone. What was happening actually?

Every meeting here was like a dagger to the soul.

No, I had to get out and walk.

I put on a coat, spent a few seconds in front of the mirror in the bathroom straightening my beret, locked the door behind me, and started walking down the hill. Some way down you could the see past the edge of the mountain and out to sea, the razor-sharp horizon against the sky. Two large very white clouds hung motionless, hovering on high. On the other side of the fjord a little fishing boat was chugging back toward the harbor. The fjord was called Fugleøyfjord. Bird Island Fjord. OK, they, the first people who arrived here, must have thought: What shall we call this fjord? Fishfjord? No, that's what we called the last one, didn't we. What about Birdfjord then? Yes! Good idea!

I continued along the road past the fish-processing plant, which was deserted apart from the seagulls huddled on the roof, and on toward the bend that led to the higher part of the village. Beyond the last house the mountain soared straight up. There was no intermediate stage, which I was used to where I had grown up, those diffuse, hard-to-define places, which were neither private property nor open nature. This was real nature, and not the low, gentle Sørland type of nature but wild, harsh, windswept Arctic nature, which confronted you as soon as you opened the door.

Were there a hundred houses here in all?

Way up here, beneath the mountains, by the sea.

I had the feeling I was walking on the edge of the world. That it wasn't possible to go any farther. One more step and I was gone.

But, my God, how fantastic it was to be able to live here.

Now and then I saw movements behind the windows in the houses I passed. The flickering lights of TV sets. All somehow submerged beneath the crash of the waves as they washed up on the shore below, or woven into it, for so even and regular was this roar that it seemed more like a quality of the air, as though the air could not only be colder or warmer but also louder or softer.

In front of me appeared the house where I assumed the woman they had called Hege lived, at any rate there were lots of cars in the drive, music was coming from an open veranda door, and behind the large 1970s-style windows I glimpsed a group of people sitting around a table. It was tempting to go over and knock on the door, they could hardly expect anything of me, after all I didn't know anyone, a certain shyness would only be natural, so it would be OK just to sit there drinking without uttering a word until the alcohol kicked in and loosened everything in me, including my heart, which was now so small and constricted.

While I was thinking this I didn't stop walking, I didn't even slow down because if they saw me standing there wavering and then I set off for home again they would think they knew something about me.

Maybe I was longing for something to make my heart swell, but this wasn't vital, and I was supposed to be doing my writing, I thought as I walked on, and then I was past the house and it was too late.

When I came to a halt by my front door I looked at my watch.

It had taken me fifteen minutes to walk around the whole village.

So it was within these fifteen minutes I was to live my whole life this coming year.

A shudder went through me. I walked into the hall and took off my coat. Even though I knew nothing was going to happen, I locked the door and kept it locked all night.

The next day I didn't go out, I sat writing and staring at the people who appeared and disappeared again on their way downhill. I paced back and forth in the flat pondering more and more what I was going to do when classes started on Tuesday, formulating one introductory sentence after another in my head while also trying to decide what strategy to adopt for dealing with the pupils. The first priority was to establish what their level was. Perhaps test them in all the subjects right from the beginning? And then plan everything after that? Tests? No, that was a bit harsh, a bit too authoritarian, a bit too schoolmarmy.

Some exercises, then, that they could do at home?

No. There was so much time to fill in every lesson that it would be best to give them the exercises at school. I could work on them tomorrow.

I went into the bedroom and lay down on the bed, finished the two books I had bought, and once that was done started on the articles in the literary magazine I had picked up in Oslo, although I didn't understand much. I was familiar with most of the words, but what they described seemed to be constantly beyond my reach, as though they were about an unknown world which the language of the old world was not equipped to approach. But one thing did emerge from these pages with greater force than anything else, and that was the description of a book, Ulysses, which in its singularity sounded absolutely fantastic. Before me I saw an enormous tower, glinting with moisture as it were, surrounded by mist and a pallid light from the overcast sun. It was regarded as the major work of modernism, by which I imagined low-slung racing cars, pilots with leather helmets and jackets, zeppelins floating above skyscrapers in glittering but dark metropolises, computers, electronic music. Names such as Hermann Broch, Robert Musil, Arnold Schönberg.

Elements of earlier, long-gone cultures were assimilated into this world, in my mind's eye, such as Broch's Virgil and Joyce's Ulysses.

At the shop the day before I had forgotten today was Sunday, so I was eating bread with liver paste and mayonnaise when there was another ring at the door. I wiped my mouth with the back of my hand and hurried into the hall.

There were two girls standing outside. I recognized one of them at once. She was the girl sitting across the aisle from me on the bus coming here.

She smiled.

"Hi!" she said. "Do you recognize me?"

"Of course," I said. "You're the girl on the bus."

She laughed.

"And you're the new teacher at Håfjord! I thought you were when I saw you, but I wasn't sure. Then someone at the party last night told me you were."

She stuck out a hand.

"My name's Irene," she said.

"Karl Ove," I said with a smile.

"This is Hilde," she said, nodding in the direction of the other girl, whose hand I then shook."We're cousins," Irene said. "I dropped in on her today. But actually that was just an excuse to come and say hello to you." She let out a laugh. "No, I was just joking."

"Would you like to come in?" I said.

They looked at each other.

"Love to," Irene said.

She was wearing jeans, a blue denim jacket, and, beneath it, a white lace blouse. She was chubby, her breasts under the blouse were full and her hips broad. Her hair was blond, shoulder-length, her skin pale with some freckles around her nose. Eyes large, blue, and teasing. Standing next to her in the hall, smelling the fragrance of her perfume, which was also full, as she passed me her jacket – there were no hooks in the hall – with a slightly searching look, I got another boner.

"I can take yours too while I'm at it," I said to Hilde, who had nowhere near the same presence as her cousin, and who passed me her jacket with a shy, bashful smile. I hung them over the back of the desk chair and slid a hand into my trouser pocket so that the bulge was not visible. The two girls went somewhat hesitantly into the sitting room.

"My things haven't arrived yet," I said. "They'll be here soon."

"Yes, it is a bit drab in here," Irene said, smiling.

They sat down on the sofa, both with their knees tightly together. I sat on the chair opposite them, with my legs crossed to hide the bulge, which had not become any smaller. She was sitting only a meter away from me.

"How old are you?" she asked.

"Eighteen," I said. "And you?"

"Sixteen," Irene said.

"Seventeen," Hilde said.

"So you just finished gymnas?" Irene said.

I nodded.

"I'm in my junior year," Irene said. "At the gymnas in Finnsnes. It's a boarding school. So I've got a room there. You can come and visit me if you like. No doubt you'll soon be coming to Finnsnes quite a bit."

"Yes, I'd like that," I said.

Our eyes met.

She smiled. I smiled back.

"But I'm really from Hellevika. That's the next village. Across the mountain. It's just a few kilometers away. Do you have a driver's license?"

"No," I said.

"Shame," she said.

There were a few moments of silence. I got up, went for an ashtray and my pouch of tobacco, and rolled a cigarette.

"Can I have one?" she said. "Mine are in my jacket."

I threw the pouch over to her.

"I had to laugh when we were on the bus yesterday," she said as she was making her rollie. "You looked as if you were trying to climb out the window."

They grinned. She licked the gum, folded the paper over with her forefingers against her thumbs, put it in her mouth, and lit up.

"It was so incredibly beautiful," I said. "I had no idea what it would be like up here. Håfjord was just a name to me. In fact, not even that."

"Why did you apply to come up here then?"

I shrugged.

"I was given a list of names by the employment office, and so I chose this one."

Someone crossed the floor above.

We all looked up at the ceiling.

"Have you met Torill yet?" Irene said.

"Yes, briefly," I said. "Do you know her?"

"Of course we do. Everyone knows everyone here. Well, in Hellevika and Håfjord."

"And on Fugleøya," Hilde said.

Silence.

"Would you like a cup of coffee?" I asked them, half getting up from the chair.

Irene shook her head. "No, I think we should be going. What do you think, Hilde?"

"Yes, I think so too," her cousin said.

We got up, I took the jackets from the chair, went closer to Irene than strictly speaking I had to as I handed her the jacket. I was filled with a sense of her hips, covered by her tight jeans, and of her thighs and legs and surprisingly small feet, of her neck and her full breasts, her short nose and blue eyes, at once innocent and sassy, I closed the door behind the girls. The whole visit had lasted ten, maybe fifteen minutes.

I was on my way to the kitchen to put on some coffee when there was another knock at the door.

It was her, alone this time.

"There's a party in Hellevika next weekend," she said. "In fact, that was why I came by, to tell you. Would you feel like coming? It's a good way to meet people from around here."

"Of course," I said. "If I can make it I will."

"If?" she said. "You just have to get in a car. Everyone's going. See you there!"

She winked. Then she turned and walked down the hill to where Hilde was chipping away at the edge of the asphalt with the tip of her shoe.

A little after eight the following morning, I left the flat for the first time in more than a day. The sun that hung above the mountains to the east shone directly on the door, and the air that met my face when I closed it behind me was mild and summery. But only a few meters away, where the countryside lay in shadow behind the mountains, it was colder, and the impression I had of small pools existing in the air, like currents and eddies, rapids and waterfalls, seemed strangely uplifting. Ahead of me, atop a small plateau, was the school, and if I wasn't absolutely dreading going in, I was certainly nervous enough for tiny flashes of apprehension to shoot through me as I approached.

It looked like any other school, a long single-story edifice on one side, connected to a tunnel-like corridor with a larger, newer, and taller block housing a woodwork room, gymnasium, and small swimming pool. Between the two buildings was the playground, which extended behind them to a full-sized soccer field. On a mound above it, standing proudly, was what I guessed was the community center.

Two cars were parked in front of the entrance. A big white jeep and a low black Citroën. The sun gleamed on the row of windows. The door was open. I went into the hall, the yellow linoleum floor was almost white in the sunshine, which fell in long stripes through the glass door panels. I rounded one corner, there were three doors on the right, two on the left, and at the end the hall opened into a large space. A man stopped and looked at me. He had a full beard and a bald patch. Probably in his early thirties.

"Hello!" he said.

"Hello," I said.

"And you are . . . Karl Ove?"

"That's me," I said, stopping in front of him.

"Sture," he said.

We shook hands.

"Karl Ove was a pure guess," he said with a smile. "But you didn't look like a Nils Erik."

"Nils Erik?" I said.

"Yes, we have two teachers from the south this year. You and Nils Erik. The rest of the untrained staff are local people, so I know them."

"Are you local?"

"I certainly am!"

He looked me straight in the eye for a few seconds. I found it unpleasant, what was this, some kind of test, but I didn't want to be the first to look away so I held his gaze.

"You're very young," he said eventually, and looked away toward the door we were standing next to. "But we knew that of course. It'll all be fine! Come on, you have to meet the others."

He stretched out an arm toward the door. I opened it and entered. It was the staff room. A kitchenette, armchairs, and a sofa, a small room full of papers and a photocopier, an adjacent rectangular room with workstations on both sides.

"Hi!" I said.

Six people were sitting around the table. All eyes turned to me.

They nodded and mumbled "hi" in return. From the kitchenette appeared a small but powerful and energetic man with a red beard.

"Karl Ove?" He beamed. After I had nodded and he'd shaken my hand, he addressed the others.

"This is Karl Ove Knausgaard, the young man who has come all the way from Kristiansand to work with us!" And then he said the names of all those seated, which I had forgotten an instant later. They all had a cup of coffee in their hands or on the table in front of them, and everyone, apart from one elderly woman, was young. In their early twenties or so it seemed.

"Take a seat, Karl Ove. Coffee?"

"Please," I said, and squeezed down at the end of the sofa.

For the next few hours the head teacher, who was called Richard and must have been in his late thirties, told us, the two temporary teachers, about the school. We were shown around the rooms, given keys, allocated workstations, and then we went through the timetables and various routines. It was a small school with so few pupils that classes were grouped together for many of the lessons. Torill would be the homeroom teacher for the first and second graders, Hege for the third and fourth, me for the fifth, sixth, and seventh, Sture for the eighth and ninth. Why precisely I had been made a homeroom teacher I had no idea, and it felt a little uncomfortable, not least because the other temp from Sørland, Nils Erik, was considerably older than me, twenty-four, and planning to embark on teacher training after this year. He was serious about it, this was his future, while I had no such plans: becoming a teacher was the last thing I wanted to do in this life. The other temps came from the area, knew the ins and outs, and ought to have been better suited than me to taking responsibility for a class. Presumably the head teacher had based his decision on my application, and that made me uneasy because I had laid it on thick.

The head teacher showed us where the syllabuses were and demonstrated the range of teaching aids we had at our disposal. At one o'clock we were finished, and I walked down to the post office, which was at the other end of the village, arranged a PO box number, sent a few letters, did some food shopping, made dinner at home, lay on my bed listening to music for an hour or so, jotted down some key words regarding the ideas I'd had for my classes, but they looked stupid, too obvious, so I crumpled up the paper and threw it away.

I had everything under control, everything.

Early that evening I went back up to the school. It was a strange feeling to unlock the door of the main building and walk along the corridors. Everything was empty and still, filled with the gray light that seeped in through the windows. All the shelves and cupboards were empty, the classrooms somehow untouched.

In the staff room there was a telephone in a small cubicle, I went in and called Mom, she'd also had her first day at a new school today. She was busy unpacking in the new place she was renting, a terraced house some way outside Førde town center. I told her a bit about what it was like here and how nervous I was about teaching the next day. She said she knew I would manage just fine, and even though her character reference didn't count for a lot – after all she was my mother – it did help.

When I had finished the call, I went into the photocopier room and made ten copies of the short story I had written. The idea was to send it to people I knew the following day. Then I wandered around all the rooms in the school. In the gym I swung open the panel door to the little equipment room, threw a ball out, had a few kicks at the handball goal at the far end. Switched off the light, went into the swimming pool area. The water lay dark and still in the pool. I went up to the woodwork room and on to the natural science room. From the windows you could see across the village lying beneath the mountains, lots of small houses in a variety of colors which appeared to vibrate, and beyond, across the sea, the endless sea, and the sky that rose from it, in the far distance, full of elongated, smoke-like clouds.

Early tomorrow morning the pupils would come, then it was down to business.

I switched the lights off after me, locked the door, and walked down the hill with the large key ring jangling in my hand.

Upon waking the next morning I was so nervous I was on the point of throwing up. A cup of coffee was all I could get down me. I walked up to the school half an hour before the first lesson was due to begin, sat in my place flipping through the books we were going to use. The mood among the other teachers buzzing around between the photocopier, classrooms, kitchenette, and sofa suite was lighthearted and cheery. Outside the window the students were beginning to appear in dribs and drabs, coming up the hill. My chest was frozen with terror. My heart was beating as if it were being strangled. I saw the letters on the page I had opened but couldn't make any sense of them. After a while I stood up and went into the kitchenette to get myself a cup of coffee. When I turned I met the eyes of Nils Erik. He looked relaxed, leaning back against the sofa, his legs wide apart.

"You're free in the first lesson, aren't you?" I said.

He nodded. His cheeks were slightly flushed. His hair was black and he had the same unruly tufts of hair that my old best friend Geir had. His eyes were light blue.

"I'm so damned nervous," I said, sitting down in the chair opposite.

"What are you nervous about?" he said. "You know there are only five or six pupils in each class, don't you?"

"I do," I said. "Nevertheless."

He smiled.

"Shall we trade places? They don't know who's who anyway. I'll be Karl Ove and you're Nils Erik."

"Why not," I said. "But what do we do when we have to swap back?"

"Swap back? Why would we have to?"

"No, you've got a point there," I said, glancing out the window. The pupils were standing around in groups. Some were running around. Scattered between them were also some mothers. The children were smartly dressed.

Of course they were. Some were here for the first time. It was their very first school day.

"So where am I from?" I said.

"Hokksund," he said. "And me?"

"Kristiansand."

"Great!" he said.

I shook my head.

"No, you're wrong there," I said.

He looked at me with a twinkle in his eye.

"You might think so now," he said. "But just wait a few years."

"What's happening in a few years?" I said.

Just then the bell rang.

"In a few years you'll think of your hometown as paradise on earth," he said.

What the hell do you know about that? I thought, but said nothing, just got up, took my coffee cup in one hand, the pile of books in the other, and headed for the door.

"Good luck!" he said from behind me.

There were five pupils in the seventh grade. Four girls, one boy. In addition to them, I was also responsible for the three in the fifth and sixth grades. So, in all, eight pupils.

When I stopped in front of the teacher's desk and put my things down, all of them were staring at me. My palms were damp, my heart was thumping, and as I drew breath it was with a tremble.

"Hi," I said. "My name's Karl Ove Knausgaard. I come from Kristiansand and I'm going to be your homeroom teacher this year. I thought we might begin with a little roll call? I've got your names here, but I don't know who's who yet."

While I was talking they exchanged glances; two of the girls giggled. The attention they were paying me was not hostile, I sensed that at once, it was childlike. They were children.

I took out the list of names. Studied it, studied them.

I recognized the girl from the shop. But the one who made the strongest impression on me was a girl with reddish hair and black-rimmed glasses. She was skeptical, I could tell. There was no sharpness from any of the others.

"Andrea?" I said.

"Here," said the girl from the shop. She said it with downcast eyes, but as her voice trailed off she looked up at me.

I smiled to reassure her.

"Vivian?"

The girl beside her giggled. "That's me!" she said.

"Hildegunn?"

"Yes," said the girl with the glasses.

"Kai Roald?"

He was the only boy in the seventh grade. Wearing jeans and a denim jacket, he sat fiddling with a pen.

"Here," he said.

"Live?" I said.

A girl with long hair, a round face, and glasses smiled. "Yup, that's me."

Then there was the boy and the girl from the sixth grade, and the girl from the fifth.

I put down the list and sat on the desk.

"You'll be with me for Norwegian, math, religion, and science. You're all very good, though, aren't you?"

"Not that good," said the redhead with the glasses. "We've always had unqualified teachers from the south who only stay for a year."

I smiled. She didn't.

"What subjects do you like?"

They looked at one another. No one seemed to want to answer.

"How about you, Kai Roald?"

He squirmed. A pink flush spread across his cheeks. "I don't know," he said. "Woodwork maybe. Or gym. Not Norwegian anyway!"

"And you?" I said, motioning to the girl from the shop as I looked down at my list. "Andrea?"

She had crossed her legs under the desk and was leaning forward, drawing something on a sheet of paper.

"I don't have any favorite subjects," she said.

"Do you like them all or dislike them all?" I said.

She peered up at me. A glint appeared in her eyes. “Dislike!” she said.

“Is that the same for all of you?” I said.

“Yes!” they said.

“OK,” I said. “But the thing is that we have to be here for all these lessons whether you like them or not. So we may as well make the best of it. Don’t you agree?”

No one answered.

“Since I know nothing about you, I’m going to spend the first few lessons getting to know you better and find out what we have to work on.”

I got up, took a swig of coffee, and wiped my mouth with the back of my hand. In the corner on the other side someone started singing. A clear, high-pitched voice, that had to be Hege, and then some very young children’s voices joined in.

They were the first graders!

“So I thought I would simply start by giving you an exercise,” I continued. “You have to write a page about yourselves. A presentation.”

“Oh no. Do we have to write?” Kai Roald said.

“What’s a presentation?” Vivian asked.

I looked at her. There was so little angularity about her chin that her whole face seemed almost square, though not harsh. She had something soft and puppylike about her. Her blue eyes almost disappeared entirely when she smiled, and she smiled a lot, I could already see that.

“It’s writing about who you are,” I said. “Imagine you have to say who you are to someone who doesn’t know you. What’s the first thing you would write?”

She shifted her position on the chair and pressed her calflike knees together.

“Maybe that I’m thirteen years old. And in the seventh grade at Håfjord School?”

“Yes, that’s good,” I said. “And maybe that you’re a girl?”

She laughed. “Yes, he’d have to know that,” she said.

“OK,” I said. “So write a page about yourselves. Or more if you like.”

“Are you going to read it out loud?” Hildegunn said.

"No," I said.

"What are we supposed to write on?" Kai Roald said.

I smacked my forehead. "You're right! I haven't given you any books!"

They cracked up, they were children, they thought things like this were funny. I dashed to the staff room, grabbed a pile of exercise books, handed them out, and soon they were all writing while I stood by the window gazing at the mountain peaks across the fjord where they seemed to writhe their way upward, so cold and black against the airy light.

When the bell rang at the end of the lesson, I gathered my papers with an exuberant, almost jubilant, feeling in my body. It had gone well, there was nothing to be afraid of. And after twelve years of continuous education, the next moment – opening the door and going into the staff room – was a particular pleasure: I had crossed the line, I was on the other side, an adult and responsible for a class of my own.

I put down my books and papers in front of my spot at the table, poured coffee into a cup, sat down on the sofa, and observed the other teachers. I was backstage, I mused, but what at first was a wonderful thought was immediately replaced by its antithesis, for this was not what I wanted, for Christ's sake, I was a teacher, was there anything sadder than that? Backstage, that was bands, women, drinking, tours, fame.

But that was not what I wanted either. This was just a step on the way.

I took a mouthful of coffee and glanced at the door as it opened. It was Nils Erik.

"How did it go?" he said.

"It went well," I said. "Certainly nothing to be afraid of."

Behind him appeared the woman called Hege.

"They're so lovely," she said. "Little sweeties!"

"Karl Ove?" came a voice from the kitchenette. I looked across; Sture was standing with a cup in his hand, looking at me.

"You play soccer, don't you?"

"I do," I said. "But I'm not much good. I played in the fifth division two seasons ago."

"We've got a team here," he said. "I'm the coach. We're in the seventh division, so you shouldn't have any difficulty hanging in there, I bet. How about a game?"

"Sure," I said.

"Tor Einar's always up for it. Isn't that right, Tor Einar?" he said, sticking his head into the room with the workstations.

"Are you talking nonsense about me again?" we heard from inside. A second later a man poked his head around the corner.

"Tor Einar used to play in the fourth division as a junior," Sture said. "Sadly though he has no other talents."

"At least I haven't lost my hair," Tor Einar said, coming closer. "So I don't need to grow a beard to retain my masculine dignity, like some people I know."

Tor Einar came from Finnsnes, had pale skin and freckles, bristly reddish hair, and a constant grin playing on his lips. His movements were slow and laborious, in an almost demonstrative way, as if with them he were trying to say here comes someone who does everything at his own pace and is not concerned about anyone else.

"Where do you play then?" he said.

"Midfield," I said. "And you?"

"Midfielder/ball winner," he said with a wink.

"Ah, a terrier," I said. "I was called the elk myself when I used to play. That tells you everything . . ."

He laughed.

"Why the elk?" Hege said.

"My loping gait," I said. "Long, unsteady stride and no change of pace."

"Are there any other animal metaphors on the soccer field?" she said.

"There are, aren't there?" I said, looking at Tor Einar.

"Yes, you've got the striker who's as strong as an ox and rams the ball into the net."

"And then you've got the cat," I said. "Lots of goalkeepers called the cat. And incidentally there's a midfield general too."

"What's that?"

"Someone who always knows where the others are and can deliver pinpoint passes at precisely the right moment."

"How unbelievably childish!" Hege said.

"And a sweeper," Tor Einar said.

"And there's often a dynamic duo up front. And then there's the lone wolf, of course."

"You've forgotten the referee," Nils Erik said. "The ref's an asshole."

"And you do this of your own free will," Hege said.

"Not me," Nils Erik said.

"But the two of you do," she said, looking at me.

The bell rang. I got up to collect my books for the next lesson. Sture placed a hand on my shoulder.

"You have my class now, don't you?" he said.

I nodded.

"For English."

"Watch out for a kid called Stian. He might try to nettle you. But don't rise to it and you'll be fine. OK?"

I shrugged.

"Hope so," I said.

"Make sure you always leave him a way out and he's no problem."

"OK," I said.

English was my worst subject, and I was only two years older than the oldest pupils, so while I was walking over to the other building, where the eighth and ninth grades had their classroom, my stomach was churning again.

I put my pile of books down on the raised table. The pupils were scattered across their desks as if they had just been hurled out of a spin dryer. No one paid any attention to me.

"Hello, class!" I said. "My name is Karl Ove Knausgaard, and I'm going to be your English teacher this year. How do you do?"

No one said anything. The class consisted of four boys and five girls. A couple of them watched me, the others sat scribbling something, one was knitting. I recognized the boy from the snack bar stand: he was wearing a baseball cap and rocking back and forth on his chair while eyeing me with a smirk on his face. He had to be Stian.

"Well," I said. "Now I would like you to introduce yourselves in English."

"Snakk norsk!" Stian said. The boy behind him, a conspicuously tall, thin figure, taller than me, and I was six foot four, guffawed. Some of the girls tittered.

"If you are going to learn a language, then you have to speak it," I said.

One of the girls, dark-haired and white-skinned, with regular, slightly chubby facial features and blue eyes, put up her hand.

"Yes?" I said.

"Isn't your English a bit too bad? I mean, for teaching?"

I could feel my cheeks burning, I stepped forward with a smile to hide my embarrassment.

"Well," I said. "I have to admit that my English isn't exactly perfect. But that isn't the most important thing. The most important is to be understood. And you do understand me?"

"Sort of," she said.

"So," I said. "And what's your name?"

She rolled her eyes. "Camilla."

"Full sentences, please."

"Oh, my name is Camilla. Happy?"

"Ja," I said.

"Do you mean yes?" she said.

"Yes," I said, blushing again.

"So, what's your name?" I asked the girl sitting behind Camilla. She raised her head and looked at me.

Ay-yay-yay.

What a beauty!

Gentle blue eyes that narrowed when she smiled. Large mouth. High cheekbones.

"My name is Liv," she said with a chuckle.

"Camilla, Liv. And you?" I said, motioning with my head to Stian.

"Æ heitte Stian," he said.

"Well," I said. "What would that be in English?"

"Stian!" he said.

Everyone laughed.

When the bell rang and I left the room, I was absolutely exhausted. So much had to be parried, so much had to be tolerated, so much had to be ignored, so much had to be repressed. The girl called Camilla had yawned and stretched her arms above her head while staring straight at me. She was wearing only a T-shirt, and her breasts, which were large and round, were delineated in unmistakable clarity against the white material. I had an erection, it was impossible to avoid, no matter how hard I tried to concentrate on other matters. How glad I was that I was sitting behind the teacher's desk! And as if that weren't enough, the girl called Liv was as charming as she was beautiful, somehow shy and outgoing at the same time, apart from the vague wildness there was about her – which above all was embodied in her big dark-blond hair and wide selection of jangling bracelets, but also in the contrast between her reserved body language and the sparkle in her eyes – which made it impossible for me not to think about her when she was in the room. Then there was Stian, who kept fidgeting with a penknife while taking every opportunity to taunt me and refused to do anything I told the class to do, and his friend Ivar, who laughed at everything Stian said, a hollow, slightly inane laugh that was always followed by sweeping glances around the room. But his gaze was ingenuous, sometimes even toward me, I could win him over, he had even grinned once or twice at something I had said.

In the staff room I slumped down onto the sofa. The teacher called Vibeke stopped and smiled at me. She was nineteen, had a full body and a round soft face, happy blue eyes, curly, permed blond hair.

"How's it going?" she said.

"It's going fine," I said. "How about you?"

"Fine too," she said. "There's not as much that's new here for me as there is for you, I imagine. I attended this school when I was growing up."

I couldn't think of a response, and she smiled again before going into the workroom. Beside me sat Jane, she was also from the village, in her early twenties, also large: her upper arms were perhaps twice the size of mine. She had a long, straight, almost Roman nose, flat cheeks, thin lips that often sagged at the corners as though she wouldn't touch what she saw before her with a bargepole. Her eyes were grumpy, indeed her whole bearing was grumpy. But a couple of times I had seen her laugh, and then all of her brightened up, the transformation was total, she could hardly stop laughing once she had started, and it was a pleasure to see her struggling to regain her composure.

In addition to all the young temporary teachers, there was an older woman on the staff, Eva, she was in her late forties, but looked older, she taught needlework and home economics, was small, lean, with a pointed face, thin fair hair, and a piercing voice, and at this moment she was sitting in the chair on the other side of the table, knitting. She was skeptical about me, I could see that from the way she looked at and didn't look at me. And with absolute justification, for what was I doing here actually? What did I want from this job?

When I came in after the English lesson, she glanced up at me, and I think she knew what feelings were coursing through me.

Of course that was impossible, but it was what I thought anyway.

During the lunch break I went down to the post office at the other end of the village. The mountainsides were bright green in the sunshine. The sea was deep blue. Something about the light or perhaps the cool draft I felt in the air, somehow beneath what the sun heated up, so typical of August, evoked the atmospheres I recognized from when I started school after the holidays: the excitement, the anticipation, the perhaps-something-fantastic-is-going-to-happen-this-year?

On the slope behind the last row of houses there was already a hint of yellow in the green. Of course autumn came earlier here. I nodded to a car driving past. The driver, who looked like a mother, nodded back, and I walked down the graveled incline to the post office, which was housed in the basement of a block of flats. In the hall were the PO boxes, inside was the office with counters, posters on the walls, stands of postcards and envelopes.

The woman behind the counter was probably about fifty. Permed thinning reddish hair, glasses, a delicate gold necklace. A man with a walker stood by the small table under the window scraping a scratch card with a coin.

"Hello," I said to the assistant, and placed the envelopes on the counter. "I just wanted to mail these."

"Yes, of course," she said. "By the way, there's some mail for you already."

"Is there?" I said. "Not bad!"

While she weighed the letters and selected the appropriate stamps, I unlocked my box. It was a letter from Line.

I went in and paid, opened the letter, and started to read while walking up the gravel road.

She wrote that she was in her room and thinking about me. She liked me a lot, she said, we'd had so much fun together, but she had never actually been in love with me, so now, with us living in two different places, she thought the best and most honest thing to do would be to end it. She hoped everything would go well for me in my life, urged me to take writing seriously, as she would with her drawing, and also hoped that I would not be angry with her, for our new lives were starting now, we were far apart, tomorrow she would be traveling to the folk high school, and by now I had probably arrived in the village where I was going to work, and as long as this felt the way it did and she didn't love me, anything else but breaking off the relationship would be a betrayal of herself. But I was a wonderful person, I should know that, that was not the reason, you can't control feelings, they are how they are.

I stuffed the letter in my coat pocket.

I hadn't been in love with Line either, everything she said about me I could have said about her, yet still I felt sad and also a bit angry with her when I read what she had written. I wanted her to love me! And even though I didn't want to be with her, and was glad it was over, it should have been me who ended it. Now it was her who had the high ground, who said no to me and who would also probably go through life convinced that I had loved her and had been crushed by her letter.

Oh well.

There was great activity down at the fish-processing plant. Several boats had docked, forklift trucks were plying back and forth across the concrete and into what looked like a dark hall. Men in high rubber boots bustled here and there, a group of women wearing open white coats and white caps stood smoking outside the end of the hall, and the air above them was full of flapping, screaming seagulls. I went into the shop and bought some rolls, some mild cheese, a packet of margarine, and a liter of milk, said hello to the assistant, who asked whether I had settled in all right, fine, I said, everything was great.

I didn't have a class in the next slot, so after eating two rolls and putting the rest in the tiny staff room fridge, I sat down at my workstation to plan the next few days' teaching. The temporary teachers had been allocated a mentor, who would come to see us once a week so that we could discuss any problems or difficulties we had in our classes. We were also going on a course next week, in Finnsnes, with all the other temporary teachers in the district. There were a lot of them; the locals who trained as teachers seldom moved back when the training was over. All sorts of measures had been implemented to remedy this, it was a big problem, of course. Where Dad lived now there were huge tax incentives, and that was one of the reasons that he and Unni had moved north. They both worked at a gymnas but actually, for now, only Dad was working because Unni was expecting a child. The last time I saw them, a few weeks ago in the terraced house they had bought in Sørland, which would be waiting for them after they had completed their contract in the north, her belly had been enormous.

That was where I'd gotten the idea to come up here. We had been sitting on the veranda, Dad bare chested, as brown as a nut, with a beer in one hand and a cigarette in the other, me with a crucifix dangling from one ear and wearing sunglasses, when he had asked me what I was going to do in the autumn. His gaze was anywhere else but on me, also when he asked, his voice was tired and apathetic, a touch slurred from all the beers he had drunk since I arrived, and so I answered in a sort of lackadaisical way, although it hurt me. I shrugged and said I definitely wasn't going to study or do military service. Work somewhere, I said. In a hospital or something.

He straightened up and stubbed out his cigarette in the large ashtray on the table between us. The air was heavy with pollen, everywhere there was the buzz of bees and wasps in the air. Why don't you do some teaching, then? he said, and slumped back in the chair, perhaps twenty kilos heavier now than the last time I had seen him. You can get a job in Northern Norway any day of the week, you know. As long as you've been to gymnas they'll welcome you with open arms. Maybe, I said. I'll think about it. You should, he said. If you want another beer, you know where the crate is. OK, why not, I said, and went into the living room, which was pitch black after the bright light outside, and into the kitchen, where Unni was reading the paper. She smiled at me. She was wearing khaki shorts and a baggy gray top. I'm going to have another beer, I said. Why not, she said. It's your summer holiday after all. True, I said. Is there an opener anywhere? Yes, there's one on the table over there, she said. Are you hungry? Not particularly, I said. It's so hot, isn't it. But you're going to stay the night, aren't you? she asked. Yes, I said. So we can eat later, she said. I leaned back and took a long swig. I should be doing some work in the garden, she said. But it's simply too hot. Yes, I said. And my stomach's beginning to get in the way. Yes, I said. I can see. Don't you want to go for a swim in the lake? Sounds like there are lots of people down there today. I shook my head. She smiled, I smiled, and then I went back out to Dad. You got yourself one, I see, he said. Yes, I said, and sat down again. In the old days he would have been working in the garden now. And if not he would have been observing everything going on around him, even if it was only a car stopping and a young man leaning over to a window that was being wound down. But all that had gone. In his eyes was only indifference, apathy.

However, the situation was not so black and white because when I observed him, and his eye caught mine, I could sense he was still there, the hardness, the coldness I had grown up with and still feared.

He swayed forward and put the empty bottle on the floor, took another and flipped the top off with the opener on his key ring. He always fetched three or four bottles at once so that he wouldn't have to keep running into the kitchen, as he put it. Lifted it to his lips, glugged down a few mouthfuls. Mm, he said. Sun's nice. Yes, I said. I've got a tan anyway! he said. Yes, I said. Me too. Know what? he said, blowing out his cheeks. We've bought ourselves a solarium up north, you know. Have to in all that darkness. Yes, I said. I saw it when I was up there. Yes, you may have, he said. Took another long swig, put the empty bottle down by the previous one, rolled a cigarette, lit it, opened another bottle. When do you want dinner? he asked. Makes no difference, I said. You two decide. Yeah, I don't get hungry in this weather, he said, snatching the section of the newspaper that lay on the table. I rested my arm on the balustrade and looked down. The grass beneath the veranda was scorched, more yellow and brown than green. The gray road was deserted. This side of it was a dusty gravel area, beyond it some trees, behind them the walls and roofs of houses. They knew no one here, neither in the immediate vicinity nor in town. A small propeller plane flew past high in the blue sky. From the living room I heard Unni's heavy footsteps on the floor. Another head-on collision on the E18, Dad said. A car and an eighteen-wheeler. Oh? I said. Almost all these accidents are disguised suicides, he said. They drive straight into a truck or into a mountainside. No one can possibly know whether it was intentional or not. So they're spared the shame. Do you really believe that? I said. Indeed I do, he said. And it's effective too. A little swing to the side and seconds later they're dead. He lifted the paper to show me. Not much chance of surviving that, is there, he said. The photo showed a car that had been completely crushed. No, I said, and got up, went downstairs and into the toilet. Sat down on the seat. I was slightly drunk. Got up again and splashed some cold water over my face. Flushed the toilet in case anyone noticed such details. When I reappeared on the veranda he had discarded the newspaper and was sitting with his elbow over the balustrade, and I remembered he used to sit like that when he was driving the car in the summer, with his elbow sticking out of the open window. How old was he actually? I wondered and counted. Forty-three this May. Then I thought about his birthdays, how we had always bought him the same green Mennen aftershave and how I had always wondered what he did with it as he had a beard. I smiled. He rose to his feet unsteadily, paused for a second to find his balance. Then he walked into the living room, taking his usual long strides and hitching his shorts up from behind.

The idea he had sown, to work as a teacher in Northern Norway, had grown and grown afterward. In fact, there were only advantages: 1) I would be far away, far from everyone and everything I knew, and totally free. 2) I would be earning my own money doing a respectable job. 3) I would be able to write.

And now here I was, I thought, looking down at the book in front of me again. At the end of the little vestibule just outside the staff room, where our two toilets were, Torill breezed into sight. She smiled but said nothing, bent forward and took out a thin file from her shelf.

"Great being a teacher!" I said.

"Give it time . . . !" she said, flashing me a smile, and was off again. Outside, Nils Erik was crossing the playground with my pupils around him.

Five years ago I had been the same age as them. And in five years I would be the same age as him.

Oh, by then I would have made my debut. By then I would be living in a city somewhere, writing and drinking and living the life. I would have a beautiful lissom girlfriend with dark eyes and big breasts.

I got up and went into the staff room, picked up the coffee Thermos, and shook it. It was empty, I filled the pot with water, poured it into the machine, popped a filter paper into the funnel, measured five spoonfuls, and started the whole shebang, lots of spluttering and gurgling, the slow rise of black liquid in the pot, and the bright red eye.

"All going well so far?" a voice worryingly close to me said. I turned. It was Richard, he was staring at me with those intense eyes of his and a broad smile. What was this? Could he move through the school without making a sound?

"Yes, I believe so," I said. "It's exciting."

"It is," he said. "Being a teacher is a very special, a fine profession. And, not least, a responsible one."

Why did he say that? Did he feel I needed to hear it, that it was a great responsibility, and if so, why? Did I give off an aura of irresponsibility perhaps?

"Mm," I said. "My father's a teacher actually. A bit farther north."

"You don't say!" Richard said. "Is he from Nordland?"

"No. It was the tax incentives that brought him up here."

Richard laughed.

"Would you like a cup?" I said. "It'll be ready any second."

"Pour it in the Thermos, will you, and I'll have some later."

He stole away as soundlessly as he had come. I didn't know which was worse, pour it in the Thermos or will you. It was patronizing whichever way you looked at it. Because I was only eighteen didn't mean he could treat me like a schoolboy! I was an employee here, no different from him.

Just afterward the bell rang and the teachers came in one by one, some silent, others with chirpy one-liners for everyone. I had put the Thermos on the table and was standing by the window with a full cup in my hand. The pupils were already running around outside. I tried to put names to the faces, but the only one I could remember was Kai Roald, the boy in the seventh grade, perhaps because I had sympathized with him, the reluctance I had sensed in his body occasionally countermanded by an interested, perhaps even an enthusiastic, glint in his eyes. And then Liv, the stunner in the ninth grade, of course. She was standing up against the wall, her hands in her back pockets, wearing a beige anorak, blue jeans, and worn gray sneakers, chewing gum and stroking away some strands of hair that the wind had blown into her face. And Stian, over there, standing legs apart, hands in his pockets, chatting to his beanpole of a friend.

I turned back to the room. Nils Erik smiled at me.

"Where do you live?" he said.

"Down the hill from here," I said. "A basement flat."

"Under me," Torill said.

"Where did you end up?" I said.

"At the top of the village. Also a basement flat."

"Yes, under me!" Sture said.

"So that's how they've organized it," I said. "The trained teachers get the flats with the view and everything while the temps get the cellars?"

"You may as well learn that right from the start," Sture said. "All privileges have to be earned. I slaved away for three years at a teacher-training college. There has to be some sort of payback."

He laughed.

"Shall we carry your bags for you too, then?" I said.

"No, that's too much responsibility for the likes of you. But every Saturday morning you're expected to come and clean for us," he said with a wink.

"I've heard there's a party in Hellevika this weekend," I said. "Anyone here going?"

"You've settled in fast, it looks like," Nils Erik said.

"Who told you about it?" Hege said.

"Heard it through the grapevine," I said. "I was wondering whether to go or not. But it's not much fun going alone."

"You're never alone at a party up here," Sture said. "This is Northern Norway."

"Are you going?" I said.

He shook his head.

"I've got a family to take care of," he said. "But I'll give you some tips. If you want." He laughed.

"I was thinking of going," Jane said.

"Me too," Vibeke said.

"What about you?" I said, looking at Nils Erik.

He shrugged. "Maybe. Is it on Friday or Saturday?"

"Friday, I think," I said.

"Maybe not such a bad idea," he said.

The bell rang.

"We can talk about it later," he said, and got up.

"OK," I said, put my cup down on the counter, grabbed my books from my workstation, went to the classroom, sat on the teacher's desk, and waited for the pupils to arrive.

When I walked down to my flat after school, my boxes were waiting on the porch. They contained everything I owned, which wasn't much: a box of records, another with an old stereo in it, one full of kitchen utensils, and one with the odds and ends that had accumulated in my old room, plus some of Mom's books. It still felt as though I had been given a huge present as I carried them into the sitting room. I assembled the stereo, stacked the records against the wall, flicked through them, selected My Life in the Bush of Ghosts by Brian Eno and David Byrne, one of my all-time favorites, and with it resounding through the room I started to organize the other items. Everything I had brought with me from home when we moved – pans, plates, cups, and glasses – I'd had around me ever since I was little and we lived in Tybakken. Brown plates, green glasses, a large pot with only one handle, blackened underneath and some way up the sides. I'd had the photo of John Lennon in my room all the time I was at gymnas and proceeded to hang it on the wall behind the typewriter. I'd had the enormous poster of Liverpool FC, the 1979/80 season, since I was eleven, and it was now given a position on the wall behind the sofa. It was perhaps their best team ever: Kenny Dalglish, Ray Clemence, Alan Hansen, Emlyn Hughes, Graeme Souness, and John Toshack. I'd grown tired of the Paul McCartney poster, so I put it in the bedroom cupboard, rolled up. When everything was in shape, I flicked through the records again imagining I was someone else, someone who had never seen them before, and wondered what they would have made of the collection, or rather of the person who owned this collection, in other words me. There were more than 150 LPs, most from the past two years, when I had been reviewing records for the local paper and spent almost all the money I had on new ones, often the complete back catalog of bands I liked. Every single one of these records embraced an entire little world of its own. All of them expressed quite definite attitudes, sentiments, and moods. But none of the records was an island, there were connections between them which spread outward: Brian Eno, for example, started in Roxy Music, released solo records, produced U2, and worked with Jon Hassell, David Byrne, David Bowie, and Robert Fripp; Robert Fripp played on Bowie's Scary Monsters; Bowie produced Lou Reed, who came from Velvet Underground, and Iggy Pop, who came from the Stooges, while David Byrne was in Talking Heads, who on their best record, Remain in Light, used the guitarist Adrian Belew, who in turn played on several of Bowie's records and was his favorite live guitarist for years. But the ramifications and connections didn't only exist between the records, they extended right into my own life. The music was linked with almost everything I had done, none of the records came without a memory. Everything that had happened in the past five years rose like steam from a cup when I played a record, not in the form of thoughts or reasoning, but as moods, openings, space. Some general, others specific. If my memories were stacked in a heap on the back of my life's trailer, music was the rope that held them together and kept it, my life, in position.

But this wasn't its most important aspect, which was the music itself. When, for example, I played Remain in Light, which I had done regularly since the eighth class and never tired of, and the third track started, "The Great Curve," with its fantastic rolling, multilayered accompaniment, brimful of energy, and the horns joined in, and afterward the voices, it was impossible not to move, impossible, it ignited every part of my body, me, the world's least rhythmic eighteen-year-old, sitting there squirming like a snake, to and fro, and I had to have it louder, I turned it up full blast, and then, already up on my feet, yes, then I had to dance, at that moment, even if I was alone. And, toward the end, on top of all this, like a bloody fighter plane above a tiny dancing village, comes Adrian Belew's overriding guitar, and oh, oh God, I am dancing and happiness fills me to my fingertips and I only wish it could last, that the solo would go on and on, the plane would never land, the sun would never go down, life would never end.

Or Heaven Up Here with Echo and the Bunnymen, the diametric opposite of Talking Heads, because here the essence is not rhythm or drive but sounds and moods, this tremendous wailing that springs from them, all longing and beauty and gloom, which swells and subsides in the music, no, which is the music. And even though I understand a lot of what he is singing about, even though I have read tons of interviews with him, as is the case with most of the bands whose records I own, this knowledge is obliterated by the music; the music doesn't want to know about it, because in music there is no meaning, there is no explanation, there are no people, only voices, each with its own special distinctive quality, as though this is its essential quality, its essence, unadulterated, no body, no personality, yes, a kind of personality without a person, and on every record there is an infinity of such characteristics, from another world, which you meet whenever you play the music. I never worked out what it was that possessed me when music possessed me, other than that I always wanted it.

Furthermore, it made me someone, of course. Thanks to music I became someone who was at the forefront, someone you had to admire, not as much as you had to admire those who made the music, admittedly, but as a listener I was in the vanguard. Up here in the north probably no one would see that, as hardly anyone in Kristiansand had been aware of it, but there were circles where it was seen and appreciated. And that was where I was heading.

I spent some time arranging my records in such a way that the impression made by each one would be enhanced and perhaps lead to surprising new associations for whoever thumbed through them, then I walked down to the shop and bought some beer and a ready-made frozen meal, pasta carbonara. In addition, I bought a rutabaga, a cauliflower, some apples, some plums, and a bunch of grapes, which I intended to use in the science class with the third and fourth years the following day in a grand illustration of the cosmos, an idea that had occurred to me while skimming through their syllabus the day before.

When I arrived home I put the meal in the microwave and ate it straight from the tray on the kitchen table while drinking a beer and reading Dagbladet. Well sated, I lay on my bed for an hour's rest. Images of teachers and pupils and the school interior flickered through my consciousness for a long time before at last I was gone. An hour and a half later I was roused by someone ringing the doorbell. I no longer knew what to expect, all sorts of people rang, so it was with a mixture of sleepiness and nervousness that I hurried to the door.

Three of the girls in my class stood outside. One, Andrea, smiled brazenly and asked if they could come in; the second, Vivian, giggled and blushed; the third, Live, stared shamelessly at me from behind her large, thick glasses.

"Of course," I said. "Come in, all of you!"

They did what other visitors had done, looked around as they stepped into the sitting room. Huddling close to each other, they pushed and shoved and giggled and blushed.

"Come on, take a seat!" I said, nodding in the direction of the sofa.

They did as bidden.

"Well?" I said. "What brings you here?"

"We wanted to see how you were. We were bored," Andrea said.

Was she some kind of leader? She hadn't exactly given that impression at school.

"There's nothing to do here," Vivian said.

"Nothing," Live said.

"No, doesn't seem like there's much," I said. "But I'm afraid there's not a lot going on here either."

"No, it's a hole," Andrea said.

"My flat is a hole?" I said.

She flushed to the roots.

"No, silly. The village!" she said.

"I'm going to move away the second I finish the ninth grade," Vivian said.

"Me too," Live said.

"You always copy what I do," Vivian said.

"Yeah? So?"

"Yeah? So?" Vivian said in a perfect imitation. It even included Live's little tic: two wrinkles of the nose under her glasses, in rapid succession.

"Ooohh!" Live said.

"You can't have a monopoly on leaving the village when you're sixteen," I said, looking at Vivian, who smiled and lowered her eyes.

"You speak so weirdly, Karl Ove," Andrea said. "What does monopoly mean?"

The use of my name caught me off guard, so much so that, while looking at Andrea, since she was the one who was talking, I reddened and bowed my head.

"Someone who is the only person to do something," I said, looking up.

"Oh, yeees," she said, pretending to keel over with boredom. The other two girls laughed. I smiled.

"I can see that you kids have a lot to learn," I said. "You're lucky that I came up here."

"Not me," Andrea said. "I know all I need to know."

"Except for how to drive a car," Vivian said.

"I can drive a car!" Andrea said.

"Yeah, but you're not allowed to drive. That's what I meant."

There was a pause. I smiled at them, obviously failing to conceal a patronizing air because Andrea narrowed her eyes and said:"We're thirteen years old, by the way. We're not little kids, if that was what you were thinking."

I laughed.

"Why should I think that? You're all in the seventh grade, I know that. I can even remember how it felt."

"How what felt?"

"Starting at a new school. It's your first day at the ungdomsskole today."

"And don't we know it," Vivian said. "It was even more boring than the sixth grade, I think."

The doorbell rang. The three girls exchanged glances. I got up to open the door.

It was Nils Erik.

"Hello there," he said. "Are you going to offer an old colleague a cup of coffee?"

"Wouldn't you rather have a beer?"

He raised his eyebrows and put on a thoughtful, or perhaps it was a skeptical, look.

"No thanks. I'm going for a drive afterward. Better safe than sorry."

"Anyway, come in," I said.

The three girls stared at him as he stopped in the middle of the sitting room.

"So this is where you hang out in the evenings," he said.

"Haven't they been to your place yet?" I said.

He shook his head. "But some fourth graders came over this afternoon. While I was frying fish cakes."

"We're just so bored," Live said.

The two others sent her an angry glare. Then they got up.

"Well," said Andrea. "We'd better be going."

"Bye," I said. "And feel free to come by another day!"

"Bye!" Vivian said from the hall, before the door was slammed shut.

Nils Erik smiled. Shortly afterward we saw them trudging down the hill toward the shop.

"Poor kids," I said. "They must be pretty desperate if all they have to do in their free time is visit teachers."

"Perhaps to them you're exciting?" Nils Erik said.

"And you're not, I guess?" I said.

"No, I'm not," he snorted. "I was thinking of going for a drive, Karl Ove. Feel like coming?"

"Where to?"

He shrugged.

"Other side of the fjord maybe? Or Hellevika?"

"I wouldn't mind going to Hellevika," I said. "After all, we can see the other side of the fjord from here."

It transpired that Nils Erik was the outdoor type. He had applied for a job up here because of the natural beauty, he said, he had brought a tent and a sleeping bag with him intending to go on hikes every weekend. Did I want to join him?

"Not every weekend," he added with a smile as we drove at a snail's pace alongside the fjord in his yellow car.

"It's not really my thing," I said. "Think I'll give that a miss."

He nodded.

"Thought so," he said. "But what makes a sophisticated city slicker like you move up here?"

"I want to write," I said.

"Write?" he said. "What? Fill out forms? Job applications? Quick reminders to yourself? Letters? Limericks for radio shows? Letters to the editor?"

"I'm working on a collection of short stories," I said.

"Short stories!" he said. "The Formula One of literature!"

"Is that what they call them?" I said.

"No," he said with a laugh. "Not really. I think that's what they call poems. The Stunt Poets, you know. One of them said something like that."

I didn't know but said nothing.

"But you can still come with me on walks, can't you? A couple of weekends anyway. There's a fantastic nature reserve only an hour away from here."

"I don't think so. If anything's going to come of my writing I have to work."

"But the nature, man! God's wondrous creation! All the colors! All the plants! That's what you have to write about!"

I laughed in derision.

"I don't believe in nature," I said. "It's a cliché."

"What do you write about then?"

I shrugged. "I've just started. But you can read it if you want."

"Love to!"

"I'll bring it in with me tomorrow."

We returned to the village around eight in the evening. It was as light as day. The sky above the sea was so magnificent that I stood by the porch staring for several minutes before going in. It was empty, there was nothing there, yet it seemed gentle and friendly, as if it wished those who lived beneath it well. Perhaps because the mountains for their part were so hard and barren?

I had some supper, lit a cigarette, and drank tea as I went through the exercise my pupils had done.

> My name's Vivian n I'm thirteen years old. I live in a village called Håfjord. I'm happy here. I have a sis called Liv. Dad's a fisherman n mam's a housewife. My best freind is Andrea. We do a lotta things together. School is boring. Sometimes we work at the fish factory. We cut the tungs off cod. With the money I'm gonna buy a stereo.

So Vivian and Liv were sisters!

For some reason this gave me a lift. There was also something about the awkwardness she showed that touched me. Or perhaps it was her openness?

I decided not to correct the words. That would be far too demoralizing, so instead I wrote a little comment in red underneath: "Well done, Vivian! But remember it's 'and' not 'n,' 'a lot of' not 'lotta,' and 'going to' not 'gonna.'"

Then I leafed through the next exercise book.

> My name is Andrea. I'm a thirteen-year-old girl and I live on the far side of an island in northern norway. I have a brother who is ten and a sister who is five. Dad goes fishing and Mom is at home with Camilla. I like listening to music > and watching movies. My favorite is Champ. And I like hanging around the village with my friends Vivian and Hildegunn and Live. It's a little boring here, but it will be better when we're old enough to go to partys!

I had thought of Andrea and Vivian as two of a kind – I had barely been able to tell them apart on the two occasions I had seen them – but from their answers I could see there was quite a difference, or was it just that one of them was more used to expressing herself in writing?

I wrote a similar comment in Andrea's book, read the three last ones, which all fell somewhere between the first two, made a comment in each, slipped the pile into my bag, put on "My Bag" by Lloyd Cole, and gazed across the village as the music made the hairs on my arms stand on end. Slowly I began to move to the beat, a shoulder here, a foot there at first, then, after switching off the light so that no one below could see me, I danced away with my eyes closed, and sang from the bottom of my heart.

That night I came in my sleep. A wave of pleasure washed through me, carried me up toward the surface, where I had no desire to go, and I didn't, because just before I reached consciousness and the vague notion of who I was, how happy I was, became a reality, I sank back down into dark, heavy slumber, where I stayed until the alarm clock rang and I opened my eyes to a room full of light and to underpants that were sticky with semen.

At first I had feelings of guilt. God knows what I had been dreaming about. Then, when I remembered where I was and what I was doing, the pressure in the pit of my stomach returned. I got up and went into the bathroom, telling myself there was nothing to be nervous about, the class was small, the pupils children, but it didn't help, it felt as if I had to walk out onto a stage without any lines to deliver. I tried to recapture the wonderful mood I had been in previously, when I had been enjoying marking the presentations and the new sensation the role of teacher gave me, seeing pupils, planning what could be done to help them, but as I stood there, surrounded by steam, drying myself, all of that was gone, for I was not a teacher, I wasn't even an adult, I was just a ridiculous teenager who knew nothing about anything.

"Oh, hell!" I shouted. Wiped the condensation from the mirror with the towel and studied my face in the few seconds it took before the glass was covered with moisture again.

I looked damned good, actually.

That was something after all.

I'd had the long hair at the back of my neck cut just before I left. Now my hair stood in a thick, maybe three-centimeter-high carpet across my skull, layered down to my temples and neck. From my left ear hung a cross.

I smiled.

My teeth were white and even. There was a glint in my eyes that I liked to see, until the incredible indignity of the situation, a person smiling and what was tantamount to winking at himself in the mirror made my stomach constrict again.

For Christ's sake.

I put on my Dream of the Blue Turtles T-shirt, my black Levi's, a pair of white tube socks, stood in front of the mirror putting on alternately the thin green military jacket and the blue denim jacket, finally choosing the former, tried on the beret, it didn't go, and two minutes later walked bareheaded up to the school with a white Ali coffee bag full of books and materials hanging from my hand.

The third and fourth graders, who had been put together in one class for all their lessons, numbered twelve pupils: five girls and seven boys. It seemed like more, they were always roaming around, running and shouting, and would never sit still. Once they had finally sat down on their chairs, there were legs twisting and turning here, arms twisting and turning there, their minds, like agitated dogs, were forever on the move.

They hadn't had me before, they had only heard about me and seen me from a distance, so when I loomed up in their part of the school all eyes were fixed on me.

I smiled and put my bag down on the teacher's desk.

"What have you got in there?" one of them said. "What's in your bag?"

I looked at him. White puppy-dog skin, brown eyes, extremely short hair.

"What's your name?" I said.

"Reidar," he said.

"Mine's Karl Ove," I said. "And there's one thing you may as well learn right from the start. You have to put up your hand before you say anything."

Reidar put up his hand.

A smart-ass.

"Yes?" I said.

"What have you got in your bag, Karl Ove?"

"It's a secret," I said. "But you'll soon find out. First of all, though, I have to know what your names are."

The boy behind Reidar, a little squirt with fair hair and hard – for his age – pale-blue eyes put up his hand.

"What's your name?" I said.

"Stig," he said. "Are you strict?"

"Strict? No!" I said.

"My mom says you're too young to be a teacher!" he said, looking around for a reaction.

They laughed, all of them.

"I'm older than you anyway!" I said. "So I think everything will be fine."

"Why do you have a cross in your ear?" Reidar said. "Are you a Christian?"

"What did I just say about raising your hand?"

"Whoops!" He laughed and raised his hand.

"No, I'm not a Christian," I said. "I'm an atheist."

"What's that?" Reidar said.

"Your hand? Where is it?"

"Oh."

"An atheist is someone who doesn't believe in God," I said. "But now you have to tell me your names. Let's start at the end there."

One after one they called out their names.

Vibeke
Kenneth
Susanne
Stig
Reidar
Lovisa
Melanie
Steve Endre
Stein-Inge
Helene
Jo

I connected with some of them at once and would remember them easily from now on – the girl who was so unbelievably pretty and doll-like in everything from her facial features to her body and her dress, the boy with the pudgy face, the little squirt who seemed angry, the boy with the big head and the warm eyes, the loudmouth, the blond-haired girl with pigtails who gave the impression of being so rational and sensible – others were more nebulous and revealed too little for me to get a handle on them.

"So you're the third and fourth graders!" I said. "What's the name of the place where you live?"

"Håfjord, isn't it!" Reidar said.

I said nothing, just looked at them. Then two or three of them realized what I was getting at and raised their hands. I nominated the little doll-like creature.

"Lovisa?" I said.

"Håfjord," she said.

"What's the name of the county Håfjord is in?"

"Troms."

"And the country?"

Now everyone had a hand in the air. I chose the fatty.

"Norway," he said.

"And the continent?"

"Europe," he said.

"Good!" I said, and he smiled.

"But what's the name of the planet we're on? Does anyone know? Yes, Reidar?"

"The world?"

"Yes, it is. But is there another name?"

I turned and wrote the whole address on the board: HÅFJORD, TROMS, NORWAY, EUROPE, EARTH. Turned back to them.

"And where is the earth?"

"In the cosmos," said Stein-Inge.

"Yes," I said. "It's in the solar system, in a galaxy called . . . ?"

On the board I wrote, THE MILKY WAY.

"Have you heard about that?"

"Yes!" several of them shouted.

"For us this galaxy is enormous. But in comparison with the rest of the cosmos it's teeny-weeny."

I observed them.

"What do you think is outside the cosmos then?"

They stared at me with mouths agape.

"Have you ever thought about that? Endre?"

Endre shook his head.

"Is there anything outside?"

"Well, no one knows," I said. "But there can't just be nothing. There has to be something, don't you think?"

"What does it say in the textbooks?" Reidar asked.

"It doesn't say anything," I answered. "As I said, no one knows."

"No one?"

"No."

"Why should we learn that then?" he said.

I smiled.

"You need to learn about where we live. And that is of course the universe.

Well, if we take a broader view of it, the cosmos. What you see above us every night. Or what you don't see because you're little kids and have gone to bed."

"He-ey, we're not little kids!"

"Just joking," I said. "But the stars you can see when it's dark. And the moon and the planets. You have to learn about them."

I turned and wrote THE UNIVERSE on the board.

"OK," I said. "Can anyone in the class name any of the planets in our solar system?"

"The earth!" Reidar said.

Scattered laughter.

"Any more?"

"Pluto!"

"Mars!"

"Good!" I said. When no more suggestions were forthcoming, I drew the whole solar system on the board.

SUN
MERCURY
VENUS
EARTH
MARS
JUPITER
SATURN
URANUS
NEPTUNE
PLUTO

"Here on the board it looks as if they're right next to each other. But there's an incredible distance between the planets. It would take many, many years to travel to Jupiter, for example. I'd like to give you an idea of the distances. So put on your coats and we'll go out onto the soccer field."

"Are we going out? During the lesson?"

"Yes, get moving. Put your coats on and we'll be going."

They jumped up from their seats and converged on the line of coat hooks. I stood waiting by the door with the bag hanging from my hand.

They flocked closely around me as we walked across the field. I felt a bit like a shepherd, so different from these small, eager creatures.

"Good, we'll stop here!" I said, and took a ball from the bag. Placed it on the ground. "This is the sun, OK?"

They looked at me somewhat skeptically.

"Come on. Now let's walk a bit farther!"

We walked for another twenty meters or so before I stopped and placed a plum on the ground.

"This is Mercury, the planet that is closest to the sun. Can you see the sun over there?"

Everyone stared over at the ball, which cast a light shadow over the shale, and nodded.

Next I placed two apples, two oranges, the rutabaga, the cauliflower, and, last of all, right up by the door of the community center, the grape, which was supposed to represent Pluto.

"Do you all understand now how far it is between the planets?" I said. "The tiny sun so far away, and Mercury, which is like a plum, we can't even see it from here. And all this," I said, looking at them as they stared blankly across the soccer field, "is just a teeny, weeny, weeny, weeny bit of the cosmos! Teeny tiny! Isn't it funny that the earth we live on is millions of miles away from the other planets?"

Some of them were thinking so hard you could see the smoke. Others were gazing across the village and the fjord.

"Let's go back in now," I said. "Come on. Run, run, run!"

In the staff room I took out a copy of my short story, stapled the pages together, and passed it to Nils Erik, who was sitting on the sofa reading Troms Folkeblad.

"Here's the short story I was telling you about," I said.

"Interesting!" he said.

"When do you think you'll have read it? By tonight?"

"Urgent, is it?" He looked at me and smiled. "I was planning to go to Finnsnes this afternoon actually. Would you like to come, by the way?"

"I'd love to. Good idea."

"Then I can read your short story by tomorrow, and we can have a little seminar afterward?"

Seminar, which to me meant universities and academia, studies, girls, and parties.

"Great," I said, and went to get a cup of coffee.

"What actually were you doing outside with them?" Nils Erik said to my back.

"Nothing special," I said, "I was just trying to help them visualize the cosmos."

When I entered the classroom for the next lesson, three of the girls were standing in a huddle by the window whispering excitedly. My entrance hadn't made the slightest impression on them.

"You can't stand there all day chitchatting!" I said. "The lesson has started! Have you forgotten? You're pupils. You have to obey the rules and do what the teachers tell you!"

They spun round. When they saw that I was smiling, they just continued.

"Hello there!" I said. "Come and sit down!"

Then, with a dilatoriness I would later that day consider exquisite because their movements became so strikingly sophisticated and their ungainliness suddenly transformed into feminine poise, they went to their seats.

"I've read your presentations now," I said, handing out their books. "They were very good. But there are a couple of things we can clear up right away since they apply to all of you."

They opened their books to see what I had written.

"Don't we get grades?" Hildegunn said.

"Not for such a small exercise," I said. "I gave you the assignment mostly so that I could get an impression of you."

Andrea and Vivian compared their comments.

"You've written almost the same thing for both of us!" Vivian said. "Are you that lazy?"

"Lazy?" I said with a smile. "You'll get grades which will show you all where you stand soon enough. I'm not sure that's much to look forward to."

Behind me, the door opened. I turned. It was Richard. He went over and sat down at a table by the wall while motioning me to carry on.

What was this? Was he going to observe me?

"The first thing we have to get to talk about is your dialect," I said. "You can't write like you speak. That's no good at all. You have to write jeg, not æ. Er, not e. Hvordan rather than koss."

"But that's what we say!" Vivian said, and twisted around in her chair to glance at Richard, who sat with his arms crossed and face impassive. "Why do we have to write jeg when we say æ, huh?"

"And Harrison said we could write like that last year," Hildegunn said.

"He said it was better to write something than to write correctly," Live said.

"Last year you were at a school for children," I said. "This year you're in a higher school. Where your language has to be standardized, as it's known. This is how it is up and down the country. We can talk as we like, but when we write, it has to be standard Norwegian. There is nothing to discuss. Unless you want your essays covered in red ink and low grades, you have to do this."

"Oh!" Andrea said, looking first at me, then Richard. The others giggled.

I asked them to get out their books and then, when they had all turned to the same page, I asked Hildegunn to start reading. Richard got up, nodded briefly to me, and left the room.

During the break I went to his office and knocked on the door.

He looked up from his desk as I walked in.

"Hi, Karl Ove," he said.

"Hi," I said. "I was just wondering why you came into my lesson."

The gaze he sent me was partly probing, partly curious. Then he smiled and chewed his lower lip, this was a quirk of his, I had realized, his bearded chin jutted forward and made him resemble a goat.

"I just wanted to see how things were going in the class," he said. "I will be doing that now and then. There are quite a few of you who have no training. I need to get an idea of how you are managing. Teaching is not easy, you know."

"I promise to tell you if I have any problems," I said. "You can trust me."

He laughed.

"I know that. That's not the issue. Go and have yourself a break now!"

He looked down at the papers in front of him. That was a rank-pulling number, and for a few seconds I refused to yield to it; however, there was nothing else I could do, I had nothing else to say, and there was nothing unreasonable about what he'd said, so finally I turned and went into the staff room.

There were three letters in my PO box when I went to the post office after school. One from Bassen, who had started university in Stavanger, one from Lars, who had moved in with his girlfriend in Kristiansand, and one from Eirik, who was now studying at the Institute of Technology in Trondheim.

Bassen told me about an incident that had taken place just before he moved. He had gone home with a girl, or rather a woman, because she was twenty-five, and while they were on the job, as he put it, she had suddenly had some kind of fit. He had been scared out of his wits. It was as though she was being convulsed by electric shocks, he wrote, her body was quivering and shaking, he thought it was epilepsy, he withdrew, and stood up.

> I was terrified, Karl Ove! I didn't know whether to call for an ambulance or what. What if she died! In fact that's what I thought she was going to do. But > then she opened her eyes and pulled me back down and asked me what I was doing. Keep going! she shouted. Can you imagine? She'd just been having an orgasm! That's mature women for you!

Walking along, I laughed as I read his letter, but I also felt a stab of something else, because I had never slept with a girl, I'd never had sex, in other words I was a virgin, and was not only ashamed that for two years I had been lying about the amount of sexual experience I'd had, which Bassen and several others were presumably taken in by, but I was also desperate for it, to sleep with a girl, any girl actually, and to experience what Bassen and my other friends experienced on such a regular basis. Whenever I heard about their adventures, it was as though equal portions of enervation and desire spread through me, equal portions of powerlessness and power, for the longer I went without sleeping with a girl, the more afraid of it I became. I could talk to others about almost any other problem I had, to ease my mind, but I couldn't reveal this, not to anyone, not ever, not under any circumstances, and whenever I thought about it, which was not seldom, it must have been several times an hour, I was overcome by a kind of black gloom, a gloom of hopelessness, sometimes only fleetingly, like a cloud drifting past the sun, sometimes for longer periods, and whatever form the hopelessness took I couldn't surmount it, there was so much doubt and torment associated with it. Could I? Could I? If, against all the odds, I succeeded in maneuvering myself into a suitable situation and was in a room alone with a naked girl, would I be able to make love to her? Would I be able to go through with it?

All the secrecy and pretense surrounding this didn't make it any easier for me.

"Do you know what it says on the teat of condoms?" Trond once said, in a break that spring, as he fixed me with his eye. We were standing in a group on the grass outside the school and jabbering away.

It was me he singled out.

Why? Did he suspect that I was lying about the girls, about the sex I'd had?

I blushed.

What should I say? No, and give myself away? Or yes, and then invite the natural follow-up question, what then?

"No, what does it say?" I said.

"Have you got such a little prick?" he said.

They laughed.

I laughed too, relieved.

But Espen was staring at me, wasn't he? Kind of knowingly, and semi-reveling in it as a result?

Two days later he drove me home at night. We had been at Gisle's together.

"How many have you actually done it with, Karl Ove?" he said as we drove up the gentle slope by Krageboen, flanked on both sides of the road by crumbling old houses.

"Why?" I said.

"I was just wondering," he said, sending me a glance before returning his eyes to the road ahead. The smile playing on his lips was furtive.

I frowned and pretended to concentrate.

"Um," I said. "Six. No, hang on, five."

"Who were they?"

"Is this the Inquisition or what?"

"Noo. But surely you can tell me that much."

"Cecilie, you know, the girl I went out with from Arendal," I said.

Outside, the shop where I had stolen so many pieces of candy drifted past. It had closed down a long time ago. Espen signaled.

"And?" he said.

"And Marianne," I said.

"Did you fuck Marianne?" he said. "I didn't know that. Why didn't you say?"

I shrugged. "You've got to keep some things private."

"You devil! Of all the people I know, you're the one I know least about. But that's just two."

The big man with the enormous gut and the ever-open mouth stood by the fence watching us as we went past.

"Quite a family, they are," I said.

"Now, don't you wriggle out of it," Espen said. "There are three left. I'll list mine afterward, if you're interested."

"OK. There was an Icelandic girl working at an ice-cream stall next to mine in the summer. When I was selling cassettes on the street in Arendal. I went back to her place one night."

"Icelandic!" Espen said. "Sounds great."

"Yes, it was as well," I said. "And then there were two one-night stands in town. I don't even know their names."

We drove down the last hill. The deciduous trees were as compact as a wall along the river. At the bottom the countryside opened out and I looked across the field to the small soccer field, where three tiny figures were shooting at a fourth in goal.

"And yours?" I said.

"There's no time for that now. We're here."

"Come on," I said.

He laughed and stopped the car.

"See you tomorrow!" he said.

"You bastard," I said, opened the door, and walked up to the house. As I listened to the sound of his car hammering down the hill and soon disappearing, I reflected that I had given him too much information, it would have been better if I had just said it was none of his business. That is what he would have said.

How come he could do it and I couldn't?

He didn't admire girls as much as I did, that was one thing. Not that he liked them any less than me, far from it, but perhaps he didn't consider them better than him, put them on such a high pedestal that you couldn't chat with them or do normal things with them; for him they were on the same level or perhaps he was even higher than them, for if there was one thing he had, it was self-confidence. That meant he didn't care, and when they saw that, he was someone they wanted to conquer. I looked upon them as completely unapproachable creatures, indeed, as angels of a sort, I loved everything about them, from the veins in the skin over their wrists to the curves of their ears, and if I saw a breast under a T-shirt or a naked thigh under a summer dress, it was as though everything in my insides was let loose, as though everything began to swirl around and the immense desire that then arose was as light as light itself, as light as air, and in it there was a notion that everything was possible, not only here but everywhere and not only now but forever. At the same time as all this arose inside me, a consciousness shot up from below, like a waterspout, it was heavy and dark, there was abandon, resignation, impotence, the world closing in on me. There was the awkwardness, the silence, the scared eyes. There were the flushed cheeks and the great unease.

But there were other reasons too. There was something I couldn't do and something I didn't understand. There were secrets and there was darkness, there were shady dealings and there was laughter that jeered at everything. Oh, I sensed it, but I knew nothing about it. Nothing.

I stuffed Bassen's letter in my pocket and hurried up the hill. Nils Erik was supposed to be picking me up in half an hour and before that I had to have something to eat.

A couple of hours later we were driving along the main street of Finnsnes. Coming here from Oslo and Tromsø, I had regarded Finnsnes as a crummy little hole, but now, only five days later, coming from Håfjord it seemed like a large, complex, almost sophisticated place, rich with possibilities.

Nils Erik parked in the supermarket parking lot and then we walked off to find a liquor shop. I bought a bottle of Koskenkorva vodka for the party, four bottles of white wine, and half a bottle of whiskey to take home with me; Nils Erik bought three bottles of red wine, which came as no surprise, he was the red-wine type, not the beer and spirits type. After we had stowed the bottles in the trunk, I took him along to an electrical goods shop that also sold stereos. Mine wasn't good enough, I had thought that for quite a while, and now that I had a steady job I decided to do something about it.

In the shop they had only racks, they weren't the best, but I could buy a decent stereo later, I figured, and looked around for an assistant.

A man was standing behind the counter with his back to us, opening a large cardboard box with a small paper knife. I walked over.

"I need some help," I said.

He turned to face me.

"Just a moment," he said.

I went back to the wall of stereo racks. Waved to Nils Erik, who was flicking through a crate full of records.

"Which one would you buy?" I said.

"None of them," he said. "Racks are shit."

"Agreed," I said. "But this is probably all they've got. And I only want it for while I'm up here."

He looked at me.

"Are you shitting money? Or is Knausgaard a family of shipowners? You never told me!"

"You can get one on an installment plan. Look, three thousand four ninety-nine kroner for that one. That's only a few hundred a month."

The assistant straightened up and looked around for me. A thin man with a bit of a gut, metal-rimmed glasses, and a comb-over.

I pointed to the Hitachi rack.

"I'd like that one," I said. "I can buy it in installments, can't I?"

"As long as you've got a job," he said.

"I'm working as a teacher in Håfjord," I said.

"Sure," he said. "Then you'll have to fill in a few forms, so if you come over to the counter with me . . ."

While I stood writing he went to the storeroom to get the stereo system.

"Is this such a good idea?" Nils Erik said. "In installments you pay almost double in the end. And the monthly payments are painful. Our salary isn't that good, either."

I glared at him. “Are you my mom or what?”

“OK, OK, it’s your business,” he said, and went back to the records.

“Yes, it is.”

At that moment the assistant returned from the storeroom with a large cardboard box in his arms. He handed it to me, I held it while he checked the papers and my ID, and when he was satisfied, I carried it to the car and placed it in the back seat.

The last item on the agenda was the supermarket. Each pushing a shopping cart in front of us, we walked around plucking things that weren’t available in the village shop from the shelves. My first target was two packs of cigarettes. At the back of the shop, next to the fruit counter, while Nils Erik was over by the pasta, I put the packets in my jacket, one in each pocket, then went on filling the cart with food as normal. I always stole cigarettes when I shopped in supermarkets, and it was completely foolproof, I had never been caught. Stealing was closely related to freedom for me, about not giving a shit, doing what you wanted, not what you were supposed to do. It was a rebellious, nonconformist act while, in a sense, pushing my personality toward one of the places where I wanted it to be. I stole, I was someone who stole.

It always went well, nevertheless I was nervous as I pushed my trolley toward the little island where the cashier sat. But there was nothing unusual about her expression and there were no men discreetly approaching from any direction, so I placed the items on the conveyor belt one by one with my sweaty hands, paid, packed them into a bag, and walked, quickly but not conspicuously so, out of the shop, then I stopped, lit up, and waited for Nils Erik, who arrived at my side a minute later carrying two bulging plastic bags.

The first kilometers were driven in silence. I was still annoyed with him for his moralizing tone in the shop where I had bought the stereo. I hated it when people interfered with what I was doing, regardless of whether it was my mother, my brother, my teacher, or my best friend: I didn’t want to hear it. No one had any business telling me what to do.

He cast intermittent glances at me as he drove. The countryside around us had leveled out. Low trees, heather, moss, brooks, shallow, completely black tracts of water, and in the distance, chains of tall, rugged peaks. He had filled the tank just outside Finnsnes, there was still a smell of gasoline in the car, it made me feel slightly nauseous.

He glanced at me again.

"Could you put some music on? There are some cassettes in the glove compartment."

I opened it and transferred the pile of cassettes to my lap.

Sam Cooke. Otis Redding. James Brown. Prince. Marvin Gaye. UB40. Smokey Robinson. Stevie Wonder. Terence Trent D'Arby.

"So you're a soul man," I said.

"Soul and funk."

I inserted the only cassette I'd heard before: Prince, Parade. Leaned back in the seat and gazed up at the mountains, which, at the bottom, were covered with a green tangled carpet of bushes and small trees, farther up with moss and heather, also green.

"By the way, why did you steal the cigarettes?" Nils Erik said. "It's got nothing to do with me. You can do what you like as far as I'm concerned. I'm just curious, that's all."

"You saw?" I said.

He nodded.

"You do have the money, after all," he said. "It wasn't as if you took them out of sheer deprivation, was it?"

"No," I said.

"What if you'd been caught? How would that have looked? As a teacher, I mean."

"Was I caught?"

"No."

"No? So then it's purely hypothetical," I said.

"We don't have to talk about it," he said.

"I don't mind talking about it," I said. "Talk away."

He gave a short laugh.

The ensuing silence was long but not unpleasant, the road was straight, the mountains were beautiful, the music was good, Nils Erik an outdoor type I didn't much care for.

But then my attitude changed. It was as though I had gone so far in one direction and now I was beginning to return because there was something unresolved here. Nils Erik, he hadn't done anything to me, didn't wish me any harm, he was curious, that was all, and maybe a bit pushy, and out here, where I didn't know anyone, perhaps that wasn't such a bad thing.

I hummed along to "Sometimes It Snows in April."

"Have you heard Prince's latest?" I said. "Lovesexy."

He shook his head. "But if he comes to Norway or Sweden in the summer, I'll go and see him. His concerts are fantastic these days. I talked to someone who had seen him on the Sign o' the Times tour. They said it was the best concert they'd ever seen."

"I'd be up for it too," I said. "But it's good, the new one, that is. Not as good as Sign o' the Times but . . . As a matter of fact I reviewed it when it came out for Fædrelandsvennen and almost made a huge blunder."

I looked at him.

"I'd read in some English music mag that he was illiterate, and I was going to write that, you know. I was on the point of pitching the whole article that way, that Prince couldn't read, but luckily it struck me as a bit odd and I dropped the idea. Afterward I realized it was probably music that he couldn't read. But I don't know. And it's not good, all the vague information you accumulate, the stuff you carry around with you that's not remotely true. If you say anything, it's a little embarrassing, but if you actually write it and it's in the newspaper the day after, that's worse."

"I thought that was what newspapers were all about," Nils Erik said, smiling, his eyes on the road.

"You can say that again," I said.

Farther ahead lay the road to Håfjord, a thin gray line leading to a small black gap in the mountain.

"By the way, I got a long letter from my girlfriend on Tuesday," I said.

"Oh really?" he said.

"Yes. Well, girlfriend may be stretching it. We were together during the summer. Her name was Line . . ."

"Was? Did she die this week?"

"For me, yes. That was the point. She broke up with me. Wrote that I was a nice person blah blah blah, but she'd never been in love with me and it was a good time to end it now because I was moving up here."

"So you're free as a bird," Nils Erik said.

"Exactly," I said. "That's what I was about to say."

A car emerged from the tunnel, it was small and black like a dung beetle, but soon it grew in size, it was going at a considerable speed.

The driver raised a hand as he passed, Nils Erik responded, slowed down, and turned into the last short stretch before the village.

"It's strange, isn't it," I said. "Everyone knows who we are while we don't know anyone."

"It's true," he said. "We've ended up in an incredibly intimidating place."

He twisted one of the levers by the steering wheel for full beam and flicked the other up to activate the windshield wipers. Drops of water splashed on the hood, windshield, and roof. The drone of the engine rebounded off the rock face, it surrounded us like a kind of shell, which vanished the moment we exited the tunnel, and the blue fjord spread out before us.

"Are you a free man then?" I said.

"Oh yes," he said. "I'm very free in fact. I haven't had a girlfriend for several years."

Was he gay?

Oh, no, don't say he was one of them?!

He was in fact a bit odd. And those rosy cheeks . . .

"There's not much of a selection up here," he said. "But nor is there much competition. So I figure they cancel each other out."

He laughed.

Not much of a selection. What was that supposed to mean? There weren't many other gays here?

My insides chilled as I stared across the matte blue surface of the sea.

"Torill is a cheery type," he said.

Torill!

False alarm!

I looked at him again. Even though his eyes were on the road some of his attention was on me.

"But she's old," I said.

"Old? Not at all!" he said. "If I had to guess, I would say twenty-eight. Maybe thirty. It's possible. But, first off, she's not old! And, second off, she's sexy. Yes, very sexy."

"Well, that hadn't even crossed my mind," I said.

"I'm not eighteen years old, Karl Ove. I'm twenty-four. So twenty-eight isn't old. Or unattainable." He chuckled. "The fact that she may be unattainable for me is quite a different matter."

We drove slowly down the narrow road squeezed under the mountainside. The local motorists drove just as fast here as anywhere else, but not Nils Erik, he was the cautious, sensible type, I had begun to realize.

"And you?" he said. "Have you got your eye on anyone?"

I smiled. "In fact, there was a girl on the bus when I was coming here. She's at the gymnas in Finnsnes. Lives in Hellevika."

"Aha!"

"We'll have to see. Other than that I don't know."

"Vibeke's a friendly girl," he said.

"Do you mean fat?"

"No, but you know . . . she's very nice. A bit chubby maybe, but what does that matter? And Hege, she's . . . well, high maintenance, I bet. But attractive. Isn't she?"

"You're game for anything, aren't you?" I said.

"Women are women, that's what I say."

Then the village lay beneath us. Nils Erik pulled up outside my flat, carried in the shopping bags while I took the big cardboard box containing the stereo, then he said good-bye and drove off to his place. I set up the stereo, put on Sulk by the Associates, an utterly insane LP that I listened to stretched out on the sofa. After a while I began to write some letters, kept them brief as I had a lot of them to do, what was important right now was not what I wrote but the short story I enclosed with all of them.

In one of the breaks the next day Sture came over to me.

"Can I have a word with you?" he said, scratching his bald head.

"Of course," I said.

"I'd just like to give you a bit of advice," he said. "About the third and fourth graders. I heard you covered the whole cosmos with them yesterday . . ."

"Yes?" I said.

"They're very small, you know. It might not be a bad idea to start at the other end. Make a map of the school here, for example. And then one of the village. And then one of the island. Do you see what I mean? Start with the known and work outward, to Norway, Europe, and the world. And then you can tackle the cosmos. If you're still here, of course!"

He grinned and winked at me so as to appear more of a friend and less of an authority figure. But this was not advice, this was a rebuke. When I met his eyes, my blood was boiling.

"I'll give that some thought," I said, then turned and went.

I was furious while being embarrassed at the same time because I could see he was right. They were so small, probably they hadn't understood a thing, and what had been exciting for me when I was ten was not necessarily exciting for them.

In the staff room I didn't want to talk to anyone, so I sat down at my workstation and pretended I was reading until the bell rang and I could go out to my pupils.

It was strange, I thought, standing by the desk and waiting for them to saunter in, it was strange that I should feel more at home among the pupils than among the teachers in the staff room.

But where were they?

I walked over to the window. There wasn't a soul in the area between the two buildings. Were they on the soccer field perhaps?

I looked up at the clock. It was already five minutes since the bell had rung. Something must have happened, I thought, and walked down the corridor to the door. Sture came striding along from the other end. He opened the door and went out, I followed and saw him break into a run.

There was a fight. Two of the boys had their arms wrapped around each other, one was thrown to the ground, he got back to his feet. Around them stood a cluster of pupils watching. They were completely silent. Behind them lay the village, behind that the mountains and the sea.

I broke into a run too, mostly for appearance's sake because I knew Sture would break this up and I was glad.

The two boys fighting were Stian and Kai Roald. Stian was stronger, it was him who had thrown Kai Roald to the ground, but Kai Roald wouldn't give in and flew at him again.

Both stopped the moment Sture reached them. He grabbed Stian by the back of his jacket and held him at arm's length while he bawled him out. Stian hung his head like a dog. He wouldn't have done that with me, that was for certain.

I came to a halt in front of them.

Kai Roald was looking at the ground. The knees and tops of his jeans were filthy. His eyes were wet with tears.

"What are you doing?" I said. "Are you fighting?"

"Oh, shut up," he said.

I placed my hand on his shoulder. He wrenched himself away.

"Come on, let's go in," I said, then looked at the others in the class. "And the rest of you! What are you doing out here? You haven't even been fighting!"

Kai Roald peered up at me as if he'd been expecting a punishment but now he could see there wasn't going to be one.

"Come on," I said. "Let's go. Kai Roald, you go to the washroom and clean yourself up. You don't look great."

Sture's class was already by the door.

"Any blood?" he asked me.

"No," I said. "Just snot and dirt."

We talked a bit about what had happened; when Kai Roald came back I told him he could fight as much as he wanted as long as he didn't do it on school premises. On weekends you can fight from the moment you get up until you go to bed, and in the afternoons too, but not at school. Can you manage that? I said. He shook his head. It was Stian who started it, he said. OK, I said. You'll have to settle your differences with him when you get home. But not here. If it happens again, I'll have to punish you, do you understand? And it isn't worth that. Wait a few hours and you can do whatever you like. Now, though, I'm afraid we'll have to start the lesson. You have to learn too, all of you. Especially you, I said. You don't know anything!

The four girls sent me a particularly sulky expression.

"Nothing at all!" I said. "So, get out your books."

"And how much do you fuckin' know?" Hildegunn said.

Vivian and Andrea laughed.

I raised a forefinger.

"No swearing! I don't want to hear that in the classroom."

"But everyone swears in Northern Norway," Vivian said.

"The same rule applies to swearing as fighting," I said. "Swear as much as you like at home. But not here. I'm serious. I mean it. All right. You can carry on with the exercises you started last time. Page thirteen onward. If you need any help, I'm here. At the beginning of the next lesson we'll go through any problems that arise. OK?"

I went to the window, leaned against the frame, and crossed my arms. Heard Nils Erik's voice at the other end of the open-plan block, he had English with the fourth grade. I thought of Stian, saw that smart-alecky smile of his in my mind's eye, and saw the girls in the class, their eyes watching his every movement. They admired him, I was fully aware of that. Perhaps they even dreamed about him?

They probably did.

The thought stung. He was just a little shit.

I went to my desk, glanced at Hege, who had taken her pupils over to the little library corner, where they sat on cushions in a circle around her and listened while she read.

She noticed that I was watching, looked across and smiled. I smiled back, sat down at the desk, thumbed through the textbook to see what I could do in the next lesson.

When I looked up again, my eyes met Andrea's. Blood suffused her cheeks. I smiled. She raised her hand and lowered her gaze. I got to my feet and went over to her.

"What do you need help with?" I said.

"This part," she said, pointing. "Did I do it right?"

I leaned forward and went through what she had written. She sat motionless, following my finger as it moved down the page. A faint fragrance redolent of apples emanated from her. It must be the shampoo she used, I thought, and felt a quiver spread through my chest. Her breathing, the hair that fell over her face, her eyes staring through it. All so close.

"We-ell," I said. "It looks right to me."

"Does it?" she said, looking up at me. When our eyes met, I straightened up.

"Yes, it does," I said. "Stick with it!"

No one was in the staff room when I entered after the lesson. It was only when I had sat down that I noticed Torill – she was in the kitchenette buttering a slice of bread.

"Did you have a free period?" I said.

She nodded and took a bite, holding a finger up while she chewed and swallowed.

"Yes," she said. "But I've been busy preparing for my next lessons!"

"Good," I said, reaching over for the newspaper on the table. As I browsed through it I was aware of her movements. The slice of bread that went up to her mouth and down again as she hustled around.

She leaned forward and opened the fridge door. I looked up. She was wearing a pair of black stretch pants. I examined her thighs so clearly outlined in them, and her bottom. It was broad but not too broad; on the contrary, it was curvaceous and so utterly feminine.

The blood began to throb in my member, and I crossed my legs without shifting my gaze. How wonderful it would be to sleep with her and feel her thighs and bottom against my body. Oh Lord. To penetrate her. Oh Lord God. Oh. Her breasts cupped in my hands! Oh, just her skin! Oh, just the smooth insides of her thighs!

I swallowed and studied the ceiling. It would never work. Even in the highly unlikely event that I ended up in bed with her or someone like her, it would never work. I knew that.

She stood up with a carton of milk in her hand. Opened it and started filling a glass as she shot me a brief glance. When our eyes met she smiled.

She had noticed everything.

I blushed and smiled back, feverishly trying to think of something that might divert her attention from the color in my cheeks and what I had just seen and thought.

She threw back her head and finished the milk in one swig. Wiped the white moustache off with the back of her hand and looked at me again.

"Would you like some coffee, Karl Ove? You look like you could use some!"

What did she mean? Why did I look like I needed coffee?

"No, thanks," I said.

But a no drew attention!

"Well, actually, maybe I will," I added quickly. "Yes, please!"

"Milk?"

I shook my head. She poured out two cups and brought them over, passed me one and sat down beside me with a sigh.

"You sighed," I said.

"Did I?" she said. "It's just late in the day. I slept badly last night."

I blew on the black, impenetrable surface with the small, light brown bubbles at the edge and took a sip.

"Do I make a lot of noise?" I said. "The music and all that, I mean."

She shook her head. "I can hear you're there," she said. "But that doesn't matter."

"Sure?"

"Of course I'm sure."

"OK, but tell me if it's too loud."

"Can you hear anything from our flat?" she said.

"Hardly anything. When you walk across the floor, that's all."

"That's just because Georg is away fishing," she said. "I'm a lot quieter when I'm on my own."

"Is he going to be away for long?"

"No, they're back on Saturday actually."

She smiled and her lips were so soft and red and supple against her hard white teeth.

"Oh," I said, and looked up because the door at the end of the room opened and Tor Einar, then Hege and Nils Erik, came in.

"Here they come, in serried ranks," I said.

"Yes, some of us respect lesson times," Nils Erik said. "We know that every minute is important for the pupils' future lives. So we cannot, I repeat, cannot finish three minutes before the bell rings. That would be grossly irresponsible. In fact, I would go so far as to say it would be unforgivable."

"Yes, regular temps have a heavy cross to bear," I said. "Why didn't you become a homeroom teacher like me? Then you would have had more control over your time, you know."

"It's my ultimate goal to become a head teacher without studying," Nils Erik said. "It's not very common, and it won't be easy, but that's what I've set my heart on." He rubbed his hands and grimaced in a caricature of greed. "Now for a few decent slices of dry bread with a bit of hard goat's cheese!"

Then in came Vibeke, Jane, and Sture. I got up, thinking I should make some room for those who wanted to eat and stood by the window staring out with a cup in my hand.

The sky was gray but not heavy. The girls from my class were standing by the wall on the far side chatting. The eighth and ninth graders were allowed to stay inside if they wanted, and they invariably did, at least the girls. The children in the lower school generally stayed on the other side by the soccer field.

I still hadn't done a break duty.

I turned to the others.

"Who's on playground duty?" I said.

"A wild guess – you," Sture said, leaning against the door frame with one hand pointing in my direction.

I went over to the list on the wall. And yes, it was me.

"Shit, I'd forgotten all about it," I said, and went into the corridor, grabbed my jacket, and put it on as I hurried out.

From the wet-weather shelter a small, plump figure came toward me. This was a boy called Jo. I pretended I hadn't seen him and made for the other side of the playground, where a whole crowd of kids rushed one way, then the other in front of a goal with a heavy gray ball in their midst.

They saw me and stopped the game.

"Do you want to join in?" they said.

"Why not," I said. "For a little while anyway."

"It's you against the rest then!"

"OK," I said.

They gave the ball to the goalkeeper, who kicked it into the melee. There were lots of boys, but their legs were short, so it was relatively easy to get the ball and keep it. Occasionally I knocked some of them flying, they shouted for a free kick, I shouted that they were little weeds, and they were put in again and chased after me. A couple of times I let them have the ball, just to keep them motivated, but in the end I ran toward the goal and shot the ball past the keeper and shouted I had won and the game was over. No, don't go, they shouted, we're going to smash you! Some of the smallest boys grabbed my trousers. I freed myself and had to run a few steps to get away. They were soon engrossed in the game again, and I started to walk over to see to the pupils on the other side.

Jo was standing on his own by the wall with his hat tugged down over his forehead.

"Don't you want to play soccer with the others?" I said as I passed.

He came after me and I had to stop.

"I don't like soccer," he whimpered.

"Just try!" I said.

"No," he said. "Can I come with you instead?"

"Me?" I said. "I'm just walking around."

He took my hand and looked up at me with a smile.

"OK," I said. "If you want."

Didn't he understand how this would look to his classmates, walking around hand in hand with the teacher?

Obviously not.

With the chubby little boy in tow I went toward the other part of the playground, where the pupils in my class had now been joined by the eighth and ninth graders.

"Yesterday I finished my homework and tried the next part," he said, looking up at me again.

"Really?" I said. "That's very good. Did you understand any of it?"

"I think so," he said. "Some of it anyway."

"But if you don't like soccer, what do you like?"

"Drawing," he said. "I love that."

"No outdoor hobbies?"

"I like cycling. With Endre."

"Is he your best friend?"

"Off and on."

I looked down at him. His face was completely expressionless.

So the poor boy had no friends.

His eyes met mine and his face softened into a smile. I rested my hand on his shoulder and crouched down in front of him.

"What about if we go and play soccer?" I said. "You and I can be on the same team."

"But I can't play soccer," he said.

"Get away with you," I said. "Of course you can. All you have to do is run around and kick the ball! I'll help you. Come on, we'll have to hurry if we're going to get a game. The bell will go soon."

"OK," he said, and we jogged over to the goal.

I stopped in front of the boys and raised my arm.

"I'm back," I said. "Jo's on my team. So it's Jo and me against the rest of you. OK?"

"But Jo's so bad!" Reidar shouted.

"You're all bad," I said. "Come on then!"

He really was bad! If I passed the ball to him he could barely kick it. But he was running around now with a smile on his face, and then fortunately the bell rang a couple of minutes later.

"You take the ball, Jo, and put it in the staff room. OK?"

"OK!" he said, and headed off with the ball under his arm. I quickly followed, hoping to catch a brief glimpse of Liv, the girl in the ninth grade, before she went in.

And I did. She was walking beside Camilla as I arrived, and she sent me a stolen glance as she turned into the corridor. I eyed her slim, firm backside, formed to perfection, and a kind of abyss opened inside me.

After the last lesson, I remained in the staff room waiting for the others to go home, partly because I longed to be alone but in a different way from how I was in my flat, and partly because I wanted to use the phone.

Eventually only Richard's car was left in the parking lot. He was in his office but could come into the staff room at any moment, so I sat leafing through an encyclopedia as I waited for him to pack up and go home.

In the past few hours the clouds had slowly darkened, and while I was sitting there the first raindrops began to pitter-patter on the windowpanes. I turned and watched them hitting the asphalt at first without leaving a mark, as though it wasn't really happening, then a few seconds later the dark wetness spread as the heavens opened. It poured down, stripes of rain cut through the air and with such force that I could see the raindrops bouncing off the ground. The water gushed out of the drainpipes from the gutters and down the hill along the side of the building opposite. A hard drumming sound came from the windows and the roof above me.

"Now that's what I call a storm!" Richard said from the door with a smile. He was wearing his green anorak and had a knife on his belt.

"It's no passing shower," I said.

"Are you doing some overtime?" he said, coming in.

"Well," I said. "I was planning to anyhow."

"How has your first week been?"

"It's gone well, I think," I said.

He nodded.

"Next Friday you can talk to Sigrid. The mentor, you know. Wouldn't be a bad idea to write down all the questions and thoughts you have before you meet her. So you can make the best use of the opportunity."

"OK, I'll do that," I said.

He chewed his lower lip and looked like a goat again.

"OK then," he said. "Have a good weekend!"

"You too," I said.

Half a minute later he appeared outside running toward his car with his briefcase over his head.

Keys out, door open, in.

The car lights came on, shivers ran down my spine. The rear lights shone red against the wet black asphalt and the headlights cast two shafts of yellow light against the wall, which seemed to diffuse them as it was lit up.

The pattering rain, the broad Vs of water running down the hill, the overflowing gutters.

Oh, this was the world and I was living in the midst of it.

What should I do? I felt like hammering my fists on the windows, running around the room and yelling, tossing tables and chairs aside, I was full to the brim with energy and life.

"IT'S THE END OF THE WORLD AS WE KNOW IT!" I sang out at the top of my voice in the staff room.

"IT'S THE END OF THE WORLD AS WE KNOW IT!

"AND I FEEL FINE!

"AND I FEEL FINE!"

Once Richard's car was out of sight, I went for a walk around the school building to see whether anyone might still be there. The caretaker, for example, could have been pottering around fixing things. But it was deserted, and after I'd made sure this was the case I went into the little telephone cubicle and dialed Mom's number.

She didn't answer.

Perhaps she'd been working late and had stopped by a supermarket on the way home, if she wasn't eating out.

I called Yngve. He picked up right away.

"Hello?" he said.

"Hi, this is Karl Ove," I said.

"You're in Northern Norway, aren't you?"

"Yes, of course. How are things?"

"Fine. Just got back from lectures. Going to chill first and then I'll be off."

"Where to?"

"Hulen nightclub probably."

"Lucky you."

"You're the one who chose to go to Northern Norway. You could have moved to Bergen, you know."

"Yes, I know."

"How are things up there? Do you have a flat and everything?"

"Yes. It's nice. Started teaching on Tuesday. Actually it's really a lot of fun. I'm going out tonight too. But not to Hulen exactly. It's a local community center."

"Any nice girls up there?"

"Yeees . . . There's one I met on the bus. That might develop into something. Otherwise they've all left home. Seems like they're either schoolgirls or housewives."

"It'll have to be schoolgirls, then, huh?"

"Ha ha."

There was a brief silence.

"Did you get my short story?" I said.

"I did."

"Have you read it?"

"I have but only quickly. I skimmed through it. I was going to write to you about it. Not easy to do that on the phone."

"But you did like it, didn't you? Or you're not sure yet."

"Yes, I did. I liked it well enough. It was nice and lively. But let's talk about it later, as I said, OK?"

OK.

Another silence.

"What about Dad?" I said. "Heard anything from him?"

"Nothing. You?"

"No, nothing. Thinking about calling him now."

"Say hello from me. It'll save me having to call him for a few weeks."

"I will," I said. "I'll write to you in the week."

"That'd be good," he said. "Catch you later!"

"OK," I said, and hung up, went into the staff room, and sat on the sofa with my feet up on the table. Something about the conversation with Yngve had depressed me, but I didn't know what. Perhaps that he was going to Hulen in Bergen with all his friends while I was going to a party in a village in the middle of nowhere and didn't know anyone.

Or was it the well enough?

Yes, I did. I liked it well enough, he had said.

Well enough?

I had once read a short story by Hemingway, it was about a boy who accompanied his father, who was a doctor, to an Indian reservation – a woman was giving birth, it didn't go so well, as far as I remembered, perhaps the woman had even died – anyway after they had been there they went back home and that was that. All very straightforward. My short story was just as good, I knew that. The context was different, but that was because Hemingway wrote in a different era. I wrote in today's world, and that was why it was as it was.

But what did Yngve really know? How much did he read? Had he even read Hemingway?

I got up and went back into the telephone cubicle, took the slip of paper from my back pocket, and dialed Dad's number. May as well get it over with.

"Yes, hello?" he said. Brusque voice. The conversation was going to be brief, no doubt about that.

"Hi, this is Karl Ove," I said.

"Oh, hi, son," he said.

"I'm all set up here now," I said. "And I've started working."

"That's good," he said. "Are you doing all right?"

"Yes."

"That's good."

"How are things with you?"

"Well, same as always, you know. Unni's at home and I've just got back from work. Now we're going to eat. But it was nice that you called."

"Say hello to Unni!"

"Will do. Bye."

"Bye."

The deluge had eased when I headed down the hill from school to my flat, but it was still raining enough for my hair to be soaked by the time I opened the door. I dried it in the bathroom with a towel, hung up my jacket, put my shoes by the stove, and switched it on, fried some potatoes, some onions, and a sausage, which I chopped up into pieces, ate it all at the sitting-room table as I read yesterday's paper, then went to bed, where I fell asleep within minutes, swathed by the comforting pitter-patter of rain on the window.

I woke to the bell ringing. Outside it had not only stopped raining, as I saw when I got up to open the door, the sky over the village was also blue.

It was Nils Erik.

He was holding his arms to his sides like two brackets, with his knees bent outward, his lips compressed into a zany smile, and his eyes wide and staring.

"Is this where the party is?" he squeaked in an old man's voice.

"Yes, it is," I said. "It's here. Come in."

He didn't move.

"Are there any . . . any . . . any really young girls here?" he said.

"How young?"

"Thirteen?"

"Yep! Come on in! It's freezing!"

I turned my back on him and went in, took a bottle of white wine from the fridge and opened it.

"Do you want some white wine?" I shouted to him.

"My wine should be as red as a young girl's blood!" he wheezed from the hall.

"Nasty," I said. He came into the kitchen with a bottle of red wine in his hand and put it on the counter. I passed him the corkscrew.

He was wearing a blue Poco Loco shirt, a black leather tie, and a pair of red cotton trousers.

The impression he made on people didn't bother him anyway, I thought with a smile. Not caring what others thought about him was an essential part of his personality, it seemed.

"I must say you're colorful tonight," I said.

"You've got to strike while the iron is hot," he said. "And I've heard you have to dress like this if you want to attract women up here."

"Like that? Red and blue?"

"Exactly!"

He put the bottle between his knees and pulled out the cork with a pop.

"Wonderful sound!" he said.

"I'm just going to have a quick shower. Is that all right?" I said.

He nodded.

"Of course. I'll put some music on while you're in there, OK?"

"No problem."

"No one can say that we aren't polite young men," he said with a laugh.

I went into the bathroom, undressed at speed, turned on the water and stepped under the shower, hastily washed under my arms and between my legs, looked at my feet, leaned my head back and wet my hair, then I turned the shower off, dried, put some gel in my hair, wrapped the towel around my waist, and went into the sitting room, past Nils Erik, who was on the sofa with studiously closed eyes listening to David Sylvian, and into the bedroom, where I put on clean underpants and socks, a white shirt, and black trousers. I buttoned up my shirt, then put on my shoelace tie and went back to Nils Erik.

"But I was told that's exactly how you shouldn't dress!" he said. "If you want them to flock to you. White shirt, shoelace tie with eagle, and black pants."

I tried to come up with a smart retort, but failed.

"Ha ha," I said, filling my glass with white wine and drinking it in one long swig.

The taste was of summer nights, discos bursting at the seams, buckets of ice on the tables, gleaming eyes, tanned bare arms.

I shuddered.

"Not used to drinking?" Nils Erik said.

I sent him a withering glance and refilled my glass.

"Have you heard the new Chris Isaak single?" I said.

He shook his head. I went and put it on.

"It's brilliant," I said.

We sat for a while without speaking.

I rolled a cigarette and lit it.

"Did you have a look at my short story?" I said.

He nodded. I got up and lowered the volume.

"I read it before I left. It's good, Karl Ove."

"Do you really think so?"

"Yes. Lively style. Actually I don't have much more to say than that. I'm not exactly a literary expert or a writer."

"Is there anything you particularly liked?"

He shook his head.

"Nothing really, no. The writing's even and good. Hangs together well."

"OK," I said. "What do you think about the ending in relation to the rest?"

"It was a strong ending."

"That's what I want, you know," I said. "Something completely unexpected, the part about the father."

"It is as well."

He filled his glass. His lips were already red from the wine.

"Have you read Saabye Christensen's Beatles by the way?" he said.

"Hell yes," I said. "It's my favorite novel. That was what made me decide to become a writer. That and White Niggers by Ambjørnsen."

"Guessed as much," he said.

"Oh? Is it similar?"

"It is."

"Too similar?"

He smiled.

"No, I wouldn't say so. But I can see you were influenced by it."

"What did you think of the blood part? The part that comes in the middle? Where everything changes into the present tense?"

"I don't think I noticed that."

"That was what I was most pleased with, in fact. I describe him seeing Gordon's blood and veins and flesh and sinews. It's pretty intense in the middle there."

Nils Erik nodded and smiled.

Then there was another silence.

"It was much easier to write than I'd thought," I said. "It's the first short story I've ever written. I'd written things in papers and that sort of thing before, but that's different. That was sort of why I came up here. I just wanted to try and write a book. And then I began and well . . . yes, all I had to do was write. It wasn't difficult at all."

"I see," he said. "Are you planning to go into writing as a career?"

"Yes, yes, that's what this is all about for me. I'm planning to write another short story this weekend. Have you read Hemingway, by the way?"

"Oh yes. Part of growing up."

"Sort of like that, yes. Straight to the point. Simple and clear. With weight behind it."

"Yes."

I refilled my glass to the brim and drank it in one go.

"Have you wondered what it would have been like if we had applied for a different school?" I said.

"What do you mean?"

"Well, it's just by chance that it happened to be Håfjord. It could have been anywhere. Then we would have had to adjust to whoever lived there, wouldn't we, and life would have been very different from what's going to happen here."

"Not to mention the fact that two completely different people would have been listening to wine and drinking Chris Isaak. Or vice versa. The wine would have been listening and Chris Isaak drinking. Well, have you ever heard the like? Or is it: have you ever leard the hike? I'm all inside out! Spoutside up! Upside down!"

Nils Erik laughed.

"Skål, Karl Ove, and I'm glad it's you sitting there and not someone else!"

We raised our glasses and said skål.

"Although, if it'd been someone else, would I have said the same to him?"

At that moment the doorbell rang.

"That must be Tor Einar," I said, getting up.

He was standing with his back to me and staring down at the village when I opened the door. The gray August light hung between the mountainsides, seemingly of a completely different texture from that which illuminated the sky, for that was blue and gleamed like metal.

"Hi," I said.

Tor Einar turned in a slow, studied manner. Here was a guy who had plenty of time.

"Hi," he said. "May I enter?"

"Step right in."

He did so in the same punctilious way I had associated with his personality from the first moment I saw him. It was as though he had thought through his movements a couple of times before he executed them. All with a smile playing on his lips.

He raised his hand and waved in greeting to Nils Erik.

"What are you two talking about?" he said in broad dialect.

Nils Erik smiled.

"We're talking about fish," he said in his own dialect.

"Fish and fanny," I said in mine.

"Salty fish and fresh fanny or fresh fish and salty fanny?" Tor Einar asked.

"What's the filleting difference, can you tell me that?" I said.

"Yes, now listen here: salty sole and sole salt, they're not the same thing. Nor are fish and fanny. But they're close. Incredibly close."

"Soul salt?" I asked.

"Yes. See, now you're saying it."

He laughed, hitched up the knees of his trousers, and sat down beside Nils Erik.

"Well?" he said. "Have you done a roundup of the week?"

"That's what we were doing," Nils Erik said.

"They seem to be a good bunch," Tor Einar said.

"Are you thinking about the teachers?" I said.

"Yes," he said. "In fact, I already know them all, apart from you two."

"But you're not from here?" Nils Erik said.

"My grandmother lives here. I've been up every summer and Christmas since I was small."

"You've just finished gymnas as well, haven't you?" I said. "In Finnsnes?"

He nodded.

"You don't know someone there called Irene, do you?" I said. "From Hellevika?"

"Irene, sure," he said, brightening up. "Not as well as I'd like, I must admit. How come? Do you know her?"

"That would be saying too much," I said. "But I met her on the bus on my way here. She seemed nice."

"Are you meeting her this evening? Is that the plan?"

I shrugged. "She's coming anyway," I said.

Half an hour later we were walking up the hill from the flat. I was drunk in that pure joyful way you can be from white wine, when your thoughts collide with one another like bubbles and what emerges when they burst is pleasure.

We had been at my place, I thought, and this filled me with pleasure.

We were colleagues and on our way to becoming friends, I reflected.

And I had written a damn good short story.

Pleasure, pleasure, pleasure.

And then there was this light, dim down among humans and things human, attended by a kind of finely honed darkness which became diffused in the light though did not possess or control it, only muted or softened it, high up in the sky it was gleamingly clean and clear.

Pleasure.

And there was this silence. The murmur of the sea, our footsteps on the gravel, the occasional noise coming from somewhere, a door being opened or a shout, all embraced by silence, which seemed to rise from the ground, rise from objects and surround us in a way which I didn't formulate as primordial, though I sensed it was, for I thought of the silence in Sørbøvåg on summer mornings when I was a child there, the silence above the fjord beneath the immense Lihesten Mountain, half hidden by mist. The silence of the world. It was here too, as I walked uphill, drunk, with my new friends, and although neither it nor the light we walked in was the main event of the evening it played its part.

Pleasure.

Eighteen years old and on my way to a party.

"That's where she lives," Tor Einar said, pointing to the house I had strolled past one evening a few days ago.

"Big house," Nils Erik said.

"Yes, she lives with someone," Tor Einar said. "His name's Vidar and he's a fisherman."

"What else!" I said, stopping at the door and raising my arm to ring the bell.

"Here everyone just walks in," Tor Einar said. "We're in Northern Norway now!"

I opened the door and went in. From upstairs came the sound of voices and music. Smoke hung in the air above the stairs. We quietly took off our shoes and went up. The floor above was open plan with the kitchen straight ahead, a living room at the back to the left, presumably the bedroom was at the back on the right.

There was a group of perhaps ten people in the living room chatting and laughing, squeezed around a table covered with bottles and glasses, cigarette packets and ashtrays. They were all stocky, many had moustaches, age-wise they ranged between twenty and forty.

"Here come the teachers," one of them said.

"Perhaps we'll be given detention this evening," another said.

Everyone laughed.

"Hi, folks," said Tor Einar.

"Hi," said Nils Erik.

Hege, the only woman there, got up and brought in some chairs from the dining-room table by the window.

"Sit yourselves down, boys," she said. "If you need glasses, you'll find them in the kitchen."

I went in and stood alone staring up at the mountainside behind the house while mixing myself a screwdriver. For a moment I lingered in the doorway observing the people around the table, thinking they looked like trolls sitting there with their variously colored drinks, depending on what they mixed with their vodka – a variety of juices, Sprite, Coke – with their pouches of tobacco from which they made endless rollies and with their moustaches, their dark eyes and the succession of stories, thinking how they came from the four corners of the earth to meet here once a year and act out their exotic natures among their own kind.

However, it was the other way round. They were the rule and I was the exception, the teacher among fishermen. So what was I doing here? Shouldn't I be at home writing rather than here?

It had been a mistake to go into the kitchen alone. Nils Erik and Tor Einar had already been through the introductory rites, they were now comfortably ensconced alongside the fishermen, and I could have done that too, tagged along behind my colleagues and slipped in without being noticed.

I took a swig and went in.

"And here we have the writer!" one of them said. I recognized him at once, he was the fisherman who had dropped by to see me on the first day, Remi.

"Hi, Remi," I said, holding out my hand.

"Have you been on a name-learning course or what?" he said, grasping it. Shook it up and down in a way that had not been done since the 1950s.

"You're the first fisherman I've ever met," I said. "So of course I remember your name."

He laughed. I was pleased I'd had a drink before we left. If I hadn't, I would have stood tongue-tied in front of him.

"The writer?" Hege said.

"Yes, he writes, this guy does. I've seen it with my own eyes!"

"I didn't know that," she said. "Do you have such fancy ideas?"

I sat down and nodded to her while smiling semi-apologetically and taking the tobacco pouch from my shirt pocket.

For the next hour I said nothing. I rolled cigarettes, smoked, drank, smiled when the others smiled, laughed when they laughed. Looked at Nils Erik, who was pretty drunk and seemed to be in on the jokey tone but wasn't, he was different, there was something light and Østlandish about him, always on the outside. Not that they rejected him, because they didn't, it was just that his jokes were of a fundamentally different character, which in this context seemed to expose him. He made puns, they didn't, adopted a variety of roles, made faces and raised and lowered his voice, they didn't. When he burst into laughter it was somehow unrestrained, bordering on the hysterical, it struck me; that too was completely different from them.

Tor Einar was more on their level, he knew the appropriate tone and was on nodding terms with everyone there, although he was not one of them either, I could see; he was not an insider, he was more like an ethnological researcher who knows his stuff well enough to be able to mimic it because he likes it so much, and perhaps that was the nub, he liked the tone, whereas for them the tone just came naturally to them. They had never thought about whether they liked it or not.

Tor Einar slapped his thighs when he laughed, which I had only ever seen in films. He would occasionally also rub his hands up and down his thighs when he talked.

The pre-party, as they called it here, excluded discussion. Issues regarding politics, women, music, or football were not on the agenda. What they did was tell stories. One story gave way to the next, laughter billowed across the table, and the tales they came up with, they being the trolls they were, all had their origins in the village and the people who lived there, which despite its modest proportions appeared to be an inexhaustible treasure trove of stories. There was the fisherman in his sixties who had been seasick all his life and who only needed to jump on board his trawler to start feeling ill. There was the gang of fishermen who after a good season had hired the suite at the SAS hotel in Tromsø and spent vertiginous sums of money in the course of a few intense days of abandon there. One man called Frank, with the fleshy face of a child, was said to have burned his way through twenty thousand kroner, and it took me a while to realize that "burned" meant exactly that, he had set fire to it. Then someone had been drunk shitless in an elevator, they said, and again it took me a while to catch on that this had to be interpreted literally: he had been so drunk that he'd shat himself. Judging by the conversation it had indeed happened in the elevator. Frank in particular got so drunk that waking up in his own shit was not an unusual occurrence, from what I could glean. His mother, who was the older teacher at the school, had a hard time, it seemed, because he still lived at home. Hege's stories were different, but no less bizarre, such as the one about the girlfriend who had been terrified before an exam and whom she had taken into the forest and hit on the head with a bat so that she would have a justifiable reason for being absent. I stared at her. Was she pulling our legs? It didn't seem like it. She met my gaze and grinned, and then narrowed her eyes to a slit and frowned, opened them again, smiled and looked away. What did that mean? Was it the equivalent of a wink? Or did it mean that I shouldn't believe everything I heard?

They not only knew one another well, they knew one another inside out.

They had grown up and gone to school together, they worked together, they partied together. They saw one another virtually every day and had done so virtually all their lives. They knew one another's parents and grandparents, many of them were first or second cousins. One might conclude this was boring, indeed intolerably boring in the long run, because nothing new ever entered their lives, everything that happened, happened among the 250 people who lived here and who knew everyone else's most intimate secrets and quirks. But such did not appear to be the case; quite the contrary, they seemed to be having a whale of a time, and if there was anything that marked the atmosphere among them, it was their carefree attitude and their joy.

While sitting there I was formulating what I was going to write in the letters I would send south, such as: "They all had moustaches! It's absolutely true! All of them!" Or: "And the music they listened to, do you know what it was? Bonnie Tyler! And Dr. Hook! How long ago is it since that music was heard anywhere in the world? What is this godforsaken place I have ended up in?" And: "Here the expression 'to drink yourself shitless' means just that. Say no more . . ."

When at last I got up to go to the john, I had drunk just over a third of my bottle of vodka and I knocked against the man sitting next to me, who was holding a glass in his hand and spilled some of the contents.

"So . . . rry," I said, straightening up and stepping across the living-room floor.

"One does the talking and the other does the drinking!" he said behind me and laughed.

He must have been referring to Nils Erik and me.

As soon as I got some speed up my balance was fine.

But where was the bathroom?

I opened a door. It was a bedroom. Hege's bedroom, I presumed, and closed the door as fast as possible. If there was one thing I didn't like, it was seeing other people's bedrooms.

"The bathroom's on the other side," a voice behind me said from the kitchen.

I turned.

A man with brown eyes, thick, collar-length dark hair, and a moustache that hung down on either side of his mouth looked at me. It had to be Vidar, Hege's partner. There was something about the self-assured way he stood there that told me this.

"Thank you," I said.

"No problem," he said. "Just don't piss on the floor, that's all."

"I'll try not to," I said, going into the bathroom. I leaned against the wall while peeing. Smiled to myself. He had looked like a bass player from a 1970s band. Smokie or someone like them. And incredibly muscular.

What was she doing with such a macho?

I flushed the toilet and stood swaying in front of the mirror. Smiled at myself again.

When I emerged from the bathroom, they had decided to leave. They were talking about a bus.

"Do buses run at this hour?" I said.

Remi turned to me. "It's our band bus."

"Is there a band here? Are you in it?"

"Yes, I am. We call ourselves Autopilot. We play at dances in the community centers around here."

I followed him down the stairs. This was getting better and better.

"And what instrument do you play?" I said, putting on my coat in the hall.

"Drums," he said.

I put my arm around his shoulder.

"Me too. Or I did. Two years ago."

"You don't say," he said.

"Yes," I said, retracting my arm, leaning forward and trying to put on a shoe. Bumped into someone. Vidar again.

"Sorry," I said.

"That's fine," he said. "Did you remember your bottle?"

"Oh, no, shit," I said.

"It's this one, isn't it?" he said, holding up a bottle of vodka.

"Yes, that's the one," I said. "Thank you very much! Thanks!"

He smiled but his eyes were cold and impassive. That wasn't my problem though. I put the bottle on the floor and concentrated on my shoes. When they were on, I staggered out under the light night sky, down to the road, where the rest were waiting. The bus was parked in a driveway a hundred meters away. One of them opened the door and got into the driver's seat, we clambered aboard and moved toward the back of the big old vehicle. It was furnished with sofas and tables and a bar, all in plywood, and plush, it seemed. We sat down, the engine started with a growl and it was out with the bottles and off down the road. As we jolted along following the bank of the fjord we had a drink in one hand and a cigarette in the other.

What an adventure.

I sang Pølsemaker, pølsemaker, hvor har du gjort av deg – Sausage maker, sausage maker, where have you gone, at the top of my voice while swinging my arms and trying to get the others to join in. The bus had conjured up memories of the old film in which Leif Juster was a bus driver, and Leif Juster had made me think of the film The Sausage-Maker Who Disappeared.

An hour or so later the bus pulled up in front of the community center, I jumped out and was swallowed up in the overcrowded room.

* * *

When I woke, at first, I couldn't remember a thing.

Everything was a complete blank.

I didn't know who I was or where I was. All I knew was that I had woken up from something.

But the room was familiar, it was the bedroom in my flat.

How had I gotten here?

I sat up and could feel that I was still drunk.

What time was it?

What had happened?

I held my face in my hands. I had to have something to drink. Now. But I was too wiped out to go into the kitchen and slumped back on the bed.

I had been to the pre-party and on a bus. And had sung. Sung!

Oh no, oh no.

And I had put my hand on his shoulder. As if we were pals. But we weren't. I wasn't even a man. Only a stupid Sørlander who couldn't even tie a knot. With arms as thin as drinking straws.

No, now I had to have something to drink.

I sat up. My body was as heavy as lead and totally uncooperative, but I forced my feet onto the floor, braced myself mentally, and pushed myself onto my legs.

Oh God.

The yearning for my bed was so strong that I had to mobilize all the willpower I had not to go back. The few paces to the kitchen exhausted me, I had to hang over the counter for a while before I could summon the energy to run the tap, fill a glass, and drink. One more, and one more. And the distance to my bedroom seemed so immense that I stopped halfway and lay down on the sofa instead.

I hadn't done anything stupid, had I?

I'd danced. Yes, I'd danced with all and sundry.

Hadn't there been a woman in her sixties too? Whom I had smiled at and danced with? And pressed myself against?

Yes, there had.

Oh my God. Oh my God.

Oh Christ.

Then it was as though the pressure inside me was ratcheted up, although there was no particular place that hurt, everything was painful, and the pain grew and grew, it was unbearable, and then my stomach muscles went into a spasm. I swallowed, dragged myself to my feet, and tried to hold it back as I stumbled toward the bathroom, the pressure mounting and mounting, that was all that existed, and then I snatched at the toilet seat, flung it up, knelt down, wrapped my arms around the bowl, and spewed a cascade of yellow and green vomit into the water with such force that it splashed back into my face, but it didn't matter, nothing mattered anymore, it was so wonderful to feel the relief, so fantastically wonderful.

I slumped to the floor.

Oh God, how good it was.

But then it came back. The muscles in my stomach writhed like snakes. Oh God. I leaned over the bowl again, caught a glimpse of a pubic hair next to my forearm resting on the porcelain as the cramps tore through my empty stomach, and I opened my mouth and groaned ooooh, ooooooh, ooooooh, and nothing came out.

But then, without warning, a gob of yellow bile was expelled. It slid down the white porcelain, a sliver still hung from my mouth and I wiped it away, and I lay down on the bathroom floor. Was that the last? Was it over now?

Yes.

Suddenly everything was as serene as in church. I lay in a fetal position on the bathroom floor enjoying to the full the calm that had settled over my body.

What had I done with Irene?

Everything inside me tensed up.

Irene.

We had danced.

I had pressed myself against her, hard, rubbed my erect dick against her stomach.

And then?

Anything else?

It was as if this one scene was surrounded by darkness on all sides. I remembered it but nothing of what came before or after.

Anything bad?

I imagined her in a ditch, strangled, with torn clothes.

No, no, what nonsense.

But the image returned. Irene in a ditch, strangled, her clothes torn.

How could the image be so clear? Her blue trousers, with those wonderfully full thighs beneath, a white blouse ripped open, part of a naked breast exposed, her eyes lifeless. The mud in the ditch, between the scattered blades of grass, yellow and green, the insane light, late in the night.

No, no, what nonsense.

How did I get home?

Hadn't I been standing by the bus when the band stopped playing and the parking lot outside the community center was packed with people laughing and screaming?

Yes.

And Irene was there!

We were kissing!

Me with a bottle of booze in one hand, drinking straight from it. She grabbed my lapel, she was the type of girl who grabbed lapels, and then she looked up at me, and then she said . . . ?

What did she say?

Oh hell, no.

Out of nowhere the snakes in my stomach entwined themselves again, and since there was nothing left below they were furious and squeezed so hard that I groaned. OOOOOHH, I went. OOOHHHH. I wrapped my arms around the toilet bowl and hung my head over the hole, but nothing came, I was empty.

CHRIST ALMIGHTY! I shouted. STOP THIS! NOW!

Then came a mouthful of unbelievably thick bile, I spat it out and thought that was it, but it wasn't, my stomach continued to churn, and I tried to alleviate it by hawking, from the bottom of my throat, for if only a little came up surely the vomiting would stop.

OOOHH. OOOHH. OOOHH.

Some phlegm came up.

There. That's the way.

Finished now?

Yes.

Ah.

Oh.

I grabbed the edge of the sink with one hand and pulled myself up. Rinsed my face with cold water and staggered into the sitting room, not too difficult, fine, lay back down on the sofa, thought I should find out what the time was but didn't have the energy, all that counted now was to wait for my body to recover and then the day could begin. After all, I was going to write another short story.

I had experienced blackouts like this, after which I remembered only fragments of what I had done, ever since I first started drinking. That was the summer I finished ninth grade, at the Norway Cup, when I just laughed and laughed, a momentous experience; being drunk took me to places where I was free and did what I wanted while it raised me aloft and rendered everything around me wonderful. Only recalling bits and pieces afterward, isolated scenes brightly illuminated against a wall of darkness from which I emerged and disappeared back into, was the norm. And so it went on. The following spring I went to the carnival with Jan Vidar, Mom had made me up as Bowie's Aladdin Sane, the town was heaving with people wearing curly black wigs, hot pants, and sequins, everywhere there was the throb of samba drums, but the air was cold, people were stiff, there was a huge amount of embarrassment to be overcome all the time, and this was visible in the processions, people were squirming rather than dancing, they wanted to feel emancipated, that was what this was about, they were not, they wanted to be, this was the 1980s, this was the new liberated and forward-looking era in which everything Norwegian was pathetic and everything Mediterranean was alive and free, when the sole TV channel which had informed the Norwegian population for twenty years about what one small circle of educated people in Oslo considered important for them to know was suddenly joined by new, very different TV channels that took a lighter approach, they wanted to entertain, and they wanted to sell, and from then on these two entities fused: entertainment and sales became two sides of the same coin and subsumed everything else, which also became entertainment and sales, from music to politics, literature, news, health, in fact everything. The carnival marked this transition, a nation moving away from the seriousness of the '70s to the levity of the '90s, and this transition was visible in the awkward movements, in the nervous eyes and the wild triumphant looks of those who had overcome this awkwardness and nervousness and were now wiggling their lean bottoms on the backs of the trucks that crawled through Kristiansand's streets on this cold spring morning with a light drizzle in the air. That was how it was in Kristiansand and that was how it was in all the other towns in Norway of any size and any self-respect. Carnival was the rage and would become a tradition, they said, every year these stiff white men and women would affirm their emancipation to the best of their ability on trucks, decked out as Mediterraneans, dancing and laughing to the drums that former school-brass-band musicians played with such a seductive, hypnotic beat.

Even two sixteen-year-olds like Jan Vidar and me understood that this was sad. Of course there was nothing we wanted more than a Mediterranean-style explosion in our day-to-day reality, for there was nothing we yearned for more than inviting breasts and bums, music and loads of fun, and if there was anything we wanted to be, it was dark-skinned, confident men who took these women at will. We were against meanness and all for generosity, we were against constraints and for openness and freedom. Nevertheless we saw these processions and were overcome by sadness on behalf of our town and country because there was an unbelievable lack of pride about all this, indeed it was as if the whole town was making a fool of itself, without realizing. But we did realize and we were sad as we strolled around, each with half a bottle of spirits in an inside pocket, becoming more and more drunk and cursing our town and the idiotic people in it while always keeping an eye open for faces we knew and could perhaps get together with. That is, girls' faces, or in a pinch boys' faces we knew who were with girls' faces we didn't know. Our project was doomed, we were never going to meet girls this way, but we didn't give up as long as there was a glimmer of hope, we strolled on, getting drunker and drunker, more and more depressed. And then, at some point, I disappeared from myself. Not from Jan Vidar, he could see me of course, and when he said something to me he received an answer so he imagined that everything was fine, but it wasn't, I had disappeared, I was empty, I was in the void of my soul, there was no other way for me to describe it.

Who are you when you don't know you exist? Who were you when you didn't remember that you existed? When I woke up in the studio in Elvegaten the following day and knew nothing about anything, it felt as if I had been let loose in the town. I could have done anything, because when I was as drunk as I was, there were no longer any limits in me, I did everything that entered my head, and what would not enter a person's head?

I called Jan Vidar. He was in bed asleep, but his father dragged him to the phone.

"What happened?" I said.

"We-ell," he said, keeping me on tenterhooks. "Strictly speaking nothing happened. That's what was such crap."

"I don't remember any of the last part," I said. "Somewhere on the way to Silokaia, that's the last thing I remember."

"Really? Nothing?"

"No."

"Don't you remember standing on the back of a truck and mooning at everyone?"

"Did I do that?"

He laughed.

"No, of course not. No, relax, man. Nothing happened. I mean, yes, something did happen when we were walking home. You bent all the wing mirrors along one street. Someone shouted, "Hey!" at us and so we ran for it. I didn't notice any difference in you. Were you that drunk?"

"Yes, it was the spirits."

"I fall asleep when I get that drunk. Jesus, though, what an awful evening. You won't get me to go to carnival again, that's for sure."

"Do you know what I think?"

"What?"

"When they have the carnival next year we'll be there again. We can't afford not to be. Not much happens in this fucking hole of town after all."

"True."

We hung up and I went to wash the Aladdin Sane lightning off my face.

The next time it happened was on Midsummer Night, also with Jan Vidar. We had dragged ourselves, each carrying a bag of beer, down to a place on the coast, to some sea-smoothed rocks below the forest in Hånes, where we wandered around drinking and freezing in the pouring summer rain, surrounded by Øyvind's many pals and a few people we knew from Hamresanden. Øyvind had chosen this evening of all evenings to break up with his girlfriend, Lene, so she sat crying on a rock, away from the others. I went over to console her, sat beside her, and stroked her back while telling her there were other boys, she would get over it, she was so young and beautiful, and she looked at me with gratitude in her eyes and sniffled, I thought it was a shame we were outdoors and not somewhere indoors, where there were beds, and that it was raining then outside. Suddenly she looked at her jacket and screamed, her shoulder was covered in blood and, as it turned out, her back too. It came from me, I'd cut my hand without noticing and it was bleeding profusely. You moron, she said, and stood up. This jacket's brand new. Do you know how much it cost? Sorry, I said, it wasn't on purpose, I just wanted to cheer you up a little. Go to hell, she said, and headed toward the others, where in the course of the evening she found herself back in favor with Øyvind while I sat drinking alone staring across the gray surface of the water, which the falling rain continued to dot with small, evocative rings until Jan Vidar came over and sat down next to me and we could pursue the years-long conversation we had about which girls were pretty or not and who we most dreamed of sleeping with, all while we slowly but surely got drunker until in the end everything disintegrated and I drifted into a kind of ghost world.

The ghost world: when I was inside, it went straight through me, and when I woke up from it, I couldn't remember much, a face here, a body there, a room, a staircase, a backyard, pale and shimmering, surrounded by an ocean of darkness.

It was nothing less than a horror film. Now and then I would remember the most peculiar details, like a rock at the bottom of a stream or a bottle of olive oil on a kitchen shelf, everyday items in themselves but as symbols of a whole night's mental activity, in fact all that was left of it, it was bizarre. What was it about that rock? What was it about that bottle? The first two times it happened I hadn't been afraid, I registered it simply as a kind of objective fact. Then, when it happened again, there began to be something eerie about it because I was so out of control. No, nothing had happened and probably nothing was going to happen either, but the fact was, I had no control over my actions at all. If I was basically a nice person, that was how I would be then as well, but was I? Actually?

On the other hand, I was also proud: occasionally getting so drunk that I couldn't remember a thing was cool.

At that time, I was sixteen that summer, there were only three things I wanted. The first was a girlfriend. The second was to sleep with a girl. The third was to get drunk.

Or, if I am being totally honest, there were only two things: sleeping with a girl and getting drunk. I had lots of other interests, I was full of ambition in all sorts of areas: I liked reading, listening to music, playing the guitar, watching films, playing soccer, swimming and snorkeling, traveling abroad, having money and buying myself bits of equipment, but in effect all that was about having a good time, about spending my time in the most agreeable fashion possible, and that was fine, all of it, but when it came to the crunch there were only two things I really wanted.

No, when I actually came down to it, there was only one.

I wanted to sleep with a girl.

That was the only thing I wanted.

A fire burned inside me, one that never went out. Even when I was asleep, it flared up, a glimpse of a breast in a dream was all I needed, and I came.

Oh no, not again, I thought every time I woke with underpants sticking to my skin and my pubic hair. Mom washed my clothes and at first I always rinsed them thoroughly before putting them in the laundry basket, but there was something suspicious about that too. What are all these sopping wet underpants doing here? she must have thought, and after a while I stopped and put the semen-drenched underpants, which after a few hours became stiff, as if permeated with salt flakes or something, in the basket, and even though she must have noticed, because it happened at least two, often three, times a week, I dismissed the thought of her bemusement as I replaced the laundry basket lid. She never mentioned it, I never mentioned it, and that was how it was with so much, and probably had to be, in the house where she and I lived alone: some things were said, commented on, pored over, and attempts were made to understand them; others were not articulated, not mentioned, and no attempts were made to understand them.

My urges were strong, but they rumbled in the empty rooms of ignorance, where what happened simply happened. Naturally I could have asked Yngve for advice, after all he was four years older and had endlessly more experience. He had done it, I knew that. I hadn't. So why didn't I ask him for advice?

It was unthinkable. It belonged to the realm of the unthinkable. Why, I didn't know, but it did. Besides, what good would advice do? It would be like receiving advice on how to conquer Mount Everest. Yeah, well, you go right there, and then you keep going straight on up, and there you are.

I would have given absolutely anything to sleep with a girl. Any girl actually. Whether it happened with someone I loved, like Hanne, or with a prostitute, made no difference, if it happened as part of a satanic initiation ceremony with goat's blood and hoods, I would have said, yes, I'm up for that. But it wasn't something you were given, it was something you took. Exactly how, I didn't know, and then it became a vicious circle, for not knowing made me unsure of myself, and if there was one thing that disqualified you, one thing they didn't want, it was a lack of self-assurance. That much I had understood. You had to be confident, determined, convincing. But how to get to that position? How in God's name could you do that? How did you go from standing in front of a girl in broad daylight, with all her clothes on, to sleeping with her in the darkness a few hours later? There was a chasm between these two states. When I saw a girl standing in front of me in broad daylight, there was a bottomless chasm between us. If I stepped off the edge I would fall. What else? Because she wouldn't come halfway, she could see I was frightened, she would withdraw, retreat into herself or turn to someone else. But actually, I thought, actually the distance between the two states was very short. It was just a question of lifting her T-shirt over her head, unfastening her bra, unbuttoning her trousers, pulling them off – and then she was naked. It would take twenty seconds, maybe thirty.

There was nothing more deceptive in existence. Walking around, knowing that I was approximately thirty seconds away from all I ever wanted, separated only by a chasm, was driving me insane. Quite often I caught myself wishing we were still in the Stone Age, then all I would have needed to do was go out with a club, hit the nearest woman on the head, and drag her home and do whatever I wanted. But it was no good, there were no shortcuts, the thirty seconds were an illusion, as almost everything concerning women was an illusion. Oh, what a mockery that they were accessible to the eye but in no other way. That everywhere you turned there were women and girls. That everywhere you turned there were breasts under blouses, thighs and hips under trousers, beautiful smiling faces, hair blowing in the wind. Pendulous breasts, firm breasts, round breasts, bouncing breasts, white breasts, tanned breasts . . . a naked wrist, a naked elbow, a naked cheek, a naked eye looking around. A naked thigh in shorts or a short summer dress. A naked palm, a naked nose, a naked neck. I saw all this around me constantly, there were girls everywhere, the supply was infinite, a well, no, I was drifting in an ocean of women, I saw several hundred of them every day, all with their own individual ways of moving, standing, turning, walking, holding and twisting their heads, blinking, looking – take for example a feature such as their eyes, which expressed their utter uniqueness, everything that lived and breathed was here, was revealed, regardless of whether the gaze was meant for me or not. Oh, those sparkling eyes! Oh, those dark eyes! Oh, that glint of happiness! The alluring darkness! Or, for that matter, the unintelligent, stupid eyes! For in them too there was an appeal, and no small appeal either: the stupid vacant eyes, the open mouth in that perfect beautiful body.

All this was never far from my mind, and all of them were thirty seconds away from the only thing I wanted – but on the other side of a chasm.

I cursed this chasm. I cursed myself. But no matter how frustrating this was, no matter how depressing this became, women shone with undiminished radiance.

Then a chance presented itself.

Some weeks after the dismal Midsummer Night party I traveled with the soccer team to Denmark. The town we were going to was called Nykøbing, on the island of Mors in the Limfjord. We stayed in a kind of hostel, perhaps it was a boarding school, just outside the town, surrounded by large fields bordered by shady old deciduous trees. In the evenings some of us sneaked out, it wasn't allowed, but the town wasn't far away and as long as we didn't miss the training sessions a blind eye was turned, if indeed our absence was noticed at all. We bought cheap wine from the supermarkets, sat outside on the benches drinking, and went to the nearby discotheque. On the second evening I met a Danish girl, and we got together every day for the rest of the time we were there. She was sweet and lively and intense, we sat on the benches and made out, danced in the disco, one night we went for a walk in the park, and on the final evening I thought, now's the time, I wouldn't have another opportunity, it was tonight or never.

On our last night everyone was outdoors; we started with a barbecue on the beach, the group leaders had bought beer, and when that was gone we took a taxi to a big restaurant in a forest not so far from where we were staying. She was coming, she'd said, and she did too, greeted me in the same warm way she usually did, stretching up on her toes, giving me a kiss and grasping my hand. We sat down at a table, I was knocking back the wine to summon up the courage for what I was about to attempt. In the bar I confided my intentions to Jøgge and Bjørn, told them I was going to try to get her into our room and go all the way. They smiled, wished me luck. It was a wonderful evening, outside, the grayish-black clouds hung heavily over the green trees, inside, under the glittering chandeliers, people mingled, they drank and laughed and danced, there was a smell of sweat and perfume, cigarette smoke and alcohol, she sat at our table and talked to Harald, but kept looking in my direction and she lit up when she saw me coming with another bottle of wine in my hand. My stomach ached as I sat down next to her. She leaned forward, we kissed, I was about to pour wine in her glass, she held up a palm, she had to work the following day. She had a sudden idea: did I want to go back to her place? But we're leaving tomorrow, I said. No, she said, no, you're not. You're never going home, you're staying here with me. You can go to school here! Or find a job! What do you say to that? Fine, I said, that's what we'll do.

We laughed and a wave of anguish washed through me: soon we would be in my room, soon she would be standing close to me and whispering, convinced I knew what I was doing.

"Feel like going for a walk?" I said.

She nodded.

"What about the wine?" she said.

"We'll be back," I said, and got up. Put my hand on her shoulder and guided her out of the room. Turned and met the eyes of Jøgge and Bjørn, they gave me a thumbs-up and smiled. Then we were outside.

She looked up at me.

Where are we going?

Into the forest? I said. I took her tiny hand in mine and we set off. I had already kissed her breasts, on a bench I had put my head up her jumper and kissed everything I found, she had laughed and held me tight. This was what I did with girls, lay on top of them, made out with them, and kissed their breasts. Once I had pulled down a girl's panties and poked a finger inside, that was already two years ago now.

A shiver ran through me.

"What is it?" she said, wrapping an arm around me. "Are you cold?"

"A bit maybe," I said. "It's turned colder."

The big heavy clouds that had been drifting in and were now over the forest had cast a pall over the gathering darkness between the tree trunks. A gusty wind had picked up. Above us the top branches swayed.

Blood was pounding through me.

I swallowed.

"Would you like to see where we're staying?" I said.

"Yes, I'd love to."

The moment she said that I had an erection. It pressed hard against my trousers. I swallowed again.

In the dusk the light in the buildings where we were staying was a deep yellow. It hovered around the lamps in halos. I felt sick and my palms were damp with sweat. But I was going to do it.

I stopped and put my arms around her, we kissed, her tongue was smooth and small. My dick was throbbing so much it hurt.

"It's over there," I whispered. "Are you sure you want to go in with me?"

A bewildered flicker appeared in her eyes. But she said nothing apart from yes.

I took her hand again, squeezed it hard, and we walked quickly over the last two hundred meters. Hugged her again outside the unmanned reception area, almost suffocating with desire. Down the corridor to the room I shared with three others. Key out, into the lock with trembling hand, a twist, handle down, door open, and in we went.

"You back already, Karl Ove?" Jøgge said with a laugh.

"Have you brought a visitor with you?" Bjørn said.

"How nice!" Harald said. "Would you like a beer, Lisbeth?"

There was nothing I could say. They were my roommates and had just as much right to be there as me. Nor could I say that they had run back here as a cruel joke, or the cat would have been out of the bag, and although Lisbeth may well have guessed my plans, this was not the sort of thing that could be said out loud. Or at least not when the others were here, what would she think, that I was making fun of her?

"What the hell are you lot doing here?" I said.

Jøgge smiled. "What are you two doing here?"

I glared at him. He was doubled up with laughter on the bed.

Harald passed Lisbeth a beer. She took it and smiled at me.

"How funny that your friends came too," she said.

What? Did she mean that?

She looked around. "Anyone got a cigarette?"

"We're soccer players," Harald said. "Only Karl Ove smokes."

"Here," said Bjørn, tapping out a Prince Mild from his packet and passing it to her.

Such a wonderful opportunity as this would not come up again for several years. And they had ruined it out of pure devilry.

Lisbeth put her hand in my back pocket and moved close to me. My dick was like a crowbar again. I sighed.

"Have a beer, Karl Ove," Jøgge said. "Can't you take a joke?"

"Yeah," I said. "Very funny."

He writhed with laughter again.

We stayed there for half an hour. Lisbeth chatted with all of them. After we had finished the beer, we went back to the restaurant. Lisbeth left at one, the rest of us stayed until early morning. The next day I met her briefly, we exchanged addresses, and she started to cry. Not much, there were only a few tears running down her cheeks. I hugged her. Lisbeth, I said. We can meet in Løkken before very long. It's only a ferry trip away for me. Can you make it, do you think? Yes, she said, and smiled through the tears. I'll write to you so that we can organize the details, OK? Yes, she said. We kissed, and when I turned around she was standing there watching me.

The Løkken idea was nonsense of course, just something I had said to lighten the atmosphere. She was nothing to me, I was in love with Hanne and had been all winter and spring. Everything had been about her, all I wanted was to be close to her, not to sleep with her, not even in the hope of a kiss or a caress, no, that wasn't it, it was the light and the excitement I was filled with when I saw her that attracted me and which I occasionally thought was not of this world, it came down to us from another world. How else could it be explained? She was a normal girl, there had to be thousands of girls like her, but she alone, by being exactly the way she was, could make my heart tremble and my soul glow. Once that spring I had knelt down on the road before her and asked her to marry me. She was pushing a bicycle, it was dark and raining, we were walking up by the blocks of flats in Lund, and when I did it she just laughed. She thought I was playing the fool.

"Don't laugh," I said. "I mean it. In all seriousness. We can get married. We can move to a house on an island and stay there, just you and me. We can do that! No one can stop us if that's what we decide to do."

She laughed again, that wonderful trilled laugh of hers.

"Karl Ove!" she said. "We're only sixteen!"

I got up.

"I know you don't want to," I said. "But I mean it. Do you understand? You're the only girl I think about. You're the only girl I want to be with. Should I act as if this didn't exist?"

"But I'm going out with someone else. You know that very well!"

"Yes, I do," I said.

I didn't need reminding. She only went on these walks with me because she felt flattered and because I was so different from the other boys she knew. Any hope that one day I would be going out with her was gone, nevertheless I didn't give up, I never would. So, standing on the deck of the Danish ferry, with the wind blowing in my hair, squinting into the low afternoon sun, surrounded by blue sea on all sides, I was thinking about Hanne, not Lisbeth.

In fact, I wasn't going to go home when we arrived in Kristiansand, I was off to a class party in a cabin on an island, and Hanne would probably be there too. I had written a few letters to her over the summer, two of them from Sørbøvåg, where I walked along the river alone with my Walkman, without a soul in sight, thinking only of her, and where I got up in the night and went outside, under the starry sky, walked up the river valley to the waterfall, climbed up alongside to sit high on a plateau beneath the stars, and thought of her.

She had answered my letters with a postcard.

But after Lisbeth my confidence was high, and even the sight of the vast sea could not dent it, or the urges in me, which were so vast that I was driven outside at night and tears formed in my eyes at all the beauty that existed in the world, but I couldn't turn these urges to any use, nor could I sublimate them.

"Hi, Elk," Jøgge said behind me. "Would you like a last beer?"

I nodded, and he passed me a can of Tuborg and stood next to me.

I opened it, foam squirted over the shiny lid. I slurped it up. Then I tipped my head back and took a real swig.

"There's nothing like drinking for four days in a row!" I said.

He laughed in that strange manner of his, it was almost ingressive, which was so easy to imitate and indeed everyone did.

"She's really something, that Lisbeth," he said. "How did you catch her?"

"Catch? I've never caught a girl in my life," I said. "You're asking the wrong guy."

"You were making out for a week. She went back home with you. If that's not catching, I don't know what is."

"But that wasn't me! It was her! She just came up to me! Then she put her hand on my chest. Like this."

I placed my hand flat against his chest.

"Hey, stop that!" he shouted.

We laughed.

"I don't know," he said, looking at me. "Do you think I'll ever get a girl? Honestly?"

"*Ev*er? *Hon*estly?"

"Cut the crap. Do you think there's someone who will have me?"

Jøgge was the only person I knew who could ask questions like that and really mean them. He could be completely open. He was as kind as could be. But handsome? Maybe not many would call him that. Nor elegant. Robust, that was perhaps the word. Solid. A hundred percent reliable. Intelligent. A good person. A sense of humor. But he was no male model.

"There's got to be someone," I said. "You aim much too high. That's your problem. You want . . . well, who do you want?"

"Cindy Crawford," he said.

"Now you cut the crap," I said. "Come on. Which girls do you usually talk about?"

"Kristin. Inger. Merethe. Wenche. Therese."

I spread out my arms.

"There you are. The cream! You'll never get any of them! You've got to understand that!"

"But those are the ones I want," he said with his broadest grin.

"Same here," I said.

"Oh?" he said, turning his head toward me. "Thought it was just Hanne with you?"

"That's something else."

"What's that then?"

"Love."

"Oh my God," he said. "I think I'll join the others."

"I'll come with you."

They were playing cards around a table in the café, drinking Coke now, we were approaching land. I sat down with them. Harald, his protégé, Ekse, Helge, and Tor Erling were there. They didn't like me, I had no real relationship with any of them, except on occasions like this. I was tolerated, but no more than that. A sarcastic comment was never far away. It didn't matter though, I couldn't give a shit about them.

Jøgge was different. We had been in the same class for two years, discussed politics until smoke came out of our ears, he was a Fremskrittsparti man, a right-winger of all things, I was a Sosialistisk Venstreparti supporter, the left. He liked good music, strangely enough, out there in farming country, he was the only person I knew who had an ounce of good taste. He had lost his father when he was little, lived at home with his mother and younger brother, he had always had big responsibilities. Now and then people tried to tease him, he was an easy target, but he just laughed and so they gave up. The crowd we were sitting with used to bait him in a good-natured way and if he reacted they would just imitate his laugh, then he went quiet or laughed along with them.

Yes, he was a good man. He went to the business gymnas, as a couple of others on the team did, the rest went to the technical school, and I had written a few essays for him and been paid for it, he'd been concerned that they shouldn't be too good, the teachers would never swallow that. Once, when he had been in the danger zone, I'd written a poem for him to hand in and his teacher considered that way out of character for Jøgge. But he scraped through; he was asked to interpret this poem, which he managed to do and was awarded a passing grade.

I had been a little disappointed because I'd put my heart and soul into that poem and I'd had a top grade in mind. But this was the business gymnas, so what could you expect?

In town, in one of the cafés, I would have probably looked in a different direction if Jøgge had walked in, he was a different breed, the wrong breed, but he may have known that himself. At any rate, I never saw him in such surroundings.

"Hey, Casanova, want another beer?" he said now.

"Why not," I said. "But then who are you? Anti-Casanova?"

"My name is Bøhn, Jørgen Bøhn," he said, and laughed.

An hour and a half later I walked ashore in Kristiansand with my big seaman's kitbag over my shoulder. The others were going up to Tveit, I was going to a party with Bassen, who was waiting for me when I came out of customs.

"Hi," he said.

"Hi," I said.

"Have a good summer?"

"So-so. And you?"

"Good."

"Any women?" I said.

"Of course. A couple, I guess."

He laughed, and we headed for the bus station to catch a bus to the ferry quay. We had a kind of competition running that year, to see who could make out with the most girls in our class, we chatted about that as we sat drinking beer and waiting for Siv to come in her boat and pick us up. The approaching night was the last chance to change the score, which was heavily weighted in Bassen's favor: he had been with seven; me, only four.

Occasionally I wondered what school would be like in the autumn. He was going down the science route, I was doing social subjects, until now we had been in the same class, which meant it was natural to hang out together.

In one of the first lessons we'd sat next to each other, and after the homeroom teacher had handed out slips of paper for us to write down three personal qualities we had, Bassen had looked at my answer. Somber, torpid, and serious, I had written.

"Are you a complete idiot?" he had said. "You should add lacking in self-knowledge! I've never seen anything like it. Somber and torpid, you've got to be kidding! Who's put these ideas in your head?"

"So what did you write?"

He showed me.

Down to earth, honest, horny as hell.

"Throw that away. You can't write that!" Bassen said.

I did as I was told. Then on a new piece I wrote, intelligent, shy, but not really.

"That's better," he said. "Jesus! Somber and torpid!"

The first time I went to his house, late that autumn, I was filled with respect, I could hardly believe it, he was all I wanted to be, and even later, when we saw more of each other, that thought was never far away. Also now. His presence pervaded every part of me, I admired everything he did, I noticed every look he cast, even across the sea in boredom, and reflected on it.

Why did he want to meet me? I had nothing that was of any use to him.

When we were together I always left early so that he wouldn't discover how boring I really was. There was a kind of fever in me, two conflicting emotions, such as on the spring morning when we ditched school and went by moped back to his place and listened to records on the lawn. It was fantastic, yet I had to cut it short, something told me I wasn't worthy or couldn't fulfill his expectations. So I lay on his lawn with my eyes closed, like a cat on hot bricks, listening to Talk Talk, whom we had discovered at the same time. "It's your life," they sang, and everything should have been great, it was spring, I was sixteen years old, had ditched school for the first time, and was lying on the grass with my new friend. But it wasn't great, it was unbearable.

He probably thought I feared a reprimand for skipping school and that was why I got up to go. How could he have known that it was because it was much too good? Because I liked him too much.

Now we hadn't said anything for maybe five minutes.

I rolled a cigarette to fill the silence with a normal activity. He glanced at me. Took a packet of Prince Mild from his shirt pocket, poked a filter tip in his mouth.

"Got a light?" he said.

I passed him a yellow Bic lighter. He lit up and blew out a cloud of smoke, which hung in the air for a few seconds in front of him before dissolving.

"How's it going with your mom and dad?" he said, passing me the lighter. I took it, lit my rollie, crushed the empty can with my free hand and threw it down into the rocks by the water.

Dusk fell over the islands in front of us, heavy with the low-pressure system. The sea was calm and gray. The can clattered against the rocks below.

"It's going OK, I think," I said. "Dad's living in Tveit now with his new girlfriend. Mom's in Vestland. She'll be home in a few days."

"Is it still the two of you living up there?"

"Yes."

Around the headland came a boat. The person at the helm had long blond hair that shone against all the gray, and when we got up and lifted our rucksacks she waved and screamed something, which was reduced to a faint squeal across the hundred meters between us.

It was Siv.

We loaded our rucksacks on board, sat down, and ten minutes later we moored beneath her cabin.

"You're the last," she said. "So now finally we can eat."

Hanne was there. She was sitting at the table. Dressed in a white shirt and jeans. Her bangs had grown, I noticed.

She smiled, a touch embarrassed.

Probably caused by the letters I had sent.

We ate shrimp. I drank beer, and the intoxicating effect on me was greater and more deeply seated than I had ever experienced before, presumably because of all the drinking over the previous days. It affected not only my head and my thoughts, it started in the depths of my body and slowly spread, and I knew that the wave that was coming would be long lasting.

And so it was. We cleared the sitting room and danced as night fell over the archipelago, we went outside and swam in the darkness, gingerly I walked along the diving board, above me the sky was black, below me the sea was black, and when I dived it felt as if I would never reach the water, I fell and fell and fell and then suddenly I was enveloped by cold, salty water, I saw nothing, everything was black, but it was not dangerous, a few strokes and I broke the surface and could see the others standing on land like small, pale trees in the darkness.

Hanne was waiting for me with a towel, which she wrapped around my shoulders. We sat high up the mountainside. Some of the girls below were swimming naked.

"They're skinny-dipping," I said.

"I can see," Hanne said.

"Don't you want to join them?"

"Me? No! That's the last thing I would do."

Silence.

She looked at me.

"Would you like me to?"

"Yes."

"Thought so!" she said with a laugh. "What about you?"

"The water's so cold. It would disappear."

"It?" she said, and smiled at me.

"Yes," I said.

"You're a strange boy," she said.

There was another silence. I gazed at all the islets, a touch blacker than the sky above. A ribbon of light hung over the horizon. Surely day couldn't be coming already?

"It's great sitting here with you," I said. "I love you."

She shot me a rapid glance. "I'm not so sure about that."

"How can't you be? I don't think about anyone but you. When I was in Vestland – oh, by the way, it was fantastic, even though you weren't there – I was full of you, in a way. Absolutely drunk."

"You drink too much," she said. "Couldn't you be a bit more careful? For my sake?"

"Drunk with you," I said.

"I know that! But seriously. You don't have to drink so much, do you?"

"Happy clappy Christian? Intoxicated by Jesus?"

"No, don't make jokes. I am a bit worried about you. Is that a problem?"

"No."

We fell quiet. On the diving board there were two figures fighting. One was Bassen, I guessed.

Both fell in the water. Those watching on land screamed and clapped.

Somewhere in the distance a lighthouse flashed. Music blared out from an open door in the cabin behind us.

"Actually you know nothing about me," she said.

"I know enough."

"No, what you see is something else. It's not me you see."

"You're wrong there," I said. "You're actually wrong there."

We stared at each other. Then she smiled.

"Well, shall we join the others?" she said.

I sighed and got up. "For a bit more to drink, if nothing else," I said.

I held out my hand and pulled her up.

"You promised!" she said.

"I promised nothing. Hanne?" I said.

"Yes?"

"Can I hold your hand the short distance to the cabin?"

"Yes."

I put on my trousers and jacket and danced to "Don't You (Forget About Me)" by Simple Minds with Bassen while Hanne sat at the table chatting to Annette and watching us.

I stood next to her and poured vodka and juice into a glass.

"You're so sexy when you wear a jacket," she said.

"Do you think so too?" I said, looking at Annette.

"No," she said. "Of course I don't. Aren't you two going to kiss soon?"

"Not in this life by the look of things," I said.

"Perhaps in heaven then?" she said.

"But I don't believe in God," I said.

Hanne laughed, and I went over to Bassen, who was poring over the record collection.

"Find anything?"

"Well," he said. "There's some Sting. But I need some sleep. I'm off to England tomorrow. I don't want to miss the boat."

"You can sleep on the boat," I said. "You don't need to go to bed now."

He laughed. "Why not? You'll have a free hand when I'm out of the way."

"OK, you win. I didn't stand a chance."

He took out the inner sleeve and held it at an angle so the record slid out. With his thumb on the edge and his other fingers on the label in the center, he placed it on the turntable.

"How's it going with you and Hanne?" he said, swinging the pick-up arm to the first groove and lowering it with the little lever.

"It's not," I said.

"You looked pretty happy out there on your rock."

"That's as far as it goes," I said.

Then "If You Love Somebody Set Them Free" streamed out of the loudspeakers, and soon everyone inside was dancing.

We slept in the loft, I lay dozing till late in the morning and dragged out the time for as long as I could after that, I didn't want it to end, I wanted to be there, in the happiness I had felt, but then Siv had to take the last group back, and I jumped on board, sat quietly in the bow on the way across, found a seat to myself right at the back of the bus, pressed my forehead against the window and gazed out at the rolling Sørland countryside, which gradually became more and more urban until we reached the bus station and I got onto a bus that would take me home, to where Dad was living now with Unni.

I had caught this bus almost every day for three years, but it felt like a whole life. I knew every bend, indeed every tree on the route, and I was on such familiar terms with many of the people who got off or on that we nodded to one another even though we had never exchanged a word.

It had been good on the island. Perhaps I'd never had such a good time.

On the other hand, it was only a class party.

Then there was Hanne.

Each in our own sleeping bag, we had lain face-to-face, whispering for maybe an hour before we fell asleep. She had also tried to whisper when she was laughing, and when she did I had thought, I can die now, it won't matter.

"Can I give you a goodnight kiss?" I said as we were about to go to sleep.

"On the cheek!" she said.

I levered my way forward a few centimeters on my elbows, she half turned her cheek to me, I moved my head slowly toward it, changed direction at the last minute and gave her a juicy kiss on the mouth.

"You cheat!" she said with a laugh.

"Goodnight," I said.

"Goodnight," she said.

That was how it had been.

And surely it is impossible for that whole evening and night not to mean something?

She had to feel something for me.

She had to feel something.

She had said several times that she wasn't in love with me. She liked me, she said, very much even, but it was no more than that.

Now she was going to change schools and start at Vågsbygd Gymnas, where she lived.

At least that would release me from the torment of seeing her every day!

The bus indicated it was going to Kjevik, and at that moment a plane flying low thundered over us, touched down, and screamed along the runway at a speed that made it seem as if we were standing still.

Flashing lights, roaring engine. We were living in the future.

I might bump into her now and then in town, we could have lunch together, go to the cinema, I could take her swimming with me on Saturday mornings. Gradually she would realize she was in love with me. She would finish the other business, tell me with a glow in her eyes that now there was nothing to stop us anymore.

But then?

When we were together?

Visit each other in the evenings, kiss, and eat pizza? Go to the cinema with her friends?

That was not enough.

I wanted her. Not as part of a gymnas existence, a gymnas girlfriend, she meant more than that. I wanted to move in with her. Be with her day and night, share everything with her. Not in town, with everything that went on there constantly around us, but in the skerries or perhaps in the forest, no matter where, as long as it was a place where we could be completely alone.

Or in Oslo, a large town where no one knew us.

Then I could go shopping after returning from lectures because I would study, and make dinner for her, there in our own flat.

Then we could have a child.

The bus stopped in front of the tiny terminal building, and a man wearing a cap and carrying a little suitcase got on board, paid, and walked down the bus whistling as he went. He sat down in the seat in front of me.

I threw my arms in the air. The whole bus was empty! And he has to sit right there!

He smelled of sweet aftershave. His neck was covered in a scattering of thin hairs. His earlobes were fat and red. A farmer from Birkeland.

Child?

I didn't want one, I didn't want to work from nine to four, that was a trap I would steer clear of, but it was different with Hanne, that was about something else.

Jesus, no, of course we wouldn't get married, of course we wouldn't live in the skerries, of course we wouldn't have children!

I smiled. It had to be the wildest idea I'd ever had.

On the other side of the runway, across the road, was Jøgge's house. There was light in the windows, and I leaned forward to see if I could catch a glimpse of him. But, if I knew Jøgge, he would be lying on his waterbed listening to Peter Gabriel.

I woke up the next morning to the drone of a vacuum cleaner in the room underneath. I didn't move. The vacuuming stopped and other sounds became more prominent: the clink of bottles, the hum of the dishwasher, water running into a bucket. They had been having a party when I arrived. The last I had seen of them before sneaking up to my room the night before had been his contorted face and her laying a hand on his shoulder. That was the first time I had seen him drunk and the first time I had seen him cry. After a while the door was opened, footsteps crunched on the gravel outside, and then I heard their voices just under my window.

There was a bench with a table where Dad used to sit in the summer in that characteristic way of his, one leg crossed over the other, his back bent slightly forward, often holding a newspaper in his hands and a smoking cigarette between his fingers.

They laughed. Her voice was high-pitched, his deeper.

I got up and tiptoed over to the window.

The sky was a little misty, it softened a tone, but the sun shone and the air in the garden was perfectly still and quivered.

I opened the window.

And they were indeed sitting on the bench beneath, leaning against the wall with their eyes closed to the sun. Both tipped their heads back and looked up at me.

"Well, isn't that our Kaklove?" Dad said.

"Good morning, early bird!" Unni said.

"Good morning," I said, securing the window with the latch. I didn't like the way their voices seemed to embrace me, as though it was us three now. It wasn't true; it was the two of them and me.

But I liked the role of the rebellious teenager even less. The last thing in the world I wanted was to give them any reason at all to blame me for anything.

I ate a few slices of bread in the kitchen, carefully cleaned up afterward, brushed the crumbs on the plate and table into the trash bin under the sink, fetched the Walkman from my room, tied my shoes up, and went down to see them.

"I'm off for a walk," I said.

"You do that," Dad said. "Are you going to visit a buddy?"

He didn't know the name of a single one of my friends, not even Jan Vidar, whom I had been friends with for three years. But now he was sitting beside Unni and wanted to show that he was a good father who knew his son's habits.

"Yes, guess so," I said.

"Tomorrow I'll start moving my stuff down. It would be good if you were here. I might need some help carrying."

"Of course," I said. "OK, bye."

I wasn't going to a friend's. Jan Vidar was working at a bakery in town this summer, Bassen was on his way to England, Per was probably grafting at the floor factory, and what Jøgge was doing I had no idea, but it wasn't, and never had been, natural for me to get on my bike without a specific aim. I felt like being alone though, and I put on my headset, pressed play, and allowed myself to be engulfed in music as I walked downhill. The countryside lay serene before me, and the few clouds, above the ridges on the other side of the river valley, were motionless. I followed the road down, it was quiet too, because, apart from a farm a kilometer farther up, there was barely a house on this side for some distance. Only forest and water.

The green of the spruce needles shone brightly in the sunshine, it was almost black in the shadows, but there was something light about all the trees, it was the summer that did that, they weren't brooding or turned into themselves as in winter, no, they let the warm air filter through and stretched toward the sun, like everything else living.

I walked along the old forest path. Even though it was only a couple of hundred meters above our house I hadn't been there more than two or three times, and then only in winter, wearing skis. Nothing happened there, it was deserted and none of the kids up here gravitated toward that path: down at the bottom was where it all happened, that was where people lived.

If I had grown up here, I might have been familiar with every bush and rock, as I was with the countryside around our house in Tybakken. But I had lived here for only three years and no roots had developed, nothing meant anything, not really.

I turned off the music, pulled the headset down over my neck. Above me the air was so full of birdsong that it felt as if I could see it. Now and then there was a rustle in the undergrowth beside the path, that must have been birds too, I mused, but I didn't see any.

The path rose gently, in constant shadow from the high trees growing on both sides. At the top there was a small lake, I lay down on my back on the grass not far away and stared at the sky, listening to music, I played Remain in Light, and thought about Hanne.

I had to write another letter to her. It had to be so good that she wouldn't be able to think about anything else but me.

Dad didn't need much help from me with moving the following afternoon. He carried all the boxes himself, loaded them onto the big white rental van, and drove off to town, three trips was all it took; it was only when it came to the furniture that he needed a helping hand. With it aboard he slammed the doors shut and shot me a glance.

"Let's keep in touch," he said.

Then he laid a hand on my shoulder.

He had never done that before.

My eyes went moist and I looked down. He removed his hand, clambered up into the driver's seat, started the engine, and drove slowly downhill.

Did he like me?

Was that possible?

I wiped my eyes on my T-shirt sleeve.

That was that, I thought. I would never live with him again now. From the edge of the forest came the cat, his tail held high. He stopped by the door and looked at me with his yellow eyes.

"Do you want to go in, Mefisto?" I said. "Are you hungry too?"

He didn't answer, he rubbed his head against my leg as I went to open the door, darted in toward his dish, and stood there staring up at me.

I opened a new can, dumped a large pile in the dish, and went into the living room, where a faint trace of Unni's perfume hung in the air.

I opened the terrace door and stood on the step outside. Even if the sun no longer shone on the house, it was still warm out there.

Per came up the hill, walking with his bicycle at his side.

I went to the edge of the slope.

"Have you been working?" I shouted.

"By the sweat of my brow!" he shouted back. "Not like some people I know who sleep all day!"

"How much did you earn for your pension today?"

"More than you'll ever earn in the course of your whole life."

I watched him chuckling. He was the type that chuckled and had always been older than his years.

He raised a hand in salute, I did the same and then I went inside.

Two of the pictures on the living-room wall had gone. Half the records, I assumed, and half the books. All his papers, the desk and the office equipment. The sofa in front of the TV, the two Stressless leather chairs. Half of the kitchen utensils. And of course all his clothes.

But the house didn't seem to have been stripped.

In the room beside the hall the telephone rang. I hurried over.

"Hello, this is Karl Ove," I said.

"Hi, Yngve here. What's new?"

"Dad's just left with the last load. Mom will be here soon. So I'm on my own with the cat. Where are you?"

"I'm at Trond's still. I was thinking of coming over. Tomorrow actually, but if Dad's gone, I might come tonight."

"Could you? That would be great."

"I'll see. Arvid would have to drive me. He might have time. Anyway, maybe see you tonight then!"

"Fantastic!"

I cradled the phone and went to see what there was in the fridge.

When Mom drove up the hill an hour later, I had fried some sausages, onions, and potatoes, sliced some bread, put out the butter and set the table.

I went to meet her. She drove the car into the garage, got out, stretched up on her toes, grabbed the door, and closed it.

She was wearing white slacks, a rust-red sweater, and sandals. She smiled when she saw me. She seemed tired, but then she had been driving all day.

"Hi!" she said. "Are you alone?"

"Yes," I said.

"Did you have a nice time in Denmark?"

"Yes, great. And what about you? Did you have a nice time in Sørbøvåg?"

"Yes, I did."

I leaned forward and gave her a hug. Followed her into the kitchen.

"Have you made some food?!" she said.

I smiled.

"Take the weight off your feet. You've been driving all day. I'll put some water on for tea. I didn't know exactly when you would get here."

"No, of course. I should have called," she said. "Tell me then. How was it in Denmark?"

"It was really good. Some fantastic fields. We played a couple of games. And then we went out on the last night. But the best part was the class party. That was really great."

"Did you meet Hanne there?" she said.

"Yes. That was the great part."

She smiled. I smiled too.

Then the phone rang. I went in and answered it.

"Dad here."

"Hi," I said.

"Is Mom there now?"

"Yes. Do you want to talk to her?"

"No, what should I talk to her about? We were wondering if you would like to visit us on Monday. A little housewarming party."

"Love to. When?"

"Six. Have you heard anything from Yngve?"

"No, I think he's on Tromøya."

"Tell him he's invited too if you hear from him."

"OK, will do."

"Good. See you."

"See you."

I put down the phone. How could his voice be so cold now when he'd put his hand on my shoulder only a few hours ago?

I went into the kitchen, where Mom was pouring hot water into the teapot.

"That was Dad," I said.

"Oh?" she said.

"He invited me to dinner."

"That's nice, isn't it?"

I shrugged.

"Have you heard from him this summer?"

"No, only from his solicitor," she said, putting the teapot on the table and sitting down.

"What did the lawyer have to say?"

"Well . . . it's all about how to share the house. We can't agree, but it's nothing you have to worry about."

"Have to? I can worry about it if I want, can't I?" I said as I put the spatula in the pan and transferred some sausages, potatoes, and onions onto a plate.

"You don't have to take sides. I suppose that's what I mean," she said.

"I took sides years ago," I said. "When I was seven I took sides. So that's nothing new. Or a problem."

I stuck the fork into a bit of sausage that had curled up in the heat, put it to my mouth, and sank my teeth into it.

"But if things go the way it looks as if they're headed, we won't have much money in the future. That is, you'll get your payments from Dad of course. They're yours to dispose of as you like, I suppose. But as I've got to buy his share of this house, it's going to be tough economically for me."

"That doesn't matter," I said. "It's only money. That's not what life's about."

"True enough." She smiled. "That's a good attitude to have."

Yngve and Arvid arrived at about ten. Arvid just poked his head around the door to say hello before leaving again while Yngve dragged a suitcase and a big bag up to his room, which he had hardly used in the three years we'd lived there.

"You're not going tomorrow, are you?" I said when he came back down.

"Nope," he said. "The plane leaves the day after. Perhaps. I've got a standby ticket."

We went into the living room. I sat down in the wicker chair, Yngve sat beside Mom on the sofa. Outside, two bats flitted to and fro, disappearing completely in the darkness of the mountains across the river, then reappearing against the lighter sky. Yngve poured coffee from the Thermos.

"Well," he said. "I suppose it's debriefing time."

Throughout our childhood we three had sat chatting, that was what I was used to, but this was the first time we had done it without Dad living in the house, and the difference was immense. Knowing that he couldn't walk in at any moment, forcing us to think about what we were saying and doing, changed everything.

We had chatted about everything under the sun then too, but never so much as a word about Dad, it was a kind of implicit rule.

I had never thought about that before.

But we couldn't talk about him now, that would have been inconceivable.

Why?

Perhaps it was bound up with loyalty. Perhaps with a fear of being overheard. But irrespective of what had happened during the day and irrespective of how upset I was, I never talked to them about it. To Yngve on his own, yes, but not when the three of us were together.

Then it was as though a dam had burst. Everything suddenly flowed into the same channel, into the same valley, which was soon full of something that excluded everything else.

Yngve began to talk about himself, and it wasn't long before we were going through one incident after the other. Yngve told us about the time the B-Max supermarket opened and he was sent off with a shopping list and some money, under strict instructions to bring back a receipt. He had done that, but the sum in his hand hadn't tallied with the till receipt and Dad had marched him into the cellar and given him a beating. He told us about the time his bike had had a puncture and Dad had beaten him. I, for my part, had never been beaten; for some reason Dad had always treated Yngve worse. But I talked about the times he had slapped me and the times he had locked me in the cellar, and the point of these stories was always the same: his fury was always triggered by some petty detail, some utter triviality, and as such was actually comical. At any rate we laughed when we told the stories. Once I had left a pair of gloves on the bus and he slapped me in the face when he found out. I had leaned against the wobbly table in the hall and sent it flying and he came over and hit me. It was absolutely absurd! I lived in fear of him, I said, and Yngve said Dad controlled him and his thoughts, even now.

Mom said nothing. She sat listening, looking at me then Yngve. Sometimes her eyes seemed to go blank. She had heard about most of these incidents before, but now there was such a plethora of them she might well have been overwhelmed.

"He had such chaos inside him," she said at length. "More than I realized. I saw him angry of course. I didn't see him hitting you. He never did when I was around. And you didn't say anything. I tried to compensate for his bouts of anger. To give you something else . . ."

"Relax, Mom," I said. "We got through it. That was then, not now."

"We always talked a lot, didn't we," she said. "And he was manipulative. He was. Very. But he did also have some self-awareness. He made that clear to me. So I . . . well, I always saw it from his side, what happened. He said he had so little communication with you, and it was because I stood between you and him. And in a way that's true. You always turned to me. When he was there you left. I had a bad conscience about that."

"What happened happened, and it's fine," Yngve said. "But what I have a problem with is that when you moved here I was left to cope on my own. You didn't help me. I was seventeen years old, at gymnas, and had no money."

Mom took a deep breath.

"I know," she said. "I was loyal to him. I shouldn't have been. That was wrong of me. It was a big mistake."

"Come on," I said. "It's over, all of it. It's just us now."

Mom lit a cigarette. I looked at Yngve.

"What shall we do tomorrow then?"

He shrugged.

"What do you feel like doing?"

"Swimming maybe?"

"Or we could go to town? Check out some record shops and cafés?"

He turned to Mom. "Can I borrow your car?"

"Yes, you can."

Mom went to bed half an hour later. I knew all she was thinking about was what we had been saying and she would be lying awake and reflecting. I didn't want her to feel like this, to be so tormented by it, she didn't deserve that, but there was nothing I could do.

When we heard the creaks in the ceiling on the other side of the living room, Yngve looked at me.

"Coming out for a smoke?"

I nodded.

We walked quietly into the hall, put on shoes and jackets, and crept out to the opposite side of the house from where she was sleeping.

"When are you going to tell her you smoke?" I said, watching the flame from the lighter flicker across his face, the glow that came to life when the lighter died.

I heard him blowing out the smoke.

"When will you?"

"I'm sixteen. I'm not allowed to smoke. But you're twenty."

"All right, all right."

I was a little offended and walked a few steps into the garden. There was a heavy aroma coming from the big bush with white flowers at the end of the potato patch. What was it called again?

The sky was light, the forest beyond the river dark.

"Did you ever see Mom and Dad hug?" Yngve said.

I walked back to him.

"No," I said. "Not that I can remember. Did you?"

He nodded in front of me in the semidarkness.

"Once. It was in Hove, so I must have been five. Dad was yelling at Mom so much she burst into tears. She was standing in the kitchen crying. He went into the living room. Then he went back and put his arms around her and consoled her. That's the only time."

I started to cry. But it was dark, and not a sound came from me, so he didn't notice.

Before we left for town I went to find Mom. She was wandering around the garden with a pair of large gloves on, trimming the edges of the beds with shears.

"Could you give me some money?" I said. "I spent all I had in Denmark."

"I'll see what I've got," she said, and went indoors to get her bag. I followed.

"Is fifty OK?" she said, taking a green banknote from her purse.

"Have you got a hundred? I was thinking of buying a record or two."

She counted her coins.

"Ninety. That's all, I'm afraid."

"It'll have to do then," I said, went back to the car, which stood idling on the gravel drive, and got in beside Yngve, who was wearing his Ray-Bans.

"I'm going to buy myself a pair when I get the money," I said, pointing to the sunglasses.

He set off down the hill.

"Buy them when you get your first student loan," he said.

"That's two years away."

"You'll have to get a job then. Piling planks at Boen or whatever it is you do there."

"I was thinking of doing record reviews," I said. "And interviewing bands, that sort of thing."

"Oh?" he said. "That sounds like a good idea. Who for?"

"Nye Sørlandet."

We drove along the narrow road under the deciduous trees, past the old white houses, the river glinting beneath us. When we reached the waterfall and I saw some figures lying on the cliff beside it, I turned to him.

"Let's go swimming afterward. We can fit in both," I said.

"We could," he said. "At Hamresanden?"

"Ye-es."

"Do they sell ice cream there?"

"Of course they do. They may even have soft ice cream."

I took Yngve to Platebørsen, the record shop in the town's old børs, the stock exchange, a situation I relished, now I was the one who knew where everything was and what was good.

He held up a record. "Have you got this one?"

"No? What is it?"

"The Church. The Blurred Crusade. You've got to have this one."

"OK. I'll get it."

I also had enough money for a Nice Price record and bought the Talking Heads' 77. Yngve was going to wait until his student loan came through before he bought any records.

We sat down in the café outside the library and smoked and drank coffee. I hoped someone I knew would come by, so that Yngve wouldn't think I had no friends in town and because the ones I had would see me sitting with Yngve.

But there didn't seem to be anyone in town today.

"Where did Mom buy the records at Christmas?" Yngve said. "Do you remember?"

For Christmas Yngve had been given The The's debut album by Mom while I got Script of the Bridge by the Chameleons. I had never heard of the Chameleons, but they were absolutely fantastic. Yngve thought the same about The The. We couldn't figure out how she had managed this. There was hardly anyone here in town who followed the indie scene more closely than Yngve and me. Well, she said, she had gone into a record shop and then she had described first Yngve, then me, and the assistant had pulled out these two records.

I asked which shop it was, she told me, and over the Christmas period I popped in. Harald Hempel was behind the counter. So now I understood. He played with Lily and the Gigolos, and what he didn't know about good music wasn't worth knowing.

"It's in Dronningens Gate," I said. "Shall we head down there?"

"Do a little tour?"

As we drove away from the last shop I pointed to a building in the next block.

"That's Nye Sørlandet. The paper I was talking about."

Yngve glanced up as we passed. "Looks small," he said.

"Well, it's the second biggest newspaper here. Like Tiden in Arendal, more or less."

I cast an eye up and down Elvegaten, where Dad lived now, to see if I could see him. But I couldn't.

"What's better, do you think?" I said. "Writing an application or going to speak to them?"

"Going to speak to them."

"OK. I'll do that then."

"Have you heard that Simple Minds are coming, by the way? To Drammenshallen."

"Really?"

"Yes. It's not for a while yet, but the tickets are on sale soon. You should go and see them."

"OK. And you?"

"It's too far away and too expensive. But for you it's only a train ride."

"OK," I said, and leaned back in the seat. As we drove I tried to imagine what it would have been like here without a road, without the housing estates, as it must have been once. Untouched bays and coves, vast, perhaps impenetrable, forests. The beach at Hamresanden no more than a strip of sand along the riverbank and the sea inlet. No caravans, no tents, no cabins, no stalls, no people. No shops, no petrol stations, no houses, no chapel, nothing. Just forest, mountain, beach, sea.

It was an impossible image.

"Let's forget about Hamresanden," Yngve said. "Mom'll probably have dinner ready soon anyway."

"OK," I said. "I feel like listening to the Church record anyway."

I was never upset when people left, the way that Mom always was. Except when it was Yngve. And then I wasn't upset, there were no strong emotions at play, it was more a kind of melancholy.

So I didn't join Mom when she drove Yngve to Kjevik, instead I cycled down to see Jan Vidar and went with him to the river, where we swam and stayed for an hour. We paddled across the rapids, then we slid down over the smooth algae-slippery overhang into the current beneath, which it was impossible to fight, all you could do was let yourself be carried along, swim a couple of strokes, and steer patiently toward the bank.

Afterward we lay on a rock, our arms down by our sides, drying in the sun, our sneakers beside us, Jan Vidar's folded glasses in one of his.

On this particular day, Merethe and Gunn were there too. They lay on the bare rock in the middle of the rapids, both in bikinis. It excited us that they were there, our pulse rates shot up sky high, even though we were lying quite still. The effect was contrary to nature. At least that was how it felt to me.

Merethe was wearing a red bikini.

She was two years younger than we were, still in the eighth grade, about to start the ninth, but what did that matter?

I couldn't go out with her, but what did my body care about that?

Oh, how unbelievably frustrating it was to lie there ogling her. Seeing her thighs, which spread as she lay on the rock, seeing that little area between her thighs, the red material nestling against her, just there. And, oh yes, her breasts.

When we got up we hoped they would see us and perhaps be thinking the same as we were. But they were so blasé, so worldly wise, that not even we, Jan Vidar and Karl Ove, were good enough for them.

We climbed up the waterfall above them, swam into the current, were carried down into the rapids and into the broad deep river beyond.

They didn't bat an eyelid.

We were used to that though. We had spent three summers like that now. My insides ached and I presumed the same was true for Jan Vidar. At any rate, like me, he was squirming on the rock where we lay.

We could no longer tell each other that our chance would come because we didn't believe it would.

Why had they ruined my opportunity in Denmark?

What a dirty trick that had been. They had got so little out of it, an extra little laugh maybe, while what they had ruined for me meant everything.

I told Jan Vidar about it.

He laughed.

"You had it coming to you. How could you be so foolish as to tell Bjørn and Jøgge?"

"It was all planned," I said. "Absolutely everything! It was perfect! And then . . . nothing."

"Was she good-looking?"

"Yes, she was. Very good-looking."

"Better looking than Hanne?"

"No, no, no comparison. Like apples and pears."

"What?"

"It's impossible to compare Hanne with some Danish girl I want to fuck. Surely you can see that?"

"What are you going to do with Hanne?"

"Well, I'm not going to talk about her in this way for starters."

He smiled and closed his eyes.

The following afternoon I went to Dad's. I had put on a white shirt, black cotton trousers, and white basketball shoes. In order not to feel so utterly naked, as I did when I wore only a shirt, I took a jacket with me, slung it over my shoulder and held it by the hook since it was too hot outside to wear it.

I jumped off the bus after Lundsbroa Bridge and ambled along the drowsy, deserted summer street to the house he was renting, where I had stayed that winter.

He was in the back garden pouring lighter fluid over the charcoal in the grill when I arrived. Bare chest, blue swimming shorts, feet thrust into a pair of sloppy sneakers without laces. Again this getup was unlike him.

"Hi," he said.

"Hi," I said.

"Have a seat."

He nodded to the bench by the wall.

The kitchen window was open, from inside came the clattering of glasses and crockery.

"Unni's busy inside," he said. "She'll be here soon."

His eyes were glassy.

He stepped toward me, grabbed the lighter from the table, and lit the charcoal. A low almost transparent flame, blue at the bottom, rose in the grill. It didn't appear to have any contact with the charcoal at all, it seemed to be floating above it.

"Heard anything from Yngve?"

"Yes," I said. "He dropped by briefly before leaving for Bergen."

"He didn't come by," Dad said.

"He said he was going to, see how you were doing, but he didn't have time."

Dad stared into the flames, which were lower already. Turned and came toward me, sat down on a camping chair. Produced a glass and bottle of red wine from nowhere. They must have been on the ground beside him.

"I've been relaxing with a drop of wine today," he said. "It's summer after all, you know."

"Yes," I said.

"Your mother didn't like that," he said.

"Oh?" I said.

"No, no, no," he said. "That wasn't good."

"No," I said.

"Yeah," he said, emptying the glass in one swig.

"Gunnar's been round, snooping," he said. "Afterward he goes straight to Grandma and Grandad and tells them what he's seen."

"I'm sure he just came to visit you," I said.

Dad didn't answer. He refilled his glass.

"Are you coming, Unni?" he shouted. "We've got my son here!"

"OK, coming," we heard from inside.

"No, he was snooping," he repeated. "Then he ingratiates himself with your grandparents."

He stared into the middle distance with the glass resting in his hand.

Turned his head to me.

"Would you like something to drink? A Coke? I think we've got some in the fridge. Go and ask Unni."

I stood up, glad to get away.

Gunnar was a sensible, fair man, decent and proper in all ways, he always had been, of that there was no doubt. So where had Dad's sudden backbiting come from?

After all the light in the garden, at first I couldn't see my hand in front of my face in the kitchen. Unni put down the scrub brush when I went in, came over and gave me a hug.

"Good to see you, Karl Ove." She smiled.

I smiled back. She was a warm person. The times I had met her she had been happy, almost flushed with happiness. And she had treated me like an adult. She seemed to want to be close to me. Which I both liked and disliked.

"Same here," I said. "Dad said there was some Coke in the fridge."

I opened the fridge door and took out a bottle. Unni wiped a glass dry and passed it to me.

"Your father's a fine man," she said. "But you know that, don't you?"

I didn't answer, just smiled, and when I was sure that my silence hadn't been perceived as a denial, I went back out.

Dad was still sitting there.

"What did Mom say?" he asked into the middle distance once again.

"About what?" I said, sat down, unscrewed the top, and filled the glass so full that I had to hold it away from my body and let it froth over the flagstones.

He didn't even notice!

"Well, about the divorce," he said.

"Nothing in particular," I said.

"I suppose I'm the monster," he said. "Do you sit around talking about it?"

"No, not at all. Cross my heart."

There was a silence.

Over the white timber fence you could see sections of the river, greenish in the bright sunlight, and the roofs of the houses on the other side. There were trees everywhere, these beautiful green creations that you never really paid much attention to, just walked past; you registered them but they made no great impression on you in the way that dogs or cats did, but they were actually, if you lent the matter some thought, present in a far more breathtaking and sweeping way.

The flames in the grill had disappeared entirely. Some of the charcoal briquettes glowed orange, some had been transformed into grayish-white puffballs, some were as black as before. I wondered if I could light up. I had a packet of cigarettes inside my jacket. It had been all right at their party. But that was not the same as it being permitted now.

Dad drank. Patted the thick hair at the side of his head. Poured wine into his glass, not enough to fill it, the bottle was empty. He held it in the air and studied the label. Then he stood up and went indoors.

I would be as good to him as I could possibly be, I decided. Regardless of what he did, I would be a good son.

This decision came at the same time as a gust of wind blew in from the sea, and in some strange way the two phenomena became connected inside me, there was something fresh about it, a relief after a long day of passivity.

He returned, knocked back the dregs in his glass and recharged it.

"I'm doing fine now, Karl Ove," he said as he sat down. "We're having such a good time together."

"I can see you are," I said.

"Yes," he said, oblivious to me.

Dad grilled some steaks, which he carried into the living room, where Unni had set the table: a white cloth, shiny new plates and glasses. Why we didn't sit outside I didn't know, but I assumed it was something to do with the neighbors. Dad had never liked being seen and definitely not in such an intimate situation as eating was for him.

He absented himself for a few minutes and returned wearing the white shirt with frills he had worn at their party, with black trousers.

While we had been sitting outside Unni had boiled some broccoli and baked some potatoes in the oven. Dad poured red wine into my glass, I could have one with the meal, he said, but no more than that.

I praised the food. The barbecue flavor was particularly good when you had meat as good as this.

"Skål," Dad said. "Skål to Unni!"

We held up our glasses and looked at each other.

"And to Karl Ove," she said.

"We may as well toast me too then." Dad laughed.

This was the first relaxed moment, and a warmth spread through me. There was a sudden glint in Dad's eye and I ate faster out of sheer elation.

"We have such a cozy time, the two of us do," Dad said, placing a hand on Unni's shoulder. She laughed.

Before he would never have used an expression such as cozy.

I studied my glass, it was empty. I hesitated, caught myself hesitating, put the little spoon into a potato to hide my nerves and then stretched casually across the table for the bottle.

Dad didn't notice, I finished the glass quickly and poured myself another. He rolled a cigarette, and Unni rolled a cigarette. They sat back in their chairs.

"We need another bottle," he said, and went into the kitchen. When he returned he put his arm around her.

I fetched the cigarettes from my jacket, sat down and lit up.

Dad didn't notice that either.

He got up again and went to the bathroom. His gait was unsteady. Unni smiled at me.

"I teach my first course at gymnas in Norwegian this autumn," she said. "Perhaps you can give me a few tips? It's my first time."

"Yes, of course."

She smiled and looked me in the eye. I lowered my gaze and took another swig of the wine.

"Because you're interested in literature, aren't you?" she continued.

"Sort of," I said. "Among other things."

"I am too," she said. "And I've never read as much as when I was your age."

"Mm."

"I plowed through everything in sight. It was a kind of existential search, I think. Which was at its most intense then."

"Mm."

"You've found each other, I can see," Dad said behind me. "That's good. You have to get to know Unni, Karl Ove. She's such a wonderful person. She laughs all the time. Don't you, Unni?"

"Not all the time." She laughed.

Dad sat down, sipped from his glass and as he did so his eyes were as vacant as an animal's.

He leaned forward.

"I haven't always been a good father to you, Karl Ove. I know that's what you think."

"No, I don't."

"Now, now, no stupidities. We don't need to pretend any longer. You think I haven't always been a good father. And you're right. I've done a lot of things wrong. But you should know that I've always done the very best I could. I have!"

I looked down. This last he said with an imploring tone to his voice.

"When you were born, Karl Ove, there was a problem with one of your legs. Did you know that?"

"Vaguely," I said.

"I ran up to the hospital that day. And then I saw it. One leg was crooked! So it was put in plaster, you know. You lay there, so small, with plaster all the way up your leg. And when it was removed I massaged you. Many times every day for several months. We had to so that you would be able to walk. I massaged your leg, Karl Ove. We lived in Oslo then, you know."

Tears coursed down his cheeks. I glanced quickly at Unni, she watched him and squeezed his hand.

"We had no money either," he said. "We had to go out and pick berries, and I had to go fishing to make ends meet. Can you remember that? You think about that when you think about how we were. I did my best, you mustn't believe anything else."

"I don't," I said. "A lot happened, but it doesn't matter anymore."

His head shot up.

"YES, IT DOES!" he said. "Don't say that!"

Then he noticed the cigarette between his fingers. Took the lighter from the table, lit it, and sat back.

"But now we're having a cozy time anyway," he said.

"Yes," I said. "It was a wonderful meal."

"Unni's got a son as well, you know," Dad said. "He's almost as old as you."

"Let's not talk about him now," Unni said. "We've got Karl Ove here."

"But I'm sure Karl Ove would like to hear," Dad said. "They'll be like brothers. Won't they. Don't you agree, Karl Ove?"

I nodded.

"He's a fine young man. I met him here a week ago," he said.

I filled my glass as inconspicuously as I could.

The telephone in the living room rang. Dad got up to answer it.

"Whoops!" he said, almost losing his balance, and then to the phone, "Yes, yes, I'm coming."

He lifted the receiver.

"Hi, Arne!" he said.

He spoke loudly, I could have listened to every word if I'd wanted to.

"He's been under enormous strain recently," Unni whispered. "He needs to let off some steam."

"I see," I said.

"It's a shame Yngve couldn't come," she said.

Yngve?

"He had to go back to Bergen," I said.

"Yes, my dear friend, I'm sure you understand!" Dad said.

"Who's Arne?" I said.

"A relative of mine," she said. "We met them in the summer. They're so nice. You're bound to meet them."

"OK," I said.

Dad came back in and saw the bottle was nearly empty.

"Let's have a little brandy, shall we?" he said. "A digestif?"

"You don't drink brandy, do you?" Unni asked, looking at me.

"No, the boy can't have spirits," Dad said.

"I've had brandy before," I said. "In the summer. At soccer training camp."

Dad eyed me. "Does Mom know?" he said.

"Mom?" Unni said.

"You can have one glass, but no more," Dad said, staring straight at Unni. "Is that all right?"

"Yes, it is," she said.

He fetched the brandy and a glass, poured, and leaned back into the deep white sofa under the windows facing the road, where the dusk now hung like a veil over the white walls of the houses opposite.

Unni put her arm around him and one hand on his chest. Dad smiled.

"See how lucky I am, Karl Ove," he said.

"Yes," I said, and shuddered as the brandy met my tongue. My shoulders trembled.

"But she has a temper too, you know," he said. "Isn't that true?"

"Certainly is," she said with a smile.

"Once she threw the alarm clock against this wall," he said.

"I like to get things off my chest right away," Unni said.

"Not like your mother," he said.

"Do you have to talk about her the whole time?" Unni said.

"No, no, no, not at all," Dad said. "Don't be so touchy. After all, I had him with her," he said, nodding toward me. "This is my son. We have to be able to talk as well."

"OK," Unni said. "You just talk. I'm going to bed." She got up.

"But Unni . . ." Dad said.

She went into the next room. He stood up and slowly followed her without a further look.

I heard their voices, muted and angry. Finished the brandy, refilled my glass, and carefully put the bottle back in exactly the same place.

Oh dear.

He yelled.

Immediately afterward he returned.

"When does the last bus go, did you say?" he said.

"Ten past eleven," I said.

"It's almost that now," he said. "Perhaps it's best if you go now. You don't want to miss it."

"OK," I said, and got up. Had to place one foot well apart from the other so as not to sway. I smiled. "Thanks for everything."

"Let's keep in touch," he said. "Even though we don't live together anymore nothing must change between us. That's important."

"Yes," I said.

"Do you understand?"

"Yes. It's important we keep in touch," I said.

"You're not being flippant with me, are you?" he said.

"No, no, of course not," I said. "It's important now that you're divorced."

"Yes," he said. "I'll ring. Just drop by when you're in town. All right?"

"Yes," I said.

While putting on my shoes I almost toppled over and had to hold on to the wall. Dad sat on the sofa drinking and noticed nothing.

"Bye!" I shouted as I opened the door.

"Bye, Karl Ove," Dad called from inside, and then I went out into the darkness and headed for the bus stop.

I waited for about a quarter of an hour until the bus arrived, sitting on a step smoking and watching the stars, thinking about Hanne.

I could see her face in front of me.

She was laughing; her eyes were gleaming.

I could hear her laughter.

She was almost always laughing. And when she wasn't, laughter bubbled in her voice.

Brilliant! she would say when something was absurd or comical.

I thought about what she was like when she turned serious. Then it was as if she was on my home ground, and I felt I was an enormous black cloud wrapped around her, always greater than her. But only when she was serious, not otherwise.

When I was with Hanne I laughed almost all the time.

Her little nose!

She was more girl than woman in the same way that I was more boy than man. I used to say she was like a cat. And it was true there was something feline about her, in her movements, but also a kind of softness that wanted to be close to you.

I could hear her laughter, and I smoked and peered up at the stars. Then I heard the deep growl of the bus approaching between the houses, flicked the cigarette into the road, stood up, counted the coins in my pocket, and handed them to the driver when I stepped on board.

Oh, the muted lights in buses at night and the muted sounds. The few passengers, all in their own worlds. The countryside gliding past in the darkness. The drone of the engine. Sitting there and thinking about the best that you know, that which is dearest to your heart, wanting only to be there, out of this world, in transit from one place to another, isn't it only then you are really present in this world? Isn't it only then you really experience the world?

Oh, this is the song about the young man who loves a young woman. Has he the right to use such a word as "love"? He knows nothing about life, he knows nothing about her, he knows nothing about himself. All he knows is that he has never felt anything with such force and clarity before. Everything hurts, but nothing is as good. Oh, this is the song about being sixteen years old and sitting on a bus and thinking about her, the one, not knowing that feelings will slowly, slowly, weaken and fade, that life, that which is now so vast and so all-embracing, will inexorably dwindle and shrink until it is a manageable entity that doesn't hurt so much, but nor is it as good.

Only a forty-year-old man could have written that. I am forty now, as old as my father was then, I'm sitting in our flat in Malmö, my family is asleep in the rooms around me. Linda and Vanja in our bedroom, Heidi and John in the children's room, Ingrid, the children's grandmother, on a bed in the living room. It is November 25, 2009. The mid-'80s are as far away as the '50s were then. But most of the people in this story are still out there. Hanne is out there, Jan Vidar is out there, Jøgge is out there. My mother and my brother, Yngve – he spoke to me on the phone two hours ago, about a trip we are planning to Corsica in the summer, he with his children, Linda and I with ours – they are out there. But Dad is dead, his parents are dead.

Among the items Dad left behind were three notebooks and one diary. For three years he wrote down the names of everyone he met during the day, everyone he phoned, all the times he slept with Unni, and how much he drank. Now and then there was a brief report, mostly there wasn't.

"K.O. visited" appeared often.

That was me.

Sometimes it said "K.O. cheerful" after I had been there.

Sometimes "good conversation."

Sometimes "decent atmosphere."

Sometimes nothing.

I understand why he noted down the names of everyone he met and spoke to in the course of a day, why he registered all the quarrels and all the reconciliations, but I don't understand why he documented how much he drank. It is as if he was logging his own demise.

Starting school again after the holidays was like being sent back to Go: it turned out that everything was as it had been when I started gymnas the previous year. The class was new, the pupils and teachers unknown. The sole difference was that there had been twenty-six girls in the sophomore class while there were only twenty-four in the junior class.

I sat on the same seat, in the left-hand corner at the back, seen from the front, and I behaved in the same way: spoke up during lessons, discussed what teachers said, got into fights with other pupils over political or religious issues. When the breaks came everyone in the class joined the crowd they belonged to or the friends they had from before, and I invested all the physical and mental strength I possessed into avoiding the humiliation it was to be left standing somewhere on your own.

I went up to the library and read books such as The Falcoln Tower by the twenty-year-old writer Erik Fosnes Hansen, only four years to go until I am twenty, I thought, perhaps my name will be on the front of a book then? I sat in the classroom on my chair pretending I was doing homework. I walked up to the gas station opposite the school premises and bought something, anything, more often than not an Oslo newspaper because I couldn't read it with others around and so that was a plausible reason for sitting alone in the canteen during the endlessly long lunch break. Or I acted as if I was searching for someone. Up and down the stairs, through the long corridors, sometimes to Gimlehallen or over to the business school, in pursuit of a fictional person whom I searched for high and low. But usually I stood smoking by the entrance, because that act by its very nature determined where I should be, where I was entitled to be, where there were also others, my "friends" to those who wondered.

My fear of being seen as friendless was not without some justification. One day there was a new note on the notice board. A student who had recently moved to the town and didn't know anyone at the school wanted someone to be friends with, if anyone was interested they could meet him by the flagpole at twelve the next day.

The area around the flagpole at twelve the next day was packed with pupils. Everyone wanted to observe this friendless creature, who naturally enough didn't show up.

Had it been a hoax? Or had this friendless creature got cold feet when he saw the crowd?

I suffered with him, whoever he was.

One day I went to Nye Sørlandet and asked to speak to the person responsible for the newspaper's music section. I was shown into the office of someone called Steinar Vindsland. He was young with dark, big hair that was cut short at the back and on the sides, much in the style of the bass player in Simple Minds, and had a bristly chin and a gleam in his eye. I said who I was and what I wanted.

"Well, we don't have a regular record reviewer," he said. "I usually do the reviews, but I've got so many other jobs to do it would be great if someone else could do that."

He studied me.

I had dressed for the occasion, put on my black and white checked shirt, which was like the one The Edge wore, studded belt, and black trousers.

"So who do you like?"

I told him, and he nodded.

"We'll give you a spin. Look," he said, rummaging through the piles of records spread across the desk. "Take these with you and write about them. If it's good, you're our new record reviewer."

I sat down and wrote all weekend, draft after draft, and when Monday came round I walked down to the newspaper after school and delivered six handwritten pages. He read them standing up in his office, at a disconcertingly fast tempo. Then he fixed me with his gaze.

"I'm looking at our new record reviewer," he said.

"Did you like it?"

"It's good. Have you got a few minutes?"

"Yes."

"I'll take a few shots of you and do a little profile. Ask you a couple of questions. Are you at Katedralskolen?"

I nodded. He grabbed a camera from the table, lifted it to his face, and pointed it at me.

"Sit down there," he said, indicating the corner of the room.

My spine ran cold as I heard the clicks of the camera.

"Here," he said. "Grab these records and hold them up facing me."

He passed me three LPs and I held them up while staring into the lens with as serious an expression as I could muster.

"You like U2, you said. Who else?"

"Big Country. Simple Minds. David Bowie. And Iggy, of course. Talking Heads. R.E.M.'s Chronic Town, have you heard it? Fucking great."

"Oh yeah. Do you have a mission statement?"

I could feel my cheeks burning.

"Nooo," I said.

"Any particular axes to grind? Musically speaking? The gigs we get in town? Music programs on NRK? Any views on that?"

"Yes, well, it's shocking that there's only one good music program on the radio and nothing on TV."

"Great!" he said. "You're still sixteen, right?"

"Yes."

"That's it then. We'll run it tomorrow. You start next week. Is that all right?"

"Yes."

"Pop in on . . . say Thursday and we can discuss the nitty-gritty."

He shook my hand.

"And by the way," he said on the way out.

"Yes," I said.

"You can't write in longhand. That won't work. If you don't have a typewriter, get one!"

"OK," I said. "Thank you."

Then I was outside on the street.

It was too good to be true. I was the record reviewer for a newspaper! Sixteen years old!

I lit a cigarette and set off. The dry asphalt, the windows darkened in places with exhaust fumes, all the cars made me think I was in a city. I was a music journalist on my way through the streets of London. Coming hotfoot from a hectic editorial office.

Steinar Vindsland had been exactly as I had imagined a journalist to be. Unbelievably fast. Everything happened fast. They had deadlines, that was why they had to nail their articles at breakneck speed.

And he knew about music. Probably knew Harald Hempel. Maybe some of the bands in Oslo.

Now I could meet them!

I hadn't even thought about that. But now that I was a music reviewer I could hang out with the bands when they came to town.

No joke!

Fifteen meters in front of me was the crossroads between Dronningens Gate and Elvegaten. Since I was in the area I ought to go and see either Dad or Grandma and Grandad.

There was just one problem: I didn't have more than seven kroner on me and after five o'clock my student card was no longer valid on the bus.

But I ought to be able to borrow what I needed. After all, I had a job now.

I stopped by the traffic lights, which were red, pressed the button on the blue box and closed my eyes to get an impression of what it would be like for a blind person to be standing here.

Perhaps it was more important to visit Grandma and Grandad? I hadn't been to see them since Dad moved out. Perhaps now that Dad was divorced they were afraid they might lose contact with me or that I might stick with Mom.

I could see Dad on Tuesday after the meeting with Steinar.

Steinar!

At that moment the ticking started. The signal for the blind. I opened my eyes and walked over the pedestrian crossing, past the large square building with the supermarket and onto Lundsbroa Bridge, where the smell of sea was always stronger and the light also seemed stronger, probably because it reflected off the water, which widened out at this point.

A couple of white sails were visible in the distance. A double-ender was on its way in. I stopped, placed my hands on the brick parapet and leaned over. The water around the columns was a deep green.

Once Dad had fallen in here. This was about the only story he had told us about his childhood. He had been given a sound beating by Grandad, he had said, and had been put under the stairs, where he stayed for several hours.

Whether that was true or not, I didn't know. Dad had also said he had once been a promising soccer player and played for IK Start, which turned out to be a lie. Another time he had said that everything the Beatles did was plagiarism, they had stolen the songs from an unknown German composer and when I, twelve years old and a big Beatles fan, asked him how he knew, he said he had played the piano when he was young, and one day he had played some tunes by this German composer, whose name he couldn't remember, and discovered they were the same as the Beatles' songs. He still had the music at home. I believed him, of course; it was Dad who had told me. The next time we go there, could you find the sheets of music and play them on the piano? I had asked. No, they were stored away in the loft, it would take too long to find them. And then the realization dawned on me! He was lying! Dad was lying!

This insight was a relief, not a burden, because it was a face-saver for the Beatles.

I kept walking, took the shortcut to the right, came out in Kuholmsveien and walked up the gentle slope, from there I saw the sea widen out, so desolate and blue.

But why had he said we were so poor?

What did that have to do with anything?

I shook my head and passed a garden surrounded by wire fencing, inside which there were three trees groaning with dark red apples. A blue station wagon parked in the adjacent drive glinted in the sunlight.

Grandma poked her head out the window when I rang the bell, disappeared and reappeared a minute later at the door.

"Well, look who it is," she said. "Come in!"

I leaned forward and gave her a hug. She stiffened slightly. I was too old for this now, I thought, and straightened up.

She had the same fragrance as always, and it was as though the whole of my childhood opened inside me as I smelled it. We were going to Grandma's! Grandma's coming! Grandma's here!

"What's that in your ear?" she said.

I had forgotten it!

The two previous times I had been here I had taken the cross out. But not today.

"It's just a cross," I said.

"Yes, times are changing," she said. "Boys wearing jewelery in their ears! But that's how it is nowadays."

"Yes, it is," I said.

She turned and I followed her up the stairs. Grandad was sitting where he always did, in the kitchen chair.

"Well, look who it is," he said.

Under the clock on the wall I saw the tall blue step chair I had always loved, and on the table the coffeepot on the small wire stand that had always been here as well.

"Got your ear pierced?" he said.

"Yes, that's what's in nowadays," Grandma said. She smiled and shook her head. Came over and ruffled my hair.

"I got myself a job today," I said.

"Did you now?" Grandma said.

I nodded.

"At Nye Sørlandet, the newspaper. As a record reviewer."

"Do you know anything about music?" Grandad said.

"A little," I said.

"How time flies," he said then. "You're so big now."

"He goes to the gymnas," Grandma said. "He's probably got a girlfriend too, don't you think?" She winked at me.

"No, I'm afraid I haven't," I said.

"You will," she said. "Good-looking fellow like you."

"If you take that cross out of your ear," Grandad said, "the girls'll come running."

"You don't think it's the cross they want then?" Grandma said.

Grandad didn't answer, he picked up the newspaper that he had put down when I arrived. He could spend hours reading it. He absorbed absolutely everything, every little ad.

Grandma sat in the chair and reached for the pouch of menthol tobacco on the table.

"But you haven't started smoking yet, I bet!" she said.

"In fact, I have," I said.

She scrutinized me.

"You have?"

"Not much. But I have tried."

"You didn't inhale though?"

"No."

"Because you mustn't inhale, you know."

She looked at Grandad.

"Hey, Grandad!" she said. "Do you remember who got us started?"

He didn't answer, she licked the edge of the paper and shaped the cigarette.

"It was your father," she said.

"Dad?"

"Yes, we were in our mountain cabin. He had brought some cigarettes along. And he told us to try one. So we did. Didn't we, Grandad?"

When she didn't get an answer this time either, she winked at me.

"He's getting senile, I think," she said, put the cigarette between her lips, lit up and then blew a huge cloud of smoke out through her mouth.

No, she didn't inhale. I had never thought about that before.

She looked at me.

"Are you hungry? We ate a little while ago, but if you like I can heat something up for you?"

"Oh, please," I said. "Actually I'm ravenous."

She placed the cigarette on the edge of the ashtray, got up and shuffled over to the fridge in her slippers. She was wearing a blue dress, it went down to her midcalves, which were light brown under her tights.

"If it's in the fridge, you don't need to warm it up," I said.

"Don't worry. It's no trouble," she said.

She began to clatter around. I watched Grandad. He was interested in politics and soccer. I was too.

"Who do you think will win the elections?" I said.

"Eh?" he said, lowering the newspaper.

"Who do you think will win the elections?"

"Hard to say. But I'm hoping it will be Willoch. We can't take much more socialism in this country, that's for sure."

"I'm hoping it'll be Kvanmo," I said.

He studied me. With a stern, solemn expression. No, no, that wasn't how it was, because the next moment he smiled.

"You're like your mother there," he said.

"Yes," I said. "I don't want money to control people's lives. Or us to be focused only on ourselves in our own backyards."

"Who should we focus on if not ourselves?" he said.

"People in wretched situations. The poor. Refugees."

"But why should they come here and be maintained by us? You explain that to me," he said.

"Don't listen to him," Grandma said to me, and put a pot on the stove. "He's just teasing you."

"But we have to help those who are less well off, don't we?" I said.

"Yes," he said. "But we have to look after our own first. Then we can help the others. But what they want is to live here. Help is not what they want. We've slogged our guts out and we've done well, and now they want to take over. Without lifting a finger. Why should we allow that?"

Grandma sat down on her chair.

"Why did the man from the laboratory refuse to enter the labyrinth?" she said.

"I don't know," I said, although I knew what was coming.

"Because it was too laborious!" she said, and laughed.

Grandad picked up the newspaper again.

There was a silence. The pot crackled on the hotplate. Grandma lit another cigarette, placed one hand on her other arm and whistled softly to herself.

Grandad turned over a page.

I had exhausted all my conversational topics. We had spent less time on my new job than I had anticipated.

Did I dare take out the cigarettes from my jacket pocket?

Would the cross plus smoking be too much for them? I wondered.

An image of Dad entered my head. Perhaps smoking had been the link, my having smoked twice in his presence without him saying a word.

If it was fine by him, it should definitely be fine by them, shouldn't it?

I took out the packet.

Grandma eyed me.

"Have you got your own cigarettes?" she said.

I nodded. I didn't want to use her lighter, somehow that would be too intimate, or too obtrusive, so I put my hand back into my pocket and took out my own. I lit up.

"I was at Dad's a few days ago," I said. "Things are going well for him."

"Yes, he dropped by yesterday," Grandma said.

"We're trying to maintain the amount of contact we had, even if we live separately," I said. "I think he must have been under a lot of pressure this summer, with the divorce and everything."

"Do you think so?" Grandma said, looking at me as she blew out smoke.

"Ye-es," I said. "They were married a long time. Getting separated is no laughing matter."

"No, it certainly isn't," Grandma said.

"I'll try to keep in touch with you as well," I said. "It's easy enough for me to come by after school. And now that I've got a job I can have dinner here every so often."

Grandma smiled at me. Then she turned, glanced at the pot, which was making some muffled gurgling noises, got up and moved it to the side, switched off the burner, fetched a plate and cutlery, which she placed in front of me on the table.

I stubbed out my half-smoked cigarette in the ashtray. She lifted the pot, held it by one handle, dipped the ladle inside, and served three meatballs, two potatoes, and some onions onto my plate.

"I did it the easy way and heated the potatoes in the sauce," she said.

"Looks fantastic," I said.

No one talked while I ate. I was soon finished.

"Thank you!" I said when I had eaten everything and placed the knife and fork on my plate. "That was fantastic!"

"Good," Grandma said, got up and carried the plate to the sink, rinsed it, opened the dishwasher lid, pulled out the little basket with the tiny fishbone-like plastic spikes, slotted the plate in, and closed it again.

The wall clock said two minutes past five.

If I was going to ask to borrow some money it mustn't look as if I had planned it or even counted on it. After all I could have stayed a shorter time and caught the bus home using my card. It would have to seem spontaneous.

But I didn't need to do it yet.

Could I smoke another cigarette?

My intuition told me that would be a mistake. Too much.

"What's so interesting in the newspaper?" Grandma said. "I read it this morning and there wasn't a damn thing in it."

"I'm reading the obituaries," Grandad said.

"And they're interesting now, are they!" Grandma said, glancing at me as she laughed. "The obituaries!"

I smiled.

"Have you met Dad's new girlfriend?" I said.

"Unni? Yes. We have. Nice girl."

"Yes," I said. "I think she's right for Dad. But it's a bit odd for me, I have to admit."

"I can imagine," Grandma said.

"It doesn't matter though," I said.

"Goodness, no," Grandma said. "I'm sure it doesn't."

She whistled again, turned her hand over to form a little rake and inspected her nails.

"Is there a lot of fruit this year?"

"Yes, it's not bad at all," she said. "Would you like to take some apples with you?"

"Is that OK? They remind me of my childhood."

"I can imagine," she said. "I'll put some in a bag for you." I raised my eyes and stared pointedly at the clock.

"Oh no!" I said. "Is that the time? Ten past five?"

I got up and rummaged through my pockets for money. Took it out, counted it, pursed my lips.

"The last bus went at five," I said. "My travel card isn't valid after five. And I don't have enough money."

I glanced at Grandma, then lowered my eyes.

"I could hitchhike though," I said.

"I'll see if I've got some you can have," Grandma said. "It's such a long way. You really should take the bus."

She got up.

"I'll be off then," I said to Grandad.

He put down the newspaper.

"Bye then," he said.

"Bye," I said, following Grandma down to the hall. She took a small purse from an off-white coat hanging up, opened it, and looked at me.

"How much does the bus cost?"

"Fourteen kroner," I said.

She passed me two twenty-krone notes.

"So you can buy yourself something nice with the rest," she said.

"I'm just borrowing it," I said. "You'll get it back next time."

She snorted.

For a moment we stood in the hall without moving. I could feel she was waiting for me to go.

Had she forgotten the apples?

For a few seconds I was at a loss to know what to do. She had said I could take some with me, so surely it wouldn't be unreasonable to remind her?

But she had just given me some money for the bus. I didn't want to bother her.

She turned her head, saw her reflection in the mirror, put a hand on top of her hair and patted it in place.

"Did you say you had some apples? I could take a few with me and Mom could try some. I'm sure she misses them too."

"Oh, that's right," she said. "The apples."

She opened the door beside the staircase that led down to the cellar.

In the meantime I inspected myself in the mirror. Pulled at the back of my T-shirt to straighten the neck. Ran my fingers through my hair to make it stand up more. Smiled. Put on a serious face. Smiled.

"Here you are," Grandma said, coming up the steps. "You've got a few here."

She passed me a bag, I took it, went out onto the front doorstep and turned to Grandma.

"Bye then!" I said.

"Bye," she said.

I turned and set off. The door shut behind me.

At the Rundingen shop I lit a cigarette while waiting for the bus. There was only one every hour, but I was lucky: the next one arrived after only a few minutes.

I boarded and while I was waiting for my ticket and change, I squinted down the bus.

Wasn't that Jan Vidar?

Yes, it was.

He was sitting gazing out the window, his chin resting on his hand. Didn't notice me until I reached his seat. He removed the small Walkman earplugs.

"Hi," he said.

"Hi," I said, plumping down onto the seat. "What are you listening to?"

"B.B. King actually," he said.

"B.B. King!" I said. "Have you gone nuts?"

"He's a damn good guitarist," he said. "Believe it or not."

"Him?" I said.

Jan Vidar nodded.

"He's so fantastic that when he plays, his guitar is horizontal," I said. "Haven't you seen? It's like he's playing a steel guitar."

"Where do you think Led Zeppelin got everything from?" he said. "They're old blues boys."

"Yes, of course. I know that," I said. "But that doesn't mean we should listen to it. Blues is a pile of shit, if you ask me. Fine for inspiration for something else, but on its own? It's just the same old song again and again."

"If you can play like him, you can play anything," Jan Vidar said. "You were the one who always talked about feeling. Who said that was why Jimmy Page was better than Ritchie Blackmore or Yngwie Malmsteen. I agree with you now. We don't need to discuss the point any more. But for feeling, brother, just listen to this guy!"

He passed me the earplugs, I put them in, he pressed play. I listened for two seconds before taking them out.

"Same song," I said.

He looked a bit annoyed.

"Are you annoyed or what?"

"No, why should I be? I know I'm right."

"Ha ha," I said.

The bus stopped at the lights before the E18.

"Why were you at Rundingen?" Jan Vidar said. "Have you been visiting your grandparents?"

I nodded.

"But before that I was at Nye Sørlandet."

"What were you doing there?"

"I've got work there."

"Work?"

"Yes."

"What as? Paperboy?" He laughed.

"Ha ha," I repeated. "No, as a music journalist. I'm going to review records."

"Are you? Fantastic! Really?"

"Yes, I start next week."

There was a silence. Jan Vidar drew up his knees and put his feet on the seat opposite.

"And you?" I said. "Where have you been?"

"Out with a friend. We've been jamming."

"Where's the guitar then?"

He tossed his head back.

"On the seat behind."

"Is he good?"

"Better than you anyway."

"That's not saying much," I said.

We smiled. Then he gazed out the window. I glanced behind us, in case someone I knew was sitting there and I hadn't noticed them. But there was just a boy I hadn't seen before, perhaps a seventh year, and a woman of around fifty with a white shoe-shop bag on her lap. She was chewing gum, which was a mistake, chewing gum didn't go with her glasses and hair.

"Do you remember when you stood in for me?" Jan Vidar said.

"Of course," I said.

He had been a paperboy. Over time he had built up a long, challenging route. Then he had to have a holiday and I was given his job for a week. He didn't go anywhere, just lazed around while I was working, and then we went swimming or biked out to a friend's. But after three days there were so many complaints from people on the route that he had to take over. One hell of a holiday that was, he had said. But he didn't look too upset.

"I still can't understand how you could make such a mess of it," he said now.

I shrugged. "Actually I did the best I could."

"Unbelievable," he said.

He had gone over the route with me twice, there were two or three quirks to watch out for – some wanted the newspaper through the door, others had boxes with identical names on them – and I couldn't remember these nuances when I was standing there, even though he had repeated them several times, so I improvised and followed my gut instinct.

"That was only last year!" I said. "At first I thought it was several years ago!"

"That was a good summer, that was," he said.

"Yes, it was."

We entered the forest after the Timenes crossroads. The sun was shining on the hilltop trees but completely absent here. I associated the bus stop we passed with Billy Idol, we had been to one of those half-baked parties we sometimes ended up at and as we had been going home in the freezing cold I had been humming "Rebel Yell."

"I think I can associate some memory with every damn bus stop from here to home," I said.

He nodded.

Topdalsfjord opened in front of us on the right. The water was a gleaming blue close to the shore, but farther out it was foam-tipped in the breeze. A couple of families were sitting on the beach and children were wading in front of them.

It would soon be autumn.

"Any nice girls at school?" I said.

"Not that I've seen. And at Katedralskolen?"

"Actually, there's a great one in my class. But she's a Christian, first of all."

"That's never deterred you before."

"No, but she's the perfection type. Pentecostalist. Well, you know the type, down jackets and Bik Bok and Poco Loco clothes."

"Second of all?"

"She doesn't like me."

"Seen much of Hanne?"

I shook my head. "Spoke to her on the phone a couple of times, that's all."

I wondered whether Jan Vidar wasn't sick of hearing about Hanne, so I didn't follow up, even though I was burning to talk about her. Instead we sat silent for the last ten minutes, lulled into the regular drone of the bus that we both knew so well. It felt as if we had been catching the bus for the whole of our lives. Up and down, back and forth, day after day. Bus, bus, bus. We knew all about buses. We were bus experts. In the same way that we were experts on pointless cycling and endless footslogging, not to mention the very center of our existence, something we knew very well: using the grapevine to stay up to date with what was happening. What? Someone had The Texas Chainsaw Massacre on video? Right, over we cycled, a tumbledown house with piles of garbage outside, and a complete stranger, a dubious but also dopey-looking twenty-year-old, who was just standing there when we arrived, in the middle of the yard, with no discernible aim, he was just standing there, and when we showed up he turned toward us.

The house was situated right in the middle of a field.

"Heard you'd got a copy of The Texas Chainsaw Massacre," Jan Vidar said.

"That's right," he said. "But I've just lent it to someone."

"Oh," said Jan Vidar, looking at me. "Better head back then, eh?"

An eighth grader who was alone at home and had invited a few friends round? Right, off we trudged, knocked on the door and were invited in, they were watching TV, had nothing to drink, there were no girls and they were just some twats with nothing in their heads, we stayed nevertheless, the alternative was no better, that was the point, if we were completely honest.

And we frequently were.

Oh! Someone somewhere had got a new guitar.

Right, onto our bikes and off we pedaled to see it.

Yes, we were good at using the grapevine. But what we were best at, what we were really the kings of, that was buses and sitting around in bedrooms.

No one could beat us at that.

None of this led anywhere. Well, we probably weren't very good at doing things that led somewhere. We didn't have particularly good conversations, no one could say we did, the few topics we had developed so slowly we ourselves assumed they had nowhere to go; not one of us was a great guitarist, although that is what we would have loved to be, more than anything else, and as far as girls were concerned, it was rare we came across one who wouldn't object if we pulled up her sweater so that we could lower our heads and kiss her nipples. These were great moments. They were luminous shafts of grace in our world of yellowing grass, gray muddy ditches, and dusty country roads. Yes, that was how it was for me. I assumed it was the same for him.

What was this all about? Why did we live like this? Were we waiting for something? In which case, how did we manage to be so patient? Because nothing ever happened! Nothing happened! It was always the same. Day in, day out! Wind and rain, sleet and snow, sun and storm, we did the same. We heard something on the grapevine, went there, came back, sat in his bedroom, heard something else, went by bus, bike, on foot, sat in someone's bedroom. In the summer we went swimming. That was it.

What was it all about?

We were friends, there was no more than that.

And the waiting, that was life.

Jan Vidar jumped off the bus at Solsletta, guitar case in hand, I continued as the sole passenger to Boen, where I also jumped off and plodded home with my rucksack on my back and the bag of apples in my hand.

Mom had been waiting for me with dinner.

"Hi," she said as I went in through the door. "I just got home too."

"Look," I said, holding out the bag. "Apples from Grandma."

"Did you pop in?"

"Yes, they send their love."

"Thanks," she said.

I lifted the lid off the pot. Tomato sauce and chunks of fish, probably pollock.

"I had dinner there," I said.

"That's fine," she said. "But I'm starving."

She put the cat down on the floor, straightened up and took a plate.

"And how did you get on at Nye Sørlandet, Karl Ove?" I said.

"Oh!" she said. "I'd completely forgotten."

I smiled. "I got the job! He just skim-read the reviews and I was home and dry."

"You worked hard on them," she said, placed some bits of pollock on the plate, lifted the lid of the second pan and spooned out a potato. It wobbled around as she lowered the spoon and rolled off when she turned it.

"And they're going to make a little article about it," I said. "It'll run tomorrow."

"Run" was a genuine journalistic expression.

"Very nice, Karl Ove," she said.

"Yes, but there's a snag."

She put the plate on the table, took cutlery from the drawer and sat down. I took a seat opposite her.

"A snag?" she said, digging in.

"He said I had to get hold of a typewriter. Writing by hand is taboo. They don't accept it. So I'll have to buy one."

"A new typewriter costs quite a bit of money."

"Come on. We must be able to afford one. It's an investment. I'll earn some money doing this. Surely you can understand that?"

She nodded as she chewed.

"Perhaps there's one there you can borrow?" she said.

I snorted.

"First day at work? And then you walk in and ask to borrow a typewriter?"

"Well, maybe that isn't such a good idea," she said.

The cat rubbed against my leg. I bent down and scratched his chest. He closed his eyes and began to purr. I picked him up, he stretched out on my lap with his paws on my knees.

"How much will one cost, do you think?" Mom said.

"No idea."

"When I get my salary next month it should be OK. But for now, I'm afraid I'm flat broke."

"But that's too late, don't you understand?"

She nodded.

"I know what you're going to say," I said. "If there's no money, there's no money."

"That's how it is, sadly," she said. "But you can ask your father as well, you know."

I said nothing. It was true, I could. He had enough money. But would he give some to me?

If he wouldn't, there would be an embarrassing situation. He would feel I was demanding something from him, and if he said no, or felt forced to say no, it would be me who had put him in this predicament. And by then it would be too late, he couldn't suddenly say yes after saying no.

"I'll ask him," I said, caressing the cat behind the ear. He writhed in pleasure with his eyes closed.

"There's a letter for you, by the way," Mom said. "I left it on the dresser in the hall."

"A letter?"

I put the cat down on the floor, I didn't like to have to do that when he had been having such a good time, but the little twinge in my conscience was gone the very next second because I didn't get letters that often.

My name on the envelope, written in a girl's hand.

The postmark was almost unreadable.

But it was airmail, and the stamps were Danish.

"I'm going to my room," I said. "Are you OK eating alone?"

"Yes, of course!" Mom said from the kitchen.

In my bedroom I sat down on the chair by the desk, tore open the envelope, took out the letter and started reading.

Nyk M 20 August 85
Hi, Karl Ove,
Hope you're fine. I don't know if you are because you haven't written, although you promised you would. Why not? I wish you could see me running to our post box when I get up. Well, if you don't want to write I won't be annoyed, I love you too much for that, but I have to admit I will be upset if I never hear from you again. Are you coming to Denmark? And if so, when? It has been boring here since you left. During the day I'm with my friends. In the evening I go to the disco. But this will soon be over as I'm moving to Israel on 14 September. I'm really looking forward to that. I would just love to see you before I go.

Perhaps you think I'm stupid to make so much of the short time we had together? That's probably because you're the only boy I've ever fallen in love with. So, don't disappoint me, write to me now.

A girl who loves you,
Lisbeth

I pushed the letter aside. My chest was riven with despair. I could have slept with her. She had been willing! She wrote that she was in love with me, that she loved me, of course she would have said yes.

She knew where we were heading and what I was thinking, of that I was sure.

Bloody Jøgge!

Those fucking dickheads!

A sudden inspiration made me pick up the envelope and look inside.

There was a photo.

I took it out. It was Lisbeth. She wasn't smiling, she was looking into the camera with her head tilted. She was wearing a yellow sweatshirt with NIKE emblazoned across it in big red letters. Her bangs hung over her forehead on one side, covering one eye. A stray lock of hair hung down behind one ear on the other.

Her neck was bare. She had a nice long neck.

Her lips were also beautiful, full, almost disproportionately full compared with her narrow face.

Oh, she looked seriously displeased.

But I could remember what it was like to hold her. How she had laughed when she put her hand up my shirt, against my chest, and I straightened up and took a deep breath.

"You're pumping yourself up!" she said. "Relax. I like you as you are. You're fantastic."

And she was Danish.

I put the picture and the letter back in the envelope, tucked it into the diary that I kept in the drawer, and got to my feet.

Mom was washing the dishes when I went to the kitchen.

"Karl Ove," she said. "I've just had a thought. Dad had a typewriter once. It's probably still around. I can't imagine he would have taken it with him. Have a look up in the barn, in the cardboard boxes."

"He had a typewriter?"

"Yes, he did. He used it to write letters for a few years."

She rinsed a glass in cold water and placed it upside down on the grooves in the drainer.

"During the first few years we were together he wrote poems as well."

"Dad?"

"Yes, he was very taken by poetry. Obstfelder was his favorite. He liked Vilhelm Krag as well, I remember. The Romantics."

"Dad?" I repeated.

Mom smiled.

"They weren't very good though."

"I can believe that," I said, and went into the hall, put on my shoes, and walked up to the back of the barn, which actually was the front because this was where the great barn door was, and inside was where the hay was stacked. The floor beneath, which Dad had used, consisted of small rooms which had been converted into a flat in the 1970s. But here nothing had been done.

I went in and thought, as I had done so many times before, it was strange that we owned such a large room. And that we didn't use it for anything.

Well, except for storage, that is.

All the old farming implements hung on the wall: cart wheels, harnesses, rusty scythes, mucking-out forks, and hoes. In some places Dad had written the nicknames he had used for me, in chalk, he did that when we moved in and when he was so happy about everything.

They were still there.

Boxes were stacked against the wall facing me. I had never looked inside them. That would have been inconceivable when Dad lived here, he often sat in the flat beneath the old floorboards and would definitely have come up to check if anyone had been walking around. And then I would have had to have an extremely good reason for being here, let alone rummaging through our old possessions.

I found clothes I remembered Mom and Dad wearing when I was smaller: flared trousers they must have bought the winter they had been in London together because you couldn't get such big bell-bottoms in Norway, even in the 1970s, Mom's white coat, Dad's large orange jacket with the brown lining he had worn to go fishing, shawls and skirts and scarves, sunglasses, belts, boots and shoes. Then there was a box of pictures we used to have on the walls. A couple of boxes containing old kitchen utensils.

But no typewriter!

I opened a couple more boxes, flicked through them. Came to one containing what looked like magazines in plastic bags.

Comics I had forgotten I had?

I opened the top one.

They were porn mags.

I opened the next.

Also porn mags.

A whole storage box full of pornographic magazines?

Whose were they?

I laid some of them on the floor and began to leaf through. Most were from the '60s and '70s. The centerfolds had bikini marks; all the breasts and bottoms were white. Many of the women were posing outdoors. Standing behind trees, lying in fields, all the colors of the '70s, big breasts, some sagging, with big nipples.

I sat there with an erection, turning the pages. A couple of the magazines were from the '80s and there was nothing strange about them. The ones from the '60s had no shots of girls with their legs open.

Had he had all these magazines at home during all that time? Down in his office?

And, not least, had he actually bought them?

I put them in a pile and stood musing. I ought to hide them. First of all this wasn't anything Mom should see. Second I would like to go through them again.

Or would I?

He had read them. He had pored over them.

I couldn't do that. It was too disgusting.

I decided to put them all back as they had been. Mom would never go through these boxes anyway.

I couldn't make this add up. All the years when I had been small, indeed, oh God, from the time before I was born until last year, he had been buying porn mags and keeping them at home.

Shit.

I opened the other boxes, and in the penultimate one I found the typewriter. It was an old manual model, I should have known, and if I had seen it before the magazines I would have been disappointed, I might even have rejected it and insisted on Mom or Dad buying me another one, but now, after finding his magazines, it didn't matter.

I carried it back and showed it to Mom, who was resting on the sofa.

"That's good enough, isn't it?" she said, her eyes half closed.

"Yes, it'll have to do," I said. "Are you going to sleep?"

"I'll just have forty winks. Can you wake me in half an hour if I'm not up?"

"OK," I said, and went up to my room, where I read Lisbeth's letter once again.

She had written unequivocally that she loved me.

No one had ever done that before.

Was that how it was with Hanne? When I said I loved her? Because I didn't love Lisbeth. I liked her writing that she loved me, but it meant no more than that. It was nice, and I was happy that she had written it, but it existed outside me, she existed outside me. Not like Hanne.

Was that how Hanne felt about me?

That was what she said.

Was she playing with me?

Why didn't she want me? Want to be with me?

Oh, how I wanted her!

That was all I wanted. She was all I wanted!

Really.

But if she didn't want me, I wasn't going to get any further. So it didn't matter.

I decided to give her a taste of her own medicine. It wouldn't matter anyway.

I stood up, went downstairs to the telephone, lifted the receiver and dialed all the numbers except the last. Gazed out the window. Two blackbirds were in the bush across the drive, pecking at the small red berries growing on it. Mefisto watched from a crouch position, his tail wagging to and fro.

I dialed the last number.

"Yes, hello," Hanne's father said.

I hated it when he answered because his daughter was going out with someone else, not me, and he knew what I was trying to do. Sometimes we chatted for more than an hour on the phone. So he probably didn't like me phoning.

"Hello, Karl Ove here," I said. "Is Hanne in?"

"Just a moment, Karl Ove, and I'll have a look."

I heard his footsteps going down the stairs and watched Mefisto creep closer to the two birds, which continued to jerk their heads and peck at the red berries undeterred. Then came the sound of light steps and I knew it was Hanne, and my heart beat faster.

"Hi!" she said. "Funny you should ring. I was just thinking about you!"

"What were you thinking?" I said.

"About you, that was all."

"What are you doing this evening?"

"I'm studying. French. It's a level up from last year. Quite difficult. How's it going with your French?"

"Same as last year. I knew nothing then, and I know nothing now. Do you remember the test I got a Good in?"

"Yes, I do. You were proud of that."

"Was I? Well, usually I got Poor. So, of course I was pleased. But what I did was incredibly simple. The text was long, right, with lots of French words in it. So I just used them in my answer, adapted them a bit and added a few of my own. And, hey presto, a Good."

"You're so smart!"

"Yes, aren't I."

"What are you doing?"

"Well, nothing special actually. I've received a letter I've read a few times."

"Oh? Who from?"

"A girl I met in Denmark."

"Oh? You didn't tell me about her!"

"No. So much happened I thought . . . well, it wouldn't be of any interest to you."

"It certainly is!"

"Right."

"What does she say?"

"She says she loves me."

"But you were only there a week!"

"A lot happened in that week, as I said. We slept together."

"Did you?" she said.

"Yes," I said.

Silence.

"Why are you telling me this, Karl Ove?"

I didn't reply at first. Then I said, "I told you this wouldn't interest you. Then you said it would. So I thought I may as well tell you."

"Mm," she said.

"And then . . . Well, when it was happening I thought a lot about us. That perhaps it wasn't . . . well, you know. Perhaps I don't feel all the things I have said I do. For you, I mean. The letters this summer . . . I think somehow I was in love with love. Do you know what I mean? When I met Lisbeth . . ." I said, and paused to let the name achieve maximum impact ". . . it was somehow real. Flesh and blood. Not just thoughts. Then I got her letter and I realized I was in love with her. And it's fantastic! There wasn't anything between you and me anyway. And there's nothing now. So, yes, just thought I had to say that."

"Yes," she said. "It's good you told me. It's good to know."

"But we're still friends."

"Of course we are," she said. "You can fall in love with whoever you like. We're not in a relationship."

"No."

"But I am a bit sad nevertheless. It was so wonderful in the cabin. With you."

"Yes," I said. "It was."

"Yes."

"Well, you'd better get back to your French."

"Yes," she said. "Bye. Thanks for ringing."

"Bye."

I rang off.

Now it was ruined. That was what I wanted. And now it had happened.

In the first break the next day I jogged up to the petrol station over the E18 to buy the latest Nye Sørlandet. Grabbed a copy from the stand and thumbed through the pages at the back.

My cheeks burned when I spotted a photo of myself.

There was a big spread, almost a page, and the photo took up two-thirds of the space. I was sitting and looking straight at the reader with three records fanned out in front of me.

I skimmed through the text. It said I was a young man who was passionate about music and that I was critical about society's marginalization of rock. Personally, I liked British indie bands best, but I promised to be open to all genres, even the Top Twenty.

I hadn't said that, not in so many words, well, I probably hadn't said it at all, now that I thought about it, but I had meant it and Steinar Vindsland had understood.

The photo was brilliant.

I paid, folded it, and walked back down to the school with it in my hand. In the classroom, which was filling up, I placed it on my desk, leaned back in my chair, tipping it against the wall as I usually did, and watched the others.

I doubted any of them read Nye Sørlandet, except on rare occasions, hardly anyone did. The only newspaper that was any good was Fædrelandsvennen. So having it there spread out on my desk might therefore cause a few eyebrows to be raised. Why have you brought Nye Sørlandet with you to school?

They would imagine I had brought it from home! To show off!

I rocked forward again and folded the newspaper. No, I hadn't brought it from home to show off. I had bought it at the petrol station and where else would you go with it? That was why I had it with me.

But what the hell. Shouldn't I just say?

Straight out?

As long as it didn't seem as if I was bragging?

But it wasn't bragging, it was true, I was a record reviewer now, and today there was an interview with me in the newspaper I had bought at the petrol station opposite the school.

There was no point hiding it either.

"Hi, Lars," I said. He was the least dangerous boy in the class. He turned to me. I held up the newspaper.

"I'm the record reviewer," I said. "Do you want to see?"

He got up and came over; I opened it at the right page.

"Not bloody bad," he said, straightening up. "Hey! Karl Ove's in the paper!" he shouted across the room.

It was more than I could have hoped for, the very next moment he was standing with a crowd around him, all staring at the photo of me and reading the article.

In the evening I browsed through my old music magazines and studied the record reviews and articles. There were three kinds of writer, I concluded. There were the witty, smart, often malicious writers like Kjetil Rolness, Torgrim Eggen, Finn Bjelke, and Herman Willis. There were the serious, ponderous types like Øivind Hånes, Jan Arne Handorff, Arvid Skancke-Knutsen, and Ivar Orvedal. And then there were the knowledgable, clearheaded writers who went straight to the point, like Tore Olsen, Tom Skjeklesæther, Geir Rakvaag, Gerd Johansen and Willy B.

It was as though I knew them all. I really liked Jan Arne Handorff. I understood virtually nothing of what he wrote but sensed his passion, somewhere deep in the wilderness of all those foreign-sounding words, while every second reader's letter accused him of being incomprehensible, although he didn't seem to care, he steered a straight line, further and further into the impenetrable night. I also had huge respect for those who could puncture opponents with a killer comment. I adopted it, to deal with my opponents. Its sole importance was that it worked. And many reviewers were vicious.

When a band changed direction and became more commercial, such as Simple Minds was doing for example, taking the easy route, they didn't think twice about confronting the band and asking for an explanation. Why? You were so good, you had everything, so why sell out? Playing at stadiums? What are you doing? What is in your heads? And if the band wouldn't respond, often they didn't, Norway was not exactly the most important country for groups on the up, they still peppered them with caustic remarks.

I had written only three record reviews, the ones Steinar Vindsland had read. In them I had tried to be impartial while also being hard, and I had dismissed one record with a couple of sarcastic comments at the end. That was the new Stones' single, I had never liked them, they were terrible, apart from the Some Girls LP, which wasn't bad. Now they were over forty and as pathetic as it was possible to be.

I had it in me. I just had to let it out.

Outside it was dark, autumn was wrapping its hand around the world, and I loved it. The darkness, the rain, the sudden cracks in the past that opened when the smell of damp grass and soil rose up at me from a ditch somewhere or when car headlights illuminated a house, all somehow caught and enhanced by the music in the Walkman I always carried with me. I listened to This Mortal Coil and thought about when we used to play in the dark in Tybakken, a feeling of happiness grew in me, but not a happiness of the bright, weightless, carefree kind, this happiness was rooted in something else, and when it met the melancholic beauty of the music and the world that was dying around me, it was like sorrow, beautiful sorrow, romantic sorrow, beauty and pain in one impossible mix, and from there sprang a wild longing to live more. To leave this, to find life where it was really lived, in the streets of cities, beneath skyscrapers, at glittering parties with beautiful people in unfamiliar apartments. To find the one great love and all the restlessness that involved, and then the acceptance, the relief, the ecstasy.

Discard her, find a new one, discard her. Rise and be ruthless, a seducer of women, a man they all wanted but none could have. I put the music magazines in a heap on the bottom of my bookshelves and went downstairs. Mom was sitting and talking on the telephone in the clothes room, the door was open, she smiled at me. I stood still for a few seconds to hear who she was talking to.

One of her sisters.

In the kitchen I took a slice of bread, ate it leaning against the worktop and drank a glass of milk. Went back upstairs and started a letter to Hanne. I wrote that I thought it was best if we never saw each other again.

It felt good to write that, for some reason I wanted to avenge myself on her, to hurt her, to make her think of me as someone she had lost.

I put the letter into an envelope and dropped it into my schoolbag, where it lay until I bought some stamps after school the following day.

I posted it before catching the bus, convinced this was the right course of action.

In the evening, lying on the sofa and reading a book I had borrowed from the school library – Bjørneboe's Ere the Cock Crows – it suddenly struck me what I had done.

I loved her, why would I say I never wanted to see her again?

Regret exploded inside me.

I had to get it back.

I rested the book on the sofa arm and sat up. Should I write another letter and say I didn't mean what I had written in the previous one? That I wanted to see her despite what I had written.

It would look absolutely idiotic.

I had to ring her.

Before I had time to change my mind, I went into the room where the telephone was and dialed her number.

She answered.

"Hi," I said. "I just wanted to apologize for the last time I called. I didn't mean to behave as I did."

"You've got nothing to apologize for."

"Yes, I have. But there's something else. To cut a long story short, I sent you a letter today."

"Did you?"

"Yes. But I didn't mean what I wrote. I don't know why I wrote it. Anyway, it's nonsense. So now I'm wondering if you could do me a favor. Don't read it. Just throw it away."

She laughed.

"Now you've really whetted my appetite! Not read it? Do you really imagine I could do that? What did you write?"

"I can't say. That's the whole point!"

She laughed again.

"You're strange," she said. "But why did you write whatever it was you wrote if you didn't mean it?"

"I don't know. I was in a funny mood. But, Hanne, please promise me you won't read it. Throw it away and pretend it doesn't exist. Actually it doesn't really exist anyway, because I don't mean any of what I wrote."

"I'll see what I can do," she said. "But it is addressed to me. It's me who decides what to do with it, right?"

"Yes, of course. I'm just asking you to be extra nice to me."

"Is there anything that's not nice in the letter? Yes, there must be of course."

"Now you know at any rate," I said. "But if you'd like me to go down on my knees and beg, I will. I'm doing it now. I'm on my knees now. Please throw the letter away!"

She laughed.

"Up on your feet, boy!" she said.

"What are you wearing?" I said.

Seconds passed before she answered.

"A T-shirt and jogging pants. I didn't know you would ring. What are you wearing?'"

"Me? A black shirt, black trousers, and black socks."

"I don't know why I asked," she said, and laughed. "I'm going to give you such a brightly colored bobble hat for Christmas that you'll be embarrassed to walk down the street wearing it, but you'll have to because I gave it to you. When you see me anyway."

"That's pure evil," I said.

"Yes, you don't have a monopoly on it," she said.

"What do you mean by that? Surely I'm not evil just because I don't believe in God?"

"I'm just teasing you. No, you're not evil at all. But now they're calling me. I think they've cooked something they want me to taste."

"So you'll throw the letter away?"

She laughed.

"Bye!"

"Hanne!"

But by then she had hung up.

The meeting with Steinar Vindsland was brief and was basically him showing me how to write the reviews, there were special forms they used at the newspaper, some boxes at the top had to be filled out in a special way, and I was given a stack of them. Then he said I should choose three new releases a week from a record shop with whom they had an arrangement. I could keep the records, that was my fee, OK? Of course, I said. You deliver the reviews to me, he said, and I'll fix the rest.

He winked and shook my hand. Then he turned and started to read some papers on the desk, and I went into the street, still with the tension from the meeting in my body. It was only half past three and I went to see if Dad was at home. I stopped outside the door and rang, nothing happened, I stepped to the side and looked through the window, the house looked empty and I was about to head for the bus stop when his car, a light green Ascona, appeared.

He pulled in by the curb.

Even before he got out of the car I could see he was the way he used to be. Rigid, severe, controlled. He undid his seat belt, grabbed a bag beside him, and placed a foot on the ground. He didn't look at me as he crossed the road.

"Waiting for me?" he said.

"Yes," I said. "Thought I'd stop by."

"You should call in advance, you know," he said.

"Yes," I said. "But I was in the neighborhood, so I . . ." I shrugged.

"There's nothing happening here," he said. "So you may as well catch the bus home."

"OK," I said.

"Call next time, OK?"

"All right," I said.

He turned his back on me and inserted the key in the lock. I started to trudge toward the bus. It was right what he had said: I may as well go. I hadn't visited him for my sake but for his, and if it wasn't convenient, it didn't bother me. Just the opposite.

He phoned at half past ten in the evening. He sounded drunk.

"Hi, Dad here," he said. "You haven't gone to bed?"

"No," I said. "I'm up late."

"You dropped by at an inconvenient moment, I'm afraid. But it's very nice of you to come and visit us. It wasn't that. Do you understand?"

"Yes, of course."

"Don't give me yes, of course. It's important we understand each other."

"Yes," I said. "I know it's important."

"I'm sitting here making a few calls to hear how people are, you know. And I'm relaxing with a pjall."

He used the Østland expression pjall, which he had recently started to say. Another was slakk, off color. He had it from Unni. I'm feeling a bit slakk, he had said once, and I had looked at him because it was as though it wasn't him who had used the word but someone else.

"We're having people round for dinner tomorrow evening, a few colleagues, well, you met them up in Sannes, and it would be nice if you had time."

"Yes, I'll come," I said. "What time?"

"Six, half past, we thought."

"Fine," I said.

"Yes, but we don't have to hang up yet. Or do you want to?"

"No," I said.

"I think you do. You don't want to talk to your old dad."

"I do."

There was a brief pause. He took a swig.

"I heard you visited Grandma and Grandad," he then said.

"Yes."

"Did they say anything about Unni and me?"

"No," I said. "Nothing special, anyway."

"Now you have to be more precise than that. They said something, but it was nothing special?"

"They said you'd been there the day before, and then they said they'd met Unni and that she was nice."

"Oh, so that was it?"

"Yes."

"Have you thought about where you want to spend Christmas? Here with us or with your mother?"

"No, haven't given it any thought. It's not for a while yet."

"Yes, that's true. But we have to make plans, you know. We were wondering whether to go south to the sun or celebrate it here. If you come, we'll stay here. But we have to know soon."

"I'll give it some thought," I said. "Maybe I'll talk to Yngve about it."

"You can come on your own, you know."

"Sure, I could. Can we wait and see? I haven't given it any thought at all."

"By all means," he said. "You need time to think. But you'd probably prefer to be with Mom, wouldn't you?"

"Not necessarily," I said.

"All right," he said. "Well, see you tomorrow then."

He hung up and I went into the kitchen and boiled some water.

"Do you want some tea?" I shouted to Mom, who was sitting in the living room, her legs tucked up underneath her, the cat on her lap, and knitting while listening to classical music on the radio.

It was almost pitch black outside.

"Yes, please!" she replied.

When I went in five minutes later, with a cup in each hand, she put her knitting on the arm of the sofa and the cat down beside her. Mefisto placed his paws in front of him, extended his claws, and stretched. Mom swung her legs down onto the floor and rubbed her hands a couple of times, which she often did after she had been sitting still for any length of time.

"I think Dad might be drinking a lot," I said, sitting down on the wicker chair under the window. It creaked under my weight. I blew on the tea, took a sip, and glanced at Mom. Mefisto stood in front of me and a moment later jumped onto my lap.

"Was that who you were talking to just now?" Mom said.

"Yes," I said.

"Was he drunk?"

"Mm, a bit. And he was pretty drunk when I was there for dinner the last time."

"How do you feel about that?" she said.

I shrugged. "I don't know. Feels a little strange maybe. When I went to the party they had here, that was the first time I'd seen him drunk. Now it's happened twice in a very short space of time."

"That's perhaps not so strange," Mom said. "There have been such big changes in his life."

"Yes," I said. "That's true. But he's becoming very hard work. He keeps asking me if he did things wrong when we were growing up, then he gets all sentimental and talks about the time he massaged my leg when I was very small."

Mom laughed.

It was such a rare occurrence. I looked at her and smiled.

"Is that what he says?" she said. "He might have massaged you once. But he did feel a lot of tenderness for you. He did."

"But not later?"

"Yes, of course. Of course he did, Karl Ove."

She looked at me. I lifted Mefisto and stood up.

"Anything you want to listen to?" I said, kneeling in front of the small record collection I'd stacked against the wall. Mefisto walked slowly, the way he did when he was offended, into the kitchen.

"No, play whatever you want," Mom said.

I switched off the radio and put on Sade, which was the only record I possessed that there was the remotest chance she would like.

"Do you like it?" I said after the music had filled the room for a few minutes.

"Yes, it's very nice," she said, putting her cup down on the table beside the sofa and resuming her knitting.

After school the next day I went to Platebørsen, spoke to the assistant, said I had an arrangement with Steinar Vindsland at Nye Sørlandet to pick up three records, he nodded, I spent half an hour choosing the ones I would write about, the trick was to choose someone I already knew, preferably someone who had been reviewed elsewhere, so that I had a pattern to follow.

I also bought one with my own money, which Mom had given me that morning. To still my hunger I went to Geheb and bought a cardamom and custard bun, strolled up Markens Gate munching, bun in one hand, records in the other, dropped the paper bag onto the street and was brushing off my hands when a slightly plump but well-dressed elderly man shouted after me.

"Hey, you!" he yelled. "We don't litter in this town! Pick it up!"

I turned, my heart pounding, and eyed him as coldly as I could. I was frightened, but I defied my fears and took a few steps toward him.

"Pick it up yourself if it's so important to you," I said.

Then, my legs trembling with fear and my chest quivering with emotion, I turned my back on him and continued up the street.

I half expected him to come running after me, grab me and shake me, even punch me in the stomach, but nothing happened.

Nevertheless, I walked quickly for several blocks before daring to turn around.

No one there.

How had I dared!

To answer back like that!

Now I had given him something to think about. What the hell was he doing, ordering me around? Who gave him the right?

Wasn't I a free person? No one was going to tell me what to do and what not to do. No one!

This bubbled inside me as I walked past the Hotel Caledonien. It was around four o'clock, I had two hours to kill, and I headed for the library, through the side streets so that there was no chance of bumping into him again. Once there, I sat down in the reading room, studied my records for a while before going to find a book from the shelves behind me, there was the first volume of Bjørneboe's trilogy about the history of bestiality, which Hilde from our class had talked about with such enthusiasm. All I had read by Bjørneboe, apart from the few pages of Ere the Cock Crows that I had managed yesterday, was The Sharks, which I had read when I was twelve as if it were Jack London. But now, perusing the first few pages of this trilogy, I realized that I hadn't understood a thing. This was deep, and it was painful. The opening, with the föhn wind, was fantastic.

Did evil come from outside?

Like a wind dragging people along with it?

Or did it come from inside?

I gazed at the square outside the church, where there were already yellow and orange leaves on the ground. In the street behind, people were walking under umbrellas.

Could I become evil? Find myself borne along by a wind of inhumanity and torture someone?

Or was I evil?

Torture wasn't so relevant really, not now, I thought, and continued to read. But this was a book you had barely glanced at before you raised your eyes again. The torture was extreme, the annihilation of the Jews extreme. But it was carried out by regular people! Why did they do it? Didn't they know it was wrong? Yes, of course they did. Is this what they wanted, in their heart of hearts? While they were walking around in their elegant little picture-perfect towns, making sure that everyone was doing what they should and believing that they were so utterly good, was evil what they really wanted if they got the chance? Without realizing it themselves? Was it just something they carried within them, an evil without form, as it were, which emerged when the opportunity arose?

Oh, how stupid it was that they went around believing in a god and a heaven. It was so conceited! So unbelievably conceited! Why would God have selected them, people who were so preoccupied with ensuring everyone did the right thing all the time? Those petty-minded fools, why would God bother about them of all people?

I almost laughed out loud in the library, but managed at the last moment to stifle it to a giggle.

Looking around me, I saw that no one had noticed. Then, to disguise the fact that I had been looking around, I gazed out through the window again, with my head slightly tilted, so that it resembled an active decision, as if I was searching for something.

Wasn't that Renate?

Yes, it was.

She was going into Peppe's Pizza. And that was probably Mona with her, wasn't it?

For one wild moment I considered going in after them. Bump into them as if by chance, ask if I could join them, sit down, turn on the charm, all casual, catch the bus home with them, it was Friday, they were popular, they were bound to be going to a party, we could have a few beers, I could accompany Renate home, she might hold my hand and ask if I wanted to come in, I would say yes and once inside I would pull off her T-shirt and jeans and spread-eagle her on the bed and fuck her senseless.

Ha ha.

Fuck her senseless, oh sure, Karl Ove.

I went weak at the knees even thinking about it. Yes, I could probably undress her, on a very, very good day I might be able to do that, but that was all I could do. That was where it stopped, then I went weak at the knees.

Renate was two years younger. And had a body that made everyone drool. Where I lived she was the body.

Once, on the bus, they had teased me. Not her, she had only been listening, but Mona. And she was three years younger!

"You're so good-looking, Karl Ove," she had said. "But you never say anything. Why don't you say anything? What is it with your cheeks? They're so red! Are you coming with us? We're going to Renate's. That would be great, wouldn't it? Or are you a homo? Is that why you're so quiet?"

She was a cheeky little brat with a great big mouth and an even greater belief in herself.

I had been in love with her sister all through the eighth grade and had absolutely no chance. I was so much older than them and couldn't find an answer, she would tie me in knots. Renate was also there, and at least she wasn't three years younger, only two, she was in ninth grade, and she . . . yes, but no, she was listening to all this and saw me rigidly staring out the window, red-cheeked, as though I imagined it was possible to get out of this situation by pretending I could neither see nor hear them.

So hopeless. Couldn't I just fuck them? Well, not Mona, but Renate?

No. That was exactly what I couldn't do.

I lowered my gaze and continued reading. Not many seconds passed before all words other than the ones Bjørneboe had written were gone from my mind. Thank goodness.

Six other guests came to dinner at Dad and Unni's. They had set the big living-room table, there was a white cloth, there were candlesticks, napkins, and silver knives, forks, and spoons. Have a glass of red wine with the food, Dad said, and I did. I said very little, sat watching for the most part, saw their spirits rising as they chatted and laughed. After I had finished one glass I reached out for the bottle and lifted it. Dad saw me and shook his head once. I put the bottle back down. One of them said he had a six-month-old baby at home and now they were discussing whether to have her christened or not. Neither he nor his wife was a believer, but tradition was important for both of them. Was that enough? he asked.

My heart beat faster.

"I got confirmed for money," I said. "And the day I turned sixteen I left the state church."

Everyone looked at me, most with a soft smile on their lips.

"Have you left the church?" Dad said. "Secretly? Who gave you permission?"

"Everyone has permission when they're sixteen," I said. "And, as you know, I am sixteen."

"It may be legal," Dad said, "but that's not the same as right."

"But you left the church too!" Unni said, laughing. "So you can't say your son shouldn't do the same."

He didn't like that.

He hid it behind a smile, but I knew him. He didn't like it. I could feel his chill. She didn't notice. She went on chatting and laughing.

Slowly he warmed up, he drank and his stiffness evaporated, what had been important was important no longer, nor that I was allowed to drink only one glass of wine, I speculated, and I was right, I took the bottle, he didn't notice, I poured, and a completely full glass stood before me.

Dad let go, his aura was great, indeed immense in the room. He was the person you noticed, he was the person eyes sought. But not in a warm way. There was no warmth in their eyes. He was too much, he was too loud, he interrupted in the wrong places, laughed at nothing, uttered inanities, didn't listen. Took offense, went absent for a while, returned as if nothing had happened. Gave Unni a lingering kiss in front of everyone. The others retreated with their eyes and expressions, they didn't want to know what he had to say, it was over the top for their taste, he was inappropriate, I could see that, and I found myself thinking that the idiots knew nothing, understood nothing, they were petty and didn't know it, and that was the worst of it, their bloated opinions of themselves while all they were was petty.

A pattern began to emerge that autumn. Dad drank every weekend, it made no difference whether I visited in the morning or the afternoon or the evening, on Saturday or Sunday, although at the beginning of the week he didn't drink, or at least he drank much less, apart from perhaps the odd blip one evening a week, when he phoned everyone he knew, including me, and rambled on about something or other. I tried to see him at least once, preferably twice a week, and when he wasn't drinking he was stern and formal, exactly as he'd always been, asked me a couple of questions about school and maybe Yngve, and then we would watch TV, not a word was spoken until I got up and said I had to go. He didn't want me there, I could feel that, but I continued to call and ask if I could come at such and such a time, and he said, I'm home then, yes. When he was drunk everything was a mess, he would talk about what a great time he was having with Unni and he didn't spare me the details about his life with Mom, how it had been compared with the life he had with Unni. Then he would cry, or else Unni would make a thoughtless remark and he would leave the room extremely upset, she only had to mention a man's name and he could be on his feet and gone, and the same applied to her, if he mentioned a woman's name she would stand up and leave.

At least once during the course of these evenings, he would talk about my childhood, which then merged into his, Grandad had beaten him, he said, and even though he might not have been a good father to me, he had always done the best he could, this he said with tears in his eyes, there were always tears in his eyes then, when he said he had done the best he could. Often he would mention how he had massaged my leg and how poor they had been in those days, they'd had almost no money, he mentioned that a lot.

I told Mom about some of this. With her I lived a completely different life, my real life; with her I discussed every thought that went through my head, apart from anything to do with girls, and the terrible feeling of being on the outside at school, and what Dad was doing. I told her everything else and she listened, occasionally with a genuinely surprised expression on her face, as though she hadn't thought about what I was saying. Although she had, of course, it was just that her empathy was so immense that she forgot herself and her own thoughts. Sometimes it was as if we were like minds. Or equals at least. Then something changed and the distance between us became apparent. Such as the weeks when I was reading Bjørneboe and for several evenings in a row I went on about the meaninglessness of all things until she burst into an uncontrollable fit of laughter, and with tears in her eyes, exactly the same as her father, said that wasn't what life was like, look around you! How offended I was for the rest of the week. But she was right, and what was strange was the fact that we had switched positions. Usually I was the one who said life was about enjoyment and that I would never fall into the traps known as duty and the nine-to-four working day, and she said life was a slog, that was the way it was. I subscribed to Bjørneboe's pessimism and the wall of meaninglessness you saw as soon as you started thinking along these lines, I acknowledged the world's misery; however, this did not apply to my own life and the plans I had, which were positive and robust. There was a connection though, since an alternative life, life outside bourgeois values, brought with it some insight into the meaninglessness, was this not the basis for all the thinking about enjoying yourself, not working, not giving a damn, and not conforming to duty? The diary I kept in my gymnas years was full of this kind of reasoning. Was there a god? I wrote at the top of one page, no, there probably wasn't, I concluded three lines later. I wasn't an anarchist in the punk "fuck 'em all" way, I was more structured, there should never be anyone above anyone else, no national state but more of a loose federation of individuals at a local level, in my opinion. No multinational companies, no capitalism, and definitely no religion. I stood for freedom, free people performing free acts. Who would take care of the sick? Mom would counter. We-ell, that could be done locally, couldn't it? Who would pay for it then and in what currency? she would respond. Surely you would need some national institutions? Or would you like to abolish the whole financial system? Why not? What's wrong with the barter system? I would say. But why on earth would we do that? How could all your records be produced in that kind of system? Then I was on shaky ground, two of my worlds were colliding, one that contained everything that was good and cool and one that contained principles. Or, expressed in a different way, what I wanted and what I believed in. I was no eco-vegetarian, for Christ's sake! That wasn't what this was about. However, it was where I ended up if I followed the logic of my basic principles.

A couple of times she received visits from friends in Arendal, a couple of times from old student friends in Oslo, and a couple of times friends she had made in Kristiansand. For them I was the grown-up son, I joined them and chatted away to surprise and impress them, he's so grown-up they said to Mom after I had gone and it was ridiculously easy to make them believe I was.

I spent most of my time outside school writing the three weekly record reviews, but since I wasn't paid in kroner and øre I also worked several evenings at the floor factory. During these months I was especially careful to drop in on Grandma and Grandad because they knew what Dad was doing and it was up to me to show that I was my old self while also, in a way, representing Dad, if life was going well for me this helped to offset the impression that Dad's life gave.

At school I made a few new acquaintances. Bassen hung out with a junior called Espen Olsen, an arrogant kid from Hånes with self-confidence that bordered on the insufferable and who knew everyone it was worth knowing. I was aware of his existence, he was one of those you noticed, the way he mounted the speaker's platform without a second thought when it was election time and spoke to a packed canteen, the self-assurance he had as chairman of Idun, the gymnas association. I stood next to him one break. "See you review records for Nye Sørlandet," he said. "Yes," I said. "I saw you once in sophomore year and I had to laugh," he said. "You were wearing a Paul Young pin next to one of Echo and the Bunnymen! How is that possible? Paul fuckin' Young?" "He's underrated," I said. He scoffed, loudly. "R.E.M. are good though," he said. "Have you heard Green on Red?" "Of course." Had he heard Wall of Voodoo? Are you joking? Stan Ridgway is the king!

A few weeks later, out of the blue, he invited me to a pre-loading session at his house. Why had he invited me? I wondered. I had nothing to offer; there was nothing he could conceivably need. But I said yes anyway. He would get some beer, don't worry about it, he said, you can pay for it when you're there, and I caught the bus early one Saturday evening, jumped off at the Rebel Yell stop, and plodded up the hill to Hånes, where he lived, not so far from the shopping center where we'd had the catastrophic gig the year before.

It turned out he lived in a terraced house. A man who must have been his father opened the door.

"Is Espen home?" I said.

"Yes," he said, stepping aside. "Come in. He's upstairs."

A woman who must have been his mother was a bit farther back in the hall, bending over, putting on her shoes.

"I don't think we've met, have we?" the father said.

"No," I said, shaking his hand. "Karl Ove."

"So you're Karl Ove," he said.

The mother smiled and shook my hand as well.

"We're going out, as you can see," she said. "Have a nice evening!"

They left and I went up the stairs with some hesitation, this wasn't a house I knew.

"Espen?" I called loudly.

"In here!" his voice answered, and I opened the door to where I had heard it.

He was lying in the bath, his arms down by his sides, with a broad grin on his face. The second I saw him there, naked, I mustered the utmost concentration to look him in the eyes. I couldn't – not for anything in the world – look down at his dick, which was floating on the surface of the water, even though that was my first impulse. Do not look at his dick. Do not look at his dick. And I steeled my gaze, looked him straight in the eye, thinking as I stood there, I had never looked anyone in the eye for such a long time before.

"So you found your way here?" he said with a smile. Lying totally at ease in the bath, as though he owned the whole world.

"Yes, it was easy enough," I said.

"You seem ill at ease," he said, laughing. "Is there something wrong?"

"No," I said.

He laughed again.

"You're looking at me strangely."

"No, I'm not," I said, staring him in the eye.

"Have you never seen a cock before? Is that what it is?"

"When are the others coming?" I persisted.

"At eight, of course. That's what I told you. But you would show up early."

"You told me seven."

"Eight."

"Seven."

"Listen, you pig head. Toss me the towel, will you?"

I grabbed the towel and threw it to him. Before he had a chance to stand up, I turned and went out. My forehead was covered in sweat.

"Is it all right if I wait downstairs until you're ready?" I said.

"Be my guest," he said from inside. "Don't sit down anywhere though!"

I knew he was teasing, but I still didn't sit down anywhere, just wandered around carefully examining everything.

He had said seven, hadn't he?

There were pictures of him on one wall, as a baby and a teenager, with another boy who must have been his brother.

When he came down, wearing blue jeans and a white T-shirt, no socks on his feet, he went straight to the stereo and put on a record. Sent me an arch glance as the first chords resounded in the room.

"Do you know who this is?" he said.

"Naturally," I said.

"Who is it then?" he said.

"Violent Femmes."

He nodded and straightened up.

"Aren't they fucking great?" he said.

"They are."

"Beer?"

"Sure, sounds good."

I didn't know any of the others who came, although I had heard about them at Katedralskolen. Trond, tall, thin, fair-haired with a triangular face, an impressively large mouth and equally impressive verbal skills, he knew how to express himself and was never, as far as I could ascertain, tongue-tied. Gisle was his polar opposite, small, black-haired, with dark, intelligent eyes, he didn't say much but what he did say was direct rather than eloquent. Then there were the twins, Tore and Erling, whom it took me several months to tell apart. They were obsessed by music and were always happy, always up for anything, talking over each other and looking at people around them with warmth in their eyes. They had seen me on the train to Drammen the winter before, they said, on the way to the U2 concert. They said nothing about me going on my own to see them or that it was pretty strange. Bassen already knew everyone and belonged to the same group, but something had happened between Espen and him, they barely tolerated each other, although I never found out what had happened.

Tonight Bassen wasn't there, and as I didn't know the others and had barely spoken to Espen, I sat silent for a long time.

Espen was full of jibes, trying to rouse me into action, I understood that, but the sole result was that I became aware of my silence, which lay like a low-pressure system over my thoughts.

I drank though, and the more I drank the more it eased my discomfort. When at last I was drunk I was there, in the room with them, babbling away, singing along to the songs at the top of my voice, groaning aloud, oh that one's great! Oh shit, what a terrific song! That is one fantastic band!

This was where I wanted to be, this was how I wanted to be, getting drunk and singing, staggering out to a bus stop, staggering into a discotheque or a bar, drinking, chatting, laughing.

The next day I woke up at twelve. I couldn't remember a thing about what had happened after we caught the bus from Espen's, apart from a few fragments which fortunately were long and specific enough for me to be able to place them, if not in time then at least in space.

But how had I got home?

Tell me I hadn't taken a taxi! It cost 250 kroner, in which case I would have spent all the money I possessed.

No, no, I hadn't, I had been on the night bus because I had been looking at the light on the little slalom slope beneath the school in Ve.

The alcohol was still in my body, and, feeling equal amounts of distaste and delight, which I recognized from previous occasions when I had been drunk, I went down to the kitchen. Breakfast was still on the table and Mom was preparing her lessons at the desk in the living room.

"Did you have a nice time yesterday?" she said.

"I did," I said, put some water on for tea, found some rissoles in the fridge, which I fried, fetched the previous day's paper, and sat at the table eating, reading, and gazing out on the almost completely yellow and orange countryside for two hours. Waking up still drunk wasn't quite as good as getting drunk, but it wasn't far off, I reflected, because that feeling of catching up with yourself, of your body slowly regaining its energy, dynamic energy at that, could have its exultant moments.

The sky above the yellow deciduous trees and the green conifers was dense and gray. The grayness, and the fact that all visibility stopped there, just a few meters above, increased the intensity of the colors; the yellow, the green, and the black were hurled into space, as it were, yet blocked by the gray sky, and that must have been why the colors shone with such abandon. They had the power to lift off and disappear into eternity but couldn't, and so the energy was burned up where they were.

The telephone rang.

It was Espen.

I was happy, he had never called me before.

"Did you get home OK?" he said.

"Yes, but don't ask me how."

He laughed. "I won't. Christ, we were drunk."

"Yes, that's for sure. How did you get home?"

"Taxi. God knows I don't have money for taxis, but it was still worth it."

"Yeah."

"What are you doing up there in farming country?"

"Nothing. Have to write a record review afterward, so I'm staying at home."

"Oh? Which band?"

"Tuxedomoon."

"Them, oh yes. That's just European avant-garde crap, isn't it?"

"It's pretty good actually. Very atmospheric."

"Atmospheric?" he sneered. "You can pan them then. See you on Monday."

At around four, as darkness was drawing in, I sat down at the living-room desk and worked on the review until eight, when I got up and sat beside Mom on the sofa and watched TV for a couple of hours. I shouldn't have, since one of the characters in the British series we were following was a homosexual, and when this was mentioned or referred to, I blushed. Not because I was homosexual and unable to tell her, but because she might have thought I was. And that was ironic because if I blushed whenever the word "homosexual" was mentioned, she definitely would have thought I was, and the idea of that made me blush even more.

In my absolutely worst hours I used to imagine that I really was homosexual.

Sometimes, just before I fell asleep, I would begin to wonder whether I was a boy or a girl. I didn't know! My consciousness struggled furiously to clear this matter up, but the walls of my mind were slippery, I didn't know, I could equally well have been a girl as a boy, until finally it found firm ground and, eyes wide open, fear deep in my chest, I knew for certain I was not a girl but a boy.

And if that could happen, if such doubts could appear, who knew what else might be there? What else could be hidden inside me?

So strong was this fear that I seemed to be watching over myself when I dreamed, it was as though there was something in me that was present in the dream to see what I was dreaming about, to see whether it was a boy or a girl I was lusting after while I slept. But it was never a boy, it was always girls I dreamed about when I was asleep and when I was awake.

I wasn't homosexual, I was fairly sure about that. The doubt was minuscule, a tiny fly buzzing in the vast landscapes of my consciousness, but its existence was enough. Great therefore was the torment when homosexuality was mentioned at school. If I had reddened then, it would indeed have been a catastrophe so terrible that I didn't even dare consider it. The trick was to do something, anything at all really, even if only to rub an eye or scratch your head. Anything that could distract attention from reddened cheeks or explain them.

In football, "homo" was one of the most common terms, are you a homo or what, or you fucking homo, but this did not present a threat and because everyone used it constantly, no one would have ever dreamed that someone actually was one.

And of course I wasn't one either.

When the program was over, Mom made some tea and brought two cups into the living room, where we sat chatting about this and that. Mostly about family matters. She had phoned her sisters – Kjellaug and Ingunn – in the course of the day and now she was telling me what they had said about their jobs, the jobs of their husbands, and everything their children were doing. She had also phoned Kjartan, her brother. We spent most of the time talking about him, he'd had four poems accepted by a literary journal, they would be published in the spring, and he was still thinking of moving to Bergen and studying philosophy. But Grandma wasn't doing well, Grandpa couldn't possibly manage on his own, and Kjellaug lived too far away to help much more than on weekends, she had her own family and farm to take care of, as well as a job.

"But he's studying philosophy at home anyway now," Mom said. "Perhaps that's not such a bad idea. Kjartan's not twenty anymore. I'm not sure university life is as easy as he imagines."

"No," I said. "But you've just studied for a year, haven't you? And you're not twenty anymore either."

"I suppose so," she laughed. "But I have a family. I have you. My identity isn't dependent on student life, if you know what I mean. Kjartan has such immense expectations."

"Have you read his poems?"

"Yes, he sent them to me."

"Did you understand anything?"

"I think so, a bit."

"He showed me one this summer. I understood nothing. Someone was walking on the edge of heaven. What does that mean?"

She looked at me and smiled. "Well, what could it mean?"

"Haven't got the foggiest," I said. "Something philosophical?"

"Yes, but the philosophy he reads is about life. And everyone knows something about that."

"Why can't he just write it as it is, straight?"

"Some do," she said. "But there are things you can't say straight."

"Such as?"

She sighed and stroked the cat on the head, which he immediately raised, his eyes closed in ecstasy.

"When I was a student I studied a Danish philosopher called Løgstrup. He's very taken by the philosopher who means so much to Kjartan: Heidegger."

"Yes, I remember the name," I said with a laugh.

"He uses a concept Heidegger writes about," Mom continued. "Fürsorge. Care. It's at the heart of nursing science of course. Nursing is about caring for people. But what actually is care? And how do we provide care? It's about being human with another human. But what is it to be human?"

"I suppose that will depend on who you ask?" I said.

"Yes, exactly," she said with a nod. "But is there a feature that is common to us all? It's a philosophical question. And it's important for the job I do too."

"I understand that," I said. "But I don't understand why he walked on the edge of heaven for that."

"Are we meant to understand?"

"Why should I read it if I don't understand?"

"Perhaps you should ask Kjartan the next time you meet him."

"About what it means?"

"Yes, why not?"

"No, I can't talk to Kjartan. He's always so angry. Or maybe not angry but grumpy. Or peculiar."

"Yes, he is, but he's not dangerous, if that's what you were thinking."

"No, no," I said.

There was a silence.

I racked my brain for something else to say because it was late and I knew the silence would make Mom wonder about going to bed, and I didn't want that, I wanted to continue talking. On the other hand, I had a review to write, and the longer I sat here doing nothing, the later into the night I would have to work.

"Well," she said. "It's late again now."

"Yes," I said.

"Are you going to stay up and work?"

I nodded.

"Don't stay up too long."

"It'll take the time it takes," I said.

"I suppose it will," she said, getting up. "Well, goodnight."

"Goodnight."

As she walked through the living room the cat stood next to the sofa and stretched. Stared up at me.

"Oh no, Mefisto," I said, shaking my head. "I've got to work, you know."

With the record I was reviewing playing on the turntable, I wrote draft after draft, scrunched up the rejects and threw them into the growing heap on the floor. It was a little after two before I was happy, scrolled the paper out of the typewriter, pushed back my chair, and read through what I had written for the final time.

It embraces diffuse moods of the past mixed with the future, synthesizer instruments mixed with acoustic. One of the songs on the LP is a medieval poem translated from the French. In my opinion, this track, "St. John," is the strongest offering, with an infectious organ intro and an equally infectious melody.*

Before I went to bed I wrote a note for Mom to say I had worked till late and she shouldn't wake me. Usually she got up an hour before me, had breakfast, drank coffee, and smoked a cigarette while listening to the radio. Then she woke me and, on the days when our timetables coincided, gave me a lift to school. Her school was only a kilometer farther down the road. We wouldn't say much during the half hour the journey took, and it often struck me how different the lull in conversation was from the one I endured with Dad, when the silence burned like a fever inside me. With Mom the silence was painless.

This morning I woke up half an hour late for the bus, saw that I'd had a nocturnal emission, took off my sticky underpants, and walked naked to the closet, where to my horror I discovered that there were no clean underpants.

Why hadn't she washed them? She'd had the whole fucking weekend to do it!

As I entered the bathroom I saw the laundry rack in the middle of the floor covered in clothes, but they were wet. I realized she had washed them the previous evening but had forgotten to hang them up, so she had done it at top speed in the morning.

Oh, how absentminded she was!

This meant I had a choice between finding a pair of dirty underpants in the laundry basket or wearing wet ones off the rack.

I hesitated. It was pretty cold out and it would be no fun walking the kilometer down to the bus wearing wet underpants.

On the other hand, you never knew how close you might be to people in the course of the day. Not that I imagined I smelled, but if I suspected I did, it would make me behave in an even stiffer and more unnatural manner than usual.

What if Merethe, in my class, who could be very flirty, what if she decided today of all days to clap her light blue eyes on me and perhaps come so close that she could stroke me fleetingly on the shoulder or even the chest with one of her exquisite hands?

No, it would have to be the wet ones then.

I showered, had breakfast, saw that I wouldn't make the next bus without rushing, so I decided I might as well catch the one after.

Outside, the sky was blue, the sun hung low, and in the shadow beneath the trees along the riverbank the frozen mist drifted across the tranquil water.

When the bus pulled up at the stop by the school the third lesson was drawing to a close, and since there was no point going now I took the bus to town and went to Nye Sørlandet with the three reviews. Steinar was in his office.

"Are you ditching school?" he said.

I nodded.

"Tut-tut," he said, and smiled. "Have you got something for me?"

I produced the sheets of paper from my bag.

"Just leave them there," he said, pointing to the table.

"Aren't you going to look at them?"

He usually skimmed through them before I left.

"No. I trust you. You've done a good job so far. Why should it be any different today? See you!"

"See you," I said, and left. My insides were glowing at what he had said, and to celebrate I went to buy a couple of records, sat down in Geheb and ate a cardamom and custard bun and drank a Coke while carefully scrutinizing the covers. Once I had finished, it was so late it would have been senseless to go to school so I wandered around the streets for a while, then caught an early bus home. I stopped by the postbox down at the crossing; apart from the newspaper, there were three letters in it. Two for Mom, window envelopes: bills. And an airmail letter for me!

I recognized the writing on the envelope and saw from the postmark that it was from Israel. Waited until I was sitting at the desk in my room to open it. Opened it, took out the letter, stood up, put on a record, and sat down again. Began to read.

Tel Aviv, 10/9/1985
Hi Karl Ove,
I arrived in Tel Aviv a month ago. It's great but also hard. I've never done so much cleaning in my whole life as in the last four weeks. It's thirty degrees here and I'm lying on the terrace writing this letter. I've been to the Mediterranean twice and some Israeli boys have taught me how to play Frisbee and surf. But it's impossible to trust the boys here if you've got blond hair. They assume you're on holiday and so, aha, they think, she'll be easy. But I can't forget you. And I don't understand myself. But I think it's because you were/are the boy I've loved most in all my life. So, Karl Ove, no matter how many girls have come into your life, don't forget me, and come to Denmark next year. And if you are nice and write back quickly this time you are très bien.
I'm your fan,
Lisbeth

I got up, went over to the window, opened it, placed my forearms on the frame, and leaned out. The air was cold and crisp, the heat of the sun shining on me barely evident.

She meant it. She was serious.

I stood up, went outside with the letter, sat down on the bench under the window, and read it through once again. I put it down beside me and lit a cigarette.

I could go to Denmark in the summer. And I didn't need to return.

I didn't need to return.

The thought had never occurred to me before, and it changed everything.

With the cold sharp light in my face, beneath the dark blue autumnal sky, in the midst of the forest above the river, it was as though the future was opening itself to me. Not as what I was expected to do, what everyone did, military service in Northern Norway first, then university in Bergen or Oslo, stay there for six years, go home during the holidays, find a job, get married, and have children who became your parents' grandchildren.

But instead go out and disappear from sight. Vanish. Not even "in a few years" but now. Say to Mom in the summer: Listen, I'm off and I won't ever be coming back. She wouldn't be able to stop me. She couldn't. I was a free spirit and she knew it. I was my own man. The future, like a door, was open.

The beech trees in Denmark. The low brick houses. Lisbeth.

No one would know who I was, I was just someone who appeared on the scene and would soon leave again. I didn't need to return! No one ever needed to know any more about me, I could go, vanish.

I really could.

A car came around the bend below the house, and I recognized the sound of Mom's Golf. I stubbed out my cigarette, buried it under some grass, and got to my feet as the car drew up on the gravel in front of the house.

She jumped out, opened the trunk, and removed two shopping bags.

"Have you come into some money?" I said.

"Yes, it's payday," she said.

"What did you buy for dinner?"

"Fish cakes."

"Great! I'm starving."

Dad's inquiry about Christmas had been a smoke screen, actually he hadn't wanted us there, and he had booked a trip to Madeira for himself and Unni without waiting to hear what Yngve and I wanted to do.

We would go with Mom to stay with her parents in Sørbøvåg. It was the first Christmas without Dad, and I was looking forward to it: everything had been free and easy the few times all three of us had been together after the divorce.

The day school finished I ambled down to Grandma and Grandad's to wish them Merry Christmas; Mom and I would fly to Bergen the following day, meet Yngve there, and catch the boat to Sørbøvåg together.

Grandma unlocked the front door as always.

"Oh, well look who's here," she said with a smile.

"Yes, I was nearby and thought I would come and wish you Merry Christmas," I said, following her up the stairs without hugging her first. Grandad was sitting in his chair, and his eyes lit up for a brief instant when he saw me. At least that was what I imagined.

"The meal's not ready yet," Grandma said. "But I can heat up some rolls for you, if you're hungry."

"Yes, that would be nice," I said, and sat down, took my cigarettes from my shirt pocket, and lit up.

"You haven't started inhaling, have you?" she said.

"No," I said.

"That's good. It's dangerous, you know."

"Yes," I said.

She put the little metal rack on the hotplate and switched on the stove, placed two rolls on top, and took out some butter, a mild white cheese, and brown goat cheese.

"Dad left for Madeira this morning," I said.

"Yes, we heard," Grandma said.

"I'm sure they'll have a nice time there," I said. "You've been there, haven't you?"

"No, we haven't," Grandma said. "No, we've never been to Madeira."

"Perhaps he's thinking of Las Palmas," Grandad said. "We've been there."

"Yes, we've been to Las Palmas," Grandma said.

"I can remember that," I said. "We each got a T-shirt from there. Light blue with dark blue letters. Las Palmas, it said, and there were some palm trees, I think."

"Can you remember that?" Grandma said.

"Yes," I replied.

Because I did. Some events stood out from that time and were etched in my consciousness. Others were more vague. I thought I remembered Grandma once saying there had been a man downstairs in the hall, a stranger, perhaps someone who had broken in. Later I mentioned it to her and Grandma stared at me in surprise, shaking her head. No, there had never been a man in the hall. So where had I gotten that idea from? Other stories I seemed to remember were similarly dismissed as soon as I mentioned them.

A forefather or a forefather's uncle, I thought I had been told, emigrated to America and remarried there, although he hadn't been legally divorced from his wife back home and was, in other words, a bigamist. I mentioned this during a meal we were having that autumn, sitting in the dining room one Sunday, Grandma, Grandad, Dad, Unni, and I. But no one had ever heard this story before, and Grandma looked almost angry as she shook her head. There was also something about a stabbing, I seemed to remember. But if the story hadn't happened and it was just something I believed had happened, how could it have formed in my mind? Had someone told me it in my dreams? Had it been in one of the countless novels I had read when I went to ungdomsskole, which in some mysterious way I had superimposed on vague characters in the family and thus drawn myself into the heart of the narrative?

I didn't know.

But it was no fun because I gained a reputation for being unreliable, I was someone who made things up; in other words, I was like Dad. This was ironic because if there was one resolution I had made it was never to lie, precisely on account of him. Well, yes, I might resort to white lies if there was some matter I didn't want others, Mom more often than not, but Dad too, to know. But whatever I hid, I hid for their sake, not for mine. So that at least was not immoral.

"It's good to have a few days' vacation now," I said.

"I'll say," Grandma said.

"Is Gunnar coming here with the others on Christmas Eve?" I said.

"No, they're staying at home. But I imagine we'll pop over."

"All right," I said.

"There we are. They're done," Grandma said, and placed two rolls on a plate she put on the table in front of me. Then she sat down.

She had forgotten to bring a knife and the cheese slicer.

I got up to get them.

"What's the matter?" she said. "Have I forgotten something?"

"Knife and cheese slicer," I said.

"You stay put. I'll get them!"

She went to the drawer and placed them next to me.

"There we are," she said again. "Now you've got everything you need."

She smiled. I smiled back.

The crust on the rolls was so crispy that I had crumbs all around my mouth. I ate quickly, not only because this was a habit, but also because they weren't eating, they were sitting quietly while I munched away, so that every slightest movement I made, even if it was only to brush the crumbs off the table, was somehow emphasized.

"Mom's looking forward to the holidays too," I said as I spread margarine over the second roll.

"Yes, I can imagine," Grandma said.

"She hasn't been to Sørbøvåg since the summer, and her parents are getting on now. Especially her mom. She's not doing well, as you know."

"No," said Grandma, shaking her head. "No, she's not."

"She can't even walk anymore," I said.

"Can't she?" Grandma said. "Is it that bad?"

"She's got a walker though," I said, swallowed, and wiped a few crumbs off my lips. "So she can get around at home. But she doesn't go out anymore."

I had never thought about that. She didn't go out anymore, she was always indoors in those small rooms.

"She has Parkinson's, doesn't she?" Grandad said.

I nodded.

"But Mom's enjoying her job," I said. "There's not so much new stuff anymore."

Grandma suddenly got up, lifted the curtain, and looked out.

"Thought I heard someone," she said.

"You were just imagining it," Grandad said. "We're not expecting anyone."

She sat down again. Ran her hand through her hair, looked at me.

"Oh yes," she said and got to her feet again. "We mustn't forget the Christmas presents!"

She was gone for a moment, and I looked at Grandad, who had his eyes on the folded soccer paper on the table beside him.

"Here you are," Grandma said from the hall, and came in with two envelopes in her hand. "Well, it's not much, but it'll help a bit. One for you and one for Yngve. Do you think you can carry them both all the way up to Sørbøvåg?"

She was smiling.

"Yes, of course," I said. "Thank you very much!"

"Our pleasure," Grandma said.

I got up.

"Have a good Christmas," I said.

"And a good Christmas to you too," Grandad said.

Grandma walked downstairs with me, gazed into the air while I put on my black jacket and wound the black scarf around my neck.

"Is it OK if I spend some of my present on the bus fare home?" I said, looking at her.

"No, it isn't," she said. "The whole idea is for you to buy something nice. Haven't you got any money?"

"I'm afraid not."

"I'll have a look to see if I've got some coins somewhere," she said, taking her purse from the pocket of the coat hanging in the wardrobe, and passed me two ten-krone coins.

"Merry Christmas," I said.

"Merry Christmas," she said, smiled at me, and closed the door.

As soon as I was out of sight of the house I opened the envelope with my name. There was a hundred-krone note inside. Perfect. I could hurry and buy two records before going home.

In the shop it struck me that actually I could buy four. Yngve had been given a hundred as well, hadn't he? Yes, he had.

I could give him the hundred from my own money. It wasn't as if the note was marked.

We arrived at Sørbøvåg in the evening. Rain, a couple of degrees above freezing, the darkness as solid as a brick wall as we carried our luggage up the road to the illuminated house. The countryside around us was saturated, everywhere water dripped and trickled.

Mom stopped, put down her suitcase, and opened the brown wooden door with the grooves and the window at the top. The smell, a bit musty from Grandpa's cowshed gear hanging in the hall, wafted toward me, and together with the sight of the door and the white wall at the end of the hall, unlocked my whole childhood in an instant.

In those days they would have met us on the drive or at least come out the second the door was opened, but now nothing happened: we deposited our cases on the floor and removed our jackets to the sound of our own breathing and the rustle of our clothes.

"So," Mom said. "Shall we go in?"

Grandpa, who was sitting on the sofa, stood up with a smile to greet us.

"The Norwegian population is going through a growth spurt, I can see!" he said, looking up at Yngve and me.

We smiled.

Grandma was sitting on a chair in the corner looking at us. Her whole body trembled and shook. She was completely in the grip of the illness now. Jaws, arms, feet, legs, everything twitched.

Mom sat down on a stool beside her and held her hands in hers. Grandma tried to say something, but all that came out was a hoarse whisper.

"We'll just carry up our bags," Yngve said. "We'll be sleeping upstairs, I guess?"

"You can do whatever you like," Grandpa said.

We went up the creaky staircase. Yngve took Kjartan's old room, I took the old children's room. Switched on the main light, put my backpack down by the old cot, drew the curtain, and tried to peer through the darkness outside. It was impenetrable, but I sensed the landscape there nevertheless, the wind gusting through seemed to open it up. The windowsill was covered with dead flies. In the corner under the ceiling hung a spider's web. The room was cold. It smelled old, it smelled of the past.

I switched off the light and went downstairs.

Mom was standing in the middle of the floor. Grandma was watching TV.

"Shall we make some supper then?" Mom said.

"OK," I said.

It was Grandpa who did the cooking in this house. He had learned to cook when his mother died, he had been twelve years old and the responsibility had fallen on him. Not many men of his generation had experience of this kind and he was proud that he could cope. But he wasn't very fussy about washing pots and pans and ladles and so on. The grease that had collected in a thick yellowish-white layer at the bottom of the frying pan appeared to have melted and solidified countless times, the saucepans in the cupboard bore scum marks around the top from boiling fish, and there were bits of overcooked potato stuck to the bottom. Otherwise the kitchen wasn't dirty, a cleaner came twice a week, but it was run-down.

Mom and I scrambled some eggs, made some tea, and took in a selection of sliced meats and cheese while Yngve set the table. When supper was ready I went to get Kjartan, who had built himself a house beside the old one a few years ago. Light droplets of rain settled on my face as I walked the three meters to his door and rang the bell. I opened the door, went into the hall, and shouted up the staircase that supper was ready.

"OK, OK, I'm coming!" he called down.

When I went back Mom was standing next to Grandma in the middle of the floor, holding her arm and guiding her slowly toward the table, where Grandpa and Yngve were already seated, Grandpa was telling him all about the various types of salmon breeding. If he had been younger, that is what he would have done, he said. One of the neighbors had done it, down below in the fjord there was a small breeding station, he was earning so much money it was as if he had won the lottery.

I sat down and poured myself a cup of tea. Kjartan came into the hallway, closed the door after him, went straight to a chair and sat down.

"Are you studying political science?" he asked Yngve.

"Hi, Kjartan," Yngve said. As Kjartan didn't respond to the discreet reproof, Yngve simply nodded. "Or comparative politics, as it's called in Bergen. But it's the same thing," Yngve said.

Kjartan returned the nod.

"And you're at gymnas?" he said to me.

"Yes," I said.

I stood up and pulled back a chair for Grandma. She slowly lowered herself onto it, Mom pushed the chair into the table, sat down on her other side while Kjartan started talking. He didn't look at us. His hands transported bread and meat, buttered bread and raised it to his mouth, poured tea and milk into a cup and raised it to his mouth, all somehow independently of himself and what he was saying, this long unstoppable stream of words that issued from his lips. Occasionally he corrected himself, he laughed a little, he even peeked up at us, but otherwise it was as though he had disappeared in order to let the speaker in him speak.

He talked about Heidegger, held a ten-minute monologue about the great German philosopher and his struggle with him, then stopped in midstream and fell quiet. Mom picked up on something he had said, asked whether that was what he meant, had she understood him correctly? He looked at her, smiled briefly, and then continued his monologue. Grandpa, who had previously dominated the conversations around this table, said nothing as he ate, stared down at the table in front of him, occasionally glanced around the table, a cheery expression on his face as though he had remembered something and was about to tell us what, but held back and lowered his eyes again.

"Not everyone here has heard of Heidegger," Yngve said in an unexpected lull. "Surely there must be other topics we can discuss apart from some obscure German philosopher."

"Yes, I suppose there are," Kjartan said. "We can talk about the weather. But what shall we talk about then? The weather is what it always is. The weather is what existence reveals itself through. Just as we reveal ourselves through the mood we are in, through what we feel at any given moment. It's not possible to imagine a world without weather or ourselves without feelings. But both elements automate das Man. Das Man talks about the weather as though there is nothing special about it, in other words he doesn't see it, not even Johannes," Kjartan said, nodding toward Grandpa, "who spends an hour every day listening to the weather forecast, and always has done, who absorbs all the details, not even Johannes sees the weather, he just sees rain or sun, mist or sleet, but not as such, as something unique, something which reveals itself to us, through which everything else reveals itself in these moments of, well, grace perhaps. Yes, Heidegger is close to God and the divine, but he never fully embraces it, he never goes the whole way, but it's there, in close attendance, perhaps even as a prerequisite for the thinking. What do you say, Sissel?"

"Well, what you say sounds quasi-religious," she said.

Yngve, who had rolled his eyes when Kjartan had started talking about the weather, speared a piece of salmon with his fork and put it on his plate.

"Is it going to be lamb ribs and pork belly this year as well?" Yngve said.

Grandpa looked at him.

"Yes, it is. We've dried the lamb in the loft. Kjartan bought the pork yesterday."

"I've brought some aquavit with me," Yngve said. "You need that."

Mom raised a glass of milk to Grandma's mouth. She drank. A white stream ran from the corner of her mouth.

The countryside was like a tub filled to the brim with darkness. The next morning the bottom slowly became visible as the light was poured in and seemingly diluted the darkness. It was impossible, I reflected, to witness this without feeling it involved movement. Wasn't Lihesten, that immense vertical wall of rock, creeping closer with the daylight? Wasn't the gray fjord rising from the depths of darkness in which it had been hidden all night? The tall birches on the other side of the meadowland, where the fence to the neighboring property was, weren't they advancing meter by meter?

The birches: five or six riders who had kept watch on the house all through the night and now had to pull hard on the reins to curb the restless horses beneath them.

During the morning the mist thickened again. Everything was gray, even the winter-green spruces growing on the ridge beyond the lake were gray, and everything was saturated with dampness. The fine drizzle in the air, the droplets collecting under the branches and falling to the ground with tiny, almost imperceptible, thuds, the moisture in the soil of the meadow that had once been a marsh, the squelch it gave when you stepped on it, your shoes sinking in, the mud oozing over them.

At eleven I walked with Yngve to Kjartan's car, he had borrowed it, we were going to Vågen to buy the last bits and pieces for the Christmas dinner. Sauerkraut, red cabbage, some more beer, nuts and fruit, and sodas to quench the thirst that lamb ribs always produced. And some newspapers, if there were any, I needed them to kill the time until the evening, for childhood Christmases were so deeply rooted in me that I still looked forward to them.

With the wipers swishing back and forth across the windshield, we drove across the yard, through the gate, and down to the road in front of the school, where we turned right and set out on the narrow two-kilometer carriageway to Vågen, which had seemed an interminable distance to me as a child. Almost every meter along the road constituted a special place, the most exciting by far however was the bit leading to the bridge over the river, where I used to hang over the railings for hours just looking.

By car, it took three, maybe four minutes. If I hadn't had my previous attachment to the area, I wouldn't have noticed anything. The trees would have been any trees, the farms any farms, the bridge any bridge.

"Kjartan's incredible," Yngve said. "He doesn't take any account of others at all. Or does he believe everyone's as interested in what he says as he is?"

"I don't know," I said. "Me, I have no idea what he's talking about. Do you?"

"A bit," Yngve said. "But it's not as impressive as it sounds. It's just a question of reading."

He turned in and parked, we walked toward the co-op shop. A woman in a long raincoat came out the door clutching a small child. She was startled to see us.

"Goodness, Yngve! Is that you!" she said.

Who was she?

They hugged.

"This is my brother, Karl Ove," Yngve said.

"Ingegerd," she said, sticking out a hand.

I smiled. Her child clung to her.

"You have grandparents here," she said. "Now I remember. How funny to see you here!"

I wandered across and gazed over Vågen. The water was perfectly still. Some boats were moored to buoys that glowed red in the middle of the fjord in all the gray. When we were little, the Bergen boat used to dock here. Once we had caught it at night, slept on a hard bench, there had been a smell of gasoline and coffee and sea, what an adventure it had been. Kommandøren it had been called. Now the hurtigbåt, the express boat, had superseded it. The boat didn't stop here anymore.

"Are you coming?" Yngve said from behind me. I turned. The woman and the child were on their way to a car.

"Who was that?" I said.

"Someone I know from Bergen," he said. "She lives with Helge."

On our return, the house smelled of green soap. Mom had washed the floors. Now she was turning her attention to the windowsills. Grandma was asleep in the chair nearby. Mom wrung the cloth over the bucket, straightened up, and looked at us.

"Will you put some porridge on?" she said.

"Yes, I can do that," Yngve said.

"Are we going to put up the tree soon?" I said.

"You can bring it in, if you like," she said.

"Where is it?"

"Actually, I don't know," she said. "Ask Kjartan."

I slipped my feet into a pair of much too small clogs and shuffled over to the other house. Rang the bell, opened the door, shouted hello.

No answer.

I walked carefully up the stairs.

He was leaning back in his Stressless chair and taking in the fjord. He had those big headphones on. Tapping his foot to the music.

Obviously he hadn't heard me. If I walked into his line of vision I would startle him. There was no other option though. Shouting was no good; the music was so loud I could hear it from where I was standing.

I went back out.

Grandpa was walking from the barn to the house. A cat sauntered along behind him.

"Any luck?" Mom asked when I went back in.

"He was busy," I said. "He was listening to music."

Yngve sighed. "I'll go and see him," he said.

Five minutes later he was wrestling with a large straggly Christmas tree in the hallway. We screwed it into the rusty metal stand and then set about hanging decorations on it from a box Mom had located in the meantime. After we had eaten I went for a stroll around the farm, over to the old derelict mink sheds, down to the black mere, past the place where the beehives had been. Farther on, by the remains of the foundations of the house that had once stood there, I smoked a cigarette. There wasn't a sound to be heard, nor a soul to be seen. I threw the stub into the wet grass and walked back to the house. My shoes glistened. In the downstairs bathroom Mom was helping Grandma to take a shower. Yngve sat listening to Grandpa, who was bent forward on the sofa, his arms resting on his knees, and chatting the way he always did.

I plopped down in the other chair.

Grandpa was talking about the time he had fished for herring in the 1920s with his father, how you could hit the jackpot with one cast of the net and how that had actually happened once. His eyes gleamed as he recalled those times. He told us about the skipper who had stood in the bows as they approached

Trondheim one evening, like a baying dog, he said laughing, because what he was baying for was women. He had spent a long time smartening himself up, now he stood at the very front of the boat sniffing the wind as they glided into the illuminated town. Then he talked about the time he had been the explosives boss on a road-building project: in the evenings they had played poker in the workmen's hut and he had won time and time again, but he couldn't spend the money, he had to buy a wedding ring for Grandma and didn't want the money for it to come from gambling, so he kept putting all the money back in the pot and sat watching the sweat pouring from the others' foreheads. He laughed so much he had tears in his eyes as he described how the others had looked, and Yngve and I laughed too, Grandpa's laughter was so infectious it was impossible not to. He was bent double with laughter, unable to speak and tears were streaming down his cheeks. But he not only entertained us with stories of the past, he wasn't given to nostalgia, for as soon as he had regained his composure, he started to tell us about a trip he had made to America to visit his brother, Magnus. About how he had sat alone at night zapping through the endless variety of channels Magnus had, it was incredible, a miracle, and I smiled because he couldn't speak English and understood nothing of what was being said as he sat there mesmerized in front of the television night after night.

Yngve shot me a look and got up. "Are you coming for a breath of fresh air?"

"Yes, you boys do that," Grandpa said, leaning back against the sofa.

It was raining and we stepped under the overhang by Kjartan's front door and lit up.

"How's it going with Hanne then?" he said. "It's been a long time since you mentioned her."

"It's going nowhere," I said. "We chat on the phone now and then, but it won't work. She doesn't want to go out with me."

"I see," Yngve said. "Might just as well forget her then, eh?"

"That's what I'm trying to do."

He ground his heel into the soft gravel. Stopped, looked across at the barn. It was falling to pieces, the paint was peeling off here and there and the ramp to the hayloft was overgrown with grass, but even though the barn was decrepit, it still stood out because the background – the green meadows, the gray fjord, and the leaden gray sky – somehow thrust it forward, somehow elevated it.

Or else it was because the barn had been so important when I was young, it had been one of the most pivotal buildings in my young life.

"By the way, I've met a girl," Yngve said.

"Really?" I said.

He nodded.

"In Bergen?"

He shook his head, took such a deep drag his cheeks were hollow.

"In Arendal actually. It happened this summer. I haven't seen her since then, but we've exchanged letters. And I'm going to meet her on New Year's Eve."

"Are you in love?"

He eyeballed me. Such a direct question could go both ways; he didn't always want to talk about things like this. But he was in love of course, he glowed in that peculiarly introverted way at any mention of her and probably wanted to talk about her all the time, at least if he was like me he would, and he was.

"Yes, basically," he said. "That's what it boils down to! To so few words! To one word, in fact!"

"What does she look like then? How old is she? Where does she live?"

"Can we start with her name? That's the most practical."

"All right."

"Her name's Kristin."

"Yes?"

"She's two years younger than me. She lives on Tromøya. She's got blue eyes. Blond curly hair. She's quite small . . . You went to the same school as her. She was in the class two years above you."

"Kristin? Doesn't exactly ring any bells."

"You'll recognize her when you see her."

"You'll have to get together with her then."

"That was the idea." He looked at me. "Why don't you come to the party? At the Vindilhytta cabin? If you're not going to another party, that is."

"I don't have any special plans," I said. "Perhaps I should."

"I'll be going anyway. Come with me!"

I nodded and looked away so that he wouldn't see how happy I was.

When we went back in, Grandpa was asleep with his chin resting on his chest and his arms folded.

It was five o'clock, The Silver Boys was starting on TV, I went downstairs from my room dressed and ready. White shirt, black suit, black shoes. The whole house smelled of lamb. Grandma was wearing her finest dress and her hair was brushed. Grandpa was in a blue suit. Kjartan a 1970s-style gray suit. The table was set, a white cloth, the best dinner service, green napkins next to the plates. Four bottles of beer, room temperature, the way it was drunk here, and a bottle of aquavit in the middle. All that was missing was the food, which Yngve had gone to bring in. Grandpa had cooked it.

"There are only five potatoes," Yngve said. "There isn't even enough for one each!"

"I can go without," Mom said. "Then you can have one each."

"Even so," Yngve said. "One paltry potato for Christmas dinner . . ."

I helped him to carry in the dishes of food. Steaming lamb ribs, square pieces of roast pork with crackling, some with tiny bristles intact, mashed swede, sauerkraut, red cabbage, five potatoes.

The lamb was delicious, Grandpa had cured it, soaked it in water, and cooked it to perfection. The sole criticism of the meal, the most important in the year, was the lack of potatoes. You should never skimp on anything, and certainly not the potatoes! But I recovered from my disappointment and no one else seemed to give it a thought. Grandma sat hunched over the table trembling, but her mind was clear, her eyes were clear, she saw us and she was pleased to have us there, I could see. Just the fact that we were there, that was enough for her and always had been. Grandpa wolfed down the meat, his chin glistening with fat. Kjartan hardly touched the food, he rambled on about Heidegger and Nietzsche, a poet called Hölderlin and someone called Arne Ruste, to whom he had sent poems and who had made some kind comments. He mentioned several other names in his monologue and all of them were spoken with a familiarity he seemed to assume everyone shared.

When the meal was over Yngve and I carried the plates and dishes out while Mom whisked the cream for the rice pudding. Kjartan sat in silence alone with his parents.

"I suggest we institute a Heidegger-free zone," Yngve said.

Mom laughed. "But it is quite interesting," she said.

"Perhaps not on Christmas Eve?" I said.

"No, you're probably right there," she said.

"Shall we have the dessert a bit later?" Yngve said. "I'm absolutely full."

"Me too," I said. "The lamb was good this year."

"Yes, it was," Mom said. "A bit salty though maybe?"

"No, no," Yngve said. "It was just right. It was perfect."

"So shall we start on the presents?" I said.

"We could," Yngve said.

"Will you do the honors?"

"OK."

I was given an EP by Yngve, The Dukes of Stratosphear, a sweater and Wandrup's Bjørneboe biography by Mom, a torch by Kjartan, and a big slice of salmon by my grandparents, as well as a check for two hundred kroner. I gave Mom a cassette of Vivaldi she could listen to in the car, Yngve the solo LP by Marty Willson-Piper, the guitarist in the Church, Kjartan a novel by Jan Kjærstad. Yngve read out the names in a confident voice and distributed the presents with a firm hand, I scrunched up the wrapping paper, threw it into the roaring wood burner, and took occasional sips from the cognac Grandpa had brought in. Yngve passed him a present from Kjellaug and Magne's youngest daughter, Ingrid, born many years after her siblings, and when he opened it and saw what it was he stiffened. Suddenly he was on his feet and heading for the wood burner.

"What did you get?" Mom said. "Don't throw it away!"

Grandpa opened the stove door. Mom hurried over.

"You can't burn it," she said, and took the present from him.

Grandpa looked hostile and bewildered at the same time.

"Let me see," I said. "What is it?"

"It's a plaster cast of her hand," Mom said.

The impression of a small hand in plaster, why would he want to burn that?

Kjartan laughed. "Johannes is superstitious," he said. "It means death, that does."

"Yes, it does," Grandpa said. "I don't want to see it."

"We'll put it here then," Mom said, putting the plaster cast out of sight. "She made it at the nursery and sent it to you. You can't throw it away, you know that."

Grandpa said nothing.

Was that a smile on Grandma's lips?

Yngve passed Kjartan a present from him. A bottle of wine.

"Bull's-eye," Kjartan said. He was sitting on a chair at the back of the room with a glass of cognac in his hand, wearing a milder, more conciliatory expression on his face now.

"Perhaps we could listen to our records on your stereo tomorrow, could we?" I said.

"Yes, help yourselves."

Kjartan was sitting by the Christmas tree, which wasn't quite straight, it was leaning toward him, and then while I was looking him in the eye I saw on the margins of my vision that it had started to move. He turned his head. His eyes lit up in panic. The next second the tree crashed down on top of him.

Grandpa burst into laughter. Yngve and Mom and I laughed too. Kjartan jumped up from his chair. Yngve and I straightened the tree, screwed it into position again, and moved it against the wall.

"Even the tree won't leave me in peace," Kjartan said, running a hand through his hair, and then sat down again.

"Skål," Yngve said. "And Merry Christmas!"

After Christmas, we took the express boat to Bergen and flew from there to Kjevik. Mefisto was ecstatic to see us when we arrived, almost clawing my trousers to pieces when I let him lie on my lap during supper.

It was good to be home and it was good to have Yngve there.

The next day he wanted to visit our grandparents on Dad's side, he hadn't seen them since the summer, and I went with him.

Grandma beamed when she saw us standing on the doorstep. Grandad was in his office, she said as we were going upstairs, and Yngve immediately sat down in his chair. With him the atmosphere with Grandma was not as humdrum as it was when I was there on my own; Yngve was much better at hitting the right tone in our family: he joked, made Grandma laugh, and had fun with her in a way that I would never be capable of, even if I practiced for a hundred years.

Suddenly, completely out of the blue, she looked at Yngve and asked him if he had bought something nice with the money.

"What money?" he said.

I flushed scarlet.

"The money we gave you," Grandma said.

"I haven't been given any money," Yngve said.

"I forgot to pass it on to you," I said. "Sorry."

Grandma stared at me as if she couldn't believe her ears. "You didn't give it to him?"

"I'm really sorry. I forgot."

"Did you spend it?"

"Yes, but I only borrowed it. I was going to give him the money back in Sørbøvåg and then I forgot."

She got up and went out.

Yngve sent me a quizzical look.

"We were given a hundred kroner each," I said. "I simply forgot to give you yours. You'll get it later."

Grandma came in with a hundred-krone note in her hand and gave it to Yngve.

"There we are," she said. "Now let's forget all about it."

Yngve did in fact get together with Kristin on New Year's Eve. I saw it all. From the moment they met and she looked up at him with her head tilted and a smile. He had said something and seemed strangely shy. I laughed inwardly. He was in love! Afterward they didn't talk but they did cast occasional glances at each other.

Suddenly they were sitting opposite each other at a long wooden table. Yngve was talking to Trond; she was talking to one of her friends.

They sent each other furtive looks.

Still talking.

Then Yngve got up and was gone for a short while, sat back down, continued to chat with Trond. Picked up a slip of paper and a pen, wrote something.

And then he pushed the slip of paper over to Kristin!

She looked at him, looked at the piece of paper and read what he had written. Looked at him, pinched her thumb and first finger together several times, and he passed her the pen.

She wrote something, pushed the sheet across, he read it. Got up and went over to her, and then suddenly they were immersed in deep conversation, there were only the two of them in the room, and the next time I saw them they were kissing. He had managed it!

After that evening for him everything was about Kristin. He went to Bergen on January 2 and the house felt empty, but only for a day or two until I was used to it, and life continued as it had before with its minor developments in one direction or another, all the unforeseen events that fill our lives, some of which lead to a locked door or a deserted room while others might have consequences that only come to fruition many years later.

I started doing local radio with Espen. We broadcast one program a week, it was live and the basic format was that we played records by our favorite bands and talked about them. I told everyone I knew they should listen, and many of them did, now and then, it was not uncommon for people at school or on the bus to comment on something we had said or some of the music we had chosen. Radio 1 was a small station, there were not many listeners on a normal weekday evening, and Nye Sørlandet was not a big newspaper, but between them they gave me a sense that I was on my way.

The radio program meant that I had to stay in town after school, there was no point going home, turning round, and going back, and I made it a habit to pop in to see Grandma and Grandad, they were a safer bet than Dad for food, and I also avoided the uncertainty that a visit to Dad entailed: would he ask me in or not, would it be too much for him or not?

After these long evenings in town, having dinner with my grandparents first, then meeting Espen at the radio station, planning the program with him, and then doing it, I would get on the bus and listen to music the whole weary way home, including the last kilometer, locked inside myself, hardly noticing the white world I was passing through until I removed my headset, opened the door, untied my boots, hung up my jacket, and went into the kitchen to have a bite of supper.

Mom was on the first floor watching TV. When she heard me she switched it off and came down.

"Did you hear it?" I said.

"Yes," she said.

"Was it embarrassing when we got the giggles or was it OK?"

"No, it wasn't embarrassing. Just funny. Karl Ove, Grandma rang while you were out."

"Oh?"

"Yes. It wasn't a pleasant conversation, I'm afraid. She said . . . well, she said you weren't to go there anymore. She said you'd never had anything to eat whenever you turned up, you were shabbily dressed, and were always asking them for money."

"What?!" I said.

"Yes," Mom said. "She said it was my job to look after you and not theirs. It was my responsibility. So now they don't want you to go there."

I started crying. I couldn't help myself, the tears came with such force. I turned away from her, my face contorted into ugly grimaces, I covered it with my hands, and even though I didn't want to, I sobbed.

I took a saucepan from the cupboard and filled it with water.

"This has got nothing to do with you," Mom said. "You have to understand that. This is about me. It's me they want to hurt."

I put the pan on the stove, barely able to see through all the tears, raised my hand in front of my face again, bowed my head. Another loud sob rolled out.

She was wrong, I knew that, this was about me. I had been there, I had physically felt all the silences and all the unease I carried with me, and in a way I understood them.

But I said nothing. The convulsive twitches in my face let up, I took a few deep breaths, wiped my eyes with the sleeve of my sweater. Sat down on a chair. Mom didn't move.

"I'm so angry," she said. "I don't think I've ever been so angry before. You're their grandchild. It's difficult for you now. It's their duty to support you. No matter what."

"It isn't difficult," I said. "I'm fine."

"You have hardly anyone around you. The few people you have cannot turn their backs on you."

"I'm absolutely fine," I said. "Don't give it a second thought. I'll manage fine without them."

"I'm sure you will," Mom said. "But they're turning their backs on their own grandchild! Can you imagine! No wonder your father struggles."

"You don't think he's behind this then?" I said.

She looked at me. I had never seen her so furious before. Her eyes were blazing.

"No, I truly don't. Well, not unless he has changed totally in these last six months."

"He has," I said. "He's a completely different person."

She sat down.

"And there's one more thing," I said. "That you don't know. Yngve and I were given a hundred kroner each for Christmas. I was supposed to pass the money on to Yngve, but I spent it. Afterward I forgot all about it. When we were there over Christmas it all came out."

"But, Karl Ove," Mom said with a sigh, "even if you'd stolen the money that's no reason for them to turn their backs on you. It's not up to them to punish you."

"You've got to understand," I said. "It's obvious they were angry. And what Grandma said is right. I eat whenever I'm there and they give me money for the bus."

"You've done nothing wrong. Don't even think it," she said.

But I did, of course. I lay awake for the first hours of the night as the cold took a grip on the countryside and caused the timber walls of the house and the ice in the river below to creak. Then, in the darkness, I was able to see the matter in a colder, clearer light. If they didn't want to see me, well, then they wouldn't see me. I hadn't gone to visit them for my benefit, I lost nothing by staying away. And there was a sweetness in my decision never to see them again. Not even when they lay on their deathbeds would I go and see them. Indeed, even when they had died and were about to be buried, even then I wouldn't go and see them. Unlike Dad, who during my childhood years had boycotted them for periods, cut off all contact for a month or two, only to resume relations as though nothing had happened. No, I would stand firm. I would never see them again, I would never talk to them again.

If that was how they wanted it, that is how they would get it. I didn't need Grandma or Grandad, they were the ones who needed me, and if they didn't understand that, well, good luck to them.

One afternoon I caught the train alone to Drammen, where Simple Minds were playing at the same venue that U2 had played the year before. I loved their new record, the sound was so monumental and the songs so brilliant I played them again and again that autumn. It was perhaps a bit commercial and the tracks were perhaps not as strong as those on New Gold Dream, but I loved it nevertheless. Leaving the concert, I was however somewhat disappointed, not least with Jim Kerr, who had become pretty flabby and actually stopped the gig when a fan ran onto the stage and snatched his red beret. He crouched down at the edge of the stage and said they wouldn't play any more unless he got his hat back. I couldn't believe my ears and from then on it didn't matter how good the songs were, for me Simple Minds were a thing of the past.

I arrived back in Kristiansand by train in the middle of the night. There were no buses and it was too expensive to take a taxi home, so I had arranged with Unni that I would sleep in her flat. She had given me a key; all I had to do was let myself in. So half an hour after I had clambered off the train I inserted the key into the lock, warily opened the door and carefully stepped into the flat. It was a 1950s or '60s build, consisted of two rooms, a kitchen and a bathroom, and had a view of the town from the sitting room. I had been there two or three times before, for dinner with Dad and her, and I liked it, it was an elegant flat. The pictures on the wall were nice, and even though I didn't care much for the Sosialistisk Venstreparti-style ceramic cups and woven fabrics, it was her style, and that was indeed what I noticed about the room, the harmony.

She had made up a bed on the sofa with a sheet and a duvet, I found a book in the bookcase, Johan Bojer, The Last of the Vikings, read a few pages, then switched off the light and fell asleep. Next morning I woke to the sound of her clattering around in the kitchen. I got dressed, she set the table in the sitting room and brought in a plate of bacon and eggs, some tea and hot rolls.

We sat chatting all morning. Mostly about me, but also about her, about her relationship with her son, Fredrik, who was having difficulty accepting that our dad had come into her life, about her job as a teacher and life in Kristiansand before she met Dad. I told her about Hanne and my plans to write after I had finished gymnas. I hadn't said anything to anyone because I hadn't formulated the thought before, not in so many words anyway. But now the words just poured out of my mouth. I want to write, I want to be a writer.

When I left it was too late to go to school, so I caught the bus home. The sun was cold and hung low in the sky, the ground was bare and damp. I was happy but not unreservedly so, because chatting with Unni, being open and honest with her, felt like betrayal. Whom I was betraying I wasn't quite sure.

A couple of months later, at the beginning of April, Mom went away for the weekend, to visit a friend in Oslo, and I was left alone at home.

When I returned from school I found a note in the kitchen.

Dear Karl Ove
Take care of yourself – and be good to the cat.
Love,
Mom

After frying some eggs and meatballs for dinner, drinking a cup of coffee and smoking a cigarette, I sat down in the living room with a history book and started to read. The countryside had not yet emerged from the strange interlude between winter and spring when the fields are bare and wet, the sky is gray and the trees leafless, nothing in themselves, everything charged with what will be. Perhaps it has already started to happen, unseen in the darkness, for isn't the air slowly warming up in the forest? Isn't there scattered birdsong coming from the trees after these long months of silence, which had been broken only by the occasional hoarse screams of a crow or a magpie? Had spring not stolen in, like someone wanting to surprise his friends? Wasn't it there, ready any day now to explode into a blaze of green, spewing out its leaves and insects everywhere?

That was the feeling I had, spring was in the offing. And perhaps that was why I was so restless. After reading for an hour or so I got up and walked around the house, opened the door for the cat, which headed straight for the food dish, I thought of Hanne and before I could change my mind I was standing by the telephone and dialing her number.

She was happy to hear from me.

"Are you at home on a Friday evening?" she said. "That's not like you. What are you doing?"

In fact, it was very much like me, but I had probably exaggerated my social life so much that she had integrated it into her perception of me.

"I'm cramming for an exam. And I'm on my own here. Mom won't be home until tomorrow. And so, well . . . I was a bit bored. And I thought of you. What are you doing?"

"Nothing special. I'm a bit bored too."

"Oh good," I said.

"I could stop by," she said.

"Stop by?"

"Yes, I've got my driver's license now, you know. Then we can drink tea and talk until late."

"That sounds perfect. But can you do that?"

"Why wouldn't I be able to?"

"I don't know," I said. "So come over. See you."

An hour and a half later she rounded the bend in the old green Beetle she borrowed from her sister. I shuffled into my shoes and went out to meet her. She looked completely out of place behind the wheel of a car, it struck me as she drove up the hill, driving required a set of movements and actions that I found irreconcilable with her somewhat gauche girlish charm. She performed every maneuver as it had to be done, it wasn't that, but there was something extra which injected a stream of effervescent happiness into my blood. She parked outside the garage door and stepped out. She was wearing the black stretch pants I had once commented on, I had said they looked incredibly sexy on her. She smiled and gave me a hug. We went indoors, I made some tea and put on a record, we chatted for a while, she talked about what was happening at school and I told her what was going on at mine. Some anecdotes about mutual friends.

But we weren't quite in sync.

We looked at each other and smiled.

"I hadn't imagined this when I woke up this morning," I said. "That you would be sitting here this evening."

"Me neither," she said.

A plane came in over the ridge behind our place, the whole house seemed to shake.

"That was low," I said.

"Yes," she said, getting up. "I won't be a minute."

I lit a cigarette, leaned back against the sofa, and closed my eyes.

When she returned she stopped by the garden door and gazed out. I got to my feet, went over to her, stood behind her and gently placed my hands on her stomach. She put her hands on mine.

"It's so lovely here," she said.

The river flowed past, shiny and black, it had flooded the soccer field, only the two homemade goals were visible. The air over the valley had thickened with the dusk. Lights shone in the houses across the valley. Droplets of rain ran down the pane in front of us.

"Yes, it is," I said, moving away from the window. She was in a relationship, she was a Christian, I was just a good friend.

She sat down in the wicker chair, swept the hair hanging over her forehead to one side, and raised the cup of lukewarm tea to her mouth. Her lips were perhaps her finest feature, they formed a gentle curve and at the top seemed to crimp as though not wishing to adapt to the otherwise clean lines of her face. Unless it was her eyes, which I sometimes imagined were yellow, because there was something feline about her face, but of course they weren't. They were gray-green.

"It's getting late," she said.

"You don't have to go yet, do you?" I said.

"Not really," she said. "I don't have anything special on tomorrow. Do you?"

"No."

"When's your mama back?"

Your mama. Only Hanne could say something like that, as though there was still a remnant of childhood in her that hadn't been eroded yet.

I smiled.

"My mama? You make me feel like a ten-year-old."

"Your mother then!" she said.

"She won't be back until tomorrow night. Why's that?"

"I was thinking I might sleep here. I don't like driving in the dark much."

"Can you do that?"

"What?"

"Sleep here?"

"Why shouldn't I be able to?"

"You're in a relationship for starters."

"Not anymore."

"What! Is that true? Why didn't you say?"

"I don't tell you everything, young man," she said, laughing.

"But I tell you everything."

"Yes, you certainly do. But my splitting up has got nothing to do with you."

"Of course it has! It's got everything to do with me!" I said.

She shook her head.

"No?" I said.

"No," she said.

That was a no to me, there was no other way of interpreting it. However, I had given up on her ages ago. She no longer filled my every waking thought, it was several months since she had.

The chair creaked as she shifted position and drew her legs up underneath her.

I liked her. And I liked her being here, in the old house. That was enough, wasn't it?

We sat there for an hour, until the darkness outside was complete and all you could see through the windows was the reflection of the living room.

"It's starting to get late," I said. "Where would you like to sleep?"

"I don't know," she said. "In your room?" She smiled. "I don't like sleeping alone in a house I don't know," she said. "Especially not here. We're almost in the middle of the forest!"

"That's fine," I said. "I'll get a mattress."

I took the mattress off Yngve's bed and laid it on the floor next to mine. Fetched a pillow, sheet, duvet, and cover and put it on while she brushed her teeth downstairs in the bathroom.

She came into the room wearing panties and a T-shirt.

My throat constricted.

Her breasts were so clearly outlined under the T-shirt that I didn't know where to look.

"There we are," she said. "I'm ready. Aren't you going to brush your teeth?"

"Yes, of course," I said, holding her gaze. "I'll do it now."

When I returned she was sitting on the chair by the desk and looking at some pictures Yngve had sent me, which I had left lying around. They were dramatic, in black and white, some of them with me in exaggerated poses.

"How good you look!" she said, holding up one of the photos.

I rolled my eyes. "Shall we go to bed?" I said.

A shudder went through me as she got up.

Her naked thighs.

Her small bare feet.

Her beautifully formed breasts beneath the thin T-shirt.

She lay down on the mattress on the floor, I lay next to her on the bed. She pulled the sheet up to her chin and smiled at me. I smiled back. We chatted a little, she sat up and pushed the mattress closer until it was right under me.

I thought about lying next to her. Lying close to her. Stroking her breasts, stroking her thighs, stroking her bottom.

But she was a Christian. And she was completely innocent, she didn't know who she was or what effect she had on others, she could ask the strangest of questions and that side of her, which I loved, was also the reason I had to stay where I was.

"Goodnight," I said.

"Goodnight," she said.

We lay there, breathing, utterly still.

"Are you asleep?" she said after a while.

"No," I said.

"Can you stroke my back a little? I just love it."

"Of course," I said.

She flipped the duvet to the side and bared her back. I gulped and ran the palm of my hand over her back, back and forth, back and forth.

I don't know how long I was doing it for, a couple of minutes perhaps, but then I had to stop, otherwise I would have gone mad.

"Can you sleep now?" I said, withdrawing my hand.

"Yes," she said, pulling her T-shirt back down. "Goodnight again."

"Goodnight," I said.

She left the next morning, I read all day on the sofa, ate pizza and watched TV with Mom in the evening. She sat with the cat on her lap and a cup of coffee on the table in front of her. I had eaten most of the pizza, then sat with my feet on the table and a glass of Coke in my hand watching Albert and Herbert, a Swedish series, it was totally meaningless, it must have been for Mom too, but now that we were sitting there it required an effort to move.

Hanne filled me to the brim. I had thought about her all day. It was a long time since I had erased her from my mind, she didn't want to be with me, but now the whole rusty funfair, once shiny and gleaming, returned once more.

What would have happened if I had snuggled up to her last night?

Suddenly I saw everything in a new light. Suddenly I saw what had really happened.

Oh my God.

That was what she had wanted all along.

Oh, how obvious it was.

Oh my God. Oh my God.

Or was it? Was it only in my mind?

I half sat up, I had to ring her, then I slumped back on the sofa.

"What is it?" Mom said.

"Nothing," I said. "A thought just struck me."

Down at Dad's the dinners had come to a complete halt, at the weekend he generally sat alone drinking, apart from the occasional afternoon when he was sober and received visits from relatives. I had told him that Grandma had rung, yes, he knew, he said, and they're right, your mother should take better care of you. I pay huge sums in child maintenance, you know. Yeah, yeah, I knew. But the fact that I was so upset about not being allowed to go there anymore must have passed him by, or else that was precisely what hadn't happened, for I had said I would pop by on his birthday, he was turning forty-two, and Grandma and Grandad were there. I could smell her perfume in the hallway, but by then it was too late, I couldn't run off now, instead I opened the door to the living room where Grandad's brother Alf and his wife, Sølvi, were sitting, as well as Grandma and Grandad, Gunnar and Tove and their children. I didn't look at Grandma when I said hello, nor when I sat down at the table. I kept my eyes cast down as I ate a piece of cake and drank a cup of coffee. The gathering dispersed, some sat on the sofa, some took their plates out, the conversation swung this way and that. No alcohol was served, of course. I got up and went to the bathroom, when I got back Grandma was in the kitchen.

"That wasn't how we meant it, Karl Ove," she said. "Not like that."

"I see," I said, and walked past her.

So now all of a sudden she hadn't said it?

I suppose she hadn't called Mom either.

It then struck me that everyone here had heard about what had happened.

They might have discussed it. Me and my behavior. What the most appropriate way of dealing with it was.

While Dad, who drank himself senseless several times a week, he could just invite them here and pretend nothing had happened and everything was hunky-dory.

Oh shit, why wasn't Yngve here?

Why did I have to deal with all this on my own?

I stood my ground against Grandma and Grandad for a few more weeks, but then, one afternoon when I was down at Dad's, he asked me to go there with him and told me I shouldn't be so childish, I was too old for that, of course I should visit them.

I did, and everything was as it had always been.

Dad formal, Grandad formal, Grandma who kept the wheels in motion, Grandma who winked mischievously, who served us food and who took Dad with her into the garden afterward. It didn't matter to me that Dad had clearly split into two different personalities, one when he was drinking and one when he wasn't, which was the one I was used to and knew, this was just how it was, it wasn't something I gave much thought.

For the whole year, from when he moved out, through all the sentimental drunken babble, all the arguments and reconciliations, through all the jealous spats and all the chaos he created, Dad never tired of telling us about the day when his separation from Mom would become a divorce and he would finally be free to do what he wanted. The moment it happened he would marry Unni. I have such a good relationship with Unni, he said, I'm so happy when I wake up with her beside me, I want to do this for the rest of my life, so we're going to get married, Karl Ove, you may as well prepare yourself for that. Had it not been for the damned law we would have done it a year ago. That's how much it means to me.

That's fine, I said in response, unless I was drunk myself and just smiled stupidly, perhaps even with tears in my eyes because that happened too, I was as sentimental as he was, and we sat there in our chairs, each with moist eyes.

When the day came he was true to his word. It was July. In the morning Yngve, Kristin, and I caught the bus to Dad's flat, where they were walking around nervously, Dad in a flamboyant white shirt, Unni in a white dress made from coarse material. They weren't quite ready; Unni asked if we wanted something to drink while we were waiting. I glanced across at Dad. He was standing with a beer in his hand. Help yourselves to anything in the fridge. I'll get it, I said. I went into the kitchen and returned with three beers. Dad looked at me. Perhaps you might wait a bit with that, he said. It's early yet and it's going to be a long day. But you've got a bottle in your hand yourself! Unni said, and Dad smiled, yes, well, I suppose there's no harm in it.

Getting ready took longer than they had anticipated, I had time for two beers before we went to wait for the taxi to take us to the registry office. The sky was overcast and it was cold. I could feel the effect of the alcohol, it lay like a thin membrane over my thoughts, a canopy of mixed feelings. Yngve and Kristin had their arms around each other. I smiled at them, lit a cigarette, and gazed down at the river, which also seemed heavy beneath the somber sky, but the taxi arrived before I had even taken the first drag. We couldn't all fit in, no one had considered that. Dad said he could walk, it was only around the corner. No, Unni said, not on your wedding day.

"We can walk," Kristin said. "Can't we, Yngve?"

"Of course," he said.

And so it was decided. I went with Unni and Dad to the registry office, where the witnesseses were waiting. I vaguely remembered them from the party at our house the summer before. A small bald man and a large buxom woman with a thick shock of hair. I shook hands, they smiled, we stood waiting in a room, Dad looked at his watch impatiently, soon it would be their turn, but it would be quite a few minutes before Yngve and Kristin arrived.

They came rushing in through the hall, red-cheeked, ready for anything. Dad stared at them blankly, we went in, they stood in front of the official conducting the ceremony with a witness on either side, both said yes, passed each other the rings, after which Dad was married again. They chose a name that was new to both of them, or rather two names, each of which was fine and elegant on its own, but in combination sounded ridiculously stilted and pretentious.

On our way to the Sjøhuset restaurant, where we were going to have lunch, Dad said that one of the names, which was originally Scottish, had some connection with our family as actually in the distant past we had come from Scotland. Unni, for her part, said that the name existed in the ancestral past of her family. I could believe that, but what Dad had said was just nonsense, that much I did know.

Yngve shared my opinion, for our eyes met when Dad started talking.

We were shown to a table at the back of the maritime-themed restaurant and ordered shrimp and beer. Dad and Unni smiled and skål-ed, this was their day.

I had five beers there. Dad noticed, he told me to take it easy, not in a particularly unfriendly way, and I said I would, but I was in control. Yngve had the flu, so he wasn't going at it like me. Besides, Kristin was there, he kept turning to her, they sat there laughing and talking about something or other.

I was alternately flying – that must have been because of the alcohol, at least I was able to take the initiative and talk to everyone with ease in that lofty manner that occasionally but not very often took hold of me – and completely on the fringes, when everyone around the table, even Yngve, appeared alien to me, indeed not only that, but also totally irrelevant.

Kristin must have spotted this for she often broke out of her twosome with Yngve and said something to draw me into the conversation. She had done that ever since they got together, she had become a kind of big sister to me, someone whom I could talk to about everything, someone who understood. Yet she wasn't much older than me, so the big-sister role could vanish without warning and we would face each other as equals in age, almost as peers.

Eventually we left Sjøhuset and went back to Dad's. The witnesses didn't join us, they would be coming to the dinner in the evening, which had been booked at the Fregatten restaurant in Dronningens Gate. I continued drinking at Dad's place and was starting to get quite drunk, it was a wonderful feeling and slightly odd as it was light outside and all the passersby on the street were pursuing their everyday activities. I sat there, getting more and more pie-eyed, without anyone noticing, as far as I could judge, since the sole manifestation of my drunkenness was that my tongue was looser than usual. As always, alcohol gave me a strong sense of freedom and happiness, it lifted me onto a wave, inside it everything was good, and to prevent it from ever ending, my only real fear, I had to keep drinking more. When the time came Dad ordered a taxi, and I staggered down the stairs to the car that would take us the five hundred meters to Fregatten, and this time there was no question of there not being enough space. Once there we were shown to our table, close to the window in the big room, which was otherwise completely empty. I had been drinking since ten o'clock, now it was six, and it was only by the grace of God that I didn't fall through the window as I went to pull out my chair and sit down. I barely registered the presence of the others, no longer heard what they said, their faces were blurred, their voices a low rustle as though I was surrounded by faintly human-like trees and bushes in a forest somewhere, not in a restaurant in Kristiansand on my father's wedding day.

The waiter came, the food had been pre-ordered, what he wanted to know now was what we were going to drink. Dad ordered two bottles of red wine, I lit a cigarette and gazed at him through listless eyes.

"How's it going, Karl Ove? Are you all right?" he said.

"Yes," I said. "Congratulations, Dad. You've got a lovely wife, I have to say. I really like Unni."

"That's good," he said.

Unni smiled at me.

"But what should I call her?" I said. "She's a kind of stepmother, isn't she?"

"Call her Unni, of course," Dad said.

"What do you call Sissel?" Unni asked me.

Dad looked at her.

"Mom," I said.

"Then you could call me mother, couldn't you?" Unni said.

"I'll do that," I said. "Mother."

"What nonsense!" Dad snapped.

"Was the wine good, Mother?" I said, staring at her.

"Yes it was," she said.

Dad fixed his eyes on me. "That's enough of that now, Karl Ove," he said.

"OK," I said.

"So where are you going on your honeymoon?" Yngve said. "You haven't told us."

"Well, there'll be no honeymoon right away," Unni said. "But we've got a room booked at this hotel tonight."

The waiter came and held a bottle in front of Dad.

Dad nodded, not interested.

The waiter poured a little into his glass.

Dad tasted it, smacked his lips. "Exquisite," he said.

"Excellent," the waiter said, and filled all the glasses.

Oh, how welcome that warm dark taste was after all the sharp, cold, bitter beers!

I knocked it back in four long gulps. Yngve sat with his head supported on one hand staring out the window. He must have had his other hand resting on Kristin's thigh, judging by the crook of his arm. The two witnesses sat silent on either side of Unni and Dad.

"We've ordered the food for half past six," Dad said. He looked at Unni. "Perhaps we should inspect the room in the meantime?"

Unni smiled and nodded.

"We won't be long," Dad said, getting up. "You just relax and enjoy yourselves."

They kissed and left the room hand in hand.

I looked at Yngve, he met my gaze, then turned away. Dad's two colleagues were still silent. Usually I would have felt responsible for them and asked them some trivial question in the hope that it might interest them, if not me, but now I couldn't care less. If they wanted to sit there eyeing us, let them.

I filled my glass with red wine and drank half of it in one swallow, and then I went for a piss. I found myself in a long corridor, which I followed to the end without seeing a toilet anywhere. I walked back and down some stairs. Now I found myself in a cellar of some kind, completely white with a dazzling light and some sacks piled against the wall. Back up I went. Was it here? Another corridor, carpeted this time. No. I came out by the reception desk. Bathroom? I said. Beg your pardon? said the receptionist. Sorry, I said. But do you know where the bathroom is? He pointed to a door on the other side of the room without looking at me. I lurched toward it, had to insert an extra step to stop myself falling, opened the door, leaned against the wall, here it was, thank God. I went into one of the cubicles and locked the door, changed my mind, unlocked it, the toilet was empty, wasn't it? Yes, no one around. I hurried over to the washstand, unzipped, pulled the thing out and pissed in the sink. The yellow stream filled the whole basin for a brief instant before being sucked down the drain. Once I had finished I went back into the cubicle, locked the door, sat down on the toilet seat, rested my head on my hands, and closed my eyes. The next second I was gone.

At one point I seemed to hear someone calling my name, Karl Ove, Karl Ove, I heard, as though I was on some mountain plateau, I thought, and someone had been sent out in the mist to find me. Karl Ove, Karl Ove. Then I was gone again.

Next time I came around it was with a jolt. I hit my head against the cubicle wall. The toilet was completely silent.

What had happened? Where was I?

Oh no. This was the wedding day! Had I fallen asleep? Oh no, I had fallen asleep!

I hurried out, washed my face in cold water, walked past reception and into the dining room.

They were still there. They stared at me.

"Where on earth have you been, Karl Ove?" Dad said.

"I think I dozed off," I said, sitting down. "Have you eaten?"

"Yes," Unni said. "We've just finished. Would you like to have something now? We're waiting for dessert."

"Dessert's fine," I said. "I'm not that hungry."

"There"ll be coffee and brandy afterward," Dad said. "You'll pick up then, you'll see."

I finished the wine in my glass and refilled it. My head ached a bit, not much, it was as if a door had been opened a fraction, out streamed the pain, and I knew the wine was doing me good, it seemed to be closing the door again.

When we left it was no later than half past nine. I was drunk, but not as drunk as when I arrived, the sleep had diminished the effect of the alcohol, which the wine and brandy had not managed to replenish. But Dad's drunkenness had escalated prodigiously, he was standing with his arms around Unni waiting for the taxi, the notion of walking five hundred meters had not occurred to him, and it was only with great difficulty that he managed to squeeze himself onto the black leather seat.

Dad went to get some beer from the fridge when we got home. Unni put out some peanuts in a bowl. Yngve had taken a turn for the worse, he had a temperature and was lying on the sofa. Kristin was sitting in the chair next to me.

Unni brought a blanket and spread it over Yngve. Dad stood some distance away watching.

"Why are you wrapping the blanket round him?" he said. "Isn't he big enough to do it himself? You've never wrapped a blanket round me when I've been feeling a bit off color."

"Oh yes, I have," Unni said.

"Oh no, you haven't!" Dad almost shouted.

"Calm down now," Unni said.

"That's something, coming from you," Dad said, and went into the kitchen, where he sat down in a chair with his back to us.

Unni chuckled. Then she went in to pacify him. I drank half the beer in one go, belched up the froth, and realizing that Kristin was there, swallowed a couple of times with my hand in front of my mouth.

"Sorry," I said.

She laughed. "That's definitely not the worst thing that has happened this evening!" she said, so low that it could only be heard around the table, and then laughed in an equally muted tone.

Yngve smiled. I went to get another beer from the fridge. As I passed the newlyweds Dad got up and went back into the living room.

"I'm going to ring Grandma," he said. "They didn't even send me so much as a single flower!"

I opened the fridge door, took out a beer, and then, suddenly, I was back in the living room reaching for the opener on the table.

Yngve and Kristin were staring awkwardly into the middle distance. Dad was speaking in a loud voice.

"I got married today," he said. "Have you two realized? It's a big day in my life!"

I threw the bottle top onto the table, took a swig, and sat down.

"You could at least have sent some flowers! You could at least have shown that you care about me!"

Silence.

"Mother! Yes, but, Mother, please!" he shouted.

I turned.

He was crying. Tears were streaming down his cheeks. When he spoke his face contorted into an enormous grimace.

"I got married today! And you didn't want to come! You didn't even send any flowers! When it was your own son's wedding!"

Then he slammed down the receiver and stared into space for a few moments. Tears continued to run down his cheeks.

Eventually he got up and went into the kitchen.

I belched and looked at Unni. She got to her feet and ran after him. From the kitchen came the sound of sobbing and crying and loud voices.

"What do you think?" I said after a while, looking at Yngve. "Shall we go out on the town while we're at it?"

He sat up.

"I'm not well," he said. "I think I might have a high temperature. I should probably go home. Let's ring for a taxi."

"Without asking Dad first?" I said.

"Without asking Dad what?" Dad said from the doorway between the two rooms.

"We were thinking of slowly making a move," Yngve said.

"No, stay for a while," Dad said. "It's not every day your father gets married. Come on, there's more beer. We can enjoy ourselves a bit longer."

"I'm not well, you know," Yngve said. "I think I'll have to go."

"What about you then, Karl Ove?" he said, gazing at me through his glazed, almost completely vacant eyes.

"We're sharing a taxi," I said. "If they go, I have to go."

"Fine," Dad said. "I'll go to bed then. Goodnight and thanks for coming today."

Straight afterward we heard his footsteps on the stairs. Unni came in to see us.

"That's how it is sometimes," she said. "Lots of emotions, you know. But you go. We'll see you soon and thanks for coming!"

I got up. She gave me a hug, then she hugged Yngve and Kristin.

Outside I had to sit down on the curb, I was much too tired to stand up for the minutes it would take the taxi to arrive.

When I woke up in bed the next day there was something surreal about all that had happened, I wasn't certain of anything, other than that I had been more drunk than I had ever been before. And that Dad had been drunk. I knew how drunkenness appeared in the eyes of the sober and was horrified, everyone had seen how drunk I had been at my father's wedding. That he had also been drunk didn't help because he hadn't shown it until right at the end when we were alone in his flat and all his emotions were flowing freely.

I had brought shame on them.

That was what I had done.

What good was it that I only wanted the best?

I spent the last weeks of the summer in Arendal. Rune, the program director at the radio station, ran a kind of agency, he sold cassettes to local gas stations, and when one evening I complained that I didn't have a summer job, he suggested I sell his cassettes on the street. I bought them from him for a fixed sum, he didn't care about only making a small profit, and so I could sell them at whatever price I liked. The towns in Sørland were full of tourists in the summer, purse strings were loose, if you were selling music from the charts you were bound to be in with a chance.

"Good idea," I said. "My brother's living in Arendal this summer. Perhaps I can set up there?"

"Perfect!"

And so one morning I loaded a bag of clothes, a camping chair, a camping table, a ghetto blaster, and a box of cassettes into Mom's car, which Yngve had at his disposal all summer, sat in the passenger seat, put on my new Ray-Bans, and leaned back as Yngve engaged first gear and set off down the hill.

The sun was shining, which it had done all July, there was very little traffic on this side of the river, I rolled down the window, stuck out my elbow, and sang along with Bowie as we raced through the spruce forest, the gleaming river appearing and disappearing between the trees, occasionally alongside sandbanks where children were swimming and screaming and shouting.

We talked about Grandma and Grandad, whom we had visited the previous day, about how time seemed to stand still there compared with the house in Sørbøvåg, where in the past two years it seemed to have accelerated and caused everything to go into decline.

We drove through the tiny center of Birkeland to Lillesand and from there onto the E18, the stretch I knew inside out after all the journeys back and forth in my childhood.

I put on a cassette by the Psychedelic Furs, their most commercial LP, which I loved.

"Have I told you about the girl who came up to me in London?" Yngve said.

"No," I said.

"'You're the spitting image of the lead singer in Psychedelic Furs,' she said, and then she wanted someone to take a photo of us together."

He looked at me and laughed.

"I thought it was Audun Automat from Tramteatret you looked like?" I said.

"Yes, but that's not quite as flattering," he said.

We drove past Knut Hamsun's Nørholm property, I leaned forward to look past Yngve and into the grounds, I had been there once, on a class trip when I was in ninth grade, we were shown round by Hamsun's son and saw the cottage where he wrote and a few pieces of furniture he had made.

Now it was empty and looked overgrown.

"Do you remember Dad saying he had seen Hamsun on the bus to Grimstad once?"

"No," Yngve said. "Did he say that?"

"Yes, an old man with a stick and a white beard."

Yngve shook his head. "Imagine all the lies he's told us over the years. There must be tons we still believe without realizing it."

"Yes," I said. "I can't say I'm sorry he's moving."

"No," Yngve said. "Me neither."

Dad and Unni had gotten jobs in Northern Norway, they were going to work at the same gymnas and during recent weeks had packed everything they owned and sent it north. They would be driving up in a couple of days.

"Has Kristin recovered from the wedding?" I said. "I assume it must have been a bit of a shock?"

"It was somewhat special, yes," he said.

We drove down to Grimstad, past the Oddensenter Mall, the old Hotel

Norge, where Hamsun had done some of his writing, up the steep incline, and onto the wide plain.

"And what was that business with the hotel?" I said. "They booked a room at the hotel where we ate, they even went up to see it. But did they sleep there?"

Yngve shrugged. "Perhaps they went back there after we left?"

"Didn't look like it."

"No, but there are a few things in their lives they don't plan. Such as when they said, if you remember, they wouldn't be having a honeymoon. But the day after they caught the boat to Denmark and stayed at a hotel in Skagen."

"That's true," I said.

We drove past Kokkeplassen, Mom's old workplace, where I had been at a nursery for a year, and I craned my neck, there had been a cliff there, we had climbed up a tree over the cliff every day, I seemed to remember. But it wasn't a cliff, it was just a little slope, I could see now. And the tree must have been chopped down. Then we motored down the hill with Arendal below us and beyond it the island of Tromøya, in all its nostalgic splendor, flooded with sunshine.

"Well?" Yngve said. "Are you going to find a spot right now?"

"May as well," I said.

Nothing had been arranged in advance; Rune thought all you had to do was ask in a shop whether they minded if you set up outside in the street and used their electricity, and then hope they didn't charge you a commission. Offer them a couple of hundred if they dithered was his advice.

Yngve parked the car, we walked down the pedestrianized street, I popped into a randomly chosen boutique and asked whether it was all right if I sold cassettes in the street outside and if they had a socket I could use. Might attract customers for them, too.

No problem.

Once that was arranged we drove up to his studio. He had taken his prelims that spring, after finishing the foundation year in comparative politics before Christmas, and now he was working at the Central Hotel in town to earn some money for a trip to China he and Kristin were planning later in the autumn.

The studio he rented was by Langsæ, outside Arendal, and I would be staying for three weeks, sleeping on an inflatable mattress on the floor.

We hadn't spent so much time together since we were little.

The next day he drove me to the town center with all my paraphernalia. It was fantastic standing there in the quiet morning streets, with the sea so blue and heavy and still before us, erecting the old yellow '70s camping table, arranging the cassettes on it – Genesis, Falco, Eurhythmics, Madonna, and anything else that sold well in those months – pulling the cable from the shop, plugging in the cassette recorder, sitting down on the chair, putting on my shades, and pressing play.

The King of Arendal, that was me.

Beside my table was an ice cream stand, and soon after I arrived a girl started work there. She swept the street in front, carried in a few boxes, came out with a rag in her hand and wiped the outside of the window, went back in, and stayed there.

She looked great. Reddish hair, freckles, big curves. When I saw her next, half an hour later, she was wearing a white apron.

Terrific!

But she didn't look in my direction, not once.

That could be arranged.

Gradually people began to trickle by, they walked up and down the small pedestrian street, passed my table several times, I kept a careful eye on them and was quick to recognize faces and bodies. Some of them stopped and examined my selection of cassettes, and if they pointed to one, I jumped up, took an unopened one from the box beside the table, pocketed the money they passed me, thanked them, registered a cross on a sheet of paper I kept handy and sat down.

What a job!

At eleven, sales began to take off with a vengeance. Through to one I sold loads of cassettes, then business flagged until I shut up shop at a few minutes to four, when Yngve came to pick me up.

At his place I counted out the money due to Rune and put it in a plastic bag. The rest I spent when we went out in the evening. I bought bottles of white wine in ice buckets, danced, chatted to whoever came over to Yngve's table. White wine, that was the discovery of the summer for me, it slid down like water, and the buzz it produced made me feel light and happy.

The next day the girl in the ice cream stand smiled at me when she arrived. A little smile, it was true, but unmistakeable.

I knocked on her window at eleven and asked if I could have a glass of water.

She handed me one.

"We're neighbors," I said. "What's your name?"

"Sigrid," she said.

Her accent was curious. The "r" was hard. She also pronounced the "d."

"Where are you from?"

"Iceland," she said with a beam.

That was as far as we got, she didn't come over to exchange a word or two, a little smile and a nod sufficed: the day had begun.

A couple of evenings later she was suddenly standing in front of me at the disco. I was so drunk that everything except her face was blurred. When I woke up in her bed the next morning I couldn't remember how I had got there, was mystified as to how I had managed it, everything was black apart from a couple of scenes from her room: she is lying on the bed wearing only panties and I'm on top of her, we're making out, I kiss her magnificent breasts, I put my hand between her legs, no, she says, absolutely no way, and I get up and take off my underpants and stand in front of her in all my glory, which can't have impressed her as much as I must have imagined it would because she laughed at me and said no again.

I held my head in shame. I had of course registered long ago that she wasn't there, but I hadn't considered where she was until the next second, when I sat up and said hello into the empty room.

No answer. Was she in the toilet perhaps?

I stood up.

Oh no, I was still naked.

On the table in the middle of the room there was a note.

Hi, King of Arendal!
I've gone to sell some ice cream.
See you again, maybe.
S.
(Put the door on the latch when you leave.)

Why on earth had she underlined maybe?

I got dressed, stuffed the note in my back pocket, put the door on the latch as she had requested, and went down the narrow, gloomy, and musty-smelling staircase. I hadn't the slightest idea where I was. For all I knew, I could have been kilometers out of town.

The sunlight hit me in the eyes as I emerged.

A street, a house on the other side.

Where was the town?

I followed the street down, rounded a corner and suddenly saw where I was. Somewhere up by Skytebanen!

I strolled down to the center, gave the ice cream stand a wide berth, and sat down in Pollen with a Coke and a bag of rolls. The mere smell of seawater put me in a good mood.

After watching the boats entering and leaving the harbor, the gulls circling, and the cars heading along Langbrygga on the other side, all beneath a deep-blue, motionless sky, I went to see Yngve at the hotel. He was dealing with some guests, I sat down on the sofa and observed him, his patient smile and polite nod, speaking in English, dressed in his not quite immaculate hotel uniform.

When they had gone he came over to me.

"Where did you get to then?"

"I went back to the ice cream girl's place," I said, and could hear what a wonderful sentence that was to say.

"How was it? Are you two together now?"

"Don't think so. She wasn't there when I woke up. But she left me a note and underlined the word maybe. See you again, maybe. What do you think that means?"

He shrugged, suddenly uninterested.

"Kristin will be at my place tonight, by the way."

"Where should I sleep then?"

"In the bathroom."

"Seriously?"

"It's no problem, is it?"

"No, of course not. I was thinking of you two."

"Don't worry, it'll be fine. I've warned her. Anyway, I stayed at her place last night."

It was fine too, though it felt a little strange lying on the mattress in the bathroom listening to Yngve and Kristin giggling and laughing and chatting in subdued voices in the bed.

As I walked down the pedestrian street the next morning I was excited. I had got up extra early to be there before her, I thought that would give me an edge. She arrived, smiled her little smile, and went into her stand. I stayed where I was, sold loads of cassettes, and when I finally did go over to her it was to ask for a glass of water.

I was given one.

"Thanks for the other night," I said.

"Thank you," she said.

"I was thinking of going out tonight. Would you like to come?"

She shook her head.

"Tomorrow night then?"

She shook her head again. "You're not my type," she said with a smile. "We could meet though."

"When?"

She shrugged and smiled again.

I went back to my table and the days passed. She attended to her business in her stand, I attended to mine, once in a while our glances met and we smiled.

That was all.

I bought a felt pen and some cardboard from a bookshop and hung a sign on the tree beside the table. ORGINAL CASSETTES, I wrote, then the price and the names of some Top Twenty artists. It wasn't long before a man in his midforties stopped and said it was "original," not "orginal." I was good at writing, my spelling was perfect, so I said no, you're wrong, that's how it's spelled. There's not another "i" in "orginal." I stuck to my guns, he stuck to his, and eventually he walked away shaking his head.

The money was rolling in. People were crazy about my cassettes, buying four or five at a time, so when evening came and I went out with Yngve I didn't stint myself. I drank as I had never drunk before. If I ran out of cash all I had to do was sell some more cassettes the next day. Once a week Rune dropped by in his red car with fresh stock. And now and then someone I knew from the old days happened by. Dag Lothar, for example, who had a summer job in a bank and was the same as always. Geir Prestbakmo, who was at vocational college and rode around on a brand-new moped, he was his old self as well. And then John, the class tough guy, who just loafed around, as he put it.

Yngve and I went to the other side of Tromøya one day, to the place where Dad had always taken us swimming. Yngve parked the car by the rifle range, we walked down through a dense prickly thicket, I relished the incomparable smell of heather, pine needles, and salt water, the massive gray ridge that had been there for so many million years, and then the sight of the sea below. The air was thick with insects. I stamped my foot down hard at every step, the area was full of adders, at least it had been when I was growing up.

Once Dad and I had encountered one only a few hundred meters from where I was walking now, it was spring, the snake had been stretched out on a stone slab in the sun. I must have been about ten. Dad went crazy, started throwing stones at it, I watched as they seemed to sink into the snake's body as they struck, the adder tried to get away, it was hit again and again until it lay still beneath a pile of stones. But as we were about to walk on, out it wriggled again. Dad went closer, continuing to throw stones at it, he wanted me to do the same, I was on the point of throwing up, the snake was still now, Dad ventured closer and crushed its head with the big rock he was holding in his hand.

I turned. Yngve was behind me. We walked along the spine of sea-smoothed rocks and found a warm spot by the water's edge. I went down to examine the great sinkhole in the rock, which wasn't so big anymore, dived into the foaming water, swam out to the long island maybe a hundred meters away and then back again. Lay down to dry in the sun, ate biscuits and oranges, smoked and drank coffee. Yngve suggested going with him to Kristin's place afterward, so that would save him having to take me to the town center. Is that all right? I said, of course, he said, they're incredibly open and kind. Anyway, the rest of the family's on holiday, so she's the only one there.

A few hours later he pulled up outside their house. We watched a video and ate pizza. Yngve had been there a lot over the past six months, he liked her parents, her brother and sister, and they liked him. He was like a son in the house, I could see.

Her sister's name was Cecilie and she was one year younger than me, I saw some photos of her and was impressed. Her brother was much younger than them, he was still at primary school.

I stayed the night and slept in Cecilie's bed. We decided to go out together the following night, Kristin would bring along some girlfriends, but first we would eat in a restaurant, just us three.

I drank two bottles of white wine with the food, and when we went to the discotheque I had three more.

And who should I meet there but the girl from the ice cream stand!

The four of us took a taxi to Tromøya. I sat in the front seat. We had stood wrapped around each other making out while we waited for it to come, and, still dazed by that, I stretched my arms back toward her. She took my hands and caressed them. Her hands were very rough, I noticed.

"Oh, Karl Ove," Yngve said from behind me.

They laughed.

Furious, I retracted my arms.

"How much have you had to drink, actually?" Yngve said.

"Five," I said.

"Five bottles of wine?" Yngve said. "Are you kidding?"

"No," I said.

"No wonder you're behaving so weirdly. If it had been me, I would have been lying in the street snoring."

"True," I said.

The taxi stopped, I paid, we went into the house.

The same thing happened there, with the sole exception that this time she was absolutely naked. But no, she didn't want to. Alabaster skin, full-bosomed and beautiful, she lay there saying no, no, no.

When I awoke next morning she was gone.

Still drunk, I went upstairs and into the kitchen, where Yngve and Kristin were having breakfast.

"She caught the bus a while ago," Kristin said. "She said to say hello and thank you for yesterday."

For a change, the sky was overcast. I decided to give this day a miss, lie on the sofa and read until Yngve went in to do his evening shift. The next day she wasn't there. There was a girl in her twenties at the hatch. I asked her where Sigrid was, she said she had finished, yesterday had been her last day. Did she have any idea where she was? No, she didn't.

I went to Kristin's a couple more times, and on the last evening the family had returned from their holiday. I said hello, they were as nice as Yngve had said they were, we rented a video of Apocalypse Now, Kristin sat leaning against Yngve while I sat beside Cecilie, we exchanged occasional glances and smiled, we were so clearly the little brother and sister on the floor below our two siblings, who, if they had decided to get married, would not have surprised anyone.

There was a tension in the air, I felt it all evening, but what kind of tension was it?

We were a bit shy with each other, was that what it was?

I saw how Cecilie sometimes tried to wrest the initiative, as though wanting to make it clear that she was not only on an equal footing with her sister but also very distinct from her.

I liked to see that. Her will, how that led the way and she followed.

She did ballet, and she was good, Kristin had said; after leaving school she was going to take the ballet school entrance exams.

The way she threw herself onto the sofa. The way her face could suddenly become quite open and artless when she smiled.

But this was no good. There was no point even thinking about it.

Yet I did.

There was only a week left of the summer job and I joined Yngve whenever he drove to Kristin's, I enjoyed being in her home too, there was such a nice atmosphere, they were good people and it was reflected everywhere in the house.

I saw how Yngve was treated and how happy he was. I thought to myself, come on now, don't be an idiot, just let him have it all.

But I also thought about Cecilie, because when she was in the room, I could feel her presence with the whole of my body.

And I knew it was the same for her too.

First of all her parents left and went to bed. Then Yngve and Kristin left and went to bed.

We sat alone in the big living room, on opposite sides of the table. We made conversation, for we couldn't talk about or show anything of what we felt, or rather of what I felt and of what I imagined she also felt.

"I was there when they got together," I said. "At Vindilhytta. You should have seen it. It was really sweet."

"Yes, they are sweet," she said.

"Yes," I said.

What kind of situation was this I suddenly found myself in? In a house on Tromøya alone with the sister of Yngve's girlfriend?

Nothing wrong with the situation. Only with my feelings.

"Well," she said with a yawn. "Time to go to bed."

"I'm going to stay up for a bit," I said.

"See you at breakfast then."

"Yes, goodnight."

"Goodnight."

She disappeared down the stairs, moving in that self-assured elegant way she had. Thank God I was going home soon and could put all this behind me.

The following evening, which was the last, I went to see Yngve, he was on the evening shift and served me an enormous pizza, which I ate at the table in the lobby while he worked and came over for a chat whenever he could. He said Cecilie and Kristin were in town. Kristin was coming over soon. He didn't know what Cecilie was doing. But she came as well, I joined them, it was the last night, in just a few hours I would be home again. Nevertheless, even though I knew it was stupid, I stayed close to Cecilie, we walked side by side, we had nothing to say to each other, we just walked and listened to each other's breathing, which was deep and tremulous, and then we hugged and kissed, again and again.

"What are we doing?" I said. "Can we do this?"

"I've been thinking about that ever since I first saw you," she said, holding my face between her hands.

"Me too," I said.

We stood wrapped in each other's arms for a long time.

"At the last moment," Cecilie said.

"Yes," I said.

"Now you mustn't have any regrets," she said. "Or rather, of course you can. But tell me if you do. Do you promise?"

"I won't have any regrets," I said. "I promise. Are you at home next weekend?"

She nodded.

"Can I come and see you?"

She nodded again, we kissed for a last time and then I went, turned, she waved, I waved.

Yngve was standing behind the counter studying a sheet of paper when I went into the hotel to get the keys. I said nothing about what had happened. Were we going out together now? I wondered as I walked up Arendal's steep hills in the hazy darkness of the late-summer night. In which case how strange it would be for Yngve and me to be going out with two sisters! Wasn't there something a bit circus-like about this? Roll up, roll up, come and see the two brothers who go out with two sisters! But why should I care? He lived in Bergen while I lived in Kristiansand, and soon he and Kristin would be in China.

This had completely bowled me over.

She was walking home now too, also bowled over.

Yngve drove me to the bus the following morning. I didn't say anything then either. When I sat down in a window seat and looked for him, he was already on his way up the street.

I closed my eyes and could feel how thoroughly exhausted I was. As the bus turned into Grimstad town center I was asleep and didn't wake until it passed Kristiansand Zoo. I jumped off at the Timenes intersection and caught a different bus for the last part up to Boen. Out of habit I looked for a glimpse of Jan Vidar in his window as the bus crossed Solsletta, but he wasn't there and his car wasn't in the driveway either.

I took out a cigarette and looked down at the waterfall, the last kilometer home was a drag, but I did finally manage to motivate myself and set off with my bag on my back.

As I came up the last hill I saw Mom by the barrel we used to burn paper in. A thin, almost transparent flame flickered back and forth over the edge. She caught sight of me and walked down.

"Hi," she said with a smile. "How was it?"

"Fine," I said. "How's everything here?"

"I've been fine," she said.

"Good," I said. "Think I'll have a shower and change."

"You do that," she said. "I've made dinner. Just have to heat it up. Are you hungry?"

"Yes, starving."

In the evening I sat at my desk reading, but I couldn't settle down, my thoughts raced this way and that, and everywhere they went they confused me, none of them were as they had been. Now and then I looked out the window, saw the garden merge imperceptibly into the dense forest behind the little potato patch, felt the trees close to us waiting or listening, darkness always gave me this sense, and as the gentle gusts of wind grew stronger the leaves trembled and the branches swayed. A week ago I had never seen her, hardly knew who she was. Now we were going out.

What about Hanne?

And the girl in the ice cream stand, what had that been?

It was as though I was faced with a jigsaw puzzle made of pieces from several sets. Nothing fit, nothing made any sense.

I went downstairs to Mom in the living room.

"Are you sure you've been fine while I've been away?" I said.

She put down the book she was reading on the table.

"Yes," she said. "I really have been."

"You weren't lonely?"

She smiled. "Not at all. I was at work. There was a lot to do. And then it was wonderful to come up here afterward."

Presumably roused by our voices, the cat padded across the floor with a sleepy face. He jumped straight into my lap and rested his heavy head on my thigh.

"How about you?" she asked.

I shrugged.

"It was fine," I said. "I liked selling the cassettes on the street. In a way I lived from hand to mouth. Earned money during the day and spent it at night."

"Oh?" Mom said. "What did you spend it on?"

"Well, different things," I said. "I went out for meals a lot. That costs money. And then I had a beer once in a while with Yngve. But I've saved a bit too. I've brought a bag of money back with me. Nearly three thousand kroner."

I hadn't counted the money, in fact I had forgotten all about it, so now I got up and went into the hall to check and keep it in something more suitable than a plastic bag.

But the bag wasn't there.

I had dropped it on the floor just inside the door, hadn't I?

Yes. On top of the shoes. A white Beisland bag it had been. Full of creased notes.

Had Mom put it away?

I went back into the living room.

"The bag that was in the hall," I said. "Did you move it?"

She looked up at me, her index finger keeping her place on the page.

"A plastic bag in the hall?" she said. "I threw it away."

"Chucked it away? Are you crazy? There was three thousand kroner in it!"

And it wasn't even mine, it was Rune's. In fact, he should have had more than that because I had spent quite a chunk of his money during the past few days there.

"You had money in it?" Mom said. "And you left it on the floor? How was I supposed to guess?"

"Where did you throw it?"

"In the barrel. Where we burn paper."

"Have you burned it? How could you? Have you burned the money?"

I shook my hands in the air. Then I dashed into the hall, slipped on a pair of shoes, and ran up the slope.

There was the bag.

But was the money in it?

I snatched at it and looked inside.

Oh, thank God. There it was.

I took the bag, emptied the money onto the floor of my room, counted it, there was a bit more than three thousand two hundred kroner, put it in a drawer, and went down to the living room.

"You found it?" Mom said.

I nodded. Put on a record, ran my eye along a bookshelf, eventually picked out Hamsun's Pan, sat down on the sofa, and began to read.

There was a week left before school began and I decided to spend it writing some reviews, went down to town, dropped in on Steinar Vindsland, it was good I came, he said, he had been trying to get hold of me, had called a couple of times without any luck.

"Thing is I'm finishing here. I've got a new job on Fædrelandsvennen. You can probably keep going here, but I can't guarantee it, after all it was me who hired you."

"That's a shame," I said.

"Yeah, well," he said. "Anyway, I have an offer for you. I'll be responsible for the young adults and music sections. How would you feel about writing for Fevennen? It wouldn't be record reviews, Sigbjørn Nedland does that, as I'm sure you know. But material for young adults, and then maybe reviews of gigs and interviews with bands."

"That would be good," I said.

"Great," he said. "So I'll see you!"

Nye Sørlandet was a sinking ship, that was common knowledge, so this was good news. Fædrelandsvennen was a paper everybody read. If I wrote something there, everyone would see it.

I went to Platebørsen and bought five LPs to celebrate my promotion, which was how I considered it. I had taken the money from the plastic bag, the odd couple of hundred kroner wouldn't make any difference anyway, somehow I would have to find the money to pay Rune.

When I returned home Yngve rang, eager to know what had happened on the last evening. Cecilie had been so strange and secretive and was writing a letter to me.

I told him.

"So you're going out with Cecilie?"

"Yes, I guess you could say that."

"Isn't that a bit weird?"

"Yes. Does it matter?"

"No . . . maybe it doesn't."

"Good!"

But it made no sense to me. Two days later the letter arrived. She was confused, it had been like a dream, she wrote, and she shouldn't tell me, but when she had left me that evening, tears had been streaming down her cheeks. On the Friday I went to see her, we were alone, we had to edge our way forward. We talked about what had actually taken place. She said she had been so intrigued by me after all the things that Kristin had told her and the photos she had seen. She had wondered whether perhaps something might happen, and after she had seen me she wanted something to happen, but it couldn't, after all we were just the younger siblings. I said I had felt the same. She said Yngve had looked at us one evening, first at her, then at me, then at her again. It had been in the air. Yes, I said, and I ached. We didn't know each other, didn't know what it was, but then it happened again, suddenly we were embracing, kissing each other, and then we went to bed . . .

But we didn't make love. I thought she was so young, we didn't know each other, and I ought to tread carefully . . .

No, that wasn't the real reason.

The real reason was that I came before anything had happened.

I was so ashamed that I lay totally still so as not give myself away.

And not only then, it happened every time we were together in the ensuing weeks.

At the first editorial meeting I attended at Fædrelandsvennen I suggested writing an article about the Sissel Kyrkjebø phenomenon. She was lauded by all the newspapers, had sold an unimaginable number of records, but why actually? I asked.

"Good idea. Go for it," Steinar said.

"Why does Sissel sell?" I called the article. "Savor the name," I wrote. "Sissel Kyrkjebø . . ." And then I made fun of all the associations you could make, with Christianity, the farming community and nationalism, she was even wearing traditional dress on the LP cover. She stood for everything I disliked, it was false, manipulative, clichéd, a dreadful picture postcard of the world, who could bear the beauty of it, and on top of everything in such an undemanding form?

There were lots of letters to the editor over the following days. One opened with the words "Karl Ove Knausgaard. Savor the name," then feasted on its associations with the sterility of rocks (knaus) and the scant yield of a farm (gaard). Fædrelandsvennen was a popular newspaper, it was loyal to its readers, the qualities that I preferred – innovation, the avant-garde, provocation – were not for the likes of them, and in the months that followed there was a conspicuously large number of glowing articles about Sissel Kyrkjebø.

I loved it, finally my name had been raised above the anonymous ranks of the crowd, not much, though not so little either.

The weekend after the article appeared Yngve came to visit, and as usual we dropped in on Grandma and Grandad. On this occasion Gunnar was there. He rose to his feet and stared straight at me as we entered the kitchen.

"Well, here he is, the world champion," he said.

I smiled at him inanely.

"Who do you think you are?" he said. "Do you realize what an idiot you've made of yourself? No, you don't, do you? You think you're something special."

"What do you mean?" I mumbled, even though I knew all too well what he was talking about.

"What makes you think that you of all people are right and everybody else is wrong? You, a seventeen-year-old schoolkid! You don't know anything. Yet you assume the lofty position of an arbiter of taste. Oh, it's so pathetic!"

I said nothing, studied the floor. Yngve did the same.

"Sissel Kyrkjebø is a popular artist loved by everyone. And she gets good reviews. Then you come along and say everyone's wrong! You! No!" he said, and shook his head. "No, no, no!"

I had never seen him so angry or worked up before, and I was shaken.

"Well, I was actually on my way," he said. "Good to see you, Yngve. You're still in Bergen, right?"

"Yes, for the time being," he said. "But I'm going to China in the autumn."

"There you go," Gunnar said. "Off to see the world!"

Then he left, and we turned to Grandma and Grandad, who had been sitting at the kitchen table minding their own business during this little interlude.

"I agree with you anyway," Yngve said as we got into the car to go home. "I think what you wrote was perfectly reasonable."

"Yes, of course it is," I said, laughing, there was something exhilarating about all this.

Cecilie and I talked for hours on the telephone. She trained hard, was enormously disciplined and determined, things came to her easily and she was open to life. But there was also something closed inside her, or silent, I didn't know quite what, but I noticed it. At the weekend I hitchhiked to her place, unless she came to mine. I preferred to be there because I too was treated like a son of the house, though not with the same acceptance as Yngve, I sensed, we were younger and siblings of the other two, something to do with that meant we weren't taken as seriously, I felt, as though we were imitations, as though we weren't ourselves or people in our own right.

When we were alone, we were, of course. Autumn descended upon us, we walked into the deepening gloom, hand in hand or entwined, Cecilie delicate yet strong-willed, open yet closed, full of platitudes yet passionately herself.

One evening we went to the primary school I had once attended, not so far from their house. I had been twelve when I left, now I was seventeen. The five years felt like an eternity, there was almost nothing that connected me with the person I had been, and I remembered next to nothing of what I had done then.

But when I saw the school before us, hovering in the mist and darkness, my memories exploded inside me. I let go of Cecilie's hand, approached the building, and pressed my hand against the black timbers. The school really existed, it wasn't merely a place in my imagination. My eyes were moist with emotion, it was as though the whole bounteous world that had been my childhood had returned for an instant.

And then there was the mist. I loved mist and what it did to the world around us.

I remembered Geir and me running around with Anne Lisbet and Solveig in the mist, and the memory had such power that the thought was painful. It tore me to pieces. The soft gravel, the trees glinting with humidity, the lights shimmering, shimmering.

"Strange to think that you actually went to this school," Cecilie said. "I don't connect you with Sandnes at all."

"Neither do I," I said, gripping her hand again. We walked alongside the building, toward the annex, which in my imagination was brand new. I craned my neck the whole way, running my gaze over everything I could, absorbing it all.

"We must have been here at the same time, no?" I said as we clambered down the slope to the football field.

"Yes," she said. "When you were in the sixth grade, I was in the fifth."

"And Kristin was in eighth grade and Yngve his first at gymnas," I said.

"And now I'm in the second at gymnas," she said.

"Yep, the world is tiny," I said.

We laughed, walked across the empty field, and followed the gravel path through the forest to Kongshavn. Only a few hundred meters farther on, the sensation of coming home, of recognizing, was gone, we were stepping into the outer zone of childhood, where I had been only a few times and where the scenery assumed a dreamlike quality which I both recognized and discovered anew.

Everything was so odd. It was so odd to be here, and it was odd to be with Cecilie, the sister of Yngve's girlfriend. It was also odd to go home to Mom and our life there, which differed so starkly from the life I lived away from home.

I had started at another local radio station, it was bigger, all the equipment was new, the rooms were fantastic, they had asked if I wanted to work for them and I did. I still played football, I still wrote for the newspaper, and I went out more and more often. When I wasn't with Hilde, Eirik, and Lars, I drank with Espen and his friends, or with colleagues from the radio station, unless I was hanging out with Jan Vidar. It was hard to take Cecilie into this world. She was something different for me. When I sat in Kjelleren drinking she was infinitely distant; when I was sitting next to her she was infinitely near.

One problem was her devotion to me, it placed me in a superior position, which I didn't want. Yet I was inferior to her, indeed as low as anyone can be, that was where I was for the weeks that became months because what I was slowly realizing, the terrible truth that my relationship with her had revealed, was that I couldn't make love to anyone. I couldn't do it. A naked breast or a hurried caress across the inside of a thigh was enough, I came long before anything had begun.

Every time!

So there I lay, beside her, this girl who was such a delight, and I was pressing my groin against the mattress in an attempt to hide my humiliating secret.

She was young, and for a long time I hoped she wouldn't realize, she probably did though, but I doubted she could imagine it was a permanent condition.

One evening she mentioned that her mother had asked whether she had considered going to the doctor for the contraceptive pill.

She said this with a smile, but there was expectation in her voice, and I, trying to repress it, or deceiving myself into believing this really wasn't happening, began to look for a way out. Not that I didn't want it, I did too of course, no, there were other problems, greater ones, for example, that we lived in separate towns and that I couldn't spend all my weekends with her.

Those were my thoughts, at the same time I thought about her devotion, it was immense, she would do anything for me, I knew that, not least through her letters, which were permeated with longing even though they were written barely hours after we had last seen each other.

No, I had to get out of this relationship.

She came over one Saturday morning at the beginning of December, intending to stay until the following day, when her parents would come to pick her up, they wanted to meet Mom, after all she was the future mother-in-law of both of their girls. It was a kind of endorsement of our relationship, and perhaps I didn't want this. We went for a walk, the countryside was frozen, the grass in the meadow below the house glittered with rime in the light from the street lamps, afterward we had dinner with Mom, and then we caught the bus down to the Hotel Caledonien, Cecilie was wearing a red dress, we danced to Chris de Burgh, "Lady in Red," and I thought, no, I can't finish this, I don't want to finish it.

We caught the night bus home, walked hand in hand over the last part, it was cold, she snuggled up to me. We entered the house, took off our coats and I thought: I'm going to do it now. We went upstairs, Cecilie first, she opened the door to my room.

"What are you doing?" I said.

She turned and gaped at me in surprise.

"Going to bed?" she said.

"You're sleeping in there," I said, pointing to Yngve's room, which was adjacent to mine.

"Why?" she said, looking at me with big eyes.

"It's over," I said. "I'm breaking it off. I'm sorry, but it's not working out."

"What did you say?"

"It's over," I said. "You have to sleep in there."

She did as I said, her every movement leaden. I undressed and went to bed. She was crying, I could hear her clearly, the wall was thin. I put my fingers in my ears and went to sleep.

The next day was torture.

Cecilie cried, Mom was wondering what was wrong, I could see, but she didn't ask, and neither of us wanted to say anything. After a while her parents drove up. Mom had laid out a big brunch, now we had to sit there and have a nice time, both families. But Cecilie was silent, her eyes were red. Our parents made conversation, I chimed in with an occasional comment. Of course they knew something was wrong, but not what, and probably thought we'd had an argument.

But we had never argued. We had laughed, played, chatted, kissed, gone on walks together, drunk wine together, and lay naked in bed together.

She didn't cry while they were there, she sat quietly and ate very slowly, her movements constrained, and I could sense her parents were very concerned, it was as though they were embracing her with their presence and their actions.

Then at last they left.

Thank God they were going to Arendal. It was far away, and the bridge Yngve represented between the two families was even farther away.

Sometime between Christmas and New Year Dad phoned. He was drunk, I could hear that from the slur. He didn't quite have full control of his voice, there was an added timbre, although the tone didn't sound any more resonant or complex as a result.

"Hi," I said. "Merry Christmas. Are you still in the Canaries?"

"Yes," he said. "We're here for a few more days. It's wonderful to get away from the darkness, you know."

"Yes," I said.

"We're going to have a baby," Dad said. "Unni's pregnant."

"Is she?" I said. "When will she give birth?"

"Just after the summer."

"That's good news," I said.

"Yes, it is," he said. "Now you'll have another brother or a sister."

"That'll be strange," I said.

"I don't think it'll be strange," he said.

“Not in that sense,” I said. “Just that there’ll be such a large difference in age between us. And we won’t be living together.”

“No, you won’t. But you’ll be siblings anyway. That’s as close as you can get.”

“Yes,” I said.

In the kitchen Mom was setting the table. The coffee machine was chugging away with small puffs of steam rising from it. I quickly rubbed my arm several times.

“Is it nice where you are?” I said. “Can you swim there?”

“Oh yes, you bet you can,” he said. “We lie by the pool all day. It’s wonderful to get away from the darkness in Norway, we think.”

There was a silence.

“Is your mother there?” he said.

“Yes,” I said. “Would you like a word with her?”

“No, what would I have to talk about with her?”

“I don’t know,” I said.

“Don’t ask such stupid questions then.”

“All right.”

“Did you go to Sørbøvåg at Christmas?”

“Yes, we’ve just got back. Half an hour ago in fact.”

“They’re still alive?”

“Oh yes.”

“And Grandma was ill?”

“Yes.”

“You know that’s a hereditary illness she has, don’t you? Parkinson’s.”

“Is it?” I said.

“Yes, so you’re vulnerable. You could get it. And then you’ll know where it came from.”

“I’ll cross that bridge when I come to it,” I said. “Dad, food’s ready here. Have to go. Say hello to Unni and congratulations!”

“Give me a call sometime, Karl Ove, when we’re back. You hardly ever call.”

"Will do. Bye."

"Bye."

I put the phone down and went into the kitchen. The cat had settled on the chair under the table, I could see his bushy tail hanging over the edge. Mom opened the oven door and put some frozen rolls on the shelf.

"There wasn't a lot of food in the house," she said. "But I found some rolls in the freezer. How many do you want?"

I shrugged.

"Four maybe."

She added one more and closed the door.

"Who was it on the phone?"

"Dad."

I pulled out the chair beside the cat and sat down.

"He's in the Canaries, isn't he?" Mom said, crossing the floor to the fridge.

"Yup," I said.

She took out one white and one brown cheese, fetched a chopping board from the counter, put it on the table, and placed the cheeses on it.

"What did he have to say? Were they having a good time?"

"He didn't say much. Just wanted to talk. He was a little drunk, I think."

She put the slicer on top of the white cheese. Removed the pot from the coffee machine, filled the cup on the other side of the table.

"Do you want some?" she said.

"Yes, please," I said, passing over my cup. "But he said one thing that was a bit strange. He said Parkinson's was hereditary. And that I was in the danger zone."

"Did he say that?" Mom said, meeting my eyes.

"Yes, that's precisely what he said."

I cut the rind off the white cheese, moved it to the edge of the plate, changed my mind and threw the rind in the bin under the counter.

"Not much is known about that," Mom said.

"Don't worry," I said. "You don't think I'm worried about it, do you?"

She sat down. I opened the fridge, took the juice from the door and looked at the date: December 31. Shook it. There was a drop left.

"Did he really say that?" Mom said.

"Yes," I said. "But don't give it another thought. He was a bit drunk, as I said."

"Have I ever told you about the first time he met Grandma and Grandpa?" she said.

I shook my head. Opened a cupboard and took out a glass.

"They made a deep impression on him, both of them. But especially Grandma. He said she was like nobility."

"Nobility?" I said, sitting down and pouring the juice into my glass.

"Yes. He saw something special in her. Dignity, he said. You know, it was tough, very different from what he was used to. We weren't poor in any real sense, we always had food and clothes, but things were tight, they were. At least, compared with his childhood home. I don't know what he'd been expecting. But he was surprised. Perhaps also because they dealt with him in a way he was unused to. They took him seriously. They took everyone seriously. Perhaps it was as simple as that."

"How old was he then?"

She smiled.

"We were nineteen, both of us."

"Do you want some juice by the way?" I said. "There's a drop left."

"No, you take it," she said.

I emptied the carton and threw it into the sink. A perfect aim. The sudden noise made the cat stir.

"He talked about her eyes," Mom said. "I can remember that. He said they were piercing yet gentle at the same time."

"That's true," I said.

"Yes, he's always been good at observing others, your father," she said.

"You wouldn't believe it now, the way he behaves," I said, taking a sip of the juice.

The acid taste made me grimace.

"That's partly why I'm telling you," she said. "So you can appreciate that he's more than what he's showing at the moment."

"I realize that," I said.

Some steam escaped from the gap at the top of the oven door and from the outlet at the back of the stove. How long had they been in now? Six minutes? Seven?

"He was a very gifted person. There were so many sides to him. Much more so than any of the others around him – when I met him anyway. And there can be no doubt that it was a problem that his talents were never really appreciated when he was growing up. Do you understand what I mean?"

"Yes, of course."

"Mm."

"But if he was as gifted as you say he was, how could he do to us what he did when we were growing up? I was petrified of him. All the time."

"I don't know," she said. "Perhaps he was confused. Perhaps he was driven by external demands incompatible with what was inside him. He grew up with so many demands on him, so many rules and regulations, and when he met me I brought along other demands that probably didn't suit him at all. Well, obviously they didn't."

"Yes, he mentioned something about that," I said.

"Did he?"

"Yes."

"So you talk about all this?"

I smiled.

"I wouldn't exactly say that. It's more him sitting there and moaning. But I think the rolls are done now."

I got up, walked around the table, opened the oven door, took out the burning-hot rolls one by one as quickly as I could, put them in the bread basket, and set it on the table.

"Lots of external rules and monumental internal chaos, is that your diagnosis?" I said.

She smiled.

"You could put it that way," she said.

I split open a roll and then handed her the bread knife. The butter I spread melted the second it made contact with the grayish surface, which was partly doughy from the heat. I cut myself two slices of brown cheese and placed them on top. They melted too.

"Why didn't you just leave?" I said.

"Leave Dad?"

I nodded with my mouth full.

"I've wondered about that many times myself," she said. "I don't know."

We ate for a while without speaking. It was odd to think we had been in Sørbøvåg only this morning. It seemed like much longer. It was a different world.

"Well, I don't have a good answer to that," she said at length. "There were so many reasons. Divorce would have been a defeat. And then we'd been together all our lives. That creates a lot of bonds of course. And I loved him, that goes without saying."

"I don't quite understand that," I said. "But I hear what you're saying."

"You can say what you like about your father," she said. "But he wasn't boring to live with."

"No," I said, and stood up to get my tobacco pouch from my jacket in the hall.

"What about Kjartan then?" I said as I returned. "Surely there's a kind of inner chaos in him too?"

"Is there?" Mom said.

"Isn't there?" I said, and opened the pouch, took a rolling paper, filled it with tobacco, and plucked a bit out to create better air flow.

"Maybe," she said. "At any rate, he's searching for something. He's been searching all his life, I would say. Now he's found it he's holding on to it."

"You're thinking of communism?"

"For example."

"What about you?" I said, rolling the paper back and forth around the tobacco. "Are you searching?"

She laughed.

"Me, no! I'm trying to survive. That's what I'm doing."

I licked the gum on the edge, stuck it down, and lit up.

The next evening I went out, first of all I sat around drinking with a few others in a gymnas friend's house, we pinched a few beers from the cellar and were thrown out, ran downhill to town, everywhere was covered with snow, it cracked and creaked beneath our shoes, and the freezing-cold wind was all around us, buffeting against our faces as we walked, we forced our way through, it was endless. At the Shell station in Elvegate we flocked around a little man who had been talking to one of the girls there and laughed at him, we sang, "Here comes toughie, toughie, toughie, tough," and then, "Here comes dickie, dickie, dickie, dick" to the tune of "Here comes Pippi." I kicked him in the ass as he turned and everyone laughed. After we had paid and left, he was standing there waiting for us all, with a pal. The pal was much bigger than him. Who could possibly have guessed? "Him," the little man said, pointing at me over by the pumps. The big pal came over to me, said nothing, then looked me straight in the eye. A second passed, perhaps two, then he punched me. I collapsed in a heap. Hot blood ran from my nose down onto the concrete. What happened? I thought. Had he punched me? It didn't hurt.

Behind me I heard Hauk. I'm only sixteen! he was shouting. I'm only sixteen! I'm only sixteen! I sat up. They ran down the hill. Hauk and two others in front of him, the big man at the back. He was brandishing a knife. I got up and went over to the girls, whom no one had threatened. Marianne dashed into the toilet and emerged with an armful of paper, and I wiped off the blood. Not long afterward, Hauk and the others returned from the opposite direction, they were still frightened, went into the kiosk and asked the assistant to call the police. The sparkle went out of the evening, the group dispersed, suddenly I was the only person left who wanted to keep going, and I had to catch a taxi home, sitting on the back seat while my nose and head pounded and throbbed.

The moment I opened the door, I knew that Yngve had come home. Luggage scattered across the floor, his jacket on a hook, his sturdy boots. I decided to surprise him. My joy at the idea made my chest bubble with excitement, and when I opened the door, switched on the light and shouted, "Da-da!" and he sat up in bed, utterly bewildered, I burst into laughter. I completely lost control, just kept on laughing, he looked at me, what happened, he asked, what's up with your nose, I was laughing so much I couldn't answer, he said, go to bed, Karl Ove, we can talk tomorrow.

"Did you just get back from China?" I said, continuing to laugh, closed the door behind me, and went into my room, where I undressed and climbed into bed still cracking up. My head felt as if it were a box full of objects swaying to and fro whenever I moved it. Now they were continuing to sway even though my head was still, I noticed, and then I fell asleep.

I woke up with my face aching. I remembered what had happened and sat up in horror.

Then I remembered Yngve was here.

Great.

There was a faint smell of smoke, they had lit the fire. Their low voices could be heard from the floor below, they were probably sitting in the kitchen having breakfast.

I put on a T-shirt and a pair of jeans and went downstairs.

They looked at me. Yngve smiled.

"Just need to wash up," I said, and went into the bathroom.

Oh dear, oh dear, oh dear.

My nose was slightly crooked, the bone beneath the bridge. In addition, it was extremely swollen and my nostrils were full of crusted blood. I washed it carefully and went back into them.

"What happened to you yesterday?" Yngve said.

"Someone punched me," I said, sat down and put a roll on my plate. "I didn't do anything. A guy at the gas station came over and just punched me. Then he ran after the others I was with and chased them down the hill with a knife. Thugs."

Mom sighed, but she said nothing and in a second it was over because Yngve talked about China, which I assumed he must have been doing for a long time. He was full of it. He talked and talked, and I could visualize it:

throngs of people swarming around Kristin when they arrived, attracted by her blond hair, what fun it had been on the Trans-Siberian Railway, how wild it had been in Tibet and how foreign the colors were. Big yellow rivers and tree-clad cliffs, the alien cities and cheap hotels, the Great Wall of China, ferries and trains, crowds of people everywhere, dogs, hens, as far from the deserted snow-covered frozen countryside as it was possible to be.

Two days later, on New Year's Eve, Yngve went to Vindilhytta while I went down to Bassen's wearing shiny new shoes and a suit I had rented. Hanne was there. I drank vodka and juice, I wanted to dance with her, we did, I drank more, I said we should get together even though it was ages since I had last seen her, it was almost an obsession, she laughed off my suggestion, I was offended, danced with other girls, got more and more drunk, and at twelve when everyone gathered together on the road, including people from the other houses in the vicinity, things degenerated, people lit rockets and held them until the very last second so that they whizzed around the ones standing there, people screamed and shouted, there were bangs and explosions, and I watched Hanne, she was shivering, and she was so beautiful, she really was, why couldn't I be hers and stand there with my arm around her? I thought, and then a rocket landed by her feet.

People screamed and ran away.

But this was my chance, so I ran forward, I went to kick it away and just as I did, it exploded. It was a bizarre feeling, my calf went all hot, and looking down I saw my trousers in tatters. Blood was flowing. There was even a big hole in my shoe! I refused to go to the emergency room, someone washed the blood off with a cloth and wound a bandage around my leg, I shouted that I was Hamsun's Lieutenant Glahn and had shot myself in the foot so that Hanne would realize how much I loved her, jumped around in tattered trousers and with the bandage soaked in blood, I'm Lieutenant Glahn, I yelled, and I have a vague memory of sitting on a chair in a corner and crying, but I am not absolutely sure. At any rate I got home at five, I remember asking the taxi driver to stop by the mailboxes, as I always did, so the engine noise wouldn't wake Mom, and I put my trousers and shoes at the back of the wardrobe before going to sleep. The next morning I took off the bandage, put it in a plastic bag and shoved it to the bottom of the rubbish bin, washed the wound, which was quite deep, put a plaster over it, and went in to have a hearty breakfast.

We don't live our lives alone, but that doesn't mean we see those alongside whom we live our lives. When Dad moved to Northern Norway and was no longer physically in front of me with his body and his voice, his temper and his eyes, in a way he disappeared from my life, in the sense that he was reduced to a kind of discomfort I occasionally felt when he called or when something reminded me of him, then a kind of zone within me was activated, and in that zone lay all my feelings for him, but he was not there.

Later, in his notebooks, I read about the Christmas when he called from the Canary Islands and the weeks that followed. Here he stands before me as he was, in midlife, and perhaps that is why reading them is so painful for me, he wasn't only much more than my feelings for him but infinitely more, a complete and living person in the midst of his life.

It was Yngve who found his notebooks. A few weeks after the funeral he rented a large car, drove back to Kristiansand and got Dad's things from the garage, and then he drove to the Østland town where Dad had lived for his last years and collected the little that was left there, then he had it all sent to Stavanger, and he put it into the loft until I arrived and we could go through it together.

When he called that evening in the autumn of 1998, he said that for a moment he had been convinced Dad was alive and was following him in a car on the motorway.

"There I was, in a car full of his things," he said. "Can you imagine how furious he would have been if he'd found out? It's absolutely absurd of course, but I'm sure it was him following me."

"It gets me in the same way," I said. "Whenever the phone rings or someone buzzes at the door, I think it's him."

"Anyway," Yngve said, "I've found some diaries he'd been keeping. Well, actually, they're notebooks. He jotted down a few notes every day. From 1986, 1987, and 1988. You've got to read them."

"Did he write a diary?" I said.

"Not exactly. Just some notes."

"What does he say?"

"You'll have to read them."

When I went to Yngve's some days later, we threw away nearly everything Dad had left behind. I took his rubber boots, which I still wear ten years later, and his binoculars, which are on my desk as I am writing this, and a set of crockery, as well as some books. And then there were the notebooks.

Wednesday 7 January

Up early, 5:30. Pjall.

The shower was cold.

Bus 6:30 from Puerto Rico. Took a quick swig here too.

At the airport. Bought a Walkman. Dep. 9:30. Delayed – Kristiansand 16:40. Flight to Oslo 17:05. Problem.

The same in Alta. Met Haraldsen here. Via Lakselv (–31°C)

Taxi home. Cold house. Warmed myself on duty-free. Hard day.

Thursday 8 January

Tried to get up for work. But had to call Haraldsen and throw in the towel. Grinding abstinence – stayed in bed all day . . . I made an attempt to read Newsweek. Managed a few TV progs. School tomorrow?

Friday 9 January

Up at 7:00. Felt lousy at breakfast.

Work. Survived the first three lessons. Had terrible diarrhea in lunch break and had to give the HK class a free. Home for repair – rum and Coke. Incredible how it helps. Quiet afternoon and evening. Fell asleep before TV news.

Saturday 10 January
Slept in. Downed the sherry in the kitchen. Evening spent in the company of blue Smirnoff!

Sunday 11 January
Had a feeeling when I woke up it was going to be a bad day. I was right!

Monday 12 January
Slept badly. Tossing and turning and hearing voices. Work. Started with English background. Hard going when you're out of shape. Evening classes even more stressful!

Tuesday 13 January
Another sleepless night. My body won't accept being without alcohol. Went to work.

Tuesday 20 January
Another bad night. Always like that when you don't take any "medicine." After an hour and a half you're too exhausted to do a good job. Lutefisk for dinner – my favorite. I had a siesta after dinner – a very long nap – up at 10. Worked till 3. Working through the night is the norm now!

And so it goes on. He drinks every weekend, but also more and more often during the week, and then he tries to stop, to have some alcohol-free days or even weeks, but it doesn't work, he can't sleep, he is restless, hears voices, and is so worn out it's almost a relief when he finally goes to the liquor store or buys beer and comes home, and all his inner conflict eases.

Under "Wednesday 4 March" his notebook just says Yngve, Karl Ove, Kristin. We went up north in the winter vacation to visit them. Dad paid for us all. Unni had invited her son, Fredrik, who was there when we arrived. I flew with Kristin from Kristiansand to Bergen, I was a bit nervous about it of course, because of what had happened between Cecilie and me, but she didn't say a word about it and treated me as she always had. Yngve joined us in Bergen, then we flew up to Tromsø, where we changed to a propeller plane for the last part.

The terrain beneath was wild and deserted, there was barely a house or a road to be seen, and when we reached the airport there was no pilot announcement of a slow descent, no, the plane simply swooped down like a bird of prey that had seen its victim, I thought, and the moment the wheels touched down on the runway, we braked and were hurled forward toward the seat in front.

The passengers filed out of the plane across the tarmac to the tiny terminal building. It was cold and overcast, the countryside was white with a scattering of shiny black patches where the rock was too steep for snow to settle.

Dad stood waiting in the arrivals hall. He was formal and tense. Asked us how the trip had been, didn't listen to the answer. His hands shook as he inserted the key into the ignition and let go of the hand brake. He was silent for the whole journey through the vast misty desolate terrain to the town. I observed his hand, he rested it on the gearshift, but as soon as he raised it, it shook.

The building he parked under was outside the center, facing the sea, on an estate that must have been built in the 1970s, judging by the shape of the houses. They had rented the entire upper floor and had a big balcony outside the living room. The windows were gritty, I supposed the salt from the spray had caused that, even though it was several hundred meters to the sea from there. Unni met us in the doorway, smiled, and gave everyone a hug. A boy who must have been Fredrik was sitting in a chair watching TV and got up to say hi.

He smiled, we smiled.

He was tall, had dark hair, and was a distinct presence in the room. When he sat down again I went into the hall for my backpack and caught a glimpse of Dad as I passed the open kitchen door. He was standing by the fridge and knocking back a beer.

Unni showed us where we would be sleeping. I left my things there. When I got back the first bottle was on the table while he was attending to the second. He belched quietly and put the bottle down next to the first, wiped the froth from his beard, and turned to me.

The tension was gone.

"Are you hungry, Karl Ove?" he said.

"I guess I am," I said. "But there's no hurry. We can eat when it suits you."

"I've bought steaks and red wine today. We can have that. Or shrimp. They've got good shrimp up here, you know."

"Both fine by me," I said.

He took another beer from the fridge.

"It's good to have beer on a holiday," he said.

"Yes," I said.

"You can have some later, with the food," he said.

"Great," I said.

Yngve and Kristin had sat down on the sofa. They were looking around the way you do when you are somewhere new, discreetly absorbing their surroundings, constantly aware of each other, not necessarily with their glances but in the total way that lovers can be when everything is about the two of them. Kristin was a miracle of joy and naturalness, and that rubbed off on Yngve, he was fully open to it and wore an almost childish glow that he only had when he was with her.

Fredrik sat in his chair on the other side of the table and shyly answered the questions Yngve and Kristin asked him. He was a year younger than me, lived somewhere in Østland with his father, played soccer, was interested in fishing, liked U2 and the Cure.

I sat down in the chair beside him. On the wall above the sofa hung the blue picture by Sigvaldsen that Dad had taken with him after the divorce, on the two longer walls there were more pictures we used to have at home. The suite of furniture in the other corner was the one Dad had always had downstairs in his office, one of the carpets on the floor came from there, too. I recognized the furniture from Unni's flat.

Dad sat down on the sofa. He put one arm around Unni, in his other hand he held a bottle of beer. I remember thinking I was glad Yngve and Kristin were here.

Dad asked Yngve a question, which he answered briefly but not in an uncivil tone. Kristin slowly tried to bring harmony to the situation with questions about the town and the school where they worked. Unni answered.

After a while Dad turned to Fredrik. His tone was light and good-natured. Fredrik's body language was dismissive, it was obvious he didn't like Dad, and I could understand why. Only an imbecile would not have heard the false ring to Dad's voice, as though he were talking to a child, and not realized that he was doing this for Unni's sake.

Fredrik gave a surly response, Dad stared into the middle distance for some seconds, Unni said something kind but reproachful to Fredrik, who writhed with discomfort.

Dad sat motionless, drinking. Then he got to his feet, hitched up his trousers, and went into the kitchen, where he started making dinner. We stayed in the living room chatting with Unni. By the time the food was on the table, at about eight, Dad was drunk, he wanted to calm the waters but his efforts were too bumbling and he made a fool of himself. Fredrik in particular suffered. We were used to Dad, we had nothing else, but Fredrik had lost his mother to this idiot.

Dad sat silent for a long time with a stupid, disgruntled expression on his face. Then he got up and went into the bedroom. Unni followed him, we heard their voices, they came back as though nothing had happened, chatted about the holiday they'd had and the dispute they were having with their travel company. It transpired that Dad had collapsed in Gran Canaria, fallen over in the room, and had been taken to the hospital by ambulance. He said it was heart failure. At any rate he had sued the tour operator because there had been several incidents – arguments with the reps, arguments with other tourists at the hotel – and now they were sure that everyone had been against them, indeed bullied them almost, and that had led to Dad's heart problem. He had been kept at the hospital for two days. He showed us photos, and some of them were an unpleasant sight: we saw photos of a couple on a terrace, the camera zoomed in, the couple got up, shook their fists, and walked toward the camera. What were they doing? See how nasty they were, Dad said. What fatheads. They're as bad as Gunnar. What's wrong with Gunnar then? Yngve said. Gunnar? Dad repeated. OK, I'll tell you. For a whole summer he was snooping round the flat in Elvegate. He was supposed to be keeping an eye on me, you know, making sure I wasn't drinking. He's so self-righteous, that brother of mine. He told me so too, that perhaps I ought to cut down, can you imagine? Is he his brother's keeper? I was an adult when he was only knee-high to a grasshopper. Can't a man have a beer in his own garden? He really went too far. And just look how he ingratiates himself with Grandma and Grandad. He's after the cabin. He's always wanted the cabin. And he'll get it in the end. He'll inject them with his poison as well.

I didn't say anything. Met Yngve's gaze.

How could he stoop so low? They were brothers, Gunnar was his younger brother, and he not only had some order in his life, the children he brought up were close to him, they trusted him, I could see that whenever I saw them, there was not a trace of fear in their eyes, on the contrary, they liked their father. If he had told Dad he was drinking too much, he was perfectly within his rights, who else was going to tell him? Me? Ha ha, don't make me laugh. And the cabin? Gunnar was the only one of the brothers who used it and always had, he loved living out there. Dad didn't. If Dad got his hands on the cabin, he would sell it.

I watched him, he sat there with his eyes brimming and the slightly stupid expression around his mouth he always had when he was drunk.

"Perhaps it would be best to show the slides tomorrow," Yngve said. "It's already late."

"What slides?" Dad said.

"Of China," Yngve said.

"Oh, that's right, yes," Dad said.

Unni stretched her arms above her head.

"Well," she said. "Now I really do have to go to bed."

"I'm coming too," Dad said. "I'll just have a few words with my two boys, who have come a long way to see their dad."

Unni ruffled his hair and went into their bedroom. As soon as the door was closed Fredrik got up.

"Goodnight," he said.

"Are you off, too?" Dad said. "You aren't pregnant, are you?"

He laughed, I looked at Fredrik and raised my eyebrows to indicate to him that he wasn't alone in what he thought.

"I'm beat too," Kristin said. "Either it's the journey or it's the sea air. Whichever it is, it's goodnight anyway!"

After she had gone the three of us sat there saying nothing. Dad gazed into the air and finished his beer, then went to get another. I wasn't drunk, but I could feel the alcohol.

"So here we are," Dad said.

"Yes," I said.

"Just like in the old days. Do you remember, in Tybakken? Yngve and Karl Ove. Sitting in the kitchen and having breakfast."

"How could we ever forget?" Yngve said.

"Yes," said Dad. "It wasn't an easy time for me either. I'd like you to know that."

"Times aren't easy for lots of people," Yngve said. "But it's not everyone who takes it out on their children."

"No," Dad said.

He started crying.

"I'm so happy to have you here," he said.

"Do you have to get so sentimental?" Yngve said. "Can't we talk about this in a normal way?"

"Unni's got a new life in her belly now. It'll be either your brother or your sister. Think about that."

He smiled through the tears, dried them, emptied the bottle, and rolled himself a cigarette.

Yngve and I exchanged glances. It was hopeless, you got nothing from him but hot air.

"I'm going to bed," Yngve said.

Dad said nothing as he left. I didn't want him to be on his own and stayed a little while longer, but when he made no sign of either leaving or speaking, and just sat there staring into the room, eventually I got up too and went to bed.

After breakfast the next day Yngve, Kristin, Fredrik, and I went to town and wandered through the snow-covered, windblown, night-black streets. While Yngve and Kristin went into a clothes shop I sat in a café chatting with Fredrik. We exchanged a few names of bands, established a kind of base, and then we started talking about what we could actually do in this godforsaken town. We couldn't just sit on our hands in the flat. He said there was a swimming pool not far away, perhaps we could go there later in the day? That's a good idea, Unni said when we went home. Yes, a great idea, Dad said from inside the living room. I haven't been to a pool in years. Are you going to join them?! Unni said. Yes, why not? he said. I could see Fredrik wasn't happy, but I thought it might be OK, the evening was a long time away. Unni drove us because Dad had drunk a couple of beers. We went into the changing room with our gear and sat down on the bench.

Dad started undressing.

I turned away. I had never seen him undress, I had never been in the same room as him before when he was doing something so intimate. Sitting on the bench, he folded his trousers, rolled his socks in a ball, and undid his shirt.

I felt myself getting hot and flustered, didn't know where to look or what to do with myself, because now he was taking off his underpants and for a few seconds he was completely naked.

I had never seen him naked before, and a shudder went through me as I cast my eyes over him.

He looked at me and smiled.

Everything else had been removed, there was just the smile he sent me before turning away to put on his trunks.

I put on mine and together we walked into the spacious swimming area.

When we returned home, Unni had made dinner, a fondue, Dad drank a bottle of red wine on his own, afterward Yngve and Kristin showed their slides of China. Unni had borrowed a projector from school. They talked and explained, Dad sat and looked on with no interest at all, I could see Yngve was getting annoyed, why did it bother him, I thought, he should give up on Dad.

Fredrik was ironic with Dad, who got angry and rebuked him, which made Unni furious, she went to her room, he struggled to his feet and followed, they shouted at each other while, in the living room, we pretended everything was fine. Something smashed against the wall, a shout became a scream, then there was silence. Dad emerged, said nothing, had a drink, suddenly looked up at us and grinned that inane grin of his, looked at Fredrik and said they could go fishing tomorrow if he wanted, his sons weren't interested in fishing.

Of all the days Dad described in his notebooks this is the only one I have a clear memory of, presumably because I saw him naked for the first and only time in his life.

In the notebook he wrote:

> Friday 6 March
> With K.O. and Fredrik in the swimming pool.
> Nice to swim again. Home for fondue and slides of China.
> Talk after. Too much to drink. Scenes. Unni fed up – broke clock.
> Shame.

On the last evening in Northern Norway I was alone again in the living room after the others had gone to bed. I smoked, made myself some tea, read a book I found, got up and found their photo album, wanting to see the disconcerting pictures once more, and at the back I came across some papers from which it emerged that the travel company had been informed by the hospital where Dad had been admitted that the heart problems had been induced by an excess of medicine and alcohol.

I read this with a chill that ran through my whole body.

Medicine?

What sort of medicine was he taking?

There were several documents, I flicked through them, some were connected with a lawsuit he had clearly been involved in that spring. The trigger was an incident with a Securitas guard at the bus station in Kristiansand, and as I read it I remembered that he had mentioned something about it once, he had been harassed, but I knew nothing about him taking the matter to the law courts. However, he had lost resoundingly and had been ordered to pay the costs.

What was he doing?

I put the photo album back, brushed my teeth, and went into the narrow room where my bed was, undressed, got into bed, switched off the light, and rested my head on the pillow.

But I couldn't sleep. After a while I got up, sat down on the sofa closest to the little telephone table, picked up the receiver, and dialed Hanne's number.

I would do this on occasion, call her in the night. If her father answered, I would put down the receiver, but he never did, she had a phone next to her room and was always quick to answer. Also this time.

We chatted for an hour. I told her about what was going on here, that I would have a brother or a sister by the end of the summer and I wasn't sure what that would be like. I told her about my father and about Yngve and Kristin. She listened, laughed when I said something funny, and somehow the heaviness in me lifted and we began to talk about other things, the exams that were in the offing, all my ditched classes, her choir, what we would do after we left school.

Suddenly the door burst open and Dad charged in.

"I have to hang up," I said, and put down the receiver.

"What on earth are you doing?!" he said. "Do you know what the time is?"

"Sorry," I said. "I was trying to speak as softly as I could."

"And who said you could use the phone? How long have you been talking?"

"An hour."

"An hour! Do you have any idea how much that costs? I paid for your ticket here! And this is how you thank me? Go to bed, now."

I lowered my head so that he wouldn't see the tears in my eyes, got up, my body half-turned away from him, and walked to my room. My heart was pounding, terror had spread to every part of me, I was shaking as I lifted a leg to pull off my jeans.

I waited until I was sure he had gone to sleep, then tiptoed out again, found a pen, some paper, and an envelope, wrote an ironic note about how sorry I was for having used his precious phone, anyway here was the money for the call. Then I put a hundred-krone note in the envelope, sealed it, wrote his name on it, and slipped it onto the bookshelf, where he would probably find it after I had gone.

At home I seldom gave Dad a thought, apart from when he called or his name came up. But there were still problems. I had gradually begun to live a double life. I liked being at home in the evening with Mom, we either drank tea and chatted, listened to music, watched TV, or did our own work, but I also liked being out at night and drinking. I didn't have a driver's license and buses were few and far between, but Mom always said she would pick me up, it wasn't an issue, all I had to do was call, even if it was in the middle of the night. I called, she answered, an hour later I opened the car door and hopped in. She had no objection to me having a glass, but she wasn't happy if I was drunk, to put it mildly, so I had to hide that from her. I solved this by sleeping at people's houses or I said she didn't need to pick me up, there were people around with a car, and sometimes there were, then I got a lift, sometimes I took a taxi, sometimes the night bus. She didn't wait up, she trusted me, from my behavior at home she had every reason to. And it was the real me when I was with her. It was also the real me when I was with Hilde. It was also the real me when I got drunk with Espen or any of the others at school. I was the real me, but the real *me*s were irreconcilable.

There were other matters I hid from Mom. For example, my missing school. I did it more and more, I was absent almost more often than I was present. She caught me one day, I hadn't gone to school, I was at home relaxing, she turned up earlier than usual and we had a fight. She said I had to go to school, it was important, I had to get a grip on what was important. She said I'd had a strict upbringing, much too strict, and now she was trying to give me some freedom, but I was abusing it. This was all about norms and they had to come from me. I said school wasn't the most important thing in my life, she said that was all well and good, but now you're at school, this is what you do and you have to fulfill your obligations. Can you promise me that? Yes, I could. I didn't keep the promise, but I camouflaged what I did better. I had a more-than-understanding homeroom teacher, he had realized I was having a difficult time, on a school trip he had been sitting on the seat next to me and said, I know you're having a difficult time at the moment, Karl Ove, say if there is anything I can do to help or if there is anything you want to talk to me about. I smiled and said I would, and for a few seconds tears were imminent, the concern for me had come out of the blue, but the next moment they were gone. Naturally enough it wasn't because I was going through a difficult time that I had been ditching school, on the contrary it was because I liked doing it so much, drifting around, meeting people in cafés, stopping by the radio station, buying records, or just lying around at home and reading. I had decided ages ago that I would not continue my education after school, what we learned was just nonsense, basically what life was about was living, and living in the way you want, in other words, enjoying your life. Some enjoyed their lives best by working, others by not working. OK, I was aware that I would need money, which meant that I would also have to work, but not all the time and not on something that would deplete all my energy and eat into my soul, leaving me like one of the middle-aged half-wits who guarded their hedges and peered across at their neighbors to see if their status symbols were as wonderful as their own.

I didn't want that.

But money was a problem.

Mom had started working overtime to make ends meet. As well as her job as a teacher at the nursing college she had agreed to do extra shifts at Eg Hospital on weekends and holidays. The house must have been making deep inroads into her money. She had bought Dad out and taken on big loans. I barely noticed, I had the money I earned from the newspaper and Dad's child support, and when that was gone it was still possible to get something out of Mom, so that was fine. She did occasionally criticize my priorities, how could I buy three new LPs one Friday afternoon when I was walking around in shoes with the sole flapping off? They're just material things, I responded, objects, while music was completely different. This was the spirit, for Christ's sake. This is what we need, really, and I do mean really, and it's important to prioritize it. Everyone prioritizes. Everyone wants new jackets and new shoes and new cars and new houses and new caravans and new mountain cabins and new boats. But I don't. I buy books and records because they say something about what life is about, what it is to be a human here on earth. Do you understand?

"Yes, you're probably right, in a way. But isn't it terribly impractical to walk around with your soles coming off? And it doesn't look very good, either."

"What do you want me to do? I don't have any money. I prioritized music this time."

"I'll have a little surplus this month. You can have it to buy some shoes. But you'll have to promise me you'll spend it on shoes and nothing else."

"I promise. Thanks very much."

And so from her office in the nursing college I went to town and bought some sneakers and a Nice Price LP.

At Easter the soccer team was going to a training camp in Switzerland, of course I wanted to go with them, but it was quite expensive and Mom said no, she was sorry, she wished it didn't have to be like this, but that was how it was, we didn't have the money.

A week before the departure date she slapped the money on the table in front of me.

"Hope it's not too late," she said.

I called the coach, not too late, no, he said, you can come along.

"Wonderful!" Mom said.

During the days before we were due to leave I finished an article on Prince that I had been mulling over for ages. His new record, Sign o' the Times, was absolutely brilliant and I wanted everyone to know.

Then we left. Bus through Denmark and Germany, spirits were high, we were drinking duty-free beer on the way, and when we got to the hotel, Bjørn, Jøgge, Ekse, and I jumped off while the bus continued over the border to Italy, where a Serie A match was on the program. We preferred to be in a bar drinking. When they came back at ten we were in a fantastic mood while they were exhausted after the journey and everyone wanted to go to bed early. I shared a room with Bjørn, it was on the fourth floor and more luxurious than any room I had ever slept in, with attractive furniture, mirrors, and a carpet on the floor. We reclined on the beds, bottles of beer in hand. It was eleven at the latest, what about a trip into town to have a look? The rule was no noise after ten, by eleven everyone was supposed to be in bed, but they hadn't exactly posted guards on the doors. We waited for a while, not wishing to risk meeting anyone in the corridors, then we went out, hailed a taxi, mumbled, "Downtown," leaned back, and were driven along unfamiliar streets with the soft light from the street lamps shining down over us. The driver stopped in a square, we paid, got out, and strolled toward the center. Soon we came across a large building, we could hear music inside, there were bouncers on the door, we went in. There were discotheques, bars, an enormous casino, and a stage where beautiful women stripped and other scantily clad women, equally beautiful, wandered around the audience.

Bjørn and I exchanged glances. What was this fantastic place?

We drifted round, looking and drinking, hung around the stage and watched the striptease, discovered to our horror that the scantily clad girls who were walking between the tables were the same ones as those dancing on the stage, hardly had we watched one go up than she was down and walking past us on the floor. We went into a disco, bar-hopped there, wandered around the room with the roulette tables, where the men were dressed in dark suits and all the women wore evening gowns, ended up in front of double doors at the other end and saw a hall beyond, with groups of people standing around chatting while waiters dressed in black and white carried trays of wineglasses and canapés. We didn't talk to anyone else, drank nonstop, left at about half past three in the morning, and six hours later were running around a field in a semiconscious state. Slept for a couple of hours before the next round of training, had dinner, drank a few beers in the bar, and then it was off to find a taxi to go to this palace, where we floated around like in a dream until the following morning. Then we had to get up and go skiing in the Alps, there was something dreamlike about that too, for the sky was completely blue, the sun was shining, everywhere we looked white mountains towered in the air, and after a few minutes on the lift, with our skis dangling beneath us, everything was perfectly still. As though we had passed into another state. All that could be heard was the low hum of the lift close to us, otherwise it was completely and utterly still. A sense of jubilation filled me, for the silence was as vast as an ocean, while there was also something painful about it, as there is in all joy. The silence high up in the mountains, surrounded on all sides by beauty, allowed me to see myself or become aware of myself, not in relation to my psyche or my morality, this had nothing to do with my personal qualities, this was all about being here, this body which was ascending, I was here now, I was experiencing this, and then I would die.

I slept on the bus back, had a headache when I awoke, drank a few beers in the bar, had dinner, downed a few more because tonight everyone was going out, there was a disco near the hotel, we were there until one in the morning. I danced and drank and had a good word for everyone I saw. On the way back Bjørn and I climbed up onto a roof. It wasn't any old roof, it was a Swiss roof, turret after turret soared upward, we shinned up, climbed and sweated and finally stood aloft, roughly thirty meters above the parking lot, where a small crowd had gathered. Our legs trembled as we shouted into the night, then we crouched down and began the descent. When there were only a few meters left two men with flashlights ran over. The beams wandered back and forth in the blackness. Polizei, they said, and came to a halt beneath us. One was holding his ID card and shining the flashlight on it. That must be Chief Inspector Derrick, I giggled. We jumped down. Our football coach came over to us, he could speak some German, and explained the situation to the two police officers, who, despite their skeptical glares, let us go. On our way down the hill to the hotel one of the players from the senior team came over to us. He said he thought we were so courageous, we were so tough, going out and drinking every night and climbing up that roof, he really looked up to us, he said, and wished he could do things like that, he didn't dare, he wasn't as brave as we were and, he said, I admire you.

That was the word he used. Admire.

I would never have believed it, I said to Bjørn after he had disappeared into the group behind us. No, said Bjørn. That wasn't bad, I said. He admires us. Bjørn looked at me. Shit, I said, the police coming and shining their flashlights on their badges. Polizei! Polizei! We laughed. Then it struck me that he knew we had been out drinking at night. Did that mean everyone knew? What did it matter anyway? The worst that could happen was that we would be barred from playing, but this was the fifth division we were talking about and the end-of-school festivities were in sight, so it wasn't a big deal.

When we returned everyone had gathered in our room. Some of the senior team had brought girlfriends with them on the trip, a couple were here, and I saw Bjørn talking to one of them, Amanda, who went out with Jøran. She was around twenty-five. Was Bjørn really trying it on with her? Here?

Yes, he was. As people began to withdraw he did too and I was left alone on my bed, I fell asleep fully clothed, only to be awoken an hour later by Bjørn shaking me.

"Amanda's coming," he said. "Could you go somewhere else? For half an hour?"

Befuddled by sleep, I got up.

"OK," I said, went to the window and opened it.

"You're not going to go out there, are you? This is the fourth floor or have you forgotten?"

"No," I said. "It'll be fine."

Beneath the window, all the way, ran a brick ledge almost the width of my feet. Two meters above it there was another. I stood on the lower one, gripped the upper one tightly and then shuffled along centimeter by centimeter. Bjørn watched me with his head out the window.

"Don't do this," he said. "Come back."

"Now you're with Amanda and I'm here. I'll be back in half an hour."

He eyed me for a moment. Then he closed the window. I looked down. There was a large fountain outside the entrance, around it an open square, on the margins a few parked cars. A high brick wall separated the hotel grounds from the road beyond. There was no one around, but that wasn't so strange, it had to be three in the morning at least.

I slowly shuffled toward the window of the room adjoining ours. The curtains were drawn, there was nothing to see. I edged back, stopped by the window, leaned forward and peered in. They were lying on Bjørn's bed and kissing, their legs intertwined, Bjørn's hands were sliding up and down her thigh under her dress. I straightened up, took a few steps to the side, squinted down again. Still deserted. How long had I been there now? Ten minutes? I let go of the ledge with one hand, patted my jacket for cigarettes and my lighter, succeeded in knocking one out, sticking it in my mouth, and lighting it without swaying once. When the cigarette was finished and lay like a small glowing eye on the tarmac far below, I shuffled sideways and banged on the window. Bjørn jumped to his feet. Amanda sat up. Bjørn came over to the window, Amanda ran out the door, Bjørn turned, ready to give chase, or so it seemed, but then he reconsidered and opened the window for me.

"Five more minutes," he said. "Couldn't you have given me five more minutes?"

"How was I supposed to know?" I said. "From where I was standing it didn't look like you were making much progress."

"Were you watching?"

"Not at all," I said. "I was just kidding. But now I want to get some sleep. You should too, if you ask me. You've got a tough day with Jøran ahead of you."

Bjørn snorted. "He's too conceited to believe she would want anyone else."

"He's all right, I think," I said.

"Sure, I do too," Bjørn said. "But Amanda's more than all right."

He laughed. I lay down on the bed and fell asleep in an instant, without having found the answer to the enigmatic and somewhat vexing question: why would Amanda want Bjørn? What had he done to deserve that?

On the last evening in Lucerne the bus stood with its engine idling outside the hotel after dinner. Everyone was going out on the town. The destination was a secret. It turned out, however, to be our casino. While the other juniors wandered around slack-jawed, Bjørn and I sat nonchalantly at a table in the striptease venue drinking white wine.

"I got her number today," Bjørn said. "She said I should phone her when we were home."

"Why on earth would she do that?" I said. "Has she left Jøran?"

Bjørn shook his head. "No. They're together. But aren't you happy for me?"

"Yes, she's nice."

"Nice? She's great. Absolutely great. And she's twenty-four!"

We finished our wine and went for a look round. I lost sight of Bjørn fairly soon and cruised around on my own. By the door to the big hall, on a sudden impulse, I looked in. What's going on in here? I asked a small bald man with glasses. It's a conference, he answered. Who for? I said. Biologists, he said. OK, I said. Interesting! He withdrew, I went in, people were gathered around the small tables, but far fewer than earlier in the week. On one of them lay a little green and white card. I went over and inspected it. It was a name tag. I pinned it to my lapel and walked toward the big door. It opened onto a conference hall, rows of seats in a wide, gradually ascending semicircle around a speaker's podium. A man was talking below. Stills were being shown on a screen behind him. The room was slightly more than half full. I walked down past a few rows, entered one, people stood up just as in the cinema, and I sat down, crossed my legs, and concentrated on the speaker. Now, I said to myself in a low voice. Imagine that. Fascinating! After twenty minutes, during which I spent as much time looking at the other people in the audience as the speaker, whose grating microphone voice filled the whole auditorium and hung like a constant annoying thought in the background, I got up and went back to the disco. Most of the junior players were inside watching the striptease, it appeared. I went in too and when Jøgge spotted me he came rushing over.

"Can I borrow some money?"

"How much do you need? I have some but not much."

"A thousand? Have you got that much?"

"What are you going to do with a thousand kroner?"

"Actually I need two thousand. That's what champagne costs."

"Two thousand for champagne? Are you out of your mind?"

"If you buy an expensive drink for one of the women, you're allowed to talk to them. And if you buy champagne, you can go off with them."

"And that's what you want to do?"

"Of course. If only I had the money! Have you got it or not?"

He looked around.

"Come on. Please. I need two thousand kroner. I've never slept with a woman. I'm eighteen years old and I've never had sex. You have. But I haven't. And it costs two thousand kroner. Come on. Please, please."

He went down on his knees in front of me. Held up his hands in supplication.

And, even worse, he was serious.

"I want to sleep with a woman. That's all I want. And I can do it here. I don't give a shit if they're prostitutes. They're unbelievably beautiful, all of them. Come on. Show some mercy. Harald! Ekse! Bjørn! Karl Ove!"

"I don't have that much," I said. "I may have enough for a little chat . . ."

"This is serious!" Jøgge said, back on his feet. "This is my chance. There aren't any places like this in Kristiansand."

"Sorry, Jøgge. Would have liked to help you," said Bjørn.

"Same here," said Harald.

"For Christ's sake, come on," Jøgge said.

"You'll have to try the old-fashioned method," Bjørn said. "Hit on someone. The place is full of girls."

"Easy for you to say," Jøgge said.

"Come on. Let's go in and see the action," Bjørn said, dragging Jøgge with him.

I had never experienced such an alcoholic high as the one I had that night. It was like a cool green river flowing through my veins. Everything was in my power. As we stood at the bar I noticed a girl on the dance floor, she might have been a year or two older than me, with blond hair and a beautiful, yes, an unbelievably beautiful face. When her gaze met mine a second time I didn't hesitate, I trotted down the two steps to the dance floor. At that moment the music she had been dancing to changed and, along with three other girls, she walked over to a wall. I followed her. I stopped and said I had seen her dancing and she looked fantastic. You looked amazing, I said. She smiled and said thank you and looked at me with her head tilted. I asked her if she was American. Yes, she was. Did she live in the town here? No, she lived in Maine. They all came from Maine. Where was I from? A small barbaric country up north, I said. We are in fact the first generation to eat with a knife and fork. I turned and nodded to the other members of the team, who were watching me from the bar. I'm with them, I said. We're soccer players at a training camp here. Do you want to dance?

She nodded.

She wanted to dance!

We glided onto the floor. I put my arms around her. The feeling of her body against mine provoked an electric storm in my head. Round and round we went, sometimes I pressed her close to me, sometimes I held her away from me and looked into her eyes. What's your name? I whispered. Melody, she whispered. Melody? I repeated. No, Melanie! she said with a smile.

When the song was over I thanked her and joined the others, who were still hanging around the bar.

"How did you manage that?" Bjørn said.

"I just asked. Had no idea it was so easy. It's crazy."

"Go back to her. You can't stay here!"

"OK. I'll just have a little drink. Just my luck this is our last night."

The bus was supposed to be outside waiting at three. It was half past two. I had no time to lose. Nevertheless I hesitated, although I could still feel her, a kind of phantom joy, her breasts, oh, her breasts, the feeling of them against my body, the light pressure, the arousal, I had all that inside me, and if I went down there now it would disappear in a new situation, which might not go that well. I knocked back two glasses of wine in quick succession and walked over again. Her eyes lit up when I appeared. She wanted to dance. We danced. Afterward we stood in the corner chatting, the others were beginning to make tracks toward the exit, I said I had to go, she wanted to go with me, I took her hand, we stopped outside, a stone's throw from the bus, which was waiting with the engine running. Where do you live? I asked. She said the name of a hotel. No, not here, but in Maine, I said. I'll write to you. May I? Yes, she said. Then she told me her address. I had nothing to write with. Did she? No. Hurry up, came shouts from the bus, we're going now. I'll memorize your address, I said. Say it again. She said it, I repeated it twice. You'll get a letter, I said. She nodded and looked at me. I leaned forward and kissed her. Put my arm around her and pressed her into me. Now I have to go, I said. All the best to you in your barbaric country, she said with a smile. I paused by the bus door and waved to her, then clambered on board.

Everyone clapped. I bowed to the right, then the left and sat down next to Bjørn. Drunk, happy, and confused, I waved to her as the bus drove past.

"Damn it – if only it could have happened on the first evening," I said.

"Did you get her address?"

"Yes, I've memorized it. She lives in . . ."

I had forgotten. I couldn't drag it up for the life of me.

"Didn't you write it down?" Bjørn said.

"No. I relied on my memory."

He laughed. "You idiot," he said.

We carried on drinking in my room. Bjørn accidentally broke a lamp, he was turning around with a bottle in his hand and hit the glass dome, which shattered. Someone else, I don't recall who, smashed the other one out of pure devilry. Then I took down the big picture hanging on the wall, which had irritated me all week, and threw it out the window. It exploded into smithereens on the street five floors down. Lights came on in the room beneath us. Shit, what was the point of that? Bjørn said, no problem, I said, we can just take one of the pictures in the corridor and hang it here, they'll never notice. What about the picture downstairs? I'll get it, I said, and did as I promised. Took the elevator down, went past the unmanned reception into the square, where I collected all the fragments I could find and put them in the pool around the fountain, close to the nearest wall, so that you could only see them if you were standing over them. On my way back along the corridor I grabbed one of the pictures hanging on the wall. The incident must have sobered people up, because the room was empty when I returned, apart from Bjørn, who was lying on his back with his mouth open and his eyes closed. I got into bed and switched off the light.

The next day was all about packing, having breakfast, and getting ready to leave. The hotel manager came out as we were stowing the baggage in the bus, he wanted to know who had been in Room 504, that was Bjørn and I, we went over, and he, the little man, was so angry that he was jumping up and down in front of us. People like you shouldn't be allowed to stay in a hotel! he yelled. You have to pay for this! It was all very unpleasant. We apologized, said we hadn't meant anything by it and we would pay. I think we even bowed to him. The others stood around grinning. The team coach, Jan, came over, said he would handle this, the hotel would be properly compensated for any damage we had caused, he was extremely sorry, they were young, anything could happen, we bowed again and got on board, people like you shouldn't be allowed to stay in a hotel! he yelled again. Jan took out his wallet and passed him a wad of notes, the bus started up, he jumped on, we drove slowly onto the road while the hotel manager glowered at us with hatred in his eyes.

Once at home, I quickly fell back into my old self, or it fell back into me. At school, where teachers focused on exams, I stayed in the shadows, I skulked around in the breaks and in class filled my notebooks with my scribblings. The trip to Switzerland had been a procession of triumphs, and I hoped the russ – graduation – celebrations would be the same. At home I wrote the social studies special paper in one night, a twenty-page comparison of the Russian revolution with the Sandanista revolution in Nicaragua, which I had followed with interest for several years, and I wrote a letter to a hotel in Switzerland asking them for the address of a guest, if at all possible, as in my possession I had a purse I would like to return, belonging to an American girl, whose name was Melanie, surname unknown, but she had stayed at the hotel over Easter.

At the end of April I had a party at home. As editor of the russ newspaper, a duty I shared with Hilde, I probably should have been on the russ committee, as had always been the case, but for some reason we were excluded. Perhaps because Hilde and I didn't really fit in there, or because we hadn't accepted our posts with the requisite nonchalance, what did I know? Whatever the reason, I invited the whole of the committee, as well as many others, home one Saturday evening. Mom was sleeping at a friend's and would be home in the afternoon, so I had told everyone that they must not under any circumstances arrive before six. But at three a red russ camper chugged up the hill. In it were Christian and two girls. He wanted to drop off the beer, he said. But I told you six o'clock, I said. Yes, but now we're here, he said. Where can I leave it?

Ten minutes later there was a stack of beer crates in the kitchen. The stack went from the floor right up to the ceiling. It was fair to say the ceiling was low, but Mom, whom Christian barely greeted when he entered the kitchen, was not enamored of the sight. What's this? she said after they had gone. Are you going to drink all of this? You're not going to have some drunken orgy here, are you? I won't allow it. Relax, I said. This is a russ party. Everyone's eighteen. There'll be quite a bit of drinking. But I'll take responsibility for everything. I promise you. It'll all be fine. Are you sure? she said, eyeing me closely. There's enough beer here for a hundred people. How many crates are there actually? Yes, but take it easy. There's a lot of drinking at russ parties. But that's the whole point. Is it really? she said. Not the whole point, I said. But it is an important element. I know you don't like the idea, and I'm sorry it's here, but everything will be fine, I promise you. Well, anyway, it's too late to do anything about it now, she said. But had I known what I know now, you wouldn't have had my blessing. Promise me you won't drink much yourself now. You're responsible for everything going well, you know. Yeah, yeah, I said.

We had dinner beside the yellow beer-crate tower, Mom got in her car and drove to town, I put on a record, grabbed a beer, and lounged on the sofa waiting for the others to come.

A few hours later the drive was full of russ vehicles. Everywhere there were screaming girls and boys in red russ outfits, all holding bottles of beer. Music was pounding from several of the cars, and in the living room the stereo was so loud that the music coming from the speakers was distorted. Three or four times more people had come than had been invited.

At one in the morning everything seemed to build up to a climax. Christian screamed and kicked a big hole in the bathroom door. Trond was sitting in the kitchen beating out the rhythm of the music on the edge of the table with two large knives, every beat was a new notch. People were throwing up on the doorstep outside the living room, people were throwing up on the path between the cars, people were throwing up in Yngve's bed. Behind the lilac bush a couple was going at it standing up. Others were jumping up and down to the music, roaring for all they were worth. People stood on car hoods and roofs, one of them naked, swirling his sweater around his head. Even though I had made up my mind not to give a damn, and had succeeded by getting drunk, I carried a constant horror within me that, at various points, would surface in my consciousness, no, oh no, I thought then, only to recede as I got wrapped up in one of the many incidents going on around me.

At three the tempo began to slow down. Some people were still dancing, some were fooling around, some were asleep, lying across the table, hunched in corners, outside under bushes. I sat on the sofa in front of the TV making out with a girl, we had hardly exchanged a word, she had been sitting there, I sat down beside her, we started to kiss. She was dark-haired, everything about her was dark, even her clothes, she was the only one not dressed in a red outfit but in a black sweater, black skirt, and black tights. Want to come with me to the room over there, I whispered, she nodded, I had drunk a lot and was thinking this will make everything different because now I didn't give a shit about anything, wasn't nervous about anything, and I took out my keys and unlocked the door to my room, held my arm around her, she pulled off the little handbag she wore diagonally across her chest, lay down on the bed, my bed, it reverberated through my brain, I rolled her sweater over her head, kissed her dark nipples, rubbed my face between them, lovingly and lingeringly, here we go, I thought, now I've got a girl here, now it's going to happen, and my legs were trembling as I sat up to pull down her tights, she let me do it, I took off my trousers, this is it, she was naked, her skin shone white in the dark, I put my hand between her legs and felt the curly though still smooth hair, and I was naked, and I squirmed a bit, she said you're so heavy on top of me, I pushed down with my arms and then my dick was in her pubic hair, I thrust, farther down, she said, I moved and there it was, wet and soft and then, no, no, oh for Christ's sake, no.

Long shudders like electric shocks went through me as she lay there, her eyes wide open, staring up at me.

No, no, no.

I hadn't even penetrated her. A couple of centimeters maybe, no more. And then it was over. I fell on top of her and kissed her neck. She pushed me away and half sat up. I reached out for her, touched her breasts, but she just got up, pulled on her panties and tights, and left the room.

In the morning I woke to a discussion outside my half-open door. I recognized the voices of Espen, Trond, and the girl from the night before. No, she said, it wasn't me. Yes, it was. I saw you. You went into his bedroom. No, it wasn't, she said. But we saw you. Yes, I went in with him, he was going to sleep, but I came out again right away, she said. Nothing happened. Ha ha ha! said Espen. You were doing it in there. No, we weren't, she said. And where were you going just now? Were you going in? Why would you go in if you hadn't slept together? You know him, don't you? No. I was going to get something I'd left in there. What's that? My bag.

I hastily got up, put on a pair of jeans and a T-shirt, grabbed her bag, and went out to them.

"Here you are," I said, passing her the bag. "You forgot this."

"Thank you," she said without meeting my eyes, and went downstairs.

"What a disaster this house is," Espen said.

"I can imagine," I said.

"I'll help you clean up."

"Great."

"I'll get Gisle and Trond to give a hand." He looked at me. "Did you sleep with Beate then?"

"Was that her name?" I said. "Yes, I did."

"She says you didn't."

"I heard."

"Why?"

"How should I know?" I said.

Our eyes met.

"Well," I said. "Better go down and inspect the hell."

There was nothing that could be done about the door, it would have to be replaced. Nor about the slashes to the table. But all the rest? Couldn't that be scrubbed clean? We cleaned the house all morning. Espen, Gisle, and Trond went home at one, I continued on my own with a steadily increasing sense of panic in my chest because no matter how much I cleaned things up, the place still looked as if a party had hit it.

Mom came at five. I went out to meet her so that it wouldn't come as a shock. I didn't want her to see it before I had told her.

"Hi," I said.

"Hi," she said. "How did it go?"

"Not so well, I'm afraid," I said.

"Oh?" she said. "What happened?"

"It got a bit out of control. Someone kicked in the bathroom door, among other things. And there are a lot of other bits and pieces. You'd better see for yourself. I'm really sorry."

She looked at me.

"I had a feeling," she said. "We'd better go in and see."

When the inspection was over, she sat down at the kitchen table, ran both hands over her face, and looked up at me.

"It's dreadful," she said.

"Yes," I said.

"What will we do about the door?" she said. "We can't afford a new one."

"Are we so hard up?"

"I'm afraid so. Who kicked it in?"

"Someone called Christian. An idiot."

"Surely he should replace it?"

"I can tell him to."

"Please do that."

She got up with a sigh.

"I suppose we'd better eat," she said. "I think there are some pollock fillets in the fridge. Shall we have those?"

"OK."

She went to the hall and hung up her coat, I found the two packs of fish, she started washing some potatoes while I sliced the frozen blocks into pieces.

"We've had this conversation before," she said.

"Yes," I said.

"You have to make your own decisions. And if they're bad ones, you have to live with the consequences."

"Of course," I said, and sprinkled flour, salt, and pepper onto a plate, turned the by now soft fish in the mixture, put the frying pan on the burner, and watched the knob of butter slide across the black surface as the heat took hold, not unlike a house, it struck me, when the clay base it stands on starts slipping. Slow, erect, with a final dignity before it subsides.

"A year's wear and tear in one night," she said. "Or even more."

"The house was built in 1880," I said. "One year's not so much."

She ignored me.

"You're eighteen years old. I can't tell you what to do anymore. I can't control you. All I can do is be here for you and hope you will turn to me if you need help."

"OK."

"I could have tried to stop you, but why should I? You're an adult and you have to take responsibility for your actions. I trust you. You're free to do what you want. But you have to trust me too. And treat me like an adult. What we share is this house. We share the responsibility for it."

She squirted some soap onto one hand, rubbed both of them together under the running tap, and dried them on the kitchen towel.

"You're washing your hands of me, I can see," I said.

She raised a smile, but it was mirthless.

"This is serious, Karl Ove. I'm worried about you."

"You have no reason to be," I said. "What happened here, well . . . it was a russ party, no more, no less."

She didn't answer, I put the fish fillets into the pan, diced an onion, and added the little cubes, poured in a can of tomatoes, sprinkled in spices, and sat down with the Saturday newspaper, flipped through to the page where my Prince article, which I had handed in several weeks ago, had finally appeared in print. I held it up for her.

"Have you seen it?" I said.

That Monday I went to Christian and told him the door was smashed beyond repair. Oh yeah, he said. You kicked it in, I said. Yes, it was me, he said. So you should replace it, I think, I said. No, he said. What do you mean no? I said. I mean what I said, he replied. No. It was your party. But it was you who broke the door, I said. Yeah, he said. So you won't replace it? I said. No, he said. And then he turned and left.

When I got back home from school there was a letter with a foreign stamp in the post box. I opened it at once and read it walking up the hill. It was from the manager of the Grand Hotel in Lucerne. He wrote that, unfortunately, all the rooms were registered by surnames and therefore he couldn't help me with Melanie's address, but I could try the two travel bureaus involved, whose addresses he added afterward: one in Philadelphia and one in Lugano.

I put the letter back in the envelope and went in. Bang went my plan to write letters for a year and then make a surprise visit, with the exciting possibility that it was there, in America, that my future lay.

For the rest of the spring I was drunk almost all the time. The first thing I did when I woke up in the russ van or on a sofa at a friend's or on a bench in the park was to get my hands on something to drink and continue where I had left off. And there was little that beat starting the day with a beer and walking around drunk in the morning. What a life. Going here, there, and everywhere, having a drink, sleeping whenever an opportunity offered itself, eating something maybe, and then just carrying on. It was fantastic. I loved being drunk. I came closer to the person I really was and dared to do what I really wanted to do. There were no limits. I only went home for a shower and a change of clothes, and once, when I was sitting in the living room with a six-pack of Carlsberg, which I drank while waiting for the russ van to come and pick me up, Mom suddenly flew into a rage. She had tolerated so much, but she drew the line here, at this, sitting alone and drinking in the living room, she would not put up with it. I could choose: either I stopped drinking or found myself somewhere else to live. It was a simple choice, I got up, grabbed the beer, said good-bye, and went out, down the road, where I sat on the slope, lit a cigarette, and opened a beer while waiting for the van. If she didn't want me to live at home, well, I wouldn't live at home.

"What are you sitting there for?" Espen said when the van pulled up in front of me.

"I`ve been thrown out," I said. "Actually, it doesn't matter."

I got in, we drank what we had on the way to town, bought some more crates of beer at a supermarket, went on toward Vågsbygd, where we were meeting that night, a grass plain by the sea with an ancient deciduous forest sloping upward, where we sat drinking, where I disappeared into myself and walked around without a thought in my head. It was great, as always. The interpersonal shit I usually got bogged down in meant nothing, I was footloose and free, everything was as cold and clear as glass. I asked after Geir Helge, a lean, sociable guy with glasses and a Mandal dialect. He smoked hash, everyone knew that, and now I wanted to try it too. I had been considering it for a long while. Smoking hash was a stigma, if you did you were on the outside, you were no longer a decent person, you were on the way to becoming a junkie. In any case that was how it was in Kristiansand. And the idea of it being the beginning of a road that would lead me to a life as a junkie was incredibly appealing and filled life with destiny and meaning. Being a junkie, just living for drugs, renouncing everything else, for me that was the worst of the worst. Junkies had abandoned their humanity, they were a kind of devil, it was terrible, terrible, the worst, hell. I laughed at those who associated hash with heroin, it was propaganda, nothing else, smoking hash was a bid for freedom for me, but although hash was completely harmless, it was in the same category as harmful drugs, in a way, smoking it made me a drug addict, and what an immense and exhilarating thought that was.

I wanted to steal, drink, smoke hash, and experiment with other drugs – cocaine, amphetamines, mescaline – to get high and live the great rock-and-roll lifestyle, to feel to the last drop of my blood that I couldn't give a flying fuck about anything. Oh, what appeal there was in that! But then there was all the rest of me inside that wanted to be a serious student, a decent son, a good person. If only I could blow that to smithereens!

This was an attempt to do that. The thought of smoking hash, the thought that I could actually do it, that I could actually become a junkie, if I ever dared, it was only a question of doing it, making the move, this simply made my insides explode with happiness and excitement as I walked up the slope under the leafy trees to where Geir Helge hung out. I asked if he had anything to smoke, I said I had never done it before, he would have to show me, which he was more than happy to do. After we'd finished I walked slowly down the slope and into the crowd. At first I didn't notice anything in particular, perhaps I was too drunk, Geir Helge had said something about this, that it didn't always work the first time and it didn't always work if you were too drunk. But when I got into the back of the russ van, which was empty, something happened. I moved my shoulder and it was as though the joint had been lubricated with oil, yes, as though the whole of me was full of oil. A tiny, tiny movement anywhere was enough to fill my body with sensual pleasure. So I sat there wagging a finger, lifting one shoulder, shaking a hip, and wave after wave of pure sensuality washed through my body.

Espen stuck his head in.

"What are you up to? Are you feeling OK?"

I opened my eyes and straightened up. The movement was so vigorous that a jolt of pleasure rippled through me.

"I'm fine," I said. "I'm having an absolutely fantastic time. But I want to be alone. I'll be out afterward."

I wasn't, I fell asleep, and in the following days I smoked as much hash as I could, as well as drinking. The last nights before Constitution Day, May 17, I was so stoned and drunk that I didn't know where I had been, and when I woke up that morning I was in a russ van, we were parked in some square, and outside the windows, the streets were lined deep with people. Vaguely I remembered we had been to Tresse and that at some point we had been sitting under a tarpaulin in a double-ender moored to the pontoons, together with some uncommunicative and inert man, and that Espen had later run over and dragged Sjur and me away, the man was dead, he said, but when we stood by the boat it was empty. Espen desperately ran up and down, and then I remembered nothing else. How many minutes of the long night were left? Ten maybe?

Once we came across a tramp, he was sitting on a bench in the park, we stood around him talking. He said he had sailed with Leif Larsen during the war, running refugees and agents between the Shetlands and Norway. From then on I called him the Shetland Shit. Laughed and repeated it as often as I could. Hey, Shetland Shit! After a while I went behind him to have a piss, and then I pissed on him, up and down his back. Then we drifted on through the night, settling here, settling there, there was always someone with a beer or a bottle of spirits. I laughed, danced, drank, and made out with whoever was there. I could go over to a girl in the class and tell her she had always been on my mind, I had always stolen furtive glances at her, it was a lie, but it did the trick, everything had opened up. Everything was open.

When I woke up in the russ van on the seventeenth of May and saw I was surrounded by festively dressed people on all sides, I was frightened. But not even that mattered, I just had to drink a couple more beers and the fear was gone, and we would go out and sell more russ newspapers so that we had the money for more beer, and when it was midnight I was as free as could be after several days' drinking, running through the streets and shouting, chatting to strangers, joking with some, harassing others, happy but also extremely tired, and it was in this state, racing back and forth through the procession, streets on both sides packed with people, all wearing their best clothes, suits, and national costumes, and Norwegian flags everywhere, that I suddenly heard someone shout my name.

It was Grandma and Grandad.

I pulled up in front of them with a grin on my face. Gunnar's son was there too, and it wouldn't have surprised me if I was the first drunk he had ever seen. They stared at me through icy eyes, but it didn't matter, I laughed and carried on, there were two days left to the exams, and I didn't want them to end. The final party was held at the Fun Senter, and the atmosphere was on the wane, however much I tried to resist it, and I and two others caught a taxi to Bassen's late at night. He wasn't at home, the house was empty, and we leaned a ladder against the first floor where there was a window ajar. Once inside we sat on the living-room carpet and smoked hash from perforated Coke cans. When Bassen turned up the following morning, he was furious, naturally enough, but not so much so that we couldn't catch a couple of hours of sleep, but we all knew that the fun was definitively over. I was still drunk when I woke up, but this time there was no hair of the dog, and I was already beginning to sink deeper and deeper into myself on the bus home, it was terrible, everything was terrible. Mom said nothing about having thrown me out, we barely spoke, I lay in the bath with a layer of scum on the surface of the water. I was tired and went to bed early, we had the Norwegian exam the following day, but I couldn't sleep. My hands were trembling, but that wasn't all that trembled, the flex on the lamp writhed back and forth like a snake whenever I looked at it. The floor sloped, the walls leaned, I sweated and tossed and turned with my head full of random images. It was dreadful, a night of hell, but then morning came and I got up, dressed, and caught the bus to school. I was unable to concentrate, every twenty minutes I signaled to the proctor, who accompanied me to the toilet, where I washed my face.

Of all the things I had done and that would come back to haunt me during these days the encounter with my grandparents was the worst. But surely they couldn't know that I had drunk so much, could they? Surely they couldn't know that I had not only been drinking but also smoking hash, could they? No, they couldn't. And in my diary for the beginning of June that year I wrote that the months I had been a russ, celebrating the end of school, were the happiest in my life. I used those words: the happiest in my life.

Why did I write that?

Oh, I was so happy. I laughed and was free and friends with everyone.

At the end of June, I left home, Mom drove me to a flat at the hospital, I worked there for a month, was together with Line, drank wine in the evenings and on weekends, smoked hash whenever I could get my hands on it. Espen rejected it point-blank, it was filth, he said, and he continued to insist that the story about the man he had found dead the night before May 17 was true. One afternoon he called up to say there had been an article in the newspaper about a man discovered floating in the harbor. "That's him!" Espen said. I didn't know if he really meant it or was just trying to get as much mileage from the joke as he could. He said he had a vague memory, as if in a dream, of him dumping the body overboard. Why would you have done that? I said. I was drunk, he answered. No one else but you saw any dead man. It's just a fantasy. No, he said, it's true. What about the man sitting with us in the boat? Don't you remember him? Yes, I do. You saw him then? Yes. He was dead. Now, come on, Espen, if he'd been dead, why would you have heaved him over the side and then run to get us? I don't know.

The month had been packed with such incidents, I wasn't sure whether they had happened or not, and this combined with the feeling I had that everything was possible, that there were no limits, and the enormous tracts of time of which I remembered nothing caused me to begin to lose sight of myself. It was as though I had disappeared. In part I liked this, in part I didn't. The routines at the hospital, where I was mostly responsible for setting and clearing the tables at mealtimes and otherwise helping with anything of a practical nature, neutralized this feeling but didn't erase it because in the evening I always went out, drank with the people I met, it was summer and there was always someone around I knew. One evening we were refused admission to Kjelleren, so Bjørn and I climbed up on the roof of the block behind, ran all the way across the rooftops, found a skylight, crawled in, went down to Kjelleren, which was absolutely empty, it must have taken us an hour. We went up a few floors, entered a flat, someone woke up and shouted at us, we said we had gone in the wrong door, walked amid gales of laughter to Tresse, a square in the center of town where Bjørn's dad had a flat and we could sleep. In the morning I rang the hospital and said I was ill, they probably didn't believe me, but what could they do?

That night I drank with a radio technician, Paul, who had driven us to an Imperium concert in Oslo, and on the way home, in the middle of the night in Telemark, at twenty degrees below, the car skidded, left the road doing a hundred kilometers an hour, brushed against a lamppost, flew through the air, and landed in a ditch. We're going to die, I thought, and the idea of it didn't bother me in the slightest. We didn't die, the car was a write-off but we were in good shape. It was a great story, one we could tell others, also the sequel, the old house whose door we knocked on, the rifle standing in the hallway, the feeling of being in another, nastier world than our own, and the incredible cold outside as we hitched for more than two hours wearing sneakers and suit jackets. We hung around talking about that at Kjelleren, Paul and I and his girlfriend, she was wonderful, perhaps twenty-three, twenty-four, I had secretly had my eye on her for ages, and when she suggested taking a taxi back to her place to smoke some dope, of course I said yes, we smoked, and when I smoked I sometimes became so unbelievably horny, and sitting next to her on the sofa it hit me at once, I grabbed her, she laughed and wriggled away, saying she loved Paul, and then she put her hand between my legs and laughed even more and said you've grown up. Downstairs in Kjelleren she had been quiet most of the time, Paul had smiled at us, he trusted her, which he was right to do.

At work the next day they said nothing, but I noticed of course, I wasn't someone they were interested in keeping however much effort I made to mollify them. I had the job for only a month, and when the time was up, I went back to our house, which was no longer ours, Mom had sold it, for the next two days we packed everything into boxes, and then a big removal van came and took it all.

Except for one thing, and that was the cat.

What should we do with the cat?

Mefisto?

Mom couldn't have the cat where she was going to live, and I definitely couldn't take him to Northern Norway.

We would have to have him put down.

He wound around our legs, Mom put a tin of liver paste in his carrier, he ran in, Mom closed the door, put the carrier on the passenger seat, and drove to the vet in town.

That afternoon I lay on the rocks beneath the waterfall and swam. When I got back, Mom's car was in the garage. She was sitting in the kitchen drinking coffee. She got up when I entered, walked past me without saying a word, her eyes downcast.

"So is Mefisto dead now?" I asked.

Mom didn't answer, just shot me a glance, then opened the door and went out. Her eyes were brimming.

That was the first time I had seen Mom cry.

Eight days later, in a fetal position on the sofa in Håfjord, I lay asleep after emptying the contents of my stomach into the toilet, so wonderful. My sleep was light, the revving of a car engine somewhere was all it required for me to open my eyes. But I didn't have anything to do, I had no duties, I could lie in bed and sleep all Saturday and Sunday. Monday was an eternity away, I mused as I lay there feeling sleep steal over me again.

There was a ring at the door.

I went to answer it, surprised at how light my body felt.

It was Sture.

"It's soccer practice," he said. "In fifteen minutes. Had you forgotten? Or are you too muzzy after yesterday?"

"I'm a bit fuzzy," I said with a smile. "But not muzzy."

I ran my hand through my hair.

"I haven't brought any cleats with me. I was thinking of buying some but I forgot. So I suppose you can count me out."

Sture brought his arm forward from behind his back. Two pairs of cleats hung from his hand.

"Forty-five?" he said. "Or forty-six?"

"Forty-five," I said, taking them.

"See you up there then?"

"OK, see you there."

I hadn't played soccer for a couple of months, and it felt strange to run around on a field again, especially this field, for there was something about the spot, squeezed in under the gleaming green mountain slopes, the sea straight ahead, which went against everything I associated with soccer. It didn't improve matters that the team I was playing on were all fishermen, the whole bunch of them. A couple of them were good, particularly one called Arnfinn, who resembled one of the English midfield players we used to see on Saturday afternoon TV in the 1970s, balding and red-haired, relatively short, stocky with a paunch, not the quickest in the world, but he made things happen around him as soon as he had the ball, whether he was flicking it on, hitting a cross, or threading a forward through, without even raising his head, as though he didn't have to see, he could sense everything. He tackled me a few times, it was like running into a tree. He was good. Their striker was good, a tall, thin guy who was surprisingly fast, and their goalie, Hugo, was also decent. The rest were like me, perhaps a bit worse, with the exception of Nils Erik, who could hardly have played before and warmed up by doing the kind of knee bends that had probably last been witnessed in the '50s.

After the game we went to the changing rooms by the swimming pool, showered, and sat in the sauna. Everyone apart from Nils Erik and me was as white as snow. Many had freckles on their shoulders and backs, many were very hairy, and when they walked around, strutting naked and teasing one another, I had the impression they almost belonged to a different race. I still had a tan after the summer, with a white patch where my trunks had been, I didn't have a single hair on my arms or chest or shoulders, just some barely visible down, and my back was as straight as a pillar, not broad and bulging like theirs. Not to mention my biceps, which were as thin as twigs while their arms were the width of tree trunks. And as for my chest, it was as flat as could be, like a board, and looked nothing like the kegs they walked around with. Not that their bodies were magnificent specimens, they weren't, many had spare tires and flab, no one had a chest arched into two well-defined halves from muscle training, no one had six-pack abs, that was another world for them. What they respected, I could see, was strength. So it made no difference to them if a belly hung over a belt or the odd double chin rolled over a collar.

We sat on the three benches in the sauna, someone had opened some beer; Hugo, the goalie, passed one over.

"Actually I have to work this evening," I said, "but one can't hurt."

"Good," he said, and gave it to me.

Froth streamed out of the bottle. The glass was green and cold.

"It was fun last night!" he said.

"Yes, it was," I said.

"That was Irene you were all over, wasn't it?"

I smiled and paused.

"We saw you! Not bad, one week in Northern Norway and Karl Ove's got himself a girlfriend!"

"Coming up here and taking our women! You stay down south, you southern bastard!" someone else said.

They laughed. I laughed too.

"But old Pinocchio here just wanted to dance," Hugo said, looking at Nils Erik.

Pinocchio! That was who he looked like!

"Yes," Nils Erik said. "I really like dancing. I used to dance a lot at Horten's Dance Academy!"

They looked at him and smiled uncertainly. I had to laugh. At that moment, Sture came in, he flicked his towel at one of the players to make room for him. He was slim and not as well built as the others, but slight he was not, there were muscles on him too. In addition, he had a beard and was bald and confident. I had been a bit nervous that, as a teacher, he wouldn't be able to cope with them, but within seconds I saw that this was not the case.

He turned and looked up at me.

"We've got a match on Tuesday evening. You're in, aren't you?"

I nodded.

"You'll be the center back."

"Center back?" I echoed.

"Yes," he said. "That's what I said."

He winked and turned away. I finished the beer and belched, got up, and went into the shower. Nils Erik followed and stood beside me.

He had a big dick, it hung down and smacked against his thighs.

Why would someone with such red cheeks who liked to go on long walks in the forest have such a big cock? I wondered. What would he do with it?

"Did you used to do outdoor calisthenics or what?" I said.

"Calisthenics? No."

"Looked like it with your warm-up exercises," I said.

He laughed and did a few knee bends in the shower.

"Was that what you meant?" he said.

"Exactly," I said. "Don't teach my class that in the gym lessons, just so you know. It would totally destroy their self-confidence."

Two or three more came in and turned on the showers. In seconds the air was full of steam again.

"Are you coming up to my place afterward?" Hugo said. "There's a gang of us having a drink."

"I'd love to," I said, "but I can't."

"Me neither," Nils Erik said. "Two nights in a row is too much."

"What wimps!" Hugo said.

That stung, I didn't want to be a wimp and I could drink him under the table any day of the week, but I couldn't go, I had to write.

I said good-bye to Nils Erik at the crossroads and walked down to my flat. Slung the bag down on the floor in the hall, stopped by the mirror and ran my fingers through my hair to make it stand up, sniffed the air a couple of times: what was that smell? Perfume? Had someone been here?

There was a folded piece of paper on the sitting-room table I was sure I hadn't left there.

I opened it. It was from Irene.

Hi Karl Ove,

Well, Hilde and I've been here on a big surprise visit. While you were at soccer practice we sat here making ourselves comfy. We've had a look at all your records. Wow, what a collection! We can see you've got a few more now than when we were here last. Good for you.

You seem like an all-right guy and I hope to get to know you better. I've missed you. I've just been waiting to see you again. But it'll have to be another time because we've gotta go now.

Hugs and kisses from Irene

Had they just come in and sat down?

Yes, they must have.

And then left again?

I opened the door and stepped out to look for them, in case we had just crossed paths.

Nobody.

Just the sound of the sea, the vast gray sky, a couple of tiny figures walking along the road at the bottom of the hill.

I went back in and boiled a whole packet of spaghetti, fried all the old potatoes I had in the fridge, and soon I was in the sitting room with a steaming mountain of spaghetti and browned potatoes on a plate in front of me, I applied ketchup liberally and wolfed it down. Wonderful. Then I made some coffee, put Led Zeppelin's first LP on the record player, turned the volume up almost full, and walked up and down clenching my fists and nodding my head. Now I'll show them. And then, pumped up with adrenaline and anger, I sat down and started to bang away on the typewriter.

The short story I wrote was based on a dream I'd had that summer. I had been doing exercises in some kind of net that stretched endlessly into the darkness on all sides, it was slippery but thick and strong, like an enormous sinew. This net turned out to be in my own brain. In other words I had turned the relationship around: my thoughts didn't exist in me, I existed in my thoughts. The dream had been a sensation, but when I wrote it down it dissipated into nothing, so I crumpled up the paper and threw it away, turned the record over and started afresh. This too was based on a dream, and in this too what I was standing on stretched into the darkness on all sides, however, unlike in the first dream, this darkness was broken by bonfires. Bonfire after bonfire burned around me as I walked. To my right there was a mountain, ahead of me the sea, that was all, nothing happened, there were just these elements, and I wrote it all down.

Oh shit, this was no good either!

All the fires in the darkness, the tall mountain and the immense plain, it had been so extraordinary!

On paper it was nothing.

I moved to the sofa and started writing my diary instead. "Have to work on transferring the moods from inside to outside," I wrote. "But how? Easier to describe people's actions, but that's not enough, I don't think. On the other hand, Hemingway did it." I raised my head and looked out at the mountains above the fjord. "But I'm happy here anyway. Who would have thought it? And I've met someone. Very pretty. Think I might have a chance. Rock 'n' roll!"

Early that evening the upstairs front door opened. The footsteps that followed across the floor were heavier and more solid than Torill's, and I remembered she had said her husband was coming home today. Life in the rooms above me now was completely different. They were laughing, music was blaring, and when I went to bed they were at it above my head.

Oh, it went on for ages.

She screamed, he groaned, something was thumping to a regular, rhythmic beat, perhaps the bed knocking against the wall.

I thrust the pillow over my head and tried to think about something else.

But it didn't work, how could it, I knew who she was and what she looked like.

All went quiet. I dozed off.

I'll be damned if they didn't start up again.

I went to the sofa and lay down there. It was as though a shadow had fallen over me. The anticipation I had felt when I had thought that something might happen with Irene collapsed like an old mineshaft and tumbled in on me.

I couldn't do it.

I was eighteen years old, I was a teacher, I had my own place and an enormous record collection for my age with almost exclusively good music. I was good-looking, I could occasionally pass for someone in a band with my coat, black jeans, white basketball shoes, and black beret. But what good was that if I couldn't do the only thing I really wanted to do?

At last they finished, for the second time, and like a child I fell asleep on the sofa, lost to the world.

I wrote all the next day, started work listening with clenched fists to Led Zeppelin, then sat tapping away for four hours without a break. I returned to the style of the first short story, and this time I had the two boys smashing a shed window on the estate where they lived and stealing the porn mags. The writing went well, except that I couldn't find an ending. One boy couldn't go home to his enraged father, something else had to happen, but what?

In the evening I walked up to the school. I still suffered pangs of conscience at being there alone, it felt as if I was snooping, but I wasn't, I thought, and dropped the big bunch of keys on the staff-room table with a clatter, opened the door to the small telephone cubicle, and dialed Mom's number.

She answered at once.

"How's it going?" I said.

"Very well," she said. "In fact, I was thinking of writing to you this evening."

"Did you get the short story?"

"Yes. Thanks for that."

"So what do you think?"

"I think it's very good. I was surprised. I thought, really, this is literature!"

"Is that true?"

"Yes. You tell a story, there are two wonderful characters, and the writing is so alive. It's as though I'm there when I'm reading it."

"Was there anything you particularly liked?"

"Well . . . no, not really, no. I think everything's very good."

"The ending?"

"You mean the part with the father?"

"Yes."

"That's what the story is about, isn't it?"

"It is, yes. As well."

There was a silence.

"What about Kjartan? Have you heard anything from him? Actually, I sent it to him too."

"No, I usually call him on Sundays. I'll talk to him afterward."

"Say hello from me."

"I'll do that. How are you?"

"Fine. Yesterday I went to soccer practice. Tomorrow I'm back in harness."

"Is it hard work?"

I blew out my cheeks.

"No, in fact it's quite easy. I honestly don't understand why teachers have to go to college for three years. It might be different with big classes though. There are only five or six students in each class here."

"Are you absolutely sure?"

"About what?"

"That it's so easy," she said.

I smiled. "Typical of you to be skeptical," I said. "But, no, of course there are problems, too."

"Have you gotten to know anyone?"

"Yes, some of the teachers. Especially one, Nils Erik. People up here are unbelievably open. They drop by and ring your doorbell all the time."

"Oh?"

"Yes, all sorts of people. Even my students!"

"Sounds as if you're having a good time."

"Yes, that's what I said."

We chatted for another half an hour, then I hung up and sat on the sofa to watch Sportsrevyen on TV. IK Start had lost again, things were beginning to look grim for them. If they didn't get their act together, they would be relegated.

Two days later Richard came into my lesson and beckoned to me.

"There's a call for you," he said. "I'll take your class in the meantime."

A call?

I hurried into the staff room and grabbed the receiver, which was lying next to the phone.

"Hello?" I said.

"Hi, this is Irene."

"Hi!"

"Are you working?"

"Yes."

"Did you get my note?"

"Yes. A bit of a surprise, I can tell you!"

"That was the idea! Listen, Karl Ove, would you like to see me? There's someone going to Håfjord on Friday, and I can get a lift."

"Yes, that would be great."

"I'll be over then. Bye."

"OK, bye," I said, and hung up.

Richard hadn't only kept an eye on the class, I could see, he was drawing something on the board and explaining it. He smiled at me, but there was a cold expression in his eyes, wasn't there?

In the break he took me aside.

"Just a moment, Karl Ove. No personal calls when we're teaching."

"It wasn't my fault she called," I said. "Couldn't you have taken a message? Then I could have called her back in the break."

He eyed me. "She said it was important. Was it?"

"Yes," I said.

He winked and went into his office.

Jesus.

When I opened my box at the post office after school there were three letters in it. One from a debt-collection agency threatening legal action if I didn't pay. That was the dinner suit I had rented on New Year's Eve, it had been damaged, and since I didn't have the money to replace it, I had tossed it, hoping that, in time, they would forget the whole business. I still didn't have the money, so the case would have to run its course. What could they do if I didn't pay? Put me in prison? I didn't have any money!

The other letters were from Hilde and Mom. I didn't open them until I got home, letters were a party, everything had to be perfect when I read them.

Steaming coffee in a cup, music on the stereo, a rollie in my hand, and one ready on the table.

I started with the one from Mom.

Dear Karl Ove,

You're probably waiting for more feedback, so here's Kjartan's: he was enthusiastic about your story – "it's literature and he has talent" was one of the comments I remember. He considers you his peer and sends you (via me) his latest piece of work, he's having a crack at prose now. And he urged you to push ahead with your writing but thought you probably lacked someone to discuss matters with and wondered if there were any writing courses/seminars in the area you could attend. Which is what he does. He also suggested getting in touch with a reader (publishing house). (I'm less certain about that – think it's too early in your personal development – but I'm passing on his thoughts.)

It sounds to me as if you've made the transition from "the warm nest of home" to the "great wide world" without any problems as you can see the positive sides of life. The transition isn't always painless. But then again maybe home wasn't that warm a nest either. Maybe you are less exposed where you are now; your music must help.

Other news from my end? My mind is mainly on the psychiatric nursing school. Recently, though, I have been out and about and I found an old house, an abandoned school with large, attractive, grand rooms complete with acquired wisdom and knowledge. I could imagine teaching my psychiatric nurses there!

In Sørbøvåg the patients are as fragile as ever – helpless, destitute, with an indomitable will to live, an inextinguishable determination to cope, to manage at all costs. It's good to be there in the sense that it's good to have people close to me. But the conditions there eat away at your own will and zest for life. I don't know how they keep going. Their lives are full of difficulty just managing their daily existences – like getting up, putting their clothes on, cooking, etc. – and yet they have this energy and determination.

Grandpa thinks he's going to live to be a hundred. That makes him happy! Grandma, even with her physical and mental problems, continues to follow what's going on, or perhaps more what went on, she mixes up the past and the present. The distinction is not always that clear for Grandpa either. It's depressing to witness their frailties, but without them life would be very empty. Talking to Auntie Borghild is often a solace though, she is sharp and wise, has experienced a lot in life, and is secure – on top of that, she's a good talker. I've been thinking about going to see her one evening this week for a chat.

I can see writing is an earnest business for you. It must be good to have found something you want to invest time and effort in. The possibilities are endless if you have the courage. That's what I believe.

As for the sweater, I've bought a pattern that can be adapted to suit you. But at the moment I have no desire to either knit or crochet. I might buy one here or send you the money. We'll see. Good luck with everything!

Love, Mom.

Could it be true that Kjartan had said I had talent? And that I should send my short story to a publisher?

She would never have written it if it wasn't.

But what did she mean by my personal development? Either the texts were good or they weren't?

I opened the letter from Hilde. As expected, I was showered with superlatives. She was looking forward to reading more, she wrote in that open-hearted passionate way only she had.

I put it aside and sat down in front of the typewriter. As soon as I had plugged it in, I knew what should happen in the bonfire stories.

They were burning dead bodies! All the fires across the whole of the unending plain were funeral pyres! At first he didn't understand, but then he went closer and that was when he saw. They were pushing a kind of flat wooden spade under each body and lifting it into the flames.

I finished the story in an hour, tore the sheet of paper out of the typewriter, and hurried up to the school to copy it.

Three days later Irene stood at my door.

I invited her in.

The mood was tense, she tried to handle it as well as she could, we drank tea and chatted, nothing happened.

When she was about to go, she put her arms around me and as she looked up at me I bent down and kissed her.

She was warm and soft and full of life.

"When will we see each other again?" she said.

"I don't know," I said. "When would be good for you?"

"Tomorrow?" she said. "Are you home then? I can get someone to drive me here."

"Yes," I said. "Come tomorrow."

I stood in the doorway and watched her walk toward the car. My member ached with desire. She turned and waved, then she got into the car and I closed the door, went in, and sat on the sofa. I was full of feelings for her, but they were not unambivalent, I liked her and wanted her, but did I like her enough? She had been wearing blue jeans and a blue denim jacket, surely everyone knew that didn't go? At least girls knew. And her note, all the dialect, I hadn't really liked that.

We should get drunk together, then all the ambivalence would be gone. And if I was drunk enough, would I be able to see her naked without . . . well, without that happening?

I was asleep when she buzzed the next evening. I dashed into the hall and opened the door. She had her thumbs in her pockets and was smiling at me. Behind her a car was waiting with the engine idling.

"Feel like making a trip to Finnsnes?" she said.

"Definitely," I said.

The same friend who had been with her the first time, and whose name I had forgotten, was sitting next to the driver, a guy my age, maybe her boyfriend, maybe not. I got in beside Irene, and then we were off. Like everyone here, he drove fast. The music was loud, Creedence Clearwater Revival, obviously a local favorite, and by the bottom of the hill I had a bottle of beer pressed into my hand. All the way there I wanted her, she was so close to me, especially when she laid her arms on the seat in front and leaned forward to chat with the others. They asked me some questions, I answered and asked them some questions, and Irene filled the silences by chatting with the two in front. Occasionally she turned to me and explained the background to what they were talking about, her face constantly alternating between a smile and a great tremulous earnestness the times our eyes met.

After around an hour the driver parked in front of the discotheque in Finnsnes, we went in, found a table, and ordered some wine, which we shared. We danced, she pressed against me, I wanted her so much I didn't know where to start. Foolish small talk, what good was that? I knocked back the wine to fill the abyss in me, my pulse accelerated, soon we were dancing all the time. On the way home, at a hundred and twenty over the long flats, we sat in the back kissing. When "Stand by Your Man" came on, I leaned back and laughed, I would write about this in my letters, that's how redneck this place was, this was what my life was like now. She asked me what had made me laugh, nothing, I said, I'm just happy.

At the turnoff to Håfjord the car stopped.

"You'll have to walk from here," the driver said. "We're going on to Hellevika."

"Isn't that a hell of a distance?" I said.

"No, it'll take you an hour max," he said. "If you walk quickly, you'll make it in three-quarters of an hour."

I kissed Irene one last time, opened the door, and stepped out.

In the car they were laughing, I turned, she stuck her head out the window.

"We were just kidding. Jump in. Of course we'll drive you all the way home."

Through the tunnel, along the fjord. The sea and the mountains lay very still, wrapped in the gray, equally still, night air.

"Would you like to sleep here?" I whispered to Irene as we approached.

"I'd love to," she whispered back. "But I can't. I have to go home. But I can next weekend. Are you here then?"

"Yes," I said.

"Then I'll come," she said.

On Mondays I had gotten into the habit of walking up to the school an hour before classes started, I ran my eye over what had to be done that day, and when the bell rang, I was more often than not sitting at my desk waiting for the pupils to come in. I would talk to them about what they had done since I last saw them.

On this Monday something was brewing, I could sense it as soon as they entered the room. They sat down on their chairs in their usual clumsy way. Andrea looked at Vivian, who put her hand up.

"Is it true you're going out with Irene from Hellevika?" she said.

The other girls giggled. Kai Roald rolled his eyes, but he was grinning too.

"What I do when I'm not at school is none of your business," I said.

"But you normally ask us what we did over the weekend," Andrea said.

"Yes, I do," I said. "And you may ask me what I did. I'll tell you."

"What did you do?" Kai Roald said.

"On Saturday I was at home all day. In the evening I was in Finnsnes. On Sunday I was at home."

"Ooh!" said Vivian. "And who were you with in Finnsnes then?"

"That's got nothing to do with you," I said. "Shall we get started?"

"No!"

I raised my arms in mock frustration.

"Do you have something else to say then?"

"Are you going out with Irene?" Andrea said.

I smiled, didn't answer, put the box I had brought in on the desk, and handed out the books. We had Norwegian now, the novel they were going to read was Poison by Alexander Kielland, one of the few class sets we had. I had started on it the previous Monday, their reading was so bad, I had told the mentor about this in the session I had with her, she advised me to read a book with the class, and that was what we were doing.

"Oh no," they said when they saw the green 1970s cover. "Not that one! We don't understand a word!"

"It's in Norwegian," I said. "Don't you understand Norwegian?"

"But it's so old-fashioned! We really don't understand it."

"Kai Roald, you set the ball rolling."

Oh, how painful it was to listen to. First of all, he was a bad reader anyway, but Kielland's style and the dated language destroyed any flow there was and reduced everything to single syllables, hesitation, coughing, and stammering. None of them had any idea about the plot. I regretted having chosen this book, but it wouldn't look good if I just gave up, so I continued to torment them all the way through the lesson, and would do the same the following Monday.

I was on playground duty in the break, so I went to the vestibule in the staff room to get my coat while the pupils ran into the yard behind me.

"Your father phoned, Karl Ove," Hege said, coming toward me with a note in her hand. "He said to ring him back. Here's the number."

She passed me the note, I hesitated for a moment. The pupils shouldn't be outside unsupervised. On the other hand, Dad was a teacher himself, and if he rang during working hours, it was bound to be important.

Oh, of course. The baby must have been born.

I went in and dialed the number.

"Hello?" he said.

"Hi, Dad, this is Karl Ove. I was told you'd rung."

"Yes, you're a big brother now," he said.

"Oh great!" I said. "Boy or girl?"

"A little girl," he said.

Was he drunk or just very happy?

"Congratulations," I said. "That's wonderful."

"Yes, it's wonderful. We've just come home. I'd better look after them now."

"Everything OK with Unni?"

"Oh yes. We'll talk later. Bye."

"Bye. And congratulations once again!"

I put down the phone and went out, smiled at Hege, who sent me a look, buttoned up my coat, and hurried through the vestibule into the playground. I had hardly emerged before Reidar slunk up to me. He could be unbearably clingy and exploited every situation to make sure he was the center of attention. In the classroom he would answer everything, comment on everything, always know better, always want to be the best. With me and the other teachers he was always ingratiating. He was a particularly detestable boy. He reminded me of myself when I was younger. I took every opportunity to try to eradicate this behavior as it would make his life difficult later, but there was scant reward for my efforts, after every harsh word, there he was, right back like a steel spring.

When I found out that he was the brother of Andrea in my class, I felt slightly better disposed toward him, she was my favorite student, and their being siblings touched me in a way, although I didn't really understand why it should.

"Karl Ove, Karl Ove," he said, tugging at my coat.

"Yes, what is it?" I said. "And don't pull at my coat!"

"Can I go back into the classroom?"

"What do you want to do?"

"I forgot my Super Ball. I just want to get it. Please, please, please!"

"No," I said, walking toward the football field.

He followed me.

"If Torill had been on playground duty, she would have let me," he said.

"Do I look like Torill?" I said.

He laughed. "No!"

"Off you go," I said. "Scram!"

He ran off, slowed to a walk, and stopped near five other kids in his class, who were skipping just beyond the school wall.

A gust of wind blew across the field, whirled up sand and dust from the road, I blinked a few times to clear my eyes.

It was strange to think that Dad had become a father again.

I turned and looked toward the school building. Two ninth-grade girls came out the door and set off down the hill. Both wearing tight jeans, white sneakers, and big jackets. One with dark hair pinned up at the back, the other with light brown permed hair and big curls that kept falling in front of her eyes and making her toss her head. She had such an elegant neck, long and white and slender. And such a fantastic ass.

No, I couldn't walk around with such thoughts in my mind, I would end up going crazy or in prison.

I smiled, turned back, and looked toward the usual gang playing soccer, across at the kids skipping, who seemed to be fine.

Oh no, Fatty was making a beeline for me.

"Hi!" he said, fixing me with his sad and happy eyes.

"Hi," I said. "Have you been skipping?"

"Yes, but I was out right away."

"Life's like that," I said.

"Can I come to your flat today?" he said.

"My flat? Why?"

"A little visit would be nice, wouldn't it?" he said.

I smiled. "Yes, that's true. But today isn't so good. I have to work. But bring a friend along and drop by another day."

"OK," he said.

I took the watch from my pocket and checked the time.

"Two minutes to the bell," I said. "If we walk slowly, we'll be at the door by the time it rings."

He held my hand and we walked to the entrance together.

Andrea and Hildegunn were standing with their hands in their back pockets under Richard's window and watched us as we approached.

"Poison's so boring," Andrea said. "Can we do something else?"

"It's a Norwegian literary classic," I said.

"We don't give a shit what it is," Hildegunn said.

I raised an admonitory finger to them.

They laughed and the bell rang.

On Saturday I played my first home game. Our jersey was green with thin white stripes, white shorts, and green socks. I played center back while Nils Erik, wearing tights under his shorts, shuffled up and down the touchline.

There were quite a lot of people watching, most of them on the touchlines, a few on the slope facing. Vivian and Andrea were there, I waved to them before the match started, and when someone shouted, "Come on, Karl Ove," a few minutes later I looked across and smiled. It was Vivian, while Andrea was yanking at her jacket to make her stop.

We won 1–0, the mood in the dressing room afterward was buoyant, everyone was going out for a drink, the majority to Finnsnes, as far as I could glean, and there was no shortage of invitations, but I couldn't go, Irene was coming.

On the way down to my place I popped into the staff room and called Yngve.

"How's it going?" I said.

"It's going fine," he said.

"Where's the letter you promised?"

"Oh that," he said. "I've had so much to think about recently."

"Like what?"

"Like breaking up with Kristin."

"Is it really over?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Your guess is as good as mine."

There was a silence.

"Karl Ove, I'm actually on my way out," he said. "I'm going to the film club tonight. We can talk later, can't we?"

"Yes," I said.

We hung up, I put on my jacket, locked the door, and left. The sky was gray and a strong wind was blowing off the sea. The tips of the waves in the middle of the fjord were white. I put a ready-made lasagna in the microwave when I returned home, ate it straight from the white plastic packaging, and drank a beer with it. I had just opened a second when a car pulled up outside.

That's probably for me, I thought, and got a hard-on. When the bell rang a second later, I stuffed one hand in my pocket to hide it and opened the door.

"Hi," said Irene.

The car hooted its horn and set off down the hill.

"Hi," I said.

She took a step forward and hugged me. I took my hand out of my pocket to reciprocate the hug and held back my groin so that she wouldn't notice.

"Nice to see you," she said. "I've been looking forward so much to coming here. I've almost been counting the hours!"

"Me too," I said. "Come in!"

"I have to go back tonight after all," she said. "But that's a long time away. Someone's going to pick me up at half past eleven. Is that OK?"

"Of course," I said.

I put the beer on the counter, opened a bottle of white wine, and filled two glasses. If this was going to work, I would have to drink, and drink something stronger than beer, that much was clear.

"Skål," I said, looking into her eyes.

"Skål," she said, smiling.

I put on a Chris Isaak record, I had worked all this out in advance, the muted, melancholic yet slightly wild mood fit perfectly.

She sat down on the sofa. I sat beside her, but not so close. She was wearing the same blouse she'd had on the first time she had been here. I couldn't see her full breasts underneath, but I sensed their presence as indeed I sensed her thighs under the tight blue jeans.

Oh.

"That was fun in Finnsnes," she said.

"Yes, it was," I said. "Are they an item, the two others who were with us?"

"Eilif and Hilde?"

"Yes."

She laughed. "No, they're brother and sister. They've always been good pals. This close," she said, holding two fingers entwined.

"Do you have any brothers or sisters?" I said.

"No," she said. "Do you?"

"Yes, a brother."

"Older or younger? No, let me guess. Older?"

"Yes, how did you know?"

"You're not the big brother type."

I smiled and refilled my glass. Knocked it back in one gulp.

"That's true," I said. "I've got a sister too. A half sister."

"Had you forgotten?"

"She's just a few days old!"

"Is she?"

"Yes, she is. A newborn baby. I haven't seen her yet. My father remarried."

Conversation flagged.

We looked at each other and smiled.

The silence continued.

It had to happen now. We had no time to lose. It had to happen now even though I couldn't feel the wine at all.

"What do your parents do?" I said, and cursed myself. A bigger turn off was hard to imagine.

But she answered politely. "Dad's a fisherman. Mom's a housewife. And yours?"

"My dad's a gymnas teacher, my mom's a teacher at a nursing college."

"And you're a teacher here!" she said. "Chip off the old block!"

"I'm not a teacher," I said. "And I'm not going to be one either."

"Don't you like it?"

"Yes, I do. But I don't want to spend my life teaching. I'm doing it for a year to earn money."

"How do you want to spend your life then?"

"I'm going to write. I'm going to be a writer."

"Are you? How exciting!"

"Yes, it is. But I'm not sure I'll make it."

"No," she said. "I mean, of course you will." She looked me in the eye.

"Would you like a bit more wine?" I said.

She nodded. I filled her glass. She took a sip. Then she got up and walked around the room. Stopped by the desk.

"So this is where you write," she said.

"Yes," I said.

She gazed out the window.

I emptied my glass and got up. Went over to her. Smelled the fragrance of her perfume, it was fresh, light, like a meadow.

"Nice view you've got from here," she said.

I swallowed and gently wrapped my arms around her. It was as though she had been waiting because she immediately leaned back, I rested my cheek against hers and stroked her stomach, she turned to me, I kissed her.

"Oh," she said, turning around and wrapping her arms around me. We kissed, long and lingering. I pressed against her. I kissed her neck, I kissed her cheek, I kissed her naked arm. My ears were rushing, my chest was pounding.

"Come on. Let's go to my bedroom," I said, took her hand and led her in. She got onto the bed and lay back, I clambered on top of her. With trembling hands I unbuttoned her blouse, underneath she was wearing a bra, I fumbled around trying to get it off, she laughed, sat up, reached behind her back and undid the hook, let the bra fall, and her breasts were freed. Oh God, how big and beautiful they were. I kissed them, my mind was running wild, first one, then the other, the nipples stiffened in my mouth and she said oh oh and I began to fumble with her trouser buttons, eventually managed to undo them, pulled them off, tore off my own, wrestled my sweater over my head and got on top of her again, felt her skin against mine, she was so wonderfully soft, I pressed against her, as hard as I'd ever done before, I rubbed against her, and then, oh no, for Christ's sake, it can't be true, not now! Not now!

But it was. A jerk, a spasm, and it was all over.

I lay quite still.

"What's up?" she said, looking at me. "Something happened?"

She half rose, supporting herself on her forearms.

"Nothing," I said, turning away. "I was just thirsty. Think I'll get something to drink. Do you want anything?"

If I could leave the bedroom without her seeing, I could "spill something" in the kitchen so that she wouldn't realize that the big wet patch on my underpants was sperm, she would think it was juice. And it worked. Standing in front of the fridge, I opened a carton of apple juice, poured some into a glass, some onto my underpants and my stomach.

"SHIT!" I shouted.

"What happened?" she said from the bedroom.

"Nothing," I said. "I've just spilt some juice. What did you say again? Did you want some?"

"No, thanks," she said.

When I went back in to her she covered her top half with the duvet, she clung to it. I sat on the edge of the bed with the glass in my hand. The moment was gone, the chance had slipped through my fingers, now I had to repair the situation.

"Ah, that's good," I said. "Shall we have a smoke? I haven't smoked since you arrived. You obviously exert a magnetic influence on me."

I smiled and got up, casually pulled on my trousers and sweater, went into the living room and put on a record, played the Housemartins this time. There was no need for Chris Isaak and his hypnotic moods anymore. Then I sat down on the sofa, filled my wineglass, and rolled a cigarette. After a while Irene appeared, also dressed.

How the hell could I get out of this?

Was it possible to raise this situation from zero to the heights we had previously scaled?

All the excitement was gone. Irene sat down at the other end of the sofa, straightened her rumpled hair with her hand, then reached out for her glass.

When she looked at me a smile was playing around her lips and there was a glint in her eye.

A pain shot through my chest.

Was she mocking me because I wasn't good enough?

"I think I'm seriously falling in love with you, Karl Ove Knausgaard," she said.

What?

Was she making fun of me?

But there was nothing of that detectable in her eyes, they were warm and happy and passionate.

What was she thinking? Did she imagine that I had refrained from taking her and all she had to offer out of chivalry? Could she not see that I couldn't do it? That I would never be able to do it? That a kind of freak, a monster, was lurking behind what she saw?

"Do you like me a little bit too?" she said.

"Of course!" I said. But the smile I sent her couldn't have been very convincing. "Irene," I said. "Why don't we go for a walk? It's still nice out."

"Yes," she said. "Good idea. Let's do that."

I regretted my suggestion the moment we were outside. Here there was only one walk, which was along the road between the houses and back again. We wouldn't be on our own for a meter of it, we would be seen everywhere.

Irene held my hand and smiled up at me. Perhaps it didn't matter, I thought, and smiled back.

We set off downhill. Neither of us said a word. The light pressure from her hand, which I felt now and then, and her presence only a few centimeters from me, were enough for my lust to return. Around us the countryside was at peace. The sea was perfectly calm. Some clouds hung motionless on the horizon and above the mountains on the other side, which in the gathering dusk were completely black. All I wanted to do was throw her to the ground and take her. But I couldn't. Not here, not anywhere, not at home, I had just tried that, I hadn't succeeded, it hadn't worked. I could have yelled, I could have screamed. I wanted her, I could have her, but I wasn't able to do it.

Darkness hovered above the sea, between the mountains, beneath the sky: floor, walls, and roof. The first stars had begun to burst through. There wasn't a soul around.

"Are you going to go back to Kristiansand after you've finished here?" Irene said.

I shook my head. "Definitely not," I said. "That's the last place on earth I want to live."

"Is it so awful?"

"Yes, you have no idea."

"I've been there. Dad's got some family there."

"Oh? Where?"

"I think it's called Vågsbygd," she said. "But I don't remember exactly."

"Yes, that's what it's called," I said.

We had reached the bend at the end of the village, by the chapel. She stopped and put her arms around me.

"We're going out now," she said. "Aren't we?"

"Yes," I said.

We kissed.

"My writer," she said with a smile.

This time it was obvious she was teasing me. But also that she liked the idea.

Oh Christ, when was this going to end? I could barely walk I was so excited by having her this close to me.

We went on, she told me a bit about what she was doing in Finnsnes, I told her a bit about what I had done in Kristiansand.

As we approached my flat and I saw the school standing there like a social-democratic fortress, it struck me that we could walk up there, I could unlock the pool and we could have a swim. Have a shower together, have a sauna together, swim together. But as I imagined it the certainty that I wouldn't be able to perform and that it would be impossible to conceal it sank its claws into my breast.

I unlocked the door, we chatted and drank some more wine. The silences became longer and more uncomfortable until it was half past eleven and I could finally accompany her to the door and kiss her good-bye.

She looked back once on her way to the car. Her eyes were gleaming. Then she got in, the door closed, and she was gone.

The next day I tried to write. It didn't go very well, and the evening's defeat cast a shadow over everything. Not only over my individual lessons and what I did in them but the whole of my accursed life. There was a reason for this, and I knew the reason, but it was somehow ill defined, surrounded by a fog-like vagueness, something deep, deep in the mists of my mind.

The fact was I had never masturbated. Had never beat off. Had never played with myself. I was eighteen years old now and it had never happened. Not once. I hadn't even tried. My lack of experience of this meant that I both knew and didn't know how to do it. And once I hadn't done it as a twelve- or thirteen-year-old, time passed and it slowly became unthinkable, not in the sense of unheard of, more in the sense of beyond my horizons. The direct result of this was that I had heavy nocturnal emissions. I dreamed about women, and in my sleep not even touching was required, it was enough just to lay my eyes on them, standing there, with their beautiful bodies, and I came. If I was close to them in my dreams, again I came. My whole body jerked and convulsed through the night, and my underpants were soaked with semen in the morning.

I had read porn magazines like everyone else when I was growing up, but it had always been with others around me, in the forest with Geir or Dag Lothar or some of the other boys, never alone, not once had I taken a magazine home, I wouldn't have dared. There were few things I found more stimulating and exciting than looking at a porn magazine, but the desire it aroused in me never led to masturbation as there were always others around. At most I would lie on my stomach and rub my groin against the ground while I read. When I was alone at home I sometimes flicked through the mail-order catalogs that existed then, staring at the lingerie or bikini models, and my throat constricted as I studied the cloth pressing against the soft arch between their thighs, or the nipples occasionally visible under their bras or bikini tops. But that was where it stopped, at the constricted throat, the throbbing heart. I didn't masturbate. This was never a conscious decision, it wasn't that I told myself, no, I'm not doing that. Everything was vague and unclear, unconscious and tenebrous. By the time I was in my teens it was too late. Reading porn magazines in the forest was over and not replaced by anything else. In my teens I didn't see a single pornographic film and didn't read a single pornographic magazine. Desire was never focused on one point, it broadened out, it was large and nebulous and hard to handle. Somewhere

I knew that my situation with regard to girls, or Irene, as she was the one in question now, would improve dramatically if I just started masturbating. Nevertheless, I didn't. Even though I knew this, at the same time I didn't, it belonged to the unthinkable, and that was where I was on this day, with the aroma of Irene still clinging to the sheets, I should have, I had to, I wanted to, but I didn't.

No, I played Led Zeppelin at full volume, summoned all the concentration I had, and tried to race ahead with a new short story. When darkness fell I let it enter the flat too, apart from on the desk, where a small lamp shone like an island in the night. There was me and my writing, an island of light in the darkness, that was how I imagined it. And then I went to bed and slept until the alarm clock woke me and another Monday at Håfjord School began.

The first thing the pupils did when I entered the classroom was to tease me about Irene.

I let them run on, then fixed them with a stare, said, now that's enough of that nonsense, we have to start work if anything is to become of you. They took out their books and started work, I walked around and helped them, I liked the way they went from being a small, chatty, giggly class to falling into step and just being themselves.

Sitting like this, without speaking, without looking at each other, fully occupied with their own work, it was as though their ages melted away. Not that I no longer saw them as children, it wasn't being children that defined them but their personalities, who they were in themselves and probably always would be.

I didn't think about Irene much at school, these thoughts came afterward, alone in my flat, like an adrenaline rush through my body. And then the despair. Never one without the other. She saw a purpose in us, she wanted something from me, and although I liked her I wasn't in love, to start with we had nothing to talk about. I wanted to have her, but that was all I wanted.

Was she in love with me?

I doubted it. It was probably more that I was different, not one of her classmates but a teacher, not a thirty- or a forty-year-old but still her age, not from here but from the south.

In a year I would be gone, and she would still be here in her last year at gymnas. That wasn't the best basis for a relationship, was it? Besides, I was going to write and I couldn't tie up all my weekends, which I would have to do if this became serious.

In my head the arguments raged back and forth. On Tuesday we had a soccer match, it took us an hour to get to the field, which was made of shale and became so dusty that the players looked like Bedouin shadows. We lost narrowly, but I scored a goal in the melee after a corner. On Wednesday I received my first copy of Vinduet, the new journal I had subscribed to, in the post. The theme was literature's relationship with other art forms, I couldn't grasp any of it, but the mere fact that I had a literary journal on my desk was good enough. In the evening Hege came by, she had gone up to the school to do some work and on her way back she had decided on an impulse to see how I was. On Thursday I went to Finnsnes with Nils Erik, we went to the liquor store and the library, I bought a bottle of vodka and took out two novels by Thomas Mann, The Confessions of Felix Krull and Doctor Faustus. On Friday I went to school to call Irene. There was no one in the staff room and I took my time, brewed up a pot of coffee, watched some TV, paced back and forth a good deal. In the end I went into the cubicle, put the note on which I had written her number on the machine, dialed the number, and put the receiver to my ear.

Her mother answered. I introduced myself, she called, "Irene, it's Karl Ove," I heard footsteps and some thumping.

"Hi!" she said.

"Hi," I said.

"How are you? Has something happened? You sound so serious."

Her slightly husky voice was more obvious on the phone, where there was nothing to distract my attention. It made her sound incredibly sexy.

"I don't know . . ." I said.

There was so much that created doubt as far as she was concerned. Wasn't I just the first best person to come along? We had seen each other on the bus, for God's sake. And she hadn't offered me any resistance at all, she had just got into bed, ready for anything.

"Tell me now," she said.

What was I doing? Should I end it over the phone? That was cowardly, it had to be done face-to-face.

"No, there's nothing," I said. "It's just . . . well, I'm not in the best frame of mind right now. But it's nothing serious. A bit down, that's all."

"Why? Has something happened? Are you homesick?"

"Maybe a little," I said. "I don't know. It'll be fine. Tomorrow it'll be gone."

"Oh, I wish I could be there to comfort you," she said. "I miss you!"

"I miss you, too," I said.

"Can we meet tomorrow?"

If she was being picked up at twelve, like the last time, it would be almost impossible to end the relationship. Because it would have to be done right away, you couldn't stay together with someone for four hours, as before, perhaps end up in bed together again, and then go your separate ways. If I did it at once, what would she do in the meantime, before her lift arrived?

"That won't work," I said. "I'm busy then. What about Sunday?"

"I have to go to Finnsnes again."

"Come here first! You can catch the bus from Håfjord. That would work."

"Maybe. Yes, I can do that."

"Good!" I said. "See you then."

"See you then. Take care!"

"Take care, Irene."

The next morning I was stopped by a group of boys standing outside the shop, they asked how I was getting on, fine, I said, did I want to go to a party later that day, they asked, where, I said, it's no big deal, they said, we'll just be sitting around drinking up at Edvald's, come up if you feel like it, no need to bring any booze, we've got enough.

Leaving them and walking up to my flat, I thought about how open people were here, inviting me to all sorts of events although I was not one of them, and I pondered why. What did they want from a Kristiansander with a black coat, a beret, and progressive musical tastes, why take him in tow in the evening? At home going out demanded planning, lots of obstacles had to be overcome, you didn't just turn up at someone's house or sit down at a table in a bar with someone you vaguely knew. Everyone had their own circle, and if you didn't, you were on the margins. Here there may have been similar circles, but if so they were open. In the few weeks I had lived here the most striking discovery was that everyone was accepted. Not necessarily liked, but always accepted. They didn't have to wave to me and invite me out, but they did, and not just a few people but everyone.

Perhaps the answer was they had to, it was as simple as that. There were so few of them that they couldn't afford to leave anyone out. Or else it was their attitude to life that was different, rawer, more casual. If you lived your life on a boat deck, if you did hard physical work every day and drank as soon as you were on shore, there was no reason to bother with petty clockwork-like social etiquette and distinctions. A more natural course of action was to proffer the hand of friendship, say join us, have a drink, have you heard about the time . . . ?

Vivian, Live, and Andrea came racing down the hill on their bikes. They waved and shouted to me as they passed, their hair flapping and their eyes squinting to meet the oncoming wind. I was smiling to myself long after they had passed. They were so funny, the way the immense seriousness they possessed was shattered internally by their equally immense childish glee.

I worked for a few hours on a short story about some boys who nailed a cat to a tree, then I heated a frozen meal in the microwave for dinner, lay down on the sofa, and read Doctor Faustus until it began to grow dark outside and I had to get ready to go out.

I hadn't read Thomas Mann before. I liked the elaborate, old-fashioned, formal style, and the scenes at the beginning when the protagonists are children and the father of one of them, Adrian, shows them experiments with dead material, which he brings to life, were fantastic, there was something eerie about them that at first forced itself to the front of your consciousness and then seemed to sink to the bottom. I was reminded of the open heart I had once seen on TV as a child, how it had throbbed in all that blood, like a small, blind animal. It was alive and belonged to a different category from Adrian's father's experiments, but the blindness was the same and also the way it was subject to laws, moving according to them, not independently.

I was unable to grasp the part about music and musical theory, but I was used to that in this kind of novel, there were always great expanses I just skimmed without understanding, more or less like the French dialogue that could suddenly crop up in some books.

I showered, changed, put a bottle of vodka in a bag, and walked up to Edvald's house, he was a fisherman, older than the others, around thirty-five, single, liked drinking, and I stayed there until five in the morning, when I strolled back through the village with a head as empty and desolate as an unfrequented tunnel. On waking up at two the next day, I remembered nothing apart from standing on the quay watching the seabirds bobbing on the water, wondering if they were asleep, and pissing against the shop wall. Everything else was gone. All the details and individual moments were lost. I had drunk a whole bottle of spirits, that was what you did here, and I was still drunk when I woke up. Writing was out of the question. Instead I lay in bed reading, but that didn't go very well either, my brain seemed to be soaking in a kind of yellow liquid, which I watched. If I stopped reading, the feeling went away, it was as though it were me in the liquid.

At a few minutes to five there was a ring at the door. I had been asleep and jumped off the bed, it was Irene.

I opened the door.

"Hi!" she said with a smile. There was a bag on the ground beside her. I took two big steps back so that she couldn't hug me.

"Hi," I said. "Do you want to come in?"

Her eyes questioned me.

"What is it, Karl Ove? Is there something up?"

"Yes, actually there is," I said. "We have to talk."

She stared at me.

"I haven't told you," I said. "But I was in a relationship before I came here. I received a letter from her after a few days. She broke it off with me. I haven't really gotten over that yet, actually. And now it's begun to get serious with us . . . But I don't have the mental space, it's too early, do you understand? I like you so much, but . . ."

"Are you finishing this?" she said. "Before it's even begun?"

I nodded. "I think so."

"What a shame," she said. "Just when I was starting to like you so much."

"Yes, I'm sorry. But it won't work. It doesn't feel right."

"Then maybe it's better we drop it," she said. "I wish you all the best for your life."

She came over and hugged me. Then she grabbed her bag, turned, and went to go.

"Are you going?" I said.

She turned her head.

"Well, we can't sit here, can we? What's the point of that?"

"But the bus won't be here for ages yet, will it?"

"I'll walk," she said. "I can get on the bus whenever it turns up."

Watching her walk down the hill, with the bag in her hand, toward the road that ran alongside the fjord, I was full of regret. An enormous opportunity had slipped away. At the same time I was relieved that it had been so painless. Now it was over. Now there was nothing to think about.

The days became shorter, and they became shorter quickly, as though they were racing toward the darkness. The first snow arrived in mid-October, went after a few days, but the next time it fell, at the beginning of November, it came with a vengeance, day after day it tumbled down, and soon everything was packed in thick white cushions of snow, apart from the sea, which with its dark, clean surface and terrible depths lay nearby like an alien and menacing presence, like a murderer who has moved into a neighboring house and whose unheeded knife glints on the kitchen table.

The snow and the darkness changed the area beyond all recognition. When I first came, the sky had been high and luminous, the sea vast, and the countryside open, nothing seemed to hold together the village with its random huddle of houses, it barely existed in its own right. Nothing stopped there, that was the feeling. Then came the snow and the darkness. The sky fell, it lay like a lid over the rooftops. The sea disappeared, its blackness merged with the blackness of the sky, no horizon was visible any longer. Even the mountains disappeared and with them the sensation of finding yourself in wide-open country. What remained were the houses, which were lit day and night, always surrounded by darkness, and now the houses and the lights were the focal point to which everything gravitated.

An avalanche blocked the road, a ferry service was started, and the fact that you were only able to leave twice a day increased the feeling that this village was the only village, these people the only people. I was still getting lots of letters, and spent a lot of time answering them, but the life they represented was no longer the one that counted, the one that did was this: up in the morning, out into the snow, up the hill to school and into class. Stay there all day, in a low-roofed, illuminated bunker, weighted down by the darkness, go home, go shopping, have dinner, and then in the evening train in the gym with the youngest fishermen, watch TV at school, swim in the pool or sit at home reading or writing until it was so late that I could go to bed and sleep off the dead hours before the next day started.

On weekends I drank. Someone always came over and asked if I wanted to go to Finnsnes or a village a few hours away, if the road was open. When it was closed it was up to someone's place or down to someone's, there were always people sitting around drinking and they always wanted company. I didn't say no, I joined in, and a bottle of spirits over the evening was no longer the exception but the rule, so I was invariably wandering around doing things which I had forgotten by the next day. Once, I fell out of the band bus, started walking away from the village instead of toward it, no one said anything until I had gone a hundred meters wearing only a shirt and a thin jacket, shivering and trembling, and then I heard their shouts, over here you idiot, over here! At another party I danced with a substitute teacher from Husøya, her name was Anne, she came from somewhere in Østland and was pretty in that cold blond way I was so attracted by, we stood kissing forever in a corner of the corridor where the coatroom was, I called her a few days later, invited her to dinner at my place with her girlfriend and Tor Einar and Nils Erik, I tried to kiss her then but she lowered her head, she had a boyfriend, she said, she had someone else, what happened at the party should never have happened, I wasn't her type at all, she had no explanation except that she had been drunk. And perhaps that it had been dark? I said, trying to make a joke out of it, but she didn't laugh, she wasn't the sort. Cold and sincere, that was Anne.

At other weekends people came home from schools or universities across Norway, and just the fact that they had different faces was a liberation. I traipsed after one of them like a dog, her name was Tone, she was Frank's sister and the daughter of the teacher who couldn't stand me, but I didn't care about that, I was drunk and had been watching her all evening.

Now she was about to leave, and I decided to follow her.

Snowflakes were whirling through the darkness. She walked fifty meters down the road with her head lowered, beneath the light of the street lamps. I wrapped my scarf around my mouth and set off. She went into her parents' house, banged the snow off her boots, then closed the door behind her.

I stood outside for a few minutes. I thought she would be happy to see me because she had wanted to sleep with me all evening.

The kitchen window was dark, the living-room window, too. But light streamed out from the narrow window at the end of the house.

I opened the door and went in. Didn't bother to remove my shoes, glanced around the living room, it was dark and empty, walked down the hall toward the open door at the end.

She was standing in the bathroom brushing her teeth in front of the mirror. Her mouth was full of foam.

"Hi," I said.

She must have heard me, yet didn't appear the slightest bit frightened when she turned toward me.

"Get out," she said.

I sat down on a chair by the wall and stared intensely at her. First at her face, then at her breasts under the green jumper.

She shook her head.

"You're wasting your time. You haven't got a hope with me," she said almost incomprehensibly as everyone does when cleaning their teeth and talking at the same time.

"Do you want me to go?" I said.

She nodded.

"Fine," I said, got up and went out. The wind formed a wall in front of the door filled with small, frozen-hard particles of snow. What a shame, I thought, looking up at the immense darkness above us. She is so classy. Yes, unbelievably classy! After wandering back and forth in the snow-blown road under the light from the street lamps, which with the snow and the darkness as background had a greenish glare and cast an underwater glow over the surroundings, I found my way back to the party, which was no longer a party but a table littered with glasses and bottles, empty cigarette packets and ashtrays in an otherwise empty room. All sense of time in me must have stopped – had I really been away that long? – and then my sense of space went too because the next thing I remember is waking up in my bed at home.

Actually doing things, not denying myself anything when I was drunk, in that intoxicating state of total freedom, had in the course of these months gradually begun to take its toll. At gymnas I was either hungover or not, there were no other consequences. If I felt any pangs of conscience at all, they were pinpricks, nothing a hearty breakfast and a walk to town couldn't cure. Up here in the north, however, it was different. Perhaps the gulf between the person I usually was and the one I became when I drank was too great. Perhaps it was impossible for a man to have such a wide gulf inside himself. For what happened was that the person I usually was began to draw in the person I became when I was drinking, the two halves slowly but surely became sewn together, and the thread that joined them was shame.

Oh hell, did I do that? the cries resounded inside me the next day as I lay in the darkness. Oh no, shit, did I say that? And that? And that?

I lay there, rigid with fear, as though someone were throwing bucket after bucket of my own excrement over me.

Look what an idiot he is. Look what a stupid fool he is.

But I got up, started a new day, and I always got through it.

The worst was probably the notion that others saw me, that I put on a show for them, and that the side of me I displayed then was reflected in the way they looked at me every day.

I pretended I was a young teacher who took the best possible care of his children, whom they watched on his way to and from the post office or the shop, while in reality I was a babbling idiot who sat drooling over all sorts of girls at night, who would cut off both his hands for one of them to take him home, but none wanted to, after all he was a babbling, drooling idiot.

At school too I occasionally felt like that, but not with the pupils, I had the situation fully under control there, nor with Nils Erik and Tor Einar, they of course knew what was what.

Yes, I had the situation under control, yet that didn't prevent me from feeling the pain and torment there too, opposite my pupils, sitting at my desk in the minutes before the new week officially started, with the disgraceful behavior of the weekend still fresh in my mind.

They had taken off their padded jackets, and were sitting there in their Icelandic sweaters, their skin still red from the cold, squirming restlessly on their chairs, wanting to go home and back to bed while the presence of the others drew them in the opposite direction, for they were exchanging glances, whispering little comments, sniggering, breathing, living.

The light glared from the ceiling, and against the deep darkness that always hovered above us the windows reflected back the other end of the whole classroom. There sat Kai Roald, there sat Vivian, there sat Hildegunn, there sat Live, there sat Andrea. Faded blue jeans, white boots, a white sweater with a high neck. And there I was, behind the desk, in a black shirt, black jeans, trembling inside with exhaustion. Even the slightest little transgression seemed monstruous to me, all I wanted and needed was security.

I opened the book at the chapter we were going to read. The room was full of the buzz of voices from other classes. My own pupils were sleepy, not interested.

"All right, take your books out! There's a limit to sleepiness!"

Andrea smiled as she bent forward and took the book from her satchel. It was bound in brown paper and covered with the names of pop stars and film stars in felt-tip pen. Kai Roald groaned, but when I met his eyes he smiled. Hildegunn already had her book ready of course. Live turned to the window. I looked in the same direction. A figure was on its way up the hill, though more like a ghost, for it was impossible to distinguish a body from the shadowy contours coming toward us, enveloped in swirling snow.

"Live! Take out your book!"

"OK, OK. What subject do we have now?"

"Are you serious? Don't you know?"

"No-oo!"

"Six months you've been here for the first lesson on Monday morning. We always have the same subject. And that is . . . ?"

Her eyes stared at me nervously.

"You don't remember?" I said.

Neither did I. Panic rose in me like water in a blocked toilet.

She shook her head.

"Does anyone know?"

Everyone looked at me. Did they understand?

No.

There. Kai Roald opened his mouth. "Christianity," he said.

"Oh yes, Christianity!" she said. "Of course. I knew that. I just went all blank for a moment."

"You're always all blank," Kai Roald said.

She looked daggers at him.

"And you aren't?" I said.

He laughed. "You're right, I guess I am."

"I've gone blank too for the moment," I said. "But it's no good. We have to get through the syllabus. And we can only do that by working hard."

"That's what you always say," Vivian said.

"But it's true. Do you think I stand here talking about Martin Luther for my sake? I know enough about him. But you don't know anything. You're a bunch of ignoramuses. But on the other hand all thirteen-year-olds are, so it's not your fault. By the way is there anyone who knows what an ignoramus is?"

Complete silence.

"Has it got something to do with ignorant?" Andrea said. A faint blush rose up her cheeks as she watched her hand doodling in her book.

"Yes," I said. "To ignore is to fail to notice or to show no interest. An ignorant person is someone who shows no interest in anything. And if you aren't interested in anything, you don't know anything about it either."

"Then I'm ignorant," Kai Roald said.

"No, you're not. You know lots of things."

"Like what?"

"You know a lot about cars, don't you? More than me anyway! And you know a lot about fishing. I know nothing about that."

"Why don't you have a driver's license, by the way? You're eighteen after all," Vivian said.

I shrugged. "I can manage fine without one."

"But you have to get a ride whenever you want to go anywhere!" Vivian said.

"I get around, don't I?" I said. "But that's enough now. Let's get on with our work."

I stood up.

"What do you know about Martin Luther?"

"Nothing," Hildegunn said.

"Nothing?" I said. "Absolutely nothing?"

"Yes," said Live.

"Was he Norwegian?" I said.

"No," said Hildegunn.

"What nationality was he then?"

Hildegunn shrugged. "Wasn't he German?"

"Is he alive now?"

"Of course not!"

"When did he live? When your parents were small? The sixties?" I said.

"He lived in the olden days," Vivian said.

"In the fifteen hundreds," Hildegunn said.

"What did he do? Was he a plumber? Fisherman? Driver?"

"No," Kai Roald said, and giggled.

"He was a priest," Andrea said in the casual way that was intended to show that this was one of many things she knew.

"You know a lot," I said. "Martin Luther was a priest who lived in Germany in the sixteenth century. Now why don't you find out ten things about Martin Luther and write them down. Then we'll go through them at the end of class."

"How will we find them out?" Vivian asked.

"Isn't it your job to tell us actually?" Hildegunn said. "Isn't that what you get paid for?"

"I get paid for teaching you," I said. "And there won't always be a teacher in front of you telling you what you need to know. So what do you do? You have to learn where you can find things out. Don't you? Look them up in a book. Find an encyclopedia. I don't mind what you do as long as you find out ten things. Off you go!"

With sighs and groans and grimaces they got up and made for the school's modest library, each armed with a pencil and a notebook. I sat down behind my desk and looked up at the clock on the wall. Half an hour left. Once this was over, there were five classes left. And Monday was crossed off. Then there were Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday left.

This weekend I would definitely have to write. No trip to Finnsnes during the day, no party in the evening, just sit in front of the typewriter from the moment I got up to the moment I went to bed.

I had five short stories now, apart from the two stories based on dreams. All of them had the same protagonist, Gabriel, and the same cast of characters. The action took place in Tybakken. What was strange was how close the place was to me. Sitting in front of the typewriter was like opening a door to it. The scene rose inside me in its entirety and repressed everything around me. There was the road outside the house, there was the tall spruce with the stream running past, there was the slope down to Ubekilen, the stone wall, the rocky outcrop, the boathouse, the crooked rickety pontoon, the island with all the seagulls. If anyone rang my doorbell now, and they did all the time, fourth graders, seventh graders, the tall ninth grader who for some reason gravitated toward me, some of the young fishermen, I would jump out of my skin. It didn't feel as though my childhood surroundings were intruding on the present but vice versa: I was really back in my childhood, and it was the present that was intruding. If I was interrupted, a whole hour or more could pass before Tybakken would rise again.

That was what I longed for. When the trees were trees, not "trees," cars not "cars," when Dad was Dad, not "Dad."

I got up and took a few steps into the common area so that I could see what they were doing. Everyone was sitting around the table in the library, apart from Andrea and Hildegunn, who were heading for their chairs.

"Did you find anything?" I said as they walked past.

"Of course," Hildegunn said. "We've finished. What should we do now?"

"Sit down and wait."

In the classroom beyond, separated from the library by a long stack of bookshelves, sat the third and fourth graders bent over their desks, some with their hands in the air, while Torill went around helping them. In the other corner of the room sat the first graders, on cushions, around Hege, she was reading from a book, they were staring ahead, their eyes dreamy, their faces sleepy. She caught my gaze, looked up without a pause in her reading, and smiled at me. I rolled my eyes, turned to my classroom, and met Andrea's look. She had been watching me. Now she looked down.

"What did you find out then?" I said.

"Do you want to hear now?" Hildegunn said.

"No," I said. "Not really. We'll wait until the others have finished."

"Then why did you ask?" said Andrea.

"Reflex action," I said.

Across the carpet came Kai Roald and Vivian. After they had sat down I walked over to the library corner, where Live was still busy writing.

"How's it going?" I said.

"I've got five," she said. "No, six."

"That's good," I said. "That'll do. You can write down the last four as we go through them."

She picked up her bits and pieces with that serious expression she put on when somebody told her to do something. But it was unable to conceal her great inner insecurity, at least not from me. What her peers saw when they looked at her was not easy to say.

We spent the last twenty minutes of the lesson going through their points. I talked and expanded while they watched me with vacant eyes. What good Martin Luther would ever do them I had no idea. For them it was probably more about being here and writing in their notebooks with their pencils. Sitting in their seats and listening to someone talking about something.

The bell rang. They asked if they could stay indoors during the break, the weather was so bad, I said absolutely not, off you go, waited while they put on their jackets and hats, went into the staff room, where everyone was busy with their own preoccupations, and sat down with a cup of coffee, which was already bitter after an hour in the machine.

Nils Erik, who was reading the local paper, glanced across at me.

"Coming up to the pool later today?" he said.

"OK," I said. "Drop by my place."

In front of us, Torill opened the fridge door, leaned forward, and took out a yogurt. She removed the lid and licked it before throwing it in the bin under the sink, found a spoon in the drawer, and started to eat. She looked at us and smiled with a streak of pink yogurt on her lower lip.

"I get so hungry at this time," she said.

"You don't have to apologize," I said. "We snack too."

Beside me Nils Erik folded the newspaper, got up, and went to the bathroom. I drank a mouthful of coffee and turned to Jane, who came out of the photocopy room at that moment with a pile of papers in her hand. The corners of her mouth drooped as always, her eyes were bored and introspective, leaving you with no real desire to find out what went on inside her.

"Did you make the coffee, Jane?" I said.

She scrutinized me. "Yes, I'm on kitchen duty today. Why?"

"Nothing," I said. "Except that this is the worst coffee I've ever tasted."

She grinned.

"You've been spoiled then," she said. "But I can put a fresh pot on if you like."

"Not at all. I was only joking! It's good enough for me."

She went to her desk, and I got up and stood by the window. A lamppost was encircled by light, thick with tiny white snowflakes whirring around like a swarm of insects. Some children were fighting in the snow below, four of them on top of one another in a drift, and my hand twitched when I saw them, so strong was my impulse to knock the top ones off, for I couldn't imagine anything more claustrophobic than lying underneath them, face down in the snow.

I stepped to the side and scanned the playground.

Where was the teacher?

Oh, when would I get it into my head? This was my playground duty!

I hurried toward the line of hooks in the vestibule.

"Three minutes left of the break," Sture said. "No point going out now. You can catch up after school."

He smirked at his own joke. I looked at him without smiling, pulled my hat down over my head, grabbed my gloves. Even though he was right that there was no point going out now, I had another reason: the impression of regret and energy I would leave behind me as I jogged out and came into the view of those standing behind the window. The last thing I wanted to give was an impression of slackness. The last thing I wanted was for people to think I was a shirker.

Out of the wet-weather shelter came a small, plump figure. I dashed over to the boys who had been wrestling in the snow and were now brushing it off their jeans. The denim material was almost black from where the snow had melted.

"Karl Ove!" he said from behind me, and tugged at my jacket.

He must have run after me.

I turned. "What's up, Jo?" I said.

He smiled.

"Can I throw a snowball at you?"

Last week I had given them permission to throw snowballs at me. It had been a big mistake because they thought it was so much fun, especially when they hit my thighs with a couple of stingers, that they refused to stop when I asked them to. They had reached a kind of amnesty, what had not been allowed was suddenly allowed, and they had a sense of how difficult it would be to punish them if all of a sudden it wasn't allowed any longer.

"No, not today," I said. "Besides, the bell's about to ring."

The four boys scowled up at me from under dark woolen hats pulled down over their faces.

"Is everything all right out here?" I said.

"Of course," Reidar said. "Why wouldn't everything be all right?"

"None of that," I said. "You should show respect for adults."

"You're not an adult," he said. "You don't even have a driver's license!"

"No, that's true," I said. "But at least I know my times tables. That's more than you can say. And I'm big enough to paddle your bottom three times a day if I have to."

"My dad would beat you up if you did," he said.

"Karl Ove, come on," Jo said, pulling at my jacket again.

"I've got a dad too, you know," I said. "He's much stronger and taller than me. And on top of that, he's got a driver's license."

I looked down at Jo. "Where do you want to go?"

"There's something I want to show you. It's something I've made."

"What is it?"

"It's a secret. No one else must know."

I looked across. The girls in the seventh grade were standing by the wall of the wet-weather shelter. Behind, on the fringes of the soccer field, a group of children were chasing after each other in the dark.

"The bell's about to ring, you know," I told him.

He took my hand. Didn't he understand how this looked to his classmates?

"It'll be quick," he said.

He'd hardly uttered the words before the bell rang.

"Next break then," he said. "Will you come with me?"

"OK," I said. "Now get going."

The kids on the soccer field had either not heard the bell or were ignoring it. I walked over to the field. Cupped my hands around my mouth and shouted that the bell had rung. They stopped and looked at me. The snow covering the field drew it into the surrounding terrain, it was a flat surface in the middle of a slope which, farther up, became a mountain, and in all this whiteness, which the sky's all-pervasive darkness muted to a blue, the pupils resembled tiny animals, rodents of some kind perhaps, it seemed to me, romping around outside the entrances to their ingenious networks of passageways and tunnels in the snow.

I waved to them. They set off at a lope toward me.

"Didn't you hear the bell?" I said.

They shook their heads.

"Didn't you think it was time for the bell to ring?"

They shook their heads again.

"Hurry up now," I said. "You're very late."

They ran past me. As I rounded the corner of the wet-weather shelter, the door slammed after the last straggler. I kicked the snow off my shoes against the wall and followed. Opened the door to the staff room, hung my coat and hat on the hook, and went for my books for the class. Behind me the toilet door opened. I turned around. It was Nils Erik.

"Have you been in there all this time?" I said.

"What kind of question is that?" he said.

"I was just surprised," I said, scanning the book spines. "You were in there a long time. I wasn't making any insinuations."

I looked at him and smiled. Picked out a natural science booklet.

"That's good to hear," he said. "Insinuations are such crap. No, it was Torill. She's so sexy it's unbelievable. And when she bent forward . . . I just had to go in and relieve the emergency that had arisen."

"Emergency?" I said.

"Yes," he laughed. "You know. Man sees woman. Man is attracted. Man runs to the john and whacks off."

"Oh, that emergency," I said, smiled, and went to the class.

In the next break Jo ran over to me the second I stepped into the playground.

"Come with me now!" he said, taking my hand and dragging me off.

"Take it easy," I said. "What are you going to show me?"

"Something I've made with Endre," he said.

"Where's Endre?"

"I think he's over there."

Endre was in the third grade, Jo was in the fourth. When they were together they usually kept away from the others.

"There," he said, pointing to a large snowdrift behind the building, out of sight of the rest of the school. "We've made a snow cave. It's really big. Do you want to have a look inside?"

Endre saw us coming, crawled in the entrance, and disappeared from sight.

"That's fantastic," I said, and stopped. "I think it's probably too small for me. But you go in."

He smiled up at me. Then he lay down on his stomach and wriggled in. I took a few steps back and looked across at the other children. Two fourth-grade boys came around the corner and headed toward us. Jo stuck his head out of the cave.

"There's room for you too, Karl Ove. It's really big."

"I have to keep an eye on everyone, you know," I said.

He spotted the two boys.

"This is our snow cave," he said, looking at me. "We made it."

"You sure did," I said.

"Have you ever made a cave?" Reidar shouted.

"It's ours," Jo said. "You can't come in."

They stopped by the entrance.

"Let's have a look," Stig said, trying to crawl past Jo.

"It's ours," Jo said, looking to me again. "Isn't it, Karl Ove?"

"You made it," I said. "But you can't refuse to let others in. You'd have to stand guard day and night if you did."

"But it's ours!" he said.

"It's on school premises," I said. "You can't stop anyone going in."

Reidar smiled and pushed past Jo. Soon the cave was full of kids. They immediately started planning how they could make it bigger and began to dig a tunnel from the end. Jo tried to take charge, but they ignored him, he had to find his place, which was and would always be at the bottom of the pecking order. I turned and went. I did have a bit of a bad conscience, Jo was as unhappy now as he had been happy a few minutes before, but there was nothing I could do about it, he would have to work out the social game for himself. He would have to learn he would get nowhere by whining or making up stories.

"Are you hanging around here again?" I said to the gum-chewing seventh-grade girls standing inside the wet-weather shelter.

"It's snowing and windy," Vivian said. "You don't really think that we should have to stand outside in this weather, do you?"

"You don't have to stand, do you?" I said. "You could run around like the other kids."

"We're not kids," Andrea said. "And it's not fair. The eighth and ninth graders can stay indoors."

"Only kids say something is unfair," I said. "Besides, the eighth and ninth graders have a double slot, so they're in class now."

"That's what we want. Working indoors is better than being out in this weather," Andrea said, and looked up at me. Her cheeks had reddened with the cold. Her eyes were narrow and beautiful.

I laughed.

"So all of a sudden you want to work, do you? That's a new tune," I said.

"You just laugh at us," Vivian said. "You don't have any respect for us at all."

"I treat you how you deserve to be treated," I said, eyeing the clock on the wall between the entrance to the main school building and the large wing where the swimming pool and gymnasium were. Four minutes left of the break.

I went to the other side to see how the fourth graders were doing. No sooner had I rounded the corner than I saw Jo and Endre trudging along, heads bowed into the wind, feet stamping on the snow.

"How's the cave?" I said.

"It's ruined!" Jo said. "Reidar put his head through the roof. The whole damned cave collapsed."

His eyes were moist.

"Don't curse," I said.

"Sorry," he said.

"It can happen," I said. "I'm sure you didn't mean to."

"But it was our cave! We built it! And now it's ruined."

"Build one with them next time," I said. "Then they won't ruin it."

"We don't want to," he said. "Come on, Endre."

They walked past me.

"I can help you make a new one, if you want," I said. "In the next break."

"Can you?"

"We can get started at least. But the others might join in."

"Yes, but then you're there," he said. "They won't dare smash it up."

It had been a stupid offer to make, I thought as I went back into the staff room a few minutes later. Now I would have to dig in the snow with the ten-year-olds for the rest of the breaks. On the other hand, Jo's face had lit up, I remembered, and I closed the toilet door behind me, unzipped, and began to pee. I aimed the jet at the porcelain so that the teachers who were still in the toilet wouldn't hear the splashing sound. While I washed my hands I stared at my reflection in the mirror. The singular feeling that arose when you looked at your own eyes, which so purely and unambiguously expressed your inner state, of being both inside and outside, filled me to the hilt for a few intense seconds, but was forgotten the moment I left the room, in the same way that a towel on a hook or a bar of soap in the small hollow in the sink also were, all these trivialities that have no existence beyond the moment, but hang or lie undisturbed in dark, empty rooms until the door is opened the next time and another person grasps the soap, dries his hands on the towel, and examines his soul in the mirror.

I was in the living room eating when Nils Erik rang at the door. Snow from the drift beside the porch swirled in the air around him. The gusting wind hung like an invisible cupola above the village.

"I'm eating," I said. "But I'll be done soon. Come in."

"But you won't want to go swimming after eating," he said.

"I'm eating fish," I said. "They're used to swimming."

"That's true," he said.

"Do you want some? Fish roe and potatoes?"

He shook his head, untied his boots, and came into the living room.

"Well?" he said. "How's it going?"

I shrugged, swallowed, and took a long drink of water.

"How's what going?" I said.

"Everything," he said. "Writing, for example."

"It's going fine."

"Teaching?"

"Fine."

"Sex life?"

"Hm . . . what shall I say? Not very good. What about you?"

"Well, you saw for yourself today," he said. "That's about all there is."

"Oh well," I said, scraping up the last roe, butter, and some crumbly potato with the knife, offloading it onto the fork and lifting it to my mouth. My lips became greasy with the fat.

"And my prospects in that direction are not particularly rosy either," he continued. "All the girls over sixteen have moved out. All that's left are schoolgirls and their mothers. The age ranges in between have been wiped out."

"Completely wiped out," I said, got up, put the cutlery on the plate, took them in one hand and the glass in the other and went to the kitchen. "But you make it sound as though they've been hunted to destruction or something."

"They have been! If they'd stayed here, we could have hunted them. But where they are, there are others chasing after them."

I put the plate and glass on the counter and went into the bedroom to get my swimming gear.

"Now I finally understand what's meant by the term 'happy hunting grounds,'" I said. "I've never understood what was supposed to be so fantastic about it. Running around in the forest until eternity. But obviously it was meant in a figurative sense."

"I don't know how fantastic it is," Nils Erik said in a loud voice so that I could hear him. "It's a lot of work and there's little to show for it at the end. At least for me. Much, much better to be in a relationship."

I put my trunks and a towel into a plastic bag, considered whether I needed anything else, no, that should do it.

"When was the last time you were in a relationship?" I said.

"Three years ago," he said, and moved toward the door when he saw me emerge with the bag in my hand.

"What about one of the other temporary teachers?" I said. He was bending down and tying his laces, and straightened up a touch redder in the face.

"If they'd be up for it, fine by me," he said.

We walked up the steep hill in silence, walking was as much as we could manage in the gale. Snow stung against the skin I hadn't covered. When we closed the school door behind us it was like leaving the top deck of a large ship and going inside. Nils Erik switched on the light, we bounded down the stairs in long strides, sat on opposite sides of the dressing room, and changed. Although the wind made the walls creak and the ventilation howl, it still seemed quiet indoors. Perhaps because of the lack of movement? All the rooms were empty, the pool was empty and smooth and still.

The smell of chlorine cast a spell over me. Childhood memories of when we used to go swimming every week in Stintahallen came flooding back: the conical bags of candy we bought at the little shop, the taste of the boiled sweets shaped like nuts and bolts, green and black, licorice and mint. The light displays around the pool, which were supposed to represent tropical waterfalls. The white bathing cap with the Norwegian flag on the side, the dark blue goggles.

I pulled on my trunks and went into the small swimming hall, the tiles were cold and rough on the soles of my feet, the snow eddied round in the light of the lamp outside, behind it the great black void.

The surface of the water was dark with a faint shimmer of blue from the bottom of the pool and as shiny as a mirror. Almost a shame to break it, I thought. I definitely wasn't going to dive in. No, instead I would climb down the metal ladder and try to make as few ripples as possible. All in vain, for along came Nils Erik: he ran to the edge and threw himself into the water with a splash. Swam underwater to the far side, where he broke the surface with a snort and a toss of the head.

"Wonderful!" he shouted. "What's up with you, you wimp?"

"Me, nothing!" I shouted back.

"You're getting into the water like an old woman!"

Suddenly I remembered how I had once tricked Dag Lothar. I had got into the pool a few minutes before him, turned my bathing cap inside out so that it was all white, pulled it away from my head so that it was wrinkled and looked like the caps old ladies wore, and started to swim in a studiously slow style with my head as far out of the water as I could manage. This mimicking of an old lady swimming was so good that Dag Lothar didn't see me, even though there were only four of us in the big pool. He glanced at me, categorized me wrongly, and thus I didn't exist. He called my name and when he received no answer went back into the changing room.

Chest first, I moved slowly out into the water, ducked my head beneath the surface and took a couple of powerful strokes that were almost enough for me to glide to the far edge. Nils Erik was plowing along on the other side, doing free-style. I swam as fast as I could for a few lengths, then stopped at the end by the window and gazed out into the snowstorm.

I turned, rested my elbows on the edge, and watched the white foam spraying up around Nils Erik's thrashing arms and legs, and was reminded of what Geir's father had once said, that you should lie as if on cotton when you swim the crawl, and behind Nils Erik I saw the open door to the empty rooms beyond.

Shit, I had forgotten. The sauna.

I dragged myself out of the water, went to the changing room, and switched on the stove. When I went back I dived in and swam back and forth for perhaps half an hour until we decided to give up.

We sat on the top bench in the sauna. I poured water on the stones in the stove, a wave of hot steam met my skin and drifted farther into the small, cube-shaped room.

"This is the biggest fringe benefit we get with the job," Nils Erik said, stroking the wet hair at the back of his head.

"It's also the only one," I said.

"Free coffee," he said. "And newspapers. And cake at the farewell party."

"Hurrah," I said.

There was a pause. He moved down to a lower bench.

"Have you had lots of other jobs?" I said at length, leaning back against the wall. The heat was making my head heavy, as though it was slowly being filled with lead or something similar.

"No. Just the health service. Oh, and the parks a couple of summers ago. And you?"

"Gardening, floor factory, newspaper, nuthouse. And radio. But it wasn't paid, so I suppose that doesn't count."

"No," he said lethargically. I looked at him. He had closed his eyes and was leaning back with his elbows on the step where I was sitting. There was an energy and vivacity about his personality that seemed to conflict with something else, an old-man-ish quality that was hard to define because it didn't manifest itself in anything specific, it was more an aura he had, I only noticed it in a negative way, when for example I was taken aback that he had heard of the Jesus and Mary Chain and liked them, because why in the world would he not have heard of them?

He sat up straight and turned to me.

"Karl Ove," he said. "Just had a thought. You know Hilda's cottage?"

"Hilda's cottage? What's that?"

"The yellow house on the bend. It used to belong to Hilda, Eva's mother-in-law. She died a few years ago, and now the house is empty. I've had a chat with them, and they'd be happy to rent it out. After all, it'll fall into disrepair faster if no one's living there. So they don't want much rent. Five hundred a month, that's all."

"And?" I said.

"Living in a whole house on my own is no good. I wondered perhaps if we could rent it? We'd save loads of money on accommodation, and food would be cheaper if there were two of us. What do you think?"

"Ye-es," I said. "Why not?"

"We can have a room each and share the rest."

"But everyone will think we're a couple of gay guys," I said. "Two young teachers have found each other, they'll say."

He laughed. "And here we are in the sauna all alone . . ."

"So the rumors have already started?"

"No, are you out of your mind? You've shown an unequivocal interest in the opposite sex up here. No one is in any doubt about your preferences. Well, are you in or out?"

"Yes. I mean no. I have to write and for that I need to be alone."

"There's a room next to the sitting room. You can have that. It's perfect."

"OK, why not then," I said.

After we had gotten dressed and were on our way upstairs, I asked him about something that had been occupying my mind for a long time but that my nakedness had prevented me from articulating.

"I've got a little problem in the area we touched on the other day," I said.

"What was that?" he said.

"About sex," I said.

"Come on. Out with it!" he said.

"It's not easy to talk about," I said. "But the thing is . . . well, I come too quickly. Put bluntly. That's the long and short of it."

"Ah, a classic," he said. "And?"

"No, there's nothing else. I was just wondering if you had any tips. When it happens it doesn't feel great, but I'm sure you understand."

"How quickly are we talking about here? A minute? Three minutes? Five?"

"Hm, it varies," I said, inserting the key into the lock of the large glass door and pushing it open. My skin was so hot after the sauna that the cold wind didn't bite, I watched it sweep between the buildings but barely noticed it. "Maybe three or four?"

"That's not bad, you know, Karl Ove," he said, winding his scarf around his neck, pulling his hat well down over his ears. "Four minutes, that's a pretty long time."

"How do you manage in this area?"

"Me? The opposite. I can hump away till eternity and nothing happens. In fact, that's a problem too. I can be at it for half an hour without getting near an orgasm. Sometimes I just have to give up."

We set off down the road.

"And when you beat the meat?" he said. "Is it the same?"

My cheeks went red, but he couldn't see that in the dark. He wasn't expecting a lie, so I was on safe ground.

"About the same," I said.

"Mhm," he said. "I've got problems there too. Well, you may have realized that today. I can keep at it forever."

"Do you think it's physiological?" I said. "Or is it a mental thing? I wish I could swap. The opposite problem would be a thousand times better."

"No idea," he said. "Probably physiological. I've always been like this anyway. Ever since the first time. So I don't know anything else. But I've heard it's supposed to help if you pinch the tip. Hard. Or pull at the scrotum. Then just keep pumping."

"I'll try that next time," I said, and smiled into the darkness.

"Yes, should an opportunity ever present itself," he said.

"At Christmas, for example? All the young women from the district will be back then."

"Do you reckon they'll be coming back here to get laid? I doubt it. I think they're getting it where they are now and they come back here for some R & R, ready to go again in January."

"Yes, you're probably right," I said, and came to a halt, we had reached the road to my flat. "If everything goes through with the house, when do we move in?"

"We have to give notice first and all that. After Christmas? If we shorten our holiday by a couple of days, we could do it then."

"Sounds good," I said. "See you!"

I raised my hand and waved, opened the door, and went in. Ate eight slices of bread and drank half a liter of milk, lay down on the sofa, and read the first pages of a new book I'd bought: The Great Fairy Tale by Jan Kjærstad. I had read Mirrors and Homo Falsus by him before and had just borrowed The Earth Turns Quietly from the library in Finnsnes. But this one was new, it had just been published, and the first thing I did when I held it in my hand was smell the fresh paper. Then I flipped backward and forward. Every chapter started with a big O. Some of the chapters were set in several columns – one column looked like notes and popped up here and there alongside another, which was the main story. Some chapters were letters. Some were printed in bold type, some in italics, some in normal font. Something called Hazar and something called Enigma cropped up at regular intervals. And definitions of k – that had to stand for kjærlighet, love.

I started reading the first page.

> She was very young. Neck as fresh as dew. They stood a meter apart, in their own worlds. He had felt the tension, even with his back to her, he turned and stole a glance. An enormous kick. Made a few feints with his leg. She noticed, smiled. Sparks between kohl and mascara. She thrust her right shoulder in his direction, twice, a different beat, bit her lower lip, lowered her gaze. The percussion and bass set off a funky groove in his sensory receptors. Contrary to nature to stand > still. He took a few steps on the carpet, toward her, away from her, inviting, teasing. She mimicked his steps, same rhythm, tiger wrinkles by her nose. Black curly hair, kerchief wound around her forehead, brazen makeup. What was she listening to? Cramps? Split Beaver? ViViVox? Kimono jacket with leaf pattern, baggy silk trousers, sandals with toe strap. Breathtaking. And around her: the covers' flickering kaleidoscope of figures, forms, and fancy calligraphy.

I read it over and over again. The style was so alien, and yet so cool with the short incomplete sentences, all the alliteration and the sprinkling of English words. And the foreign words. Kimono – that was Japanese. Tiger wrinkles – that was Indian and animalistic. Kohl – that sounded German, was it? Within the space of a few lines a whole world was opened up to me. And it was a different world, it had something futuristic about it, which attracted me. But I couldn't write like that, even if I wanted to, it would be impossible. When I read Vinduet, which Kjærstad edited, I knew as good as none of the names and the featured titles and only a few of the terms used. About Burning the Aeneid, one article was called, for some reason it rumbled around in my head, cropping up here, there, and everywhere, although I had no idea what an Aeneid was. All this was postmodernism, Kjærstad was the greatest Norwegian postmodernist writer, and although I liked it, or the whole world that I suspected lay behind what stood in the text, I didn't know what it was or where it actually existed. Toe strap, tårem in Norwegian, was there some echo there with harem and the Orient? Kjærstad's books were full of the Orient, a Thousand and One Nights atmosphere, narratives within narratives, and I imagined part of what he was doing was drawing that world into ours, along with a host of other worlds. What it meant, I had no idea, but intuitively I liked it, in the same way that intuitively I disliked Milan Kundera. Kundera was also a postmodernist writer, but he completely lacked this embracing of other worlds, with him the world was always the same, it was Prague and Czechoslovakia and the Soviets, who had either invaded or were on the verge of doing so, and that was fine, but he kept withdrawing his characters from the plot, intervening and going on about something or other while the characters stood still, sort of waiting, by the window or wherever it was they happened to be, until he had finished his explanation and they could move forward. Then you saw that the plot was only "a plot" and that the characters were only "characters," something he had invented, you knew they didn't exist, and so why should you read about them? Kundera's polar opposite was Hamsun, no one went as far into his characters' worlds as he did, and that was what I preferred, at least in a comparison of these two, the physicality and the realism of Hunger, for example. There the world had weight, there even the thoughts were captured, while with Kundera the thoughts elevated themselves above the world and did as they liked with it. Another difference I had noticed was that European novels often had only one plot, everything followed one track, while South American novels had a multiplicity of tracks and sidetracks, indeed, compared with European novels, they almost exploded with plots. One of my favorites was One Hundred Years of Solitude by García Márquez, but I also loved Love in the Time of Cholera. Kjærstad had a little of the same, but in a European way, and there was also something of Kundera in him. I thought so anyway.

What about my own writing?

Writing in a postmodernist style like Kjærstad was way beyond my reach, I couldn't do it even if I wanted to, I didn't have it in me. I had only one world, so that was the one I had to write about. At least for the time being. But I tried to include the exuberance that García Márquez possessed. The multiplicity of stories too. And Hamsun's being present in the moment.

I read on. I had seen in the reviews that in this novel Oslo was situated somewhere in the southern hemisphere. That was a fantastic idea, it meant Oslo became everything it wasn't in reality. But the way this world was evoked was more important. There was something Márquezian about the exuberance and the density and the multiplicity in this passage.

I laid aside the book and went to the desk, sat down and started to flip through the little pile of texts I had written. It was so thin! So unbelievably thin! I only included the bare essentials – the forest, the road, the house – I let everything else go. But what if I let all the rest explode?

I took a fresh piece of paper and wound it into the typewriter, glanced at my reflection in the window as the typewriter carriage buzzed into position.

Where was there a subject with more breadth and depth and an abundance of detail?

I imagined the road outside the house in Tybakken.

> I went onto the road. It was black and beside it the green spruce trees swayed in the wind. A car drove past. It was a BMW. On the pavement Erling and Harald stood by their bikes. Erling had an Apache, Harald a DBS. Behind them the hill was lined with houses. In the gardens there were chairs and tables, kennels, barbecues, tricycles, small plastic pools, hoses, and an abandoned rake. In the sky above, a plane flew past, so far up that only the white vapor trail was visible.

I tore the sheet out of the roller, crumpled it up, and threw it on the floor. Inserted another. Stared straight ahead for a while. Two years ago I had visited Yngve and Mom in Bergen. The fish market there had swarmed with life: people, stalls, fishermen, and crabs, cars and boats, flags and pennants, birds and water and mountains and houses. That would be a perfect place to get the density!

I started writing again.

> The fish were lined up side by side on a bed of ice. They glistened in the sunlight. Women with money to spend and bulging bags walked back and forth between the stalls. A little boy was holding a balloon in one hand and clasping the stroller his mother was pushing with the other. Suddenly he let go and ran over to the tank full of cod. "Look, Mom," he shouted. An old man in a black suit and hat was staggering along, supporting himself on a stick. A fat woman in a coat was examining some mackerel. A sparkling jewel hung from her neck. The two assistants had fish blood smeared over their white aprons. One was laughing at something the other had said. On the road behind them cars raced by. A girl with dark shoulder-length hair, a white T-shirt, her breasts visible beneath, and a blue Levi's 501-clad bottom stood gazing across the harbor. I glanced at her as I hurried past. She looked at me and smiled. I thought how wonderful it would be to fuck her.

I leaned back, took out my watch, it was already a few minutes to nine. I was content, that was a good start, he could meet her again later, anything could happen then. I switched off the typewriter, put a pan of water on the stove, sprinkled some tea leaves into the bottom of the teapot, and suddenly realized that this was the first time I had written without any music in the background. While waiting for the water to boil, I reread the passage. The sentences should be broken up a bit and made more abrupt. There should be something about the various smells and the sounds. Maybe even more detail. And some alliteration.

I switched on the typewriter again, took out the sheet, and inserted another.

The fish were lined up side by side on a bed of ice, everything glinted and glistened in the sunlight. The air smelled of salt, exhaust fumes, and perfume. Voluminous women with bulging bags and money to spend walked back and forth between the respective stalls, pointing authoritatively at what they wanted. Prawns, crabs, lobsters, mackerel, pollock, cod, haddock, eels, and plaice. The sounds of mumbling and laughing filled the air. Some children were shouting. A bus let out a deep sigh as it stopped at the bus stop across the street. The pennants along the quay were flapping in the wind. Flap! Flap! Flap! A little boy, pallid and puny, was holding a Winnie-the-Pooh balloon in one hand and clutching the stroller his mother was pushing with the other.

The steam from the boiling pan wafted in through the door. I switched off the typewriter again, poured the water over the tea leaves, took the teapot with a cup, a carton of milk, and a bowl of sugar into the sitting room, sat down, rolled a cigarette, and with it hanging from my lips continued to read The Great Fairy Tale, this time without an eye for the detail or a thought about the style, within a few minutes I was totally absorbed. So when the doorbell shrieked through the flat a little later there was something brutal about the way it jerked me back into reality.

It was Hege.

"Hi," she said, pulling the scarf down from her mouth. "You haven't gone to bed?"

"Gone to bed? No. It's only half past nine."

"It's ten actually," she said. "Can I come in?"

"Of course, sorry," I said. "Has something happened or what?"

She came into the hall, unwound the huge scarf, unzipped her down jacket.

"No, but that's the problem. Nothing is happening. Vidar's at sea and I was hanging around getting bored. And then I thought you were probably up."

"Good timing," I said. "I've even got some tea going."

We went into the living room, she sat down on the sofa, picked up the book and looked at the title.

"It's Kjærstad's latest," I said. "Have you read it?"

"Me? No. You're talking to an illiterate. Am I going to get some tea or was that just polite conversation?"

I got a cup, placed it in front of her, and sat down in the chair on the opposite side of the table. She tucked her legs beneath her and poured.

She was thin, long-limbed, with an almost boyish body. Her facial features were pronounced, long nose, full lips, hair big and curly. There was a hardness about her, but in her eyes, which were vivacious and sparkling, often something else would appear, something softer and warmer. She was sharp, had a ready answer for everything, and treated the fishermen around her with a characteristic unflinching aloofness.

I liked her a lot, but I wasn't attracted to her at all, and that was what I realized allowed us to be friends. If I had been attracted to her I would have been sitting there paralyzed, thinking about what I should say and the impression I was making. Since I wasn't, I could be who I was, without a further thought, just chat away. The same applied to her. And as was so often the case when I talked to girls I liked but wasn't attracted to, the conversations tended toward emotional, intimate matters.

"Anything new?" she said.

I shook my head.

"Not really. Oh yes, Nils Erik has suggested we move into the yellow house on the bend."

"And what did you say?"

"I thought it was a good idea. So we're going to move after Christmas."

"I can't imagine two more different men than you and Nils Erik," she said.

"I'm a man now all of a sudden?"

She looked at me and laughed. "Aren't you?"

"I don't feel like one."

"What do you feel like then?"

"A boy. An eighteen-year-old."

"Yes, I can understand that. You aren't a man like the others here in the village."

"What do you mean?"

"Have you ever had a look at your arms? They're as thin as mine! You can't say you're broad-shouldered either."

"So?" I said. "I'm not a fisherman."

"Oh, moody now, huh?"

"No."

"No," she said with the same intonation and laughed. "You're right though. All you have to do is sit still and write for the rest of your life. You don't need big muscles to do that."

"No, you don't," I said.

"Come on, Karl Ove," she said. "You don't take yourself that seriously, do you?"

"It's got nothing to do with how seriously I take myself," I said. "What you say is true. I'm very different from Vidar, for example. But that doesn't mean you can walk all over me."

"Oooh, I obviously touched a sore spot there!"

"Give it up now."

"Oh dear!"

"Do you want me to throw you out?"

I raised my cup in a threatening manner.

She laughed again.

I leaned back, took my tobacco pouch, and started to roll a cigarette.

"I know you want men to be men," I said. "In fact, you've said that many times. The strong silent type. But what does Vidar do to get on your nerves? What do you usually complain about? He never says anything, he never talks about himself or the two of you, there isn't a scrap of romanticism in him."

She eyed me. "Is there anything more romantic than being fucked hard by a strong man?"

I could feel my cheeks glowing, made a grab for the lighter and lit the rollie.

Then I laughed.

"Actually, I don't know anything about that. I can't even imagine what it's like."

"Have you never fucked a girl hard?"

I sensed she was watching me and our eyes met.

"Yes, yes, of course," I said, averting my gaze. "I was thinking the other way round. Of your role in all of this."

I got up and went over to my record collection.

"Any requests?" I said, turning to her.

"You choose," she said. "I have to go soon anyway."

I put on the latest deLillos record: Før var det morsomt med sne.

"The biggest argument in favor of moving is that I won't have to listen to the two upstairs any longer," I said, and pointed to the ceiling.

"Torill and Georg?"

I nodded.

"The walls are incredibly thin here. Especially between bedrooms. And there's lots of romanticism, to use your definition of the term."

"How nice for Torill."

"And him by the sound of it."

I sat down again. "You don't like Torill much, do you?" I said.

"No, I can't say I do."

A false smile slid across her mouth, she raised her face and chirruped some words. "She's so good and sincere it hurts to watch and at the same time she offers herself to everyone who wants to look."

"Offers herself?"

"Yes, you don't think she walks around like that when she's on her own, do you?"

She pushed out her bosom, wiggled her hips on the sofa, and coquettishly stroked her hair from her forehead.

I smiled.

"It had never struck me," I said. "But now that you say that I believe it has struck Nils Erik. And pretty hard. He hurried into the john immediately after she had bent forward in front of the fridge today."

"You see. She knows what she's doing. And you?"

"Torill?" I said with a snort. "She's twelve years older than me."

"Yes, of course, but do you like her?"

"I don't dislike her. She's pleasant enough."

There was a pause. The windows reflected the light from the lamps and between them the vague outlines of the furniture in a room that seemed to be underwater.

"Do you have any plans for this Friday?" Hege said.

"No," I said. "Not as far as I know."

"I was thinking of inviting some of the temps over. Making a pizza and drinking some beer. Are you up for it?"

"Of course."

She got up.

"Time to wend my way home. Sleep tight, you writer wuss."

"If you're not careful, I'll start calling you names," I said.

"I'm a woman, you know. That's not done. For you I'm Frøken or Hege. And you're overwatering your flowers. You're drowning them."

"Is that what's wrong? I thought it was imperative they shouldn't get too dry."

"No, it's almost always the opposite. Poor flowers. They've ended up with a murderer. The worst kind, in fact, one who doesn't know he's a murderer."

"Well, actually I am sorry when they die," I said.

"What about fish?" she said.

"What about them?"

"Are you sorry when they die too?"

"Yes, I am. I hate it when they're pulled up from the sea, wriggling and squirming, and I have to kill them."

She laughed.

"I don't think I've ever heard that said here before. I can't imagine it. It must be the very first time."

"There's one fisherman who's been seasick all his life," I said. "That's almost the same."

"No, it isn't," she said. "But now I do have to go."

I followed her into the hall.

"OK, Frøken, I wish you goodnight," I said. I stood waiting in silence while she put on her outdoor gear. Smiled when she had finished. Only her nose was protruding from between her scarf and hat. She said good-bye and went out into the darkness.

The next morning I had the third and fourth graders for the first two lessons. I got up ten minutes before the bell was due to ring, threw on my clothes, and dashed up the hill under a sky that was as black and wild as it had been when Hege left ten hours earlier.

When the children ambled across the floor in their stockinged feet, wearing their sweaters, with their hair rumpled after removing their woolen hats, eyes narrow, I saw them as they were, tiny and vulnerable. It was barely comprehensible that I could on occasion get so irritated and angry with some of them. But there was something in them that rose and sank during the day, a vortex of shouting and screaming, pestering and fighting, games and excitement, which meant that I no longer saw them as small people, only whatever was coursing through their veins.

Sitting in his chair, Jo raised his hand.

"What is it, Jo?" I said.

He smiled. "What are we going to do in the first lesson?"

"You'll have to wait and see," I said.

"Are you going to read to us at the end of the second lesson, like you usually do?"

"All things come to those who wait. Have you heard that saying?"

He nodded.

"Well, there you have it."

The door at the end of the building kept opening and shutting as pupils trickled in. Every time it did, I automatically looked up and across. To the right of the door was the part of the block my class used. Nils Erik was teaching them, he sat behind the desk staring into the air waiting for them to quiet down.

In came Reidar and Andrea. They were brother and sister, they walked to school together, arrived late together, what was so touching about that?

Reidar set off at a run across the floor, must have remembered they weren't allowed to run, then stopped with a jolt and looked at me, and walked quickly to his place. From the other side Andrea watched us. I met her stare. She immediately turned her head away, to where the seventh grade was, and she joined them a moment later.

This little interlude ought to have been perfectly natural, but it wasn't, there was a woodenness about Andrea's movements, as though she was forcing herself to perform them.

"Hi, Karl Ove," Reidar said with a smile. He used my name as a kind of buffer, to make a reprimand for lateness harder because of the friendly interaction. He was a crafty little devil.

"Hi, Reidar," I said. "Sit down. You've held up the whole class now."

Andrea was in love with me.

Of course.

That explained her behavior. All the looks, all the evasiveness, all the blushes.

A warm feeling spread through me. I got up and went to the board.

"What does it mean to have a profession?" I said. "What is a profession?"

Poor little girl.

"A job," Reidar said.

"Put your hand up if you know," I said.

He put up his hand. Fortunately some others did too. I pointed to Lovisa.

"It means having a job," she said.

"That's what I said!" Reidar said.

"Could you give me some examples of professions, Lovisa?" I said.

She nodded. "Fisherman."

"Good," I said, and wrote it down. "Any others?"

"Working in the fish hall?"

"Yes! Any more professions? Hands up!"

Suggestions poured in. Bus driver, truck driver, shop assistant, ship's captain, cleaner, policeman, fireman. Of course "teacher" never occurred to them, even though one was standing right in front of them. For them it wasn't a real job. Chatting with children day in, day out.

"What about me?" I said eventually. "Don't I have a profession?"

"You're a teacher! Teacher! Teacher! Teacher!" they called out.

"And if you're sick?"

"Nurse! Doctor! Ambulance driver!"

When the board was full I asked them to write down the job they would like to have, say why, describe what it involved, and draw a picture. While they were doing that I walked around monitoring, talking to them individually and standing by the window with my hands on my hips staring into the darkness. The thought that she was in love with me was touching, both heartening and sad.

I went up to the desk, we began to go through what they had written and we covered a little more than half before the bell rang. In the following lesson we continued where we had left off, changed to reading from the textbook, they answered the questions in it, and then in the last twenty minutes I read an excerpt from One Thousand and One Nights. When I took out the book and started reading they left their chairs and sat in a semicircle on the carpet in front of me, they always did that, it must have been what they were used to from the first or second grade, and I liked it, I felt as if I was giving them something warm and secure. Or rather that they turned a normal situation into something warm and secure. Blank-eyed, they sat listening to the oriental tales, somehow turned in on themselves, as though they were sitting before the fount of their soul, in the midst of the desert of their minds, and saw all the camels, all the silk, all the flying carpets, all the spirits and robbers, mosques and bazaars, all the burning love and sudden death, the billowing mirages across the empty blue sky of consciousness. To them it made no difference that a world more different from theirs, from where they sat on the edge of the world in complete darkness and freezing temperatures, could hardly be imagined; the story took place in their minds, where everything was possible, where everything was permitted.

In the lesson afterward I had the fifth, sixth, and seventh graders for Norwegian.

"OK, let's get cracking," I said as I entered. "Sit down and take out your books!"

"Are you in a bad mood today?" Hildegunn said.

"Don't you try any red herrings," I said. "Come on, books out. We're going to do a bit of group work today. By which I mean you're going to work in pairs. Hildegunn and Andrea, put your desks together. Jørn and Live. Kai Roald and Vivian. Come on. Do you always have to dillydally?"

They placed their desks together in the way I had explained. Apart from Kai Roald. He sat with his elbows on his desk and his cheeks in his hands.

"You too, Kai Roald," I said. "Move your desk next to Vivian's. You'll be working together."

He looked up at me and shook his head. Stared into space again.

"There's no choice," I said. "You have to. Come on now."

"I'm not doing it," he said.

I went over to him.

"Didn't you hear what I said? Come on now, move your desk over."

"I don't want to," he said. "I'm not doing it."

"Why not?" I said.

The others, who had finished their maneuvers, sat watching us.

"I don't want to," he said.

"Shall I do it for you?" I said.

He shook his head. "Didn't you hear what I said? I'm not doing it."

"But you HAVE TO," I said.

He shook his head.

I grabbed the desk on both sides and lifted it. He pressed his forearms down on the top with all his might. I pulled harder, he grabbed it with his hands and held on, red-faced now. My heart was beating faster.

"Now you do as I say!" I said.

"No!" he said.

I snatched at the desk and took it from his grasp, carried it over to Vivian and put it down. He didn't move from his chair.

"I'm not budging," he said.

I held his arm, he wrenched it away.

"Now you go and sit over there!" I said in a loud voice. "Do you want me to carry you? Is that what you want?"

From the corner of my eye I sensed Hege watching us from the other side of the room.

He didn't answer.

I went behind him and grabbed the seat of his chair, intending to lift it with him in it. He stood up, went behind his desk and grasped it with both hands, presumably to move it back.

"Put the desk down!" I said.

His face was scarlet, his eyes rigid and inaccessible. When he started moving the desk I seized it and tore it out of his hands.

"You horse prick!" he shouted.

I put down the desk. Anger throbbed in my veins. My eyes were white with fury.

I took a deep breath to calm myself down, but it didn't help, my entire body was shaking.

"You can go home," I said. "I don't want to see you here any more today."

"What?" he said.

"Go," I said.

He suddenly fought back tears and looked down. "But I haven't done anything," he said.

"Go," I said. "I don't want to see you. Come on. Out. Out."

He lifted his head, sent me a wild, defiant glare, slowly turned and left.

"All right, let's get going," I said with as much composure as I could muster. "Open the exercise book to page forty-six."

They did as I said. Outside the windows Kai Roald walked past, swinging his arms, apparently unconcerned, staring ahead. I explained to them what they had to do. Glanced out the window, he was walking beneath the light from the last lamp on the school premises, neck bent, head down. But I had behaved correctly, no one should be allowed to call a teacher a horse prick and go unpunished.

I sat down behind the desk. For the rest of the class I was completely out of myself, concerned only that the pupils shouldn't notice anything.

In the staff room Hege came over and asked what the scuffle had been about. I shrugged and said I'd had a difference of opinion with Kai Roald and he had called me a horse prick.

"So I sent him home for the rest of the day. Unbelievable . . ."

"Things are different up here, you know," she said. "Swearing's nowhere near as serious."

"It is for me," I said. "And I'm the homeroom teacher."

"Yeah, yeah," she said.

I went over and got a cup of coffee, sat down on my chair, leafed through a book. Then, in a flash, it came to me.

He didn't want to sit next to Vivian because he was in love with her.

This sudden insight made me flush with embarrassment. Oh, what an idiot I had been! How stupid could you be? Sending a pupil home was serious, he would have to explain himself, and his parents wouldn't believe it was the teacher's fault. But it was.

I liked Kai Roald.

So he was in love, that was all!

But it was too late, I couldn't undo anything now.

I went back into the staff room, picked up the newspaper from the table, sat down, and started reading. At the end of the small vestibule the door opened. It was Richard. He spotted me.

"Karl Ove," he said, and beckoned. "Can I have a word with you? Why don't we go to my office?" he said.

I followed him in silence. He closed the door behind us and turned to me.

"Kai Roald's mother just called," he said. "She said he'd been sent home. What happened?"

"He refused to do what I asked him to do," I said. "We had a little altercation. He called me a horse prick, and so I told him to leave. That's where I draw the line."

Richard studied me for a while. Then he lowered himself onto the chair behind his broad desk.

"Sending someone home is a serious measure," he said. "It's the most severe punishment we have. A lot has to happen before we do that. But you know that. Kai Roald is a fine fellow. Do we agree on that?"

"Yes, no question. But that isn't what this is about."

"Hang on a moment. This is Northern Norway. It's a bit rougher up here than down south. We don't take swearing seriously, for example. Calling you what he called you isn't good, but nor is it as serious a crime as you seem to believe. The boy's got a temper. Surely he's allowed to have that?"

"I will not put up with being called a horse prick by a pupil. Regardless of where in the world it happens," I said.

"No, no, of course not," he said. "I appreciate that. But there are always ways of resolving conflict. There has to be a bit of give and take. Sending a pupil home is absolutely the last resort. I have a feeling that your disagreement hadn't really got that far. Am I right?"

I didn't answer.

"You haven't been a teacher for long, Karl Ove," he said. "And even the most experienced of us make the wrong calls on a regular basis. But next time, if you can't resolve a situation yourself, come and get me. Or bring the pupil to see me."

In your dreams.

"I'll consider that if it happens again," I said.

"It will happen again," he said. "You'll have to sort this one out anyway. You'd better ring Kai Roald's mother and explain why he was sent home."

"Isn't it enough if I give him a message tomorrow?" I said.

"She rang here and was very worried. So I think it would be best if you spoke to her."

"OK," I said. "Then I will."

He held out an open palm to indicate the gray telephone on his desk. "You can use this one."

"But the bell's about to ring," I said. "I'll do it in the next break."

"I'll take your lesson for the first few minutes. Who do you have?"

"Fifth, sixth, and seventh graders."

He nodded, got up, and stood beside his desk.

Was he going to stand there while I made the call? Was he going to listen to the conversation? Was he a total control freak?

I looked up the number in the phone book, found it, and glanced at Richard, who didn't bat an eyelid.

What a sack of shit he was.

I dialed the number.

"Hello," said a woman's voice.

"Oh, hello, this is Karl Ove Knausgaard, Kai Roald's homeroom teacher."

"Oh, hi," she said.

"Kai Roald and I had a disagreement this morning. He refused to do what I asked him to do and then he called me – well, he swore at me to my face. So I sent him home."

"I see," she said. "Kai Roald can sometimes be a bit unruly."

"Yes, he can," I said. "But he's a good kid. It wasn't that serious and there won't be any consequences for him. He had to be taught a lesson though. Tomorrow everything will be back to normal. Is that all right?"

"Yes. Thank you for your call."

"No problem. Good-bye."

"Good-bye."

The moment I put down the phone the bell rang. Richard nodded to me, I left his office without a word and went straight to the teaching block, where I would have math with the fifth, sixth, and seventh graders. This was my weakest subject, I had nothing to say about it, there was nothing there that I could develop or make interesting, they did the problems in their exercise books and every now and then we went through new material on the board. They knew this and seemed to try even harder at the beginning of class to distract me.

"Who were you calling?" Vivian said after they had sat down.

"How do you know I called anyone?" I said.

"We saw you through the window," Andrea said. "You used the head teacher's phone."

"Did you call Kai Roald's parents?" Hildegunn said.

"Is he coming back today?" Vivian said.

"It's none of your business who I call, as you know," I said. "The fact is if you don't quiet down soon, I'll phone your parents."

"But they're at work," Vivian said.

"Vivian!" I said.

"Yes?" she said.

"That's enough now. Come on, get to work! That means you too, Jørn."

Andrea had stretched her legs out under the desk and was rubbing her feet against each other while reading through the passage in the book with a pencil in her hand. Live was looking around as she always did when she was stuck and didn't want to show it. I watched Jørn doing the mental calculations at breakneck speed with his tongue sticking out of the corner of his mouth. Then I met Live's gaze and she raised her hand.

I leaned over her desk.

"I can't do this one," she said.

She pointed to a problem with her pencil. Her eyes darted back and forth behind her glasses. I explained it to her, she sighed and groaned, which was her way of playing down her ignorance in front of friends.

"Are you with me?" I said.

"Yes, I am," she said, and waved me away.

"Teacher." Vivian giggled. "Teacher, I can't do this one, teacher!"

When I leaned over her it was as if she was completely at sea. Her face was blank and expressionless, her eyes were blank and expressionless. The receptivity I sensed in her was a little eerie.

"Why have you gotten stuck on this one?" I said. "You've cracked fifteen of them in exactly the same way before!"

She rolled her shoulders.

"Give it another try," I said. "Look at the other ones. If you still can't do it, I'll come and help. OK?"

"OK, teacher," she said, glancing around with a giggle.

As I straightened up, I looked straight into Andrea's eyes.

There was a longing in them, and my cheeks burned.

"Everything OK?" I said.

"Not really," she said. "I need some help."

My heart beat faster as I stopped beside her. Oh, it was ridiculous, but the awareness that she might be in love with me made it suddenly impossible to behave normally.

I leaned over and she seemed to shrink back. Her breathing changed. Her eyes were locked on to the book. I could smell the fragrance of her shampoo, I studiously avoided any form of contact, placed my finger on the first number she had written. She stroked her hair to the side, rested one elbow on the table. It was as if everything we did had become conscious: every detail became visible, it was no longer unthinking and natural but considered and artificial.

"There's the slip," I said. "Can you see it?"

She blushed, said yes in a soft voice, pointed to the next problem, what about this one, said yes again after a few seconds in a soft, low voice, and her breathing was shaky.

I stood up and walked on, surveyed the whole class and the whole teaching area, but I had not been left unmoved, the tiny moment lived on, and to release myself from it I collected all the books on the desk, piled them high with a bang, and addressed the whole class. The moment had to be destroyed by a new, a greater moment. And I had to make the class a place for everyone, a unit, a class that would learn.

"It looks as if some of you are having the same problem," I said. "Let's go through it on the board. Fifth and sixth graders, close your ears."

Once it was done, the lesson proceeded as before. Even before I realized that Andrea had feelings for me, I had been careful to keep my distance from them. I never put my arm around them, indeed I never touched them at all, and if the conversation or jokes went too far, into vaguely sexual areas, I always stopped them. The other teachers didn't need to do this, for them distance was a fact of life that nothing could break. For me it was something I had to create.

In the afternoon, I called Dad. His voice was somber and cold and sober. He asked me how things were, I said fine but I was looking forward to Christmas vacation.

"Are you going to celebrate Christmas with your mother?" he said.

"Yes," I said.

"We thought you would. Fredrik isn't coming either. So we're off down south again this year. You've got a sister here, Karl Ove. Don't forget that."

Did he really think I would fall for that? If I had said I wanted to celebrate

Christmas with them, they would have come up with a thousand and one excuses. He didn't want me there. So why pretend that we were letting him down?

"But I could maybe come up during the winter break," I said. "Is that convenient? You won't be heading for the sun?"

"We haven't planned that far ahead," he said. "We'll have to see when the time comes."

"I could catch the express boat or something," I said.

"Yes, that's a possibility. Have you heard from Yngve recently?"

"No, it's been a while ago now," I said. "I think he's very busy."

Throughout the short telephone conversation it was as if he was trying to find a way out. We hung up after about two minutes. I was glad it was like this. Whenever it happened I became aware that he wasn't someone I needed.

Wasn't it like this with everyone?

Walking downhill, with the snow arrowing in off the black sea, I wondered whether there was anyone I needed. Whether there was anyone I couldn't manage without.

If so, it had to be Mom and Yngve.

But they weren't indispensable either, were they?

I tried to imagine what it would have been like if they didn't exist.

Roughly like now, minus the phone calls and the get-togethers at Christmas and over the summer.

Weren't they indispensable?

But when I made my breakthrough as a writer, Mom would have to be there.

I kicked away the snow in front of the door and went in. And maybe if I had children?

But I wasn't going to. It was unthinkable.

And, the way things were going, unfeasible anyway.

I smiled to myself as I removed my jacket. Then I was depressed. Everything connected with it lay like a shadow over my life. I couldn't do it. I'd tried, I'd failed, it didn't work.

Oh, fuck, fuck, fuck, shit.

I threw myself onto the sofa and closed my eyes. How unpleasant it was, it was as though someone could appear outside at any moment and look in at me, indeed as if someone was standing there right now.

On Friday evening all the temporary teachers went to Hege's, ate pizza, and drank beer. Hege was the driving force and the center of attention, as high-spirited as she was fast-talking, telling one story after the other. Nils Erik liked her and tried to impress her with his imitations and caricatures. I didn't get a glance, and that was strange as she had been at my place quite a bit over the past few weeks talking on and on about matters that were close to her hard heart.

After the food had been cleared from the table, she got a bottle of vodka from the freezer. The cold shiny drink elevated me into a cold happy world while Hege gradually began to lose control of her facial muscles and physical coordination. When she stood up to go to the toilet she hurried over to the wall, supported herself on it, swayed and focused on the hall, laughed and set off again across the large open living-room floor, with more luck this time, for apart from the exaggeratedly straight line and a couple of staggers she reached the toilet door without further mishap. Half an hour later she was dozing off in a chair. I stroked her cheek, she opened her eyes and looked at me, I said she should go for a walk with me, the cold air would do her good. She nodded, I helped her to her feet and half carried her downstairs, she grinned, put her arms into the sleeves of the jacket I held out for her, pulled her hat over her head, and slowly wound her scarf around her neck.

Outside, it was dark and still. The temperature had taken a nosedive over the past few hours, and the cloud cover that had hung over the area like a tarpaulin all week was now drawn to one side: the stars twinkled above us. I hooked her arm in mine and we began to walk. She stared straight ahead as we walked, her eyes were glazed and vacant, now and then she burst into laughter for no reason. We went down to the chapel and back, on to the school and back. Just above the mountain to the west a wave of green rippled across the sky, leaving a yellow and green veil after it was gone.

"Look at the Northern Lights," I said. "Did you see them?"

"The Northern Lights, yes," she said.

We walked down to the chapel once again. Our shoes creaked in the dry snow. The mountains across the fjord stood silent and wild, a touch lighter than the night around them because of the snow. The cold lay around my face like a mask.

"Are you feeling better?" I said as we turned again.

"M-hm," she said.

If this didn't clear her head, nothing would.

"Shall we go in then?" I said by her driveway. She looked up at me and smiled what I interpreted as a devilish smile. Then she wrapped her arms around my neck, pulled me in, and kissed me.

I didn't want to offend her, and let her continue for a moment, then straightened up and freed myself.

"We can't do this," I said.

"No," she said, and laughed.

"Shall we go back to the others?" I said.

"Yes, let's."

The clarity of mind she had gained dissolved quickly once she was back in the warm, soon she repaired to her bedroom, where she stayed for so long that we, without our hostess, cleared the bottles and glasses from the table, glanced in to see her, she was lying on her back in a large double bed, fully clothed and snoring, and then we all went our separate ways.

I wrote for the rest of the weekend. On Sunday afternoon Hildegunn, Vivian, Andrea, and Live came by, they were bored as usual, I chatted with them for half an hour, avoided looking at Andrea, didn't look at her, apart from once, and it was as though my eyes were magnets and hers were made of iron because a quarter of a second later she glanced toward me and blushed.

No, no, no, little Andrea.

But she wasn't little, her hips were a woman's, her breasts as big as apples, and it wasn't just a child's happiness that shone in her green eyes.

I said they had to go, I had other things to do than entertain kids all evening, they snorted and groaned and left, Andrea last, she leaned forward and pulled on her high boots, flashed me a look before leaving to join the others, who were already outside waiting, surrounded by driving snow, motionless for an instant. Then life flooded back into them, and they walked down the hill laughing while I slammed the door and turned the key.

On my own at last.

I turned the music up as loud as I could without speaker distortion, and sat down to try to finish the short story I'd started the day before.

It was about some seventeen-year-olds who were on their way home from a party and saw a car that had been driven into a cliff. They were drunk, it was early one Sunday morning, the road they were on was empty, thick wet mist hung over the countryside. They came around a bend and saw the car, the front was smashed in, the windshield shattered. At first they thought it had happened a long time ago, that it was just an old wreck lying there, but then they spotted someone in the car, a man, he was sitting in the driver's seat, which had been shunted back, his face was covered in blood, and they realized the accident must have only just happened, perhaps no more than ten or fifteen minutes before. Are you all right? they said to him, he stared at them and slowly opened his mouth, but not a sound emerged. What shall we do? they said, looking at one another. There was something dreamlike about the whole scenario because the surroundings were so quiet and the mist so thick and because they were so drunk. We have to call for an ambulance, Gabriel said. But where from? The nearest house was on an estate a kilometer away. They decided that one of them should run there and call, and that the other two should stay by the wrecked car and keep an eye on it.

Moving the man was out of the question, he was trapped and probably also had internal injuries.

That was as far as I'd gotten. What would happen next I had no idea, other than that the man would die while they were standing there watching. Perhaps he would say something, anything from a different context, incomprehensible to them yet still clear. I also toyed with the idea of the man coming from a place where another story was being enacted. He had locked his father in a room, for example, where he had subjected him to brutal treatment, a secret that he was now taking with him to the grave. Or this was all there was, a car accident early in the morning, a man who died.

Immersed totally in this image – the gleaming asphalt, the motionless spruce trees, the glass splinters and the contorted metal, the smell of burned rubber and the rain-wet forest, perhaps the pillars of a bridge just visible thanks to flashing red lights deep in the mist – I jumped up from my chair like a lunatic when someone knocked on the window in front of me.

It was Hege.

My heart seemed to stampede, for even when I saw that it was her and realized that she must have been ringing the bell for some time without any success, my chest was still pounding. She laughed, I smiled and pointed to the door, she nodded, I went to it and opened up.

"Hi," she said. "I didn't realize you were so jumpy!"

"I was writing," I said. "My head was somewhere else entirely. Would you like to come in?"

She shook her head.

"I told Vidar I was going down to the kiosk. So I thought I'd pop by and apologize for Friday."

"There's nothing to apologize for," I said.

"Maybe not," she said. "But I'm doing it anyway. Sorry."

"Apology accepted."

"Don't you go getting any ideas, by the way," she said. "I'm always like that when I'm drunk. Completely lose control of my emotions and launch myself at the first person I see. It doesn't mean anything. You do understand, don't you?"

I nodded.

"I'm the same," I said.

She smiled.

"Good! So everything's back to how it was. See you on Monday!"

"Yes," I said. "Bye."

"Bye," she said, and walked back to the road.

I closed the door and noticed that I was angry, it would take me at least an hour to get back into the text, and it was already eight o'clock. Might as well go up to the school and watch Sportsrevyen, I thought, standing by my desk and staring at the last sentences I had written.

No. If this was going to be any good, I had to invest everything I had into it.

I continued writing.

Then there was someone at the door again.

I switched off the music and went to answer it.

It was three of the young fishermen. None of them was on the soccer team, two of them I had barely exchanged a word with, despite being at the same table three or four times. The third was Henning. He was a year older than me, had been to gymnas and set great store on showing himself to be different in minor details, like the pointed shoes he wore, his black Levi's, the music he played on his car stereo, which had more in common with what I liked than anything anyone else here listened to.

"Can we come in?" he said.

"Course," I said, and stepped aside. They hung up their jackets, with snow on the shoulders, kicked off their shoes, dark from the slush, went into the sitting room and sat down.

The wind had picked up. Down by the sea, waves were hurling themselves at the shore like furious beasts. The wash that was always present had a darker undertone when there was a storm, a kind of boom or a muted rumble.

They each put a bottle of Absolut on the table.

"I don't have any mixers, I'm afraid," I said.

"We stick them in the freezer and drink it neat," Henning said. "That's what the Russians do. That's how it's supposed to be drunk. If you add a bit of pepper, it tastes great."

"OK," I said, and went for some glasses. After they had filled theirs, and also mine, to the brim, I put on one of the two U2 mini LPs I had, which not many people had heard. Henning, who liked U2, actually asked me what the music was, and I was able to bask in the sun for a while.

The music evoked at once the atmospheres of my ninth grade and the first at gymnas. The enormous, bare, beautiful but also lonely space for music that I had loved, and now discovered that I still loved, as well as everything else around it, everything that had been going on in my life then, condensed into this unbelievably vibrant concentrated moment that only feelings can produce. A year relived in a second.

"Just fantastic!" I said.

"Skål," said Kåre.

"Skål," said Johnny.

"Skål," said Henning.

"Skål," I said, and drained my glass with a shiver. Turned up the music. With the darkness so dense outside and the lights so bright inside, it was as if you were being transported. In a shuttle of some kind. Way out into space.

And it was true too. We were hovering out in space. I had always known that, but it was only when I came here that I understood. Darkness did something to your perception of the world. The Northern Lights, this cold burning in the sky. And the isolation.

I cursed myself for not having been able to keep my eyes off Andrea. Whatever I do I must not encourage her feelings.

I must not look at her again.

Or at least only in a teaching context.

I didn't need it. Liking her had nothing to do with it, I liked lots of the others as well. Fourth graders as much as seventh graders. The exception was Vivian's sister Liv, but for Christ's sake she was sixteen, only two years younger than me, no one could object to my looking at her.

"Did you get back today?" I said, looking at Henning.

He nodded.

"Did you catch anything?"

He shook his head.

"Black sea."

They didn't leave until five. By then I had drunk almost a whole bottle of vodka. I had enough presence of mind to set the alarm clock, but when it rang at a quarter past eight I must have been dead to the world because it was still beeping in its devilish way when I was brought to by other sounds that had merged with it, namely, someone ringing the doorbell and knocking on the door.

I tumbled out of bed, threw some cold water over my face, and opened up.

It was Richard.

"You're awake, are you?" he said. "Come on then. Your class is waiting. It's a quarter past nine."

"I'm sick," I said. "I'll have to stay at home today."

"Nonsense," he said. "Come on. Have a shower and get your clothes on. I'll be waiting here."

I looked at him. I was still drunk, my brain was in a corridor with glass walls. I saw Richard from far off although he was a meter from me.

"What are you waiting for?" he said.

"I'm sick," I said.

"You've got one chance," he said. "I suggest you take it."

I met his eyes. Then I backed away and went into the bathroom, turned on the shower, and stood under it for a few seconds. I was furious. I was an employee, a teacher, and if one of the others didn't appear for work one day and said they were ill, Richard wouldn't dream of going to get them. Not a chance. The fact that he was right – after all I wasn't sick – was irrelevant. I was an adult, not a child, a teacher, not a student; if I said I wasn't well, I wasn't well.

I turned off the shower, dried myself, rolled deodorant under my arms, got dressed in the bedroom, put on a coat, shoes, and a scarf in the hall, and opened the door again.

"Good," he said. "Let's head up then."

He had humiliated me, but there was nothing I could do about it. Right and power were on his side.

I had always liked darkness. When I was small I was afraid of it if I was alone, but when I was with others I loved it and the change to the world it brought. Running around in the forest or between houses was different in the darkness, the world was enchanted, and we, we were breathless adventurers with blinking eyes and pounding hearts.

When I was older there was little I liked better than to stay up at night, the silence and the darkness had an allure, they carried a promise of something immense. And autumn was my favorite season, wandering along the road by the river in the dark and the rain, not much could beat that.

But this darkness was different. This darkness rendered everything lifeless. It was static, it was the same whether you were awake or asleep, and it became harder and harder to motivate yourself to get up in the morning. I succeeded, and five minutes later I was standing in front of my desk again, but what happened there was also rendered lifeless. It felt as though I was getting nothing back from what I was doing. However much effort I put in, nothing came back. Everything vanished, everything dissolved into the great darkness in which we lived. I might as well say this as that, do this as that, nothing made any difference.

At the same time there was the weight of being under constant observation, of everyone always knowing who I was, by never being allowed to have any peace. Especially at school, where Richard hovered over me like some damn bird of prey, ready to pounce on me the second I did something he didn't like.

All the drinking reinforced my unease, and since nothing of what I did gave me anything back, I became more and more worn down, it was as though I was being drained, I became emptier and emptier, and soon I would be walking around like a shadow, a ghost, as empty and dark as the sky and the sea around me.

I would drink several times in the middle of the week after the day Richard came to get me, but I always managed to stagger out of bed and get myself to school punctually. The next occasion he had reason to find fault with me was different. I had been to a party in Tromsø over the weekend, Jøgge was on leave and wanted to meet me, and on Sunday evening I missed the boat to Finnsnes, had to stay overnight in Tromsø, and then when I finally returned to the village it was too late in the morning for it to be worth going to school.

The next day Richard called me into his office. He said he had confidence in me, I was an important part of the school, but things had to function smoothly, things had to function smoothly every day, and if I didn't turn up for work this created big problems for everyone. Also for the pupils. It was my responsibility, no one else's, and this must not happen again under any circumstances.

As I stood there, with pupils running in all directions outside the window and him sitting behind his desk and telling me this in a loud, harsh voice, I was raging inside. But his voice paralyzed my fury, it could not find a vent, except in the old despised way that it used to, as tears.

He humiliated me, although he was right, it was my responsibility, I couldn't skip work the way I had ditched classes in gymnas.

All my strength had ebbed away, and all my resolve.

I closed the door behind me, washed my face in the staff bathroom, sat down on the sofa without even the energy to pour myself a cup of coffee.

Torill was sitting at the table making some Christmas decorations. She noticed me looking at her.

"Just have to make sure I can do this before I ask the kids to do it," she said.

"Don't they teach you that kind of thing at training college?" I said.

"That wasn't the main priority, no. Pedagogics and that kind of useless stuff was more the style," she said with a grin.

I sat up.

I could just stop teaching.

Who said I couldn't?

Who said so?

Everyone said so, but who said I had to listen to them?

No one could stop me handing in my notice, could they? I didn't even need to hand it in, all I had to do was stay down south after Christmas, just not return. I would be putting the school in a predicament, but who said I couldn't do that?

The teacher my class had had the year before turned up drunk for classes, was always taking days off, and finally had just taken off and never returned.

Oh, how they had moaned and groaned about him in the months I had been up here.

I got up, the bell rang the next moment, so deeply were the routines ingrained in my body. But the thought of stopping glowed in me. I wanted to be free, and freedom existed everywhere but here.

After the last lesson that day I called Mom. Caught her as she was about to leave work.

"Hi, Mom," I said. "Do you have time for a little talk?"

"Yes, of course. Has something happened?"

"No. Nothing has changed here, but the job's beginning to weigh me down. I can only get out of bed in the morning with the greatest of difficulty. And it struck me today that I could just hand in my notice. I'm really not enjoying it at all. I haven't been trained for this either. So I wondered about studying after Christmas instead. Doing the foundation year."

"I can understand you being frustrated and that it's tough going," she said. "But I think you should sleep on it before you decide. Christmas is around the corner, and you'll be able to unwind and relax lying on the sofa here if you like. I think everything will look different then, when you go back up."

"But that's exactly what I don't want!"

"Work goes through patches. There was a time when you thought it was a lot of fun. It's quite normal for you to have a down period now. I'm not saying you shouldn't quit. That's up to you to decide. But you don't need to make up your mind right now, that's all I'm saying."

"I don't think you understand what I'm telling you. It won't get any better. It's just a huge drag. And for what?"

"Life is a drag at times," she said.

"That's what you always say. Your life may be a drag, but does mine have to be?"

"I was only trying to give you some advice. In my opinion, it's good advice."

"OK," I said. "The odds are I'll give up the job, but you're right, I don't need to make a decision now."

Usually I took care to make sure the staff room was empty when I phoned, or that only Nils Erik was there, but this time I had been so upset and desperate that I hadn't given it a thought. When I opened the door to leave, Richard was in the kitchen.

"Hi, Karl Ove," he said. "I'm just doing the washing up. Are you on your way home?"

"Yes," I said, turned and left.

Had he heard? Had he been standing there and listening too?

I couldn't believe it.

But then came the last day of school before the break, report cards were handed out, coffee was drunk, and cakes were eaten, in an hour I would be getting on the bus to Finnsnes and setting off on the long journey down to Mom in Førde, where we would stay for a few days before going to Sørbøvåg for Christmas Eve. Richard stopped in front of me.

"You should know that I consider you've done a fantastic job here this term. You've been an invaluable member of staff. And you managed the occasional difficulty with grace. Now you have to promise me you'll be back after the Christmas holidays!"

He smiled to soften the impact, to make it seem like a pleasantry.

"Why would you think I wasn't coming back?" I said.

"You must come back, you know," he said. "It's not easy up here in the north, but it is still extraordinary. We need you here."

This was unadulterated flattery, as transparent as glass, but that didn't stop me puffing out my chest with pride. Because he was right. I had done a good job.

"Of course I'll be back," I said. "Merry Christmas! See you in 1988!"

The next day, in the evening, Mom was waiting on the quay as the hurtigrute boat from Bergen docked in Lavik. It was half past eight, pitch black, the crew lowered the gangplank while the roaring propellers churned up the sea. The light from the lamp above the tiny waiting room glimmered in the film of water that lay over the asphalt. I stepped ashore, leaned forward and gave Mom a hug, we walked together to the car. Around us doors were being opened and closed, engines started and the express boat was already speeding off down the fjord. The weather was mild, the countryside snowless, the car windshield dotted with small raindrops that were intermittently swept away by the wipers. The cones of light from the headlights roamed like two frightened animals in front of us. Trees, houses, gas stations, rivers, mountains, fjords, whole forests appeared in them. I leaned back in my seat staring. I'd had no idea that I had missed trees until I was back there and saw them.

Mom had made a casserole before she left, we ate it, chatted for an hour, then she went to bed. I stayed up to write but didn't get much done beyond a couple of lines. She had rented a furnished flat, and I felt like a stranger there.

The next day we drove to town to do our final Christmas shopping. The sky was overcast, but the clouds hiding the sun were thin and straggly, my back was cold as I opened the door, stepped out of the building, and for the first time in several months saw the burning globe hanging behind the clouds. Even if the colors of our surroundings were reduced to a minimum in which only the pale yellow of the grass and the wan green of the hedges stood out from the gray, to me they seemed to glow. There was no sharpness, there were no marked contrasts, no steep mountain peaks, there was no endless sea. Only lawns, hedges, housing blocks, and behind them gentle friendly mountains, all muted by moisture and gray winter light.

In the evening, Yngve came. It was his birthday, he was twenty-three, after dinner we ate cake, drank coffee, and had a glass of brandy. I gave him a record, Mom gave him a book. After Mom had gone to bed, we sat up and had a couple more glasses of brandy. I asked him to read the latest short story I had written. I stood outside on the veranda in the drizzle gazing into the distance, I was overjoyed to be home, although the few signs of Mom and her life that existed in the flat didn't make the alienness any more homey, as one might imagine, more the contrary, they made the homeyness more alien. Seeing her things there was like seeing them in a museum. But then home was no longer a place. It was Mom and Yngve. They were my home.

I craned my neck and looked into the living room. He was still reading.

Was that the last page?

It looked like it.

I forced myself to wait a little longer.

Then I pushed up the long handle and slid open the glass door. Closed it behind me, sat down on the sofa across the table from him. He had placed the sheets of paper in a pile. He was busy rolling a cigarette, oblivious of my presence.

"Well?" I said.

He smiled. "Well, it's good."

"Sure?"

"Ye-es. It's similar to the other ones I've read."

"Good," I said. "I've done six now. If I can speed up, I could have fifteen ready by the time I finish at the school."

"What are you going to do then?" Yngve asked, putting the somewhat crooked rollie between his lips and lighting up.

"Send it to a publishing house, of course," I said. "What do you think?"

He looked at me.

"You don't think anyone's going to publish it, do you? In all seriousness? Do you think they will?"

Chilled to the depths of my soul, I met his gaze. All the blood had drained from my face.

He smiled. "You did, didn't you," he said.

My eyes glazed over and I had to turn away.

"You can send them anyway," he said. "And see what they say. They might go for them, you never know."

"But you said you liked them," I protested, getting up. "Didn't you mean what you said?"

"Yes, I did. But everything is relative. I read it as a story written by my nineteen-year-old brother. And it is good. But I don't think it's good enough to be published."

"OK," I said, going back out onto the veranda. I watched him go back to reading the Fløgstad book Mom had given him. The brandy glass resting in his hand. As though what he had said had no special significance.

To hell with him.

What did he know, really? Why should I listen to him? Kjartan liked it, he was a writer. Or did he also say that based on who I was, his nineteen-year-old nephew, I wrote well considering who I was?

Mom had said she considered me a writer after reading it. You're a writer, she had said. As though that surprised her, as though she hadn't known, and she couldn't have put that on. She meant it.

But for Christ's sake I was her son.

You don't think anyone's going to publish it do you? In all seriousness?

I'll damn well show him. I'll damn well show the whole fucking world who I am and what I am made of. I'll crush every single one of them. I'll render every single one of them speechless. I will. I will. I damn well will.

I'll be so big no one is even close. No one. No. One. Never. Not a chance. I will be the greatest ever. The fucking idiots. I'll damn well crush every single one of them.

I had to be big. I had to be.

If not, I might as well end it all.

The sight of the pallid winter sun in the damp, muted countryside continued to keep me enchanted throughout Christmas, it was as though I hadn't seen the sun before it was gone again, what energy it brought, how rich the play of light on nature when its rays were filtered through the clouds or the mist or just flooded down from a blue sky, and all the endless nuances that appeared when nature reflected the light back.

Nothing had changed in Sørbøvåg. Grandma's state hadn't noticeably worsened, Grandpa hadn't noticeably aged, and the fervor in Kjartan's eyes wasn't noticeably diminished. Since last Christmas he had passed a philosophy exam in Førde, and now it was his lecturer's name, rather than Heidegger's and Nietzsche's, that was mentioned, at least they were not referred to as often as before, in that casual, confidential way of his. I might have imagined we could talk about literature, but apart from him showing me some poems, hardly a word of which I understood, nothing came of this. He had also acquired an astronomical telescope, it stood there on the living-room floor, beside the ceiling-high window, from where he studied the universe at night. He had also developed an interest in ancient Egypt, ensconced in his old leather chair reading about that mysterious culture, which was so far removed from ours it seemed almost nonhuman to me, as if they actually had been gods. But then I knew nothing about it, and just flipped through his books when he wasn't there and examined the pictures.

On December 28 I went down to Kristiansand, celebrated New Year's Eve there, Espen had hired a room with some others at the Hotel Caledonien, which had just reopened after the fire, it was heaving with people, everyone was smoking and drinking, and it wasn't long before two firemen came dashing along the corridor in full uniform. I laughed myself silly when I saw them. I had been on my way up to the rooftop with some others, I sat on the edge and dangled my feet over, with the town beneath me and the sky lit up with fireworks. We talked about a crowd of us going to the Roskilde Music Festival in the summer, and with Lars I semiplanned a hitchhiking trip down to Greece afterward. I managed to include a visit to Grandma and Grandad as well, nothing had changed there either, with them, the house, everything inside and its smells. It was me who had changed, it was my life that was on a wild trajectory.

On the third of January I caught the plane up to Tromsø, shortly after halfway we flew into a tunnel of darkness, and I knew it wouldn't end, this was how it would be, pitch black all day for some weeks yet. Then everything would slowly change, soon the darkness would be gone and the light would fill every hour of the day. This was just as wild, I thought, smoking in the narrow seat.

But first came the darkness. Dense and heavy, it lay over the village when I arrived by bus the next morning, not open, as it could be when the sky was cloud-free and the stars were shining out in space, but dense and heavy like at the bottom of an abandoned well.

I unlocked the door to my flat, went in, unhitched my rucksack, and switched on the light. It was like coming home.

There was my Betty Blue poster, there was the Liverpool FC poster, there was the new landscape poster I had bought in Finnsnes on one of my first days here.

I turned the coffee machine on, crouched down by my record collection and began flicking through it. After that I surveyed the tiny library of books I had bought. It all filled me with pleasure.

I went into the kitchen and poured some coffee into a cup. Through the window I saw a little group of kids coming up the hill. In case they were coming to see me I put on Mozart's Requiem, one of the two classical LPs I possessed, and turned the volume up to full.

There was a ring at the door.

Andrea, Vivian, Live, Stian, and Ivar, the tall ninth-grade boy, stood outside.

"Happy new year," I said. "Come in."

From the hall, where they were hanging up their coats, I heard Vivian say: He likes opera!

I smiled to myself, standing with a steaming cup of coffee in my hand as they came in. Stian had been here only once before, right at the start, with Ivar, he had gone through my record collection and asked whether I had any heavy metal. In the few lessons I had with him at school I ignored him as far as I was able, trying not to rise to all the provocation he dished out. I placed no demands on him, he had made up his mind anyway. Tor Einar had them much more than me and had made a stand against them, which didn't go too well, once he had returned to the staff room trembling all over, two of them, Stian and Ivar, had knocked him to the ground, Ivar had gotten him in a stranglehold. They were sent home for a few days because of the incident, but the school was so small, the place so transparent that what would have been a serious matter elsewhere wasn't so serious here. We were expected to deal with the likes of Stian and Ivar. When they went fishing or hung out with some of the younger men, they were young kids, pests no one bothered about. So Tor Einar could hardly say they had held him by the throat. Not if he wanted to elicit any sympathy or understanding at any rate.

Stian sat down brazenly on the sofa with his legs wide apart. He was the only one not to have taken off his coat. The three girls hung on his lips, I could see, as though ready to obey his every command. If he spoke, they watched him with rapt reverence. If he addressed one of them directly, they cast down their eyes and squirmed uncomfortably on the sofa.

"Get anything nice for Christmas?" I asked.

Vivian giggled.

I went over and sat in the chair opposite them.

"What about you, Stian?" I said. "Did you get anything good?"

He blew out his cheeks.

"I went fishin' over Christmas. Didn't do too bad. Gonna buy a moped as soon as the snow's gone."

"He'll be sixteen in March," Andrea said.

Why did she say that?

"Then you're only three years younger than me," I said. "It won't be long before you can have my job. That's what you have in mind, isn't it, to become a teacher?"

He blew out his cheeks again, but a tiny smile crept into the corners of his mouth.

"No, no," he said. "The only book I'm going to open after I've left school will be a bankbook."

They laughed.

"What about you, Ivar?" I said.

"Goin' fishin'."

He was only sixteen but already the tallest person in the village. His height was so conspicuous that he probably never thought about anything else. Seeing him beside the three seventh-grade girls was painful, anything that was small and delicate caused him difficulty: letters, numbers, conversation, ball games, girls. In most ways he was a child, he burst into loud guffaws at the most basic, the most stupid things, blushed to the roots when he was corrected, and only really felt at ease with Stian, who controlled him as you would a dog. He had lost his father when he was small, and on the few occasions he had come to talk to me that had been the topic. It had all happened in the 1970s, a fishing boat sank without trace, the whole of Norway talked about it for some days, but then it faded into oblivion except for Ivar, his mother, and the rest of the family. Barely a year after the accident they had moved up to Håfjord, where his mother had relatives. That was his story, his fate, the father who died when he was small.

"What about you?" I said, looking at the three girls.

They shrugged. Usually they had a certain confidence when they were here, I teased them, they laughed and talked back, had a good time being cheeky. But now they were more reserved. They didn't want to give anything away in front of Stian, this was a different game, the stakes were higher.

"Vivian's got a boyfriend," Live announced.

Vivian gave her a dirty look. Punched her hard on the shoulder.

"Ow!" Live exclaimed.

"Have you?" I said.

"Yes," Live said, rubbing her shoulder. "She's going out with Steve."

"Steve?" I said. "Who's he?"

"A guy who moved here at Christmas," Stian said. "He's from Finnsnes and is going to start fishing this spring. He's completely useless, they say."

"He is not," Vivian said. She blushed.

"He's twenty," Live said.

"Twenty?" I said. "Really? You're thirteen, aren't you?"

"Yes!" Vivian said. "And?"

"They're crazy up north," I said, and laughed.

I got to my feet.

"I'm afraid you'll have to hop it now. I've just come in the door. I have to unpack and so on. Prepare some lessons. I've got such a terrible class, you know. They don't know anything."

"Ha ha," Andrea said, levered herself off the sofa, walked toward the hall, where she had hung her white jacket. The others followed, for a few seconds everything was jackets and arms, hats and gloves, and then they went out into the darkness, laughing and poking each other. I unpacked my clothes, ate some supper, read in bed for a couple of hours before switching off the light and going to sleep. Once I was woken by sounds from the room above, it was Torill and her husband, the floor shook, she shouted and screamed, he groaned, I took the duvet with me to the sofa and slept there for the rest of the night.

Nils Erik and I moved into the house the following weekend. Apart from the bedrooms and the little room leading off the sitting room, where I would do my writing, we shared everything. We took turns cooking and doing the dishes. There was hardly an evening when we didn't have visitors, either pupils or the other teachers, especially Tor Einar, he dropped by almost every day, but Hege also came a lot. On weekends Nils Erik went on walks, he always asked me if I wanted to join him, I always said no, nature was not the place for me, besides, more often than not there was a party somewhere, and if I didn't go I stayed home writing, no more short stories but a novel called Vann over/Vann under – Water Above/Water Below. I'd gotten the title from a song Yngve and his friend from Arendal, Øyvind, had written. The novel was about a young man, Gabriel, who went to gymnas in Kristiansand, and would consist of a mysterious frame narrative with short, report-like sequences and a present-tense plotline about drinking and girls, punctuated at regular intervals by little episodes from his childhood. It all culminated in him being bound up at a party in a cabin in Agder Province, having a nervous breakdown, and being admitted to a psychiatric clinic, where the circle was closed, since this is where the short objective reports that had introduced every chapter stemmed from.

To ensure I had more time to write, I completely altered my daily routine, it made no difference when you slept and when you were awake, morning and evening, night and day, in practice everything was the same. I started getting up at eleven at night, I worked through until eight in the morning, had a shower, went to school, and took a nap after I finished at around three in the afternoon.

If I couldn't write, I would sometimes put on my coat and go out, wander around the silent village, listen to the roar of the waves beating against the shore, gaze up at the mountainsides, which at first, because of the snow, seemed to be floating in the darkness and then became totally swallowed up by it. Sometimes I went to school. It might have been three or four in the morning, I saw my reflection in the windows I passed, my vacant expression, my vacant eyes. Occasionally I stayed there, read a book on the sofa in the staff room or watched a film on the TV, or simply slept for a few hours, until the sound of a door being opened suddenly woke me, and Richard came in, he was usually the first to appear in the morning. This was all that was needed for a feeling of chaos to come over me, a feeling of not having anything under control, of finding myself on the edge of . . . well, of what?

I did my job. Did it make any difference that I worked at the end of my day rather than the beginning?

But there was something about the darkness. There was something about this small, enclosed place. There was something about seeing the same faces every day. My class. My colleagues. The assistant at the shop. The occasional mother, the occasional father. Now and then the young fishermen. But always the same people, always the same atmosphere. The snow, the darkness, the harsh light inside the school.

One night I was out walking, on my way to the school, when a bulldozer drove up behind me. It had a snowplow mounted on the front, the snow flew alongside into mounds by the road, an orange light flashed from the roof, thick black smoke belched from an exhaust pipe at the front. The man driving didn't look at me as he passed. Some way up the hill he stopped, with the engine still running. As I came alongside he set off again. He drove at the same speed as I walked. I watched him, he was staring straight ahead, and I shivered with unease, the vibrating, roaring, scraping, flashing vehicle shook my soul. I walked faster. He drove faster. I turned right, he turned right. I turned around, he drove straight on, and I'll be damned if he didn't turn around as well, and as I reached the hill leading to the school he was right behind me again. I set off at a run, this was scary, because around us everything was lifeless and black, the village was asleep, it was just us two outside, me and some mad snowplow man chasing me. I ran, but I was no match for him, he accelerated and followed me right into the school playground. I unlocked the door, my heart pounding in my chest, would he follow me in here too?

From the staff room I watched him steadily and methodically clearing the playground of snow, it took him perhaps a quarter of an hour, before he turned and drove back down to the village.

On my way home from school the following afternoon I caught a glimpse of Vivian's twenty-year-old boyfriend. She was in his car, so overcome by her triumph that she didn't know where to look as they drove past and our eyes met. He was a puny-looking blond-haired guy who – I could see when I met them by the shop shortly afterward – laughed a lot. He had been unemployed and had moved here when he was offered a job as a crewman on one of the boats. Nothing of the Vivian we saw in the lessons, her childish questions, the teasing and giggling, was on show here, it had to be stowed away, and it was strange to see, she had sat in the front seat of the car like royalty, with a hard-won stateliness that threatened to crack at any moment, held together only by the fragile bonds of vanity, such that the child she also was could reappear at any moment or even take total control. One giggle, one gesture, one blush, and it was over. Her boyfriend was not the world's brightest, to put it mildly, so in this way they were well matched. In class her behavior changed, she became more self-important, she no longer liked all the childishness the others exhibited. But she was easily led, it didn't take many comments before she lost the stateliness she'd worn like a cloak only a few minutes earlier. That didn't mean that she was really unchanged, really untouched by what was going on around her, only that everything in her was still fluid. She might refuse to laugh at my jokes and say I was stupid, then burst into laughter anyway, and after that she might look at me with a different nuance in her eyes, and this nuance, which was quite new and also present in Andrea's eyes, although not so clearly, I had to protect myself against, for what it did, insidiously, was to draw me closer to them. Through this look the distance between me and them narrowed, and it wasn't because I had approached them, quite the contrary, I saw that in this look, which was completely open, half knowing, half unknowing.

Or was I imagining all of this? For when I had seen them in other contexts, such as in Torill's or Nils Erik's lessons, or in the shop with their mothers, it was as if this side of them had never existed. They toed the line, and if they didn't, they tried to rebel with defiance, sulks, or protests, and not, as they occasionally did in my classes, with charged looks.

This wasn't something I spent tracts of time mulling over, more impressions that blew through me, tiny gusts of pleasure and fear while I was writing during the January and February nights. Nor did I have any concrete basis for these impressions, nothing had been said or done, it was all about moods and feelings triggered by something as intangible as a gaze or a certain way of moving.

As I plodded through the village on my way to the first class, my feelings were ambivalent – I liked being at school yet I didn't. Now and then I felt a slight flutter in my chest at the thought that I would be seeing her again the following day.

No one knew, and I hardly knew myself.

One Friday at the beginning of February, all these small impressions, which in themselves were insignificant and vague, and as such unexacting, were suddenly intensified. I had as usual got up late in the evening, written through the night, and as the clock passed five in the morning I'd had enough and went out into the darkness. Through the still sleeping village, up to the school, where after a stroll through the teaching block I sat down on the sofa with a book until tiredness overcame me and I leaned back with eyes closed and the book resting on my chest.

The door opened. I sat up with a start, ran a hand through my hair while staring straight into Richard's eyes with what must have been a guilty expression on my face.

"Have you spent the night here?" he said.

"No," I said. "I came here early to do some preparation. And then I dozed off."

He scrutinized me carefully.

"I'll make some extra strong coffee," he said at length. "That'll wake you up."

"Make it strong enough for a horseshoe to stand upright in," I said, and got to my feet.

"What?" he said. "Who said that?"

"Lucky Luke, I think."

He laughed and poured water into the machine while I sat down at my desk. It had been several months since I'd prepared a lesson in any other way than with a quick glance at a textbook shortly before I walked into the class. I had ditched most of my alternative teaching methods, now the majority of my lessons consisted of going through whatever topic had to be dealt with, after which I gave them some exercises. The aim was to get through the syllabus in all subjects. Whether they absorbed everything or not no longer bothered me. The main thing was the framework this approach gave and, with it, the distance.

"Coffee's ready if you want any," Richard said, heading for the hall with a cup in his hand, probably on the way to his office.

"Thank you very much," I said.

When the bell rang half an hour later, I was standing by the window in the classroom watching the pupils coming up the hill. Tiredness lay in me like stagnant water. We had math for the first two lessons, incomparably the most boring subject. It was February, incomparably the most boring month.

"Open your books and get started," I said after they had trickled into the room and found their places. For math we were joined by the fifth and sixth graders, so there were eight pupils in all.

"Same as always then. You work on the problems, and if you run into any problems, I'll come and help. Then we'll go through the new material on the board at the beginning of the next lesson."

No one objected, they slipped acquiescently from the state they arrived in at school to the state the solving of the math problems demanded. Live put her hand up before she had even glanced at the book.

I went over to her and leaned forward.

"Try on your own first," I said. "Have a shot."

"But I can't do this, I know. It's so difficult."

"Maybe it'll be easy. You don't know until you've tried. Give it ten minutes, then I'll come back and see how you're doing. OK?"

"OK," she said.

Jørn, the sharp little sixth grader, waved me over.

"I did some of the exercises at home," he said when I was by his desk. "But then I got stuck. Can you help me?"

"Possibly," I said. "I'm not that great at math myself."

He looked up at me and smiled. He thought I was joking, but I wasn't; after the syllabus for the seventh grade I started having problems. I could even get into difficulties before then too, suddenly forgetting how to divide two big numbers, and I had to wriggle my way out by asking pupils how to do it. Not that I didn't know of course, it was just that I couldn't remember.

"But this one doesn't look too bad," I said.

He followed carefully while I explained it to him. Then he took over, I left him and went to the window.

He was a determined character, but his attitude to school was either-or, on or off. Math he liked, so there was no problem. In some subjects though he switched off completely.

Live put up her hand again.

"I can't do it," she said. "And I mean it."

I showed her. She nodded, but her eyes were vacant.

"Can you do the rest yourself now?" I said.

She nodded.

I felt sorry for her, almost every lesson held a humiliation of some kind, but what could I do?

I sat down behind my desk, scanned the class and looked up at the clock, which had barely moved. After a while Andrea put up her hand. I met her eyes, smiled, and stood up.

"Karl Ove's in love with Andrea!" Jørn said loud enough for everyone to hear.

I gave a start. Red-faced, I pretended I hadn't heard, leaned over her desk, and tried to concentrate on the little math problem.

"Karl Ove's in love with Andrea!" Jørn repeated.

Some of the pupils giggled.

I straightened up and eyed him. "Do you know what that's called?" I said.

"What what's called?" he said with a grin.

"When you say that other people feel what you feel? It's called transference. For example, if you, a sixth grader, were in love with one of the girls in the seventh grade. Instead of admitting it, you say your teacher is."

"I'm not in love with anyone," he said.

"Me either," I said. "So shall we do some problem-solving now?"

I leaned forward again. Andrea whisked her hair away from her forehead with one hand.

"Don't take any notice of him," she whispered.

I ignored her remark, stared at the column of figures she had written and pointed to where she had slipped up.

"There," I said. "That's wrong. Can you see?"

"Yes," she said. "But what's it supposed to be?"

"I can't tell you that!" I said. "You have to do the problem. Try again. I'll be at my desk if you can't do it."

"OK," she said, looked up at me, and gave a fleeting smile.

My insides trembled.

Was I in love with Andrea?

Was I in love?

No, no, no.

But I was drawn to her in my thoughts. I was.

When I was at the school during the night, when I stood by the dark, motionless water in the swimming pool, I imagined she was in the changing room, alone, and that soon I would go in. She covered herself, looked up, I knelt down in front of her, she looked at me, at first with apprehension, then tenderness and openness.

I imagined this and at the same time thought the opposite, that she wasn't in the changing room, how could I think like that, no one must find out how my mind worked.

My insides trembled, but no one knew because my movements were controlled, what I said was thought through, nothing of what others saw could betray my inner thoughts.

I hardly knew I had these thoughts, they lived in a kind of no-man's-land, and when they came, in an explosion, I didn't hold on to them, I let them fall back to where they'd come from, and so it was as though they didn't exist.

But what Jørn had said, that changed everything, because that came from the outside.

Everything that came from the outside was dangerous.

There was something almost morbid about writing alone at night while everyone else was asleep and then teaching the children with the dregs of my strength, and I was becoming more and more worn down, so at the end of February, I switched back as the tiny pulse of light in the middle of the day slowly began to widen. It was as if the world was returning. And living together with Nils Erik was good: when the pupils came visiting, from the fourth graders to the seventh graders, the meetings weren't so charged – if I didn't play such a dominant role, it didn't make much difference. It was different with Hege, she invariably came when Nils Erik was out, how she knew I had no idea, nor why she did it. But she liked talking to me, and I liked talking to her, we could sit for hours in the evening despite our being so different.

The writing on the other hand was going badly, I had reached a point where I kept repeating myself, all of a sudden I was unsure why I was writing at all.

Aschehoug Publishing House had put an advert in Dagbladet, announcing a short-story competition, my enthusiasm was rekindled and I sent in two of my best stories: the one about the garbage dump and the one about the funeral pyres on the plain.

Various community centers on the island took turns organizing parties, and at the beginning of March it was Håfjord's turn. We had pre-drinks in our house, almost all the temporary teachers were there, and after only a few drinks I was floating on air, they made me so happy, these people, and I told them so too, on the way up to the community center, swinging the bag with the bottle of vodka and the extra pouch of tobacco.

What was special about these parties was that they weren't restricted to or arranged for particular age groups – desperate twenty-year-olds here, resigned forty-year-olds there – no, everyone came to these community center parties. Seventy-year-olds sat at the same table as teenagers, fish-processing workers at the same table as school inspectors, and the fact that they had known one another all their lives did not prevent them from letting their hair down, normal social relationships were set aside, you could see a thirteen-year-old necking with a twenty-year-old, a juiced-up old lady dancing and shaking her dress cancan style while grinning a toothless grin. I loved it, couldn't help myself, there was a freedom in this I had never encountered anywhere else. Yet you could only love it if you were there, part of the untrammeled euphoria, for with even the tiniest hint of criticism or good taste everything would collapse and become a wild parody or perhaps even a travesty of the human condition. The young men who lit their coffee so it burned with a low blue flame, the very elderly women who looked at you with mischievous, flirty eyes, the bald men dressed in formal suits and ties who one minute were making passes at fifteen-year-olds and the next were hunched over a ditch beneath the glittering community center spewing, women staggering and men crying, all wrapped up as it were, packaged in a long stream of badly performed 1960s and '70s hits by bands that no one but people up here cared about any longer, and a cloud of smoke that was so dense that if you hadn't known better, you might have assumed came from a blaze in the cellar.

For me this was alien and exotic. I had grown up where almost no one drank or at least was ever visibly the worse for wear. There was a neighbor who drank himself silly once or twice every six months, this was a sensation and caused quite a stir. There was an old alcoholic who cycled to the shop every day to buy his brown bottles of beer. And that was it. Mom and Dad never drank, apart from a couple of bottles of beer or a glass of red wine with their food. Grandma and Grandpa in Sørbøvåg didn't drink, Grandma and Grandad in Kristiansand didn't drink, none of my uncles and aunts drank, and if they did, never in front of me. It was only two and a half years ago that I had seen my father drunk for the first time.

Why didn't they drink? Why didn't everyone drink? Alcohol makes everything big, it is a wind blowing through your consciousness, it is crashing waves and swaying forests, and the light it transmits gilds everything you see, even the ugliest and most revolting person becomes attractive in some way, it is as if all objections and all judgments are cast aside in a wide sweep of the hand, in an act of supreme generosity, here everything, and I do mean everything, is beautiful.

Why say no to this?

I plunged into the party on this March evening, I was in my element, I even went over to Richard, who was sitting in a late '70s suit a size too small for him, with his wife, to say how much I liked him, he had kept a tight rein on me, he was right to do so, and everything had gone well, hadn't it? It was going well, wasn't it?

Yes, I was doing fine.

He didn't like me, but he couldn't say that, all he could do was force a goatish smile. I was in the ascendancy, I was the shining star, he was just the head teacher at a small school, of course I could spare a moment for a little chat with him.

I saw Vivian and Andrea's mothers, they were friends and were sitting at a table smoking, I sat down beside them wanting to have a chat about their daughters, they had such fantastic girls, they were so lively and pretty and would do well in life, I was sure of that.

I had never spoken to them before, apart from at parents' evenings, but those had been formal occasions, I had discussed the girls' behavior and performance in various subjects then, they had listened carefully to what I said and asked a few questions, no doubt prepared, before disappearing into the darkness, on their way home to their children, who had been nervously waiting to hear what the meeting might bring, or reveal. Now the situation was different, we each had a glass in front of us, people were staggering past on all sides, the music was loud, the air close and warm, I was drunk and so eager to say something nice that I was leaning over the table towards them with a huge smile on my face. They said their children talked so much about me, there was no end to it, in fact it was almost as though they were in love with me! They laughed, I said yes, that can be difficult, a teacher who is only eighteen years old, nevertheless they are incredibly nice girls!

For a moment I wondered whether to ask one of them to dance, but rejected the idea, they were at least thirty-five, so even though they had a twinkle in their eyes when I appeared, I got up and wandered around the room, sat down first here and then there, went outside and saw Håfjord gleaming beneath me, the black sea straight ahead, and when I went back in

I searched for Nils Erik to tell him what a good friend he was and how much I liked sharing the house with him.

Having done that, I went outside again, I wanted to take in the view one more time. At the bottom of the hill were my girls, I went down, Vivian was with Steve, Andrea with Hildegunn, I asked them if they were having a good time, they were, and they laughed at me, perhaps because I was drunk, who knows, but it made no difference, I moved on, into the thick, smoke-filled atmosphere, bounded up the steps in two strides, plowed my way into the room, and there in front of me, like a revelation, stood a girl.

I stopped in my tracks.

Everything in me stopped. She was beautiful, but there were many who were, that wasn't the point, it was the eyes she looked at me with, they were dark and brimful with a life I wanted to share. I had never seen her before. But she was from here. She came from the village, I could see that the moment I clapped my eyes on her, for she was wearing a soccer uniform, the whole deal, shirt, shorts, socks and cleats, everyone who was working there tonight was, the event had been organized by the soccer team, and would anyone not from the area volunteer to work at a party for Håfjord Soccer Club?

She was holding a tray of empty glasses.

Seeing her, so beautiful and so shapely, in football garb and cleats, made my senses reel. I glanced at her bare thighs and calves, and I knew I was doing it, so to disguise this fact I looked slightly to one side, and then the other, as though I was inspecting this clubhouse and everything in it very thoroughly.

"Hi," she said with a smile.

"Hi," I said. "Who are you? I've never seen you before, I'm sure of that, you're so beautiful I would have remembered if I had."

"My name's Ine."

"You live here, but you never go out, is that right?"

"No," she laughed. "I live in Finnsnes, but this is where I come from."

"I live here," I said.

"I know," she said. "You work with my sister."

"Do I? Who's that?"

"Hege."

"Are you Hege's sister? Why didn't she say she had such a pretty sister? Because you are younger than her, aren't you?"

"Yes. Yes, why didn't she tell you? Perhaps she wants to protect me?"

"From me? I'm the most harmless person out here."

"Yes, I'm sure you are. But I have to go in with this. I'm working here tonight, as you can see."

"Yes," I said. "But can we meet again? When you finish? There must be some get-together afterward somewhere. Why don't you come along? Then we can talk a bit more."

"Well, we'll have to see," she said, turned and made for the little room beside the stage, where the kitchen was.

After that, the party was over as far as I was concerned. Nothing going on there interested me anymore. All I had in my head was the beautiful waitress in her soccer uniform, and I spent the rest of the evening looking longingly at her.

Hege's sister!

She told me everything, why hadn't she told me about her?

I searched for Nils Erik and said we should organize some drinks at home. He hesitated, he was already exhausted, but I was determined, we were going to do this. As long as he didn't have to join in, it was fine with him, he said. You have to stay up for a while, I said. And you don't need to invite anyone else. What are you up to? he said. Have you got your beady eye on someone? You bet, I said, filling my glass to keep myself on the boil while doing what I could to kill time. I caught fleeting glimpses of her as she went in and out of the kitchen, for a while she served in the snack bar as well, but I didn't go over, although I would have loved to buy a hot dog from her, just to watch her squeezing the ketchup and mustard from the plastic bottles over the sausage, but I didn't want to waste the little time I had on anything that wasn't to do with my plan for her and me at our place. I didn't want to be a nuisance or force myself on her. When she smiled at me I said there would be drinks at our place afterward, we were staying in the yellow house on the bend and it would be an enormous boost for everyone there if she came along.

"We'll see," she said again, but not without a smile, not without a glint in her dark eyes.

Oh, dear God, please let her say yes! Please let her come along!

The band started up again. Eric Clapton's "Cocaine."

I applauded when they had finished, couldn't take much more, staggered out into the cold, saw Tor Einar chatting with two girls in the ninth grade with a big smile on his face, a couple farther away making out in a car, the school at the other end of the soccer field looking like an embankment in the darkness, lit a cigarette, drained the vodka, turned and glimpsed Hege on her way over. My intuition told me I shouldn't say anything about Ine to her, otherwise she would be sure to come along too and the situation would be impossible.

"How are you?" she said.

"Can't complain," I said.

"So you've been talking to my sister?"

"Yes, you kept her well hidden. I didn't even know you had a sister."

"We're only half sisters. Same dad, but we didn't grow up together. She lives her own life."

"Does she live in Finnsnes?"

"Yes. She opted for the motor mechanics course. She likes motorbikes. And motorbike riders!"

"Oh."

Vidar appeared in the doorway. His eyes scoured the people standing outside. And stopped at us. Held us in his gaze, then he came in our direction. He was drunk, I could see that by the way he was concentrating on walking properly and in a straight line. Broad and powerfully built, his shirt open at the chest, a gold chain visible, he stopped in front of us.

"So this is where you are," he said.

She didn't answer.

He looked at me. "We don't see much of you anymore. You should drop in. Or perhaps that's what you do when I'm away?"

"It has happened," I said. "We had a little get-together there for the teachers a couple of weeks ago, for instance. But mostly I stay at home and work in the evenings."

"What do you think about Håfjord actually?"

"It's great here," I said.

"Are you happy?"

"Yes, I am."

"Good," he said. "It's important that teachers are happy."

"Shall we go in?" Hege said. "It's beginning to get cold."

"I'll stay here for a bit," I said. "Have to clear my head."

They went in side by side, next to him she was extremely slight. But she was tough, I thought, and looked out over the village again, it was so quiet and peaceful compared to the hubbub of vying personalities and wills in the clubhouse behind me.

Some time after the band stopped playing, the music was also switched off, and as people began to drift away the lights came on, harsh and quivering, and the magic veil in which the darkness had wrapped everything was torn aside. The dance floor, which moments before had been the scene for the sweetest and hottest dreams, was now bare and empty and covered with dirt and gravel from all the boots that had stomped around on it during the course of the evening. The space beneath the ceiling, which as if underwater had pulsated in hues of red, green, and blue except when it had sparkled like a starry sky, was empty apart from a light rig with some light cannons and an idiotic cheap shiny disco ball hanging from the middle. The tables, where people had been sitting and enjoying themselves in what resembled a wall of human warmth, were strewn around, beneath them a sea of empty bottles and scrunched-up cigarette packets, here and there shards of broken glass, and the odd trail of toilet paper someone had unwittingly brought with them. The tabletops were stained with all sorts of sticky mess and covered with small burn marks from forgotten cigarettes, there were overflowing ashtrays, piles of cups and glasses, empty bottles of all descriptions, cheap Thermos flasks with long rivulets of coffee under the spouts. The faces of those who had not yet gone home were tired and lifeless, bone structures covered with skin, white and creased, eyes two lumps of jelly, bodies either rippling with fat and folds of skin or so bony and lean that your thoughts were led to the skeletons beneath, which would soon be lying picked nice and clean under the ground in some windblown graveyard with saline soil somewhere by the sea.

No, under the lights this room was nothing special. But then in came six girls wearing soccer uniforms to clean up, they scurried around with their trays and cloths and it was as though life had come to chase away death. I would have loved to stand watching them, but now it was important to give the right impression, not to be a pest and stare and harass, so I went for a walk outside, chatted to people and tried to plan the next phase of the evening, that is, to discover where people were going to drink in case she didn't want to join me.

A quarter of an hour later the crowd outside the community center had thinned and I ventured in. With another girl she was carrying a table across the floor to the corner below the stage. After they had put it down she ran one hand across her forehead, rested the other on her hip, and looked across at me.

"After all this hard work you deserve a break," I said. "I know a house with a great location by the water. You can relax and recover there."

"And no one will come and bother me?" she said.

"No," I said with a smile.

She held her index finger against her cheek, supported her chin on her thumb and regarded me with raised eyebrows. God, she was so attractive.

Five seconds passed. Ten.

"OK," she said. "I'll come with you. We've finished here anyway. I just need to change first."

"I'll wait outside," I said, and turned so that she couldn't see I was smiling so much my mouth was in danger of splitting open.

A few minutes later she came down the steps zipping up her dark blue down jacket and straightening her white woolen hat in a way that was making my heart thump as I waited in the darkness.

She stopped in front of me and put on her gloves, also white, and shifted the bag she was carrying from one hand to the other.

"Shall we go then?" she said, as though we had known each other for years.

I nodded.

All the light-headedness vanished as we set off down the hill. Now it was just her and me. And oh, how aware I was of her movements and facial expressions as we walked down the snow-covered road.

She was tall, slim, her nose was small like a child's, her hips were beautifully rounded, her feet small, yet there was nothing of that dainty grace about her, she wasn't someone you wanted to protect, someone you wanted to take care of, and her strength, which was also a coldness, was what perhaps I found most irresistible about her.

When her eyes didn't flash with life they were dark and calm.

This had been my initiative, she had waited for me, I had set this in motion.

We had already reached my old flat.

"Where do you stay when you come here?" I asked.

"At Mom's," she said, pointing down to the right. "She lives down there."

"Did you go to school here?"

"No, I grew up in Finnsnes."

"And now you're at the tech?"

"Have you been talking to Hege?" she said, looking at me.

"No, no," I said. "It was a wild guess."

Then there was silence. I was uneasy and tried to think of something else so that she wouldn't notice my nerves. If dogs can smell fear, girls can smell nervousness, that was my experience.

From a distance I could see lights in the sitting room. When we went in Nils Erik, Tor Einar and Henning were there. They were playing Nick Cave and drinking what looked like red wine. We sat down on the sofa. It felt as if the party was over, there was no energy in the room, only lifeless eyes and some sipping of wine. Tor Einar tried a couple of times to whip up some atmosphere, but no one was biting, his laughter was met with polite smiles and weary looks.

"Would you like something to drink?" I asked Ine. "A glass of red wine? Some vodka?"

"Do you have any beer?"

"No."

"A little vodka then."

I went into the kitchen, which was freezing cold as usual, and took two glasses from the cupboard, poured a dash of vodka in each and mixed it with 7UP as I wondered what to do. Perhaps best to wait? They would soon go, and then we would be alone. But if they didn't, if this dragged on for another half an hour, there would be a good chance she would leave. There was nothing of interest for her here. Could I simply suggest we go up to my bedroom?

No, no, that was the last thing I should do. Then they would be sitting underneath us listening to every movement upstairs, she would know that and refuse, that wouldn't work.

But I had to get her on her own.

Could we go into my study?

With a glass in each hand I went into the sitting room. Put one on the table by Ine, who looked up at me and gave a weak smile.

"This music is depressing me," I said. "Can I put something else on?"

"Be my guest," Nils Erik said.

What might she like?

Or should I choose a record I liked, one which might give her a sense of who I was? Hüsker Dü, for example? Or Psychocandy by the Jesus and Mary Chain?

"Any requests?" I said, crouching by the LPs.

No one answered.

The Smiths maybe?

No, that was too whiny. And something told me she hated whining.

Something hard and masculine. But what?

Did I really not have anything? Was all the music I had feminine and whiny?

It would have to be Led Zeppelin.

As the stylus crackled on the first groove I stood up. It was important to keep on the move because if I sat down, the inertia in the room would make everything I did from then on conspicuous.

"Skål!" I said, reaching out my glass and clinking it against the others, Ine's last.

"Come with me," I said. "I'm going to show you something."

"Oh, what?" she said.

"It's in there," I said, motioning toward the other end of the sitting room. "It's something I talked about before. Come on!"

She got up, we crossed the floor, I closed the door behind us and there we were, each holding a glass and standing between the towers of books and piles of paper and cardboard boxes.

She looked around. I sat down on the chair.

"What were you going to show me?" she said.

"Nothing," I said. "It was just so boring in there. Come and sit over here."

I held her hand, she sat down on my lap. Then she took the initiative, picked up my hand and studied it. Ran her thumb over my palm.

"Wow, they're so soft," she said. "You've never done any manual work in your life, have you?"

"Not a lot," I said.

"Never used a spade? Or a wrench?"

"No."

She shook her head.

"That's not good," she said. "And you bite your nails, I can see. Are you the nervous type?"

"Yes, I guess so."

"And why was I to go home with you, did you say?"

I sat there with a hard-on, not knowing what to say.

She leaned forward and opened her mouth. We kissed. I stroked her back, then I held her tight and pulled her to me, hard, she was so lovely, and she moved her head away.

She stroked my cheek.

"You're nice," she said.

Her dark eyes lit up as she smiled.

We kissed again.

Then she got up.

"I have to go," she said.

"No. You can't," I said. "Not now."

"Yes, I can. But I'm here tomorrow too. Come by if you like. I'll be at Mom's."

She opened the door, I accompanied her to the hall, she put on her jacket and went out, turned briefly and said good-bye, disappeared down the road.

Leaving her bag behind.

The next day, well, what was on my mind the next day?

Ine.

A miracle had taken place. In my room, last night, a miracle.

Ine, Ine, Ine.

But I put off the visit. The night before I had been drunk, everything took its own course. Now I was sober and could lose everything.

It was three o'clock before I dared venture out and set off on the long road there.

Her mother, an elderly woman with white hair, opened the door.

"Is Ine at home?" I asked.

"Yes, she is," she said. "She's in the living room. Come in."

Ine in the living room, that was quite different from Ine at a party. She was wearing gray jogging pants and a white T-shirt with a picture of a motorbike on it. Her hair was pinned up. She smiled when she saw me, jumped to her feet, and asked if I wanted some coffee.

"Yes, please."

She found a cup and placed a white Thermos on the table next to me.

I grabbed it and tried to unscrew the top. But my palms were too sweaty. My hand slipped around without gaining any purchase. When I applied all my strength it budged a little, but by then I had used all my strength and had none left to turn it.

She watched me.

I blushed.

"Shall I give you a hand?" she said.

I nodded.

"My hands are so slippery," I said.

She came over and unscrewed the top with ease.

"There you go," she said, and sat back down.

I poured the coffee, took a sip.

So far I hadn't said a word.

"When are you going back? Tonight?"

She nodded. Her mother came in behind me.

"You work with Hege, don't you?" her mother said.

"Yes."

"Hege really likes you," Ine said. "She talks about you a lot anyway."

"Is that right?" I said.

"Yeah," she said.

What was this? What was I doing here? Were we going to make small talk? How wrong was that? Wrong, wrong, wrong!

"Where do you live in Finnsnes?" I said.

"Right behind the bank."

"Renting somewhere?"

She nodded.

"Do you like Håfjord?" her mother asked.

"Yes, I like it a lot," I said. "I'm having a great time here."

"Yes, it's a fine little place," her mother said.

"Mom!" Ine said. "You're boring him."

Her mother smiled and got up.

"OK, OK," she said. "I'll leave you two in peace."

She left the room. Ine drummed her fingers on the table.

"Can I meet you again?" I said.

"You're meeting me now," she said.

"That's true," I said. "But I meant in a different way. We could have dinner together or something like that. What do you think?"

"Maybe," she said.

She looked beautiful sitting there. A red-faced sweaty boy was the last thing she needed in her life.

"Actually I dropped by on my way to the school," I said. "I've got to do some work and prepare for tomorrow."

I got up.

She got up.

I went into the hall, she followed and watched me put on my coat.

"Bye then," she said.

"Bye," I said, and hurried up the hill toward the school, where I had nothing to do, but I unlocked the door anyway, in case she was watching me from her house. I was fairly sure she had forgotten I existed the moment she closed the door behind me, nevertheless, I didn't want to be caught out telling such a cowardly lie, and now that I was at the school I might just as well watch some TV, it was Sunday, there were always sports on then.

Ine, Ine, Ine, all the girls tittered when I went into the classroom for the first lesson the following day.

So everyone knew.

I ignored them but thought of nothing else.

Ine, Ine, Ine.

At night I lay awake musing on my next move. She had left her bag at my place, she would have to come and get it, wouldn't she? Or should I take it to Finnsnes?

I had already put the nightmare visit to her house behind me, I hadn't even been able to open the Thermos, so what could I expect of another visit? That she would she throw herself into my arms?

I would have to meet her when I was drunk, that was my only chance.

Ine, Ine, Ine.

The brief memory of her burned inside me, I had never experienced anything similar, it was so unassailable, it was the focal point of everything, suddenly she was all that counted.

I walked back and forth between the house and the school during the day, went for long runs in the evenings to sweat out any thoughts of her, and then the following Sunday she appeared.

There was a knock at the door, I opened up, there she stood.

Beautiful Ine.

"I left a bag here, I believe. Just came by to pick it up."

"Is it this one?" I said, holding it up.

"Yes," she said. "Thank you."

She turned to go.

"Wouldn't you like to come in for a while?" I said.

She shook her head, but not from side to side, the movement seemed to stop halfway, and I loved it.

"I have to go back to Finnsnes," she said, starting to walk up the little slope to the road. It was slippery, she took small steps.

"Did you come all this way just to get the bag?" I said.

"No. I've been here all weekend," she said. She had reached the top now and was striding out.

I knew nothing about her except that she was sixteen, liked motorbikes, and went to a technical school.

Not much to base a relationship on.

But she was a miracle of nature, and she was tough.

Her breasts were big, her legs long.

What more could I want?

Nothing, that covered everything.

So what should I do?

Nothing, I meant nothing to her, that had taken her under five minutes to figure out.

I told Hege everything. We sat nursing cups of tea.

"Ine's no good for you," she said. "You have no idea. So you'll just have to forget it."

"I can't," I said.

She looked at me. "You're not in love with my little sister, are you?"

"Yes, I am. That's exactly what I am."

She sipped her tea, stroked a long strand of hair away from her eyes.

"Oh, Karl Ove, you are something," she said.

"It's a terrible cliché, but I can't stop thinking about her."

"You'll never make it with her. It just won't work. In fact, it's inconceivable."

"Saying that is not helpful," I said. "I have got to try."

"OK," she said. "Let's go to Finnsnes, go to the disco, miss the bus home, and crash at her place."

"Why can't she come with us to the disco?"

"She doesn't like discos."

It was a plan, and we followed it to the letter.

On Friday night we stood outside a house behind a bank, not far from a disco, Hege rang the bell and Ine came down.

If she was angry that her sister had tricked her, she didn't show it.

They hugged, I looked down and tried to be as unassuming as possible, followed them up the stairs, sat down on a chair rather than the sofa so that she wouldn't feel compelled to sit next to me.

She was just as casually dressed this time as last. Shiny tracksuit bottoms tight around her thighs and a plain white T-shirt.

She made some tea and they did the talking, I sat listening and offering the occasional comment.

The place consisted of a single room with a little kitchenette at one end. The room was quite big, though by no means immense, and while I sat there I kept wondering what Hege had imagined. How could anything possibly happen here?

Ine made up a bed on a mattress on the floor, it was positioned right next to the door and that was where I was to sleep. Hege would be sharing the double bed with her.

Oh well.

The light was switched off, the two of them whispered for a while, then all went quiet.

I lay on my back staring at the ceiling.

How strange my life had become.

As if in a dream a figure rose from the bed. It was Ine, she came over and slipped in beside me.

Jesus, she was naked.

She snuggled up to me, breathing hard.

We kissed, I caressed her whole body, her wonderfully large dark breasts, oh, I devoured them, and I felt her smooth hair against my thigh, and she was breathing heavily and I was breathing heavily, was it going to happen now, I caught myself thinking, with this stupendous motorbike girl?

She rubbed herself against me, and I came.

I twisted away and pressed myself against the mattress.

Shit. Shit. Shit.

"Did you come?" she said.

"Mhm," I said.

She got up, crept back into bed, and slid back into the dream from which she had so enticingly risen only a few minutes earlier.

And thet was thet, as Fleksnes used to say.

For the next few days my love grappled with the remainder of my pride. I couldn't go to see her again. I couldn't ring, couldn't write a letter, couldn't look her in the eyes again.

She was still all I thought about, but the incident at her place had been so definitive and so humiliating that not even the most enamored thoughts could withstand the pressure and slowly but surely they disappeared from my system.

Then it was just school again. School and writing and drinking.

But the days lengthened, the snow melted, spring was on its way. One day there was an envelope marked H. Aschehoug & Co. in my mailbox. I took it with me outside with the other letters, lit a cigarette, gazed at the jagged white mountains across the fjord gilded by the sun, which with every day that passed came closer to the village with its retinue of rays. The sight was invigorating, there was in fact a light that burned for us out in space.

A car drove past. I didn't see who it was but waved all the same. Some gulls screeched over by the fish-processing factory, I glanced across, they were circling in the air above the quay. The waves lapped against the stones on the shore. I opened the envelope. There were my two short stories. So they had been rejected. There was a letter attached, I read it. No contributions had been selected, it said. The general standard had been too poor, the anthology would not be published.

So at least I hadn't been rejected!

I walked up to the road and ambled toward our yellow house. Tor Einar's old blue Peugeot was parked outside. Tor Einar was chatting with Nils Erik in the sitting room, along with his cousin, Even, a boy in the eighth class, it was Saturday, we were going to Finnsnes. As I turned on to the little path down to the door, they came out.

"Are you ready?" he said.

"Yes," I answered. "Are we going now?"

"That was the idea."

I went back up, opened the passenger door, and got in. On the rear seat Even leaned forward and spread his arms across the front seats. He had kind blue eyes, dark hair, a small wispy moustache above his upper lip. His voice rose and sank in ways even he could not predict. Tor Einar started the car and drove slowly through the village, waving to the right and left to people on their way to or from the shop. I set about opening the pile of letters I had taken from the mailbox. The original twenty people I corresponded with had shrunk to twelve, still enough to ensure the mailbox was seldom empty. One of the letters was from Anne. She had worked as a technician on the radio programs I had done in Kristiansand. She lived in Molde now, went to the university there or whatever it was, I wasn't very interested, she was though, the letters I received were rarely less than twenty pages.

I opened it and took out the thick wad of paper. A small brownish lump came with it and fell onto my thigh.

"What was that?" Even said.

Christ! It was hashish.

"What was what?" I said, placing my hand over it.

"What fell out. What did you get?"

"Oh that?" I said. "It was nothing. A friend of mine's studying horticulture. She's interested in trees. So she's sent me a piece of bark from a rare specimen."

"Can I see?" he said.

I stared ahead at the tunnel opening a few meters in front of us. What would he do if he knew what it was? Tell someone? There would be a hell of a fuss then. DRUGS SEIZED ON HÅFJORD TEACHER. They drank like fiends, but they didn't have anything to do with hashish, marijuana, amphetamines, or that sort of thing.

"Let me see then!" he said.

"There's nothing to see," I said. "Just a rare specimen of bark."

"Why did she send it to you then?"

I shrugged. "We had a relationship."

Tor Einar glanced at me. "Tell us about it," he said.

"Nothing to tell," I said, putting the lump in my pocket with one hand while grabbing the handle above the door with the other. Not that it was necessary, Tor Einar was driving carefully as always. He and Nils Erik had to be the only drivers in the village who kept to the speed limits.

"Am I going to see it or not?" Even said.

Strange how persistent he was.

I turned. "Give me a break," I said. "I've put it in my pocket now. It's just a bit of bark."

"But it was rare," he said.

"Are you interested in bark?" I said.

"No," he said, and laughed.

"Well, there you are. Now I want some peace and quiet to read if that's all right with you," I said, skimming through Anne's pages.

When we returned a few hours later Tor Einar and Nils Erik were going to go skiing. They asked me if I wanted to join them, as usual I said no, I was going to write. The moment they were out the door I took out the lump of hashish, warmed it up, mixed it with tobacco and rolled a joint. I drew the curtains, locked the door, sat down on the sofa and smoked it.

On the wall next to my Betty Blue poster Nils Erik had hung one of Charlie Chaplin. Sitting there, I imagined I was him and then I mimicked his walk. With my feet at a quarter to three and a stick happily whirring around in one hand I walked back and forth across the floor. It was a perfect imitation and I didn't want to stop, I waddled up the stairs into my bedroom, which was bare except for a pile of clothes and a mattress against the wall, down again, did a circuit of the kitchen, back into the sitting room. I laughed several times, not because it was funny but because it felt so good. I was the tramp, I swung my stick and staggered around taking tiny footsteps, sometimes I lifted my hat and made a little pirouette to greet everyone. I could do no wrong. And my insides were lubricated to perfection, every movement rippled through my body, soon I was lying on the sofa and lifting first one shoulder, then the other, tensing my calf muscles, knees, abs, biceps, and it was as if I were both floating in the sea and the waves therein.

I woke up to someone knocking on the door. Outside, it was pitch black. I looked at my watch. It was half past five. I sat up, rubbed my hands over my face several times. There was another knock. The smell of hashish still hung in the air. I considered not answering, but when the third bout of knocking started I thought the person knocking must be sure I was here, I let some air in through a window, closed the sitting-room door behind me, went to the hall and opened up.

A man in his forties was standing outside. He was the father of one of my pupils although offhand I couldn't say which. I had a faint rushing sound in my ears.

"Hello," I said.

"Hello," he said. "I'm Jo's father. I wanted to have a little talk with you. It's nothing serious, but I'd like to speak about Jo. It's been on my mind for a while to drop by, but it hasn't been convenient until now. Is this a good time for you? I know this is not exactly school hours but . . ." He laughed.

"No problem at all," I said. "Come in. Would you like some coffee?"

"Please, if it's on. But don't make any especially for me."

He walked past me into the kitchen.

"I was just about to make some," I said. "I've been having a nap. It's been a long week."

He sat down at the kitchen table. Hadn't taken off either his jacket or his boots. I filled the coffee pot with water.

It was always women who took care of everything to do with children and school. They were the ones who went to parents' evenings, they were the ones who signed the slips children took home, they were the ones who did volunteer work and made sure school trips and such things were paid for.

I switched on the stove and sat down opposite him at the table.

"Yes, our Jo," he said. "He's not happy at school at the moment."

"Oh?" I said.

"No, he isn't. He says he doesn't want to go to school anymore, he wants to stay at home. Sometimes he cries. If I ask him why, he won't tell me. Or else he says it's nothing. But we can see there's something wrong. He really doesn't want to go. Well, he is . . . he always got along fine before, when he was younger. He liked school then. But now . . . no . . ."

He looked at me.

"I've come to you . . . I know you aren't his homeroom teacher . . . perhaps it would have made more sense to go and see her . . . but he talks very warmly about you. He likes you so much. It's Karl Ove said this and Karl Ove did that all the time. And so I thought I could talk to you about this. After all you know him."

I was so upset when he said that, I hadn't been so touched for many years. The trust he showed in me I had already betrayed. Not through anything I had done, but through what I had thought. Now, with him sitting opposite me, his face grave and tormented, it was obvious he loved his son, that for him Jo was unique and precious. I realized that what for me had been a minor matter, a maladjusted boy who cried over nothing, for him was major, it filled his life, indeed it was his life, everything he had.

My guilt burned in me like a forest fire.

I would have to make amends. I would have to make amends now, to the father, who fortunately, oh how fortunately, had no idea what I had been thinking. And then I would have to make amends to Jo. As soon as I saw him I would do that.

"Well," I said. "He's a fine boy."

"Have you noticed anything at school? Have there been any incidents?"

"No, nothing specific. But I've noticed he doesn't fit in. And that sometimes the others don't want him along, or they make fun of him. Nothing serious though, if you know what I mean. That is, no violence or systematic bullying. I haven't seen anything like that. I don't think it happens either."

"No," he said, rubbing his chin as he looked at me.

"But he's a . . . well, chubby kid. Other kids tell him that. And maybe he's not as good at ball games as some of the others. So he avoids them. And that means he's sometimes left to his own devices. He goes around on his own."

"Yes."

"I don't know what we should do," I said. "But it's a small school. We're not talking about a lot of pupils. Everything's quite open. Everyone knows everyone else inside out. So if he was being bullied it would be easy to do something about it. I mean, these are not children we don't know, big gangs or anything like that. This is Stig, Reidar, Endre. Do you understand what I'm trying to say? It shouldn't be impossible to talk to them about it."

"No," he said.

Oh, he did trust me, he was thinking through what I had said, and it hurt, it hurt him, he was a father in his forties, I was a boy of eighteen, so should he listen to me?

"It's all fine in the classroom," I went on. "There may be a comment now and then, but there is about everyone, more or less, and if anything more serious crops up, of course it's dealt with at once, so what we're really talking about is the breaks. Maybe we can try to set up some activities he likes and can do, and get others to join in? I can talk to Hege about it, and then we can draw up a little plan. It might be as simple as talking to the other boys and explaining the situation to them. I don't think they know how he feels."

"I think they do," he said. "I think they know all too well. They never come back to play with him anymore, and they exclude him from their games."

"OK," I said. "But I don't have the impression there's anything malicious in it or that it means much to them. It's more that it's just happened that way."

"Won't it get worse if you talk to them about it?"

"It's a risk we have to take. It has to be handled sensitively. And they're good kids, all of them. I think it'll be fine."

"Do you think so?" he asked.

I nodded.

"I'll have a word with Hege on Monday. Then we'll put together a plan of action."

He got up. "Then I won't take up any more of your time."

"It's not a problem," I said.

"Thank you very much!" he said, and shook my hand.

"Everything will be fine," I said.

After he had gone I flopped down on the sofa. The sitting room was freezing cold, the window was still open. Noises filtered in from outside and filled the room, which in the atmospheric conditions became distorted, everything seemed to be close. It sounded as if the waves on the shore were beating against the house wall. Footsteps on the road, the crunch of the snow, seemed to come from out of thin air, as though a ghost were walking past, on its way to the sea. A car passed, the drone of the engine rebounded off the wall I was lying next to. Someone laughed somewhere, how eerie, I thought, the devils are out tonight. The state of disquiet Jo's father had produced in me, the chasm between his trust and my betrayal, was like an ache in my chest. I got up, put on a record, the one I had been playing most of that year, Lloyd Cole and the Commotions' latest, which I sensed would always remind me of the moods up here, lit a cigarette, closed the window, pressed my forehead against the chilly glass. After a while I went into the little study adjoining the sitting room, full of piles of books and papers, switched on the light, and sat down at the desk.

The second I laid eyes on the sheet in the typewriter I saw someone had written something on it. I went cold. The first half of the page was mine, and then came five lines that weren't. I read them.

> Gabriel stuck his fingers up her wet cunt. Oh my God, Lisa groaned. Gabriel took his fingers out and smelled them. Cunt, he thought. Lisa was squirming underneath him. Gabriel knocked back a slug of vodka. Then he grinned and unzipped his fly and stuffed his hard dick up her wrinkly cunt. She screamed with delight. Gabriel, that's my boy!

Shaken to the core, close to tears, I sat there staring at the five lines. It was a well-observed parody of the way I wrote. A good imitation. I knew who had done it, it was Tor Einar, and I recognized the spirit in which it had been done, the spirit of the good-natured joke, he'd "had a good laugh" while he was doing it, read it aloud to Nils Erik, who had laughed his Østland laugh.

It wasn't meant nastily, but I couldn't forgive them for this. I wanted nothing more to do with them, didn't want to speak to them beyond what was absolutely necessary: work and practical arrangements.

I tore the sheet out of the typewriter, crumpled it up and threw it on the floor. Then I got dressed and went out into the night. No point going to the village, along the illuminated road, I would be seen and might have to talk to people. Instead I followed the dead-end road after the bend, it ran along the gentle mountainside, it was dotted with houses. At the end there was a huge pile of snow. Behind it there was nothing, just snow, low trees, and a rock face that after about fifty meters rose sharply in the darkness. The snow reached to above my knees, it was futile going any farther, so I turned and waded through the snow down to the sea, stood gazing at the black water and the waves that rolled into the shore again and again, without much power, they were more like thoughtless little slaps.

Fuck.

It wasn't just a text he had tampered with, that wouldn't have offended me in the slightest, it was something else, much more than that, there was a soul in it, my soul. And when he tampered with that, I could feel it. It looked different from the outside than from the inside, and it was perhaps that which lay at the heart of my despair. What I wrote was worthless. So that meant I was worthless too.

I retraced my steps. At the crossroads I stood not knowing what to do. I could walk five hundred meters along one road, ending up at the school, or five hundred meters along the other, also ending up at the school. There were no other options. The shop was closed, the snack bar was closed, and if anyone was drinking somewhere, I didn't know about it. There was no one I knew well enough to drop in on. The sole exceptions were Nils Erik and Tor Einar, whom I no longer wanted anything to do with, and Hege, whom I didn't feel like visiting now, and nor could I, as her husband, who was always exceptionally open toward me but evidently also had a heart darkened with jealousy, was at home. Sitting at home reading and playing records wasn't an option either, I saw, a light had come on in the sitting room, which meant that Nils Erik was there.

I couldn't stay standing under the lamppost much longer either, someone somewhere would be watching me and wondering what I was doing.

Slowly I moved off. On reaching the house I warily opened the door, carefully removed my coat, and was about to creep upstairs as quietly as I could when the hall door opened and Nils Erik stood looking at me.

"Hi!" he said. "We got mølje at Tor Einar's grandmother's. Shame you weren't with us! It's something of a delicacy – cod with liver and roe and onions!"

"I'm going to bed," I said, avoiding his eyes. "Goodnight."

"Already?" he said.

I didn't answer, opened the door to my room, slipped in, and lay on the mattress in the dark, fully clothed. Staring at the ceiling. Heard Nils Erik washing up in the kitchen. He had the radio on. Now and then his humming, which I couldn't hear, but after two months of living in the house with him I knew he was humming, developed slowly into loud, hearty singing. A car with its stereo on full blast drove by. The throb of the drums became fainter and fainter as it went up the hill and followed the road to the other end, then the drums grew louder until they were again pounding outside the wall next to which I was lying.

I looked at my watch. It was a few minutes to eight.

What the hell should I do?

All the roads out of here were closed.

I was stuck.

For an hour I lay there in the darkness without moving. Then I swallowed my pride and went downstairs to the sitting room, where Nils Erik was reading.

"Didn't you have a bottle of red wine?" I said.

"Yes," he said, looking up. "Why?"

"Can I have it?" I said. "I'll buy you a bottle in the week."

"Yes, no problem," he said. "Are you going out or what?"

I shook my head, fetched the bottle, opened it, and went back up to my room. And glimpsed happiness as I started to drink. They had betrayed me, I was despondent, yes, there was black depression inside me, but I was alone and drinking, I was a writer.

They couldn't say that. They were nothing.

I finished off the bottle in ten minutes. My mind befuddled, as though mist had seeped into my skull, I went downstairs, ignored Nils Erik, opened the door to my study, locked it behind me, switched on the typewriter, sat down at the desk, and got started. A few minutes later it was as if my stomach was being torn apart. I launched myself at the door, but of course it was locked, vomit was pressing up my throat, I cast around, a box, a bucket, a corner, anything, found nothing though, my mouth opened and a cascade of purple spew arced and fell into the room.

I collapsed, my stomach churned, another torrent of wine and sausage was expelled, I groaned, my stomach churned again, but now there was nothing left, only the pain as it writhed and twisted and some thick mucus that I coughed up.

Oooh.

I sat on the floor for several minutes enjoying the peace that had descended on my innards. I didn't care that my books and papers were covered with vomit.

There was a knock at the door. The handle went up and down a few times.

"What are you doing in there?" Nils Erik said.

"Nothing much," I said.

"What did you say? Are you ill? Do you need help?"

"Not from you anyway, you idiot."

"What was that?"

"NOTHING! THERE'S NOTHING WRONG!"

"OK, OK."

I could imagine him holding up his palms to the locked door, then going back to the sofa. The stench of puke had filled the room, and for a moment I speculated on why the smell of your inner juices should be repugnant while that of your excrement was not. Could it have something to do with some kind of Neanderthal custom, shitting in the forest to mark your territory, whereas vomit had no such function to fulfill, it was no more than a reflex action to dispose of tainted food and therefore had to stink?

I staggered to my feet, opened the window and fastened it with the clasp. I couldn't bring myself to clean up the vomit, that would have to wait until the following day, I thought, unlocked the door and went to the hall without so much as a glance at Nils Erik, up the stairs and into my room, where I undressed, crept under the duvet, and slept like a log.

I stayed away from them all the next day, and the day after that too, but then I relented, they were going to the school in the evening for a swim, I joined them, not overjoyed, though not furious either. I didn't say much as we swam up and down, and I let them go into the sauna first, left them on their own, before I climbed out of the pool and stood by the door to try to catch what they were saying. I knew they were talking about me, and I knew they were laughing at me. That was obvious, they spent a lot of time together, and they ridiculed what I did and invested so much energy in.

But inside it was silent, so eventually I opened the door and joined them, sat in the corner at the top, supported my back against the wall, looked down at their two white bodies, which glistened with sweat, Nils Erik bent forward, Tor Einar was resting against the bench behind. Nils Erik's face was always in motion, either he was talking, smiling, laughing, or making faces, but now it was completely still, and it appeared wooden, as though he really was Pinocchio, a carved stump of wood into which a magician had breathed life.

He must have noticed I was staring at him because he smiled and turned toward me.

"I saw something today that might interest you, Karl Ove. There was an ad in Dagbladet for some kind of writing school. In Bergen."

"Oh yeah," I said in as bored a tone as I could manage. Surely he didn't believe I would fall for such an obvious gesture of appeasement?

At school it was decided that I should have the two school-weary disruptive ninth graders, Stian and Ivar, a few times a week. I was to teach them to play an instrument, we borrowed some equipment from the band in the village, Autopilot, so every Tuesday we trudged up to the community center, switched on the amps, and went through the few songs I knew, instrument by instrument. Ivar played bass, he was absolutely hopeless, but I told him to play the same note while watching me, then when I nodded he should change to a sequence he had been practicing. Stian played the drums, he was better but wouldn't listen to instructions, he was too proud for that, while I played the guitar. We could play three songs: "Smoke on the Water," "Paranoid," and "Black Magic Woman." I was used to playing them as instrumentals, I had done that with Jan Vidar, it was second nature to me, a voice on top of this jangling, inept, talentless performance would only sink it further. We stood on the stage and played with the whole of the spacious but empty community center before us. Stian and Ivar did as much posing with their instruments as playing. Toward the end of one lesson a fourth grader opened the door and stood watching us, wide eyed. Stian and Ivar tried to conceal the pride they felt by spitting and pretending this was no big deal for them.

At a planning meeting some days later Eva went berserk. We had been given permission to use equipment belonging to the band her son played in, but we had treated it carelessly, a string had been broken and not replaced, a drumstick had snapped and not been replaced, the band had had enough, she said, and moved without pause on to the next item on the agenda, which was the seventh grade's attitude to work, you couldn't talk to them anymore, they didn't listen to her, they informed her Karl Ove had said something very different, and when she told me to reprimand them I said I would, but I never did, at least not as far as she could see.

I said I didn't have any discipline problems in my lessons, but I would take the matter up with them. She said this was precisely the problem, I would "take it up with them" but I didn't treat the matter seriously, and they noticed. There had never been any problems with the seventh grade before, they had always been hardworking and bright, now they were smart-alecky and lazy.

"Not in my lessons," I said, looking at her.

She was so angry her head was trembling.

Richard intervened, he said both of us were right, but I needed to make it abundantly clear to them that this behavior would not be tolerated and there would be consequences for them if it continued. OK, I said, I'll do that. When the meeting was over and I was in the hall putting on my coat, Eva said Grete was wondering what had happened to the bed linen they had lent me in August, did I perhaps imagine I had been given it in perpetuity?

Oh, for Christ's sake, was she never going to let up?

"Not at all," I said. "It's not gone anywhere. I can return it tomorrow. It's not a problem."

People were so preoccupied with trivialities, they kept searching until they found something and then they went for the jugular instead of keeping sight of the bigger picture, here we all are, humans on one earth, we're only here for the short term, in the midst of all this wondrous creation, grass and trees, badgers and cats, fish and sea, beneath a star-strewn sky, and you get worked up over a broken guitar string? A snapped drumstick? Some silly bed linen that hasn't been returned? Come on, what's the matter with all of you?

The broken drumstick was the height of pettiness for me. So this was what we were going to discuss, not the results I had achieved with Stian and Ivar?

Why choose the little picture when the bigger one existed?

I hated the little picture, and I wasn't much good at dealing with trivialities, I had to confess. The installments on the stereo had been passed on to a debt-recovery firm, and the case of the dinner suit I had rented a year before and had not returned because it was ruined – a rocket had torn the trouser leg to ribbons – had gone to court, I had been ordered to pay for it and in addition there had been a hefty fine for not appearing in court! A fine for not appearing! What did they imagine? That I would hop on a plane to Southern Norway for the sake of a dinner suit?

But that was how it was, everyday life with its endless round of petty demands and obligations, petty conversations and arrangements, surrounded us like a fence. I lived this life, but not when I was drinking, then it was all open spaces and grand gestures, and even though the price was high, the fear afterward great, I always paid, and only a day or two later again I would feel the itch to cast myself out into it, and to hell with what people said.

One night when I had been out drinking at a community center at the other end of the island, Nils Erik was sitting up at home waiting for me.

"You've got an enemy," he said.

"Oh yeah?" I said from the doorway, drunk and weary.

"I went to bed after you left. Then I was woken up by someone sitting on my bed. It was Vidar. He wanted to know where you were. He had a gun in his lap."

"You're joking!" I said. "Don't fuck with me."

"It's true. If I were you, I'd lock the door. And then I'd get hold of Hege and tell her."

"But there's never been anything between us!"

"He doesn't know that. She's here two nights a week, minimum. That's a lot of time to spend with someone."

"But for God's sake I'm not even the slightest bit interested!"

"This is serious. He had a gun. I'm not kidding."

I wasn't frightened until the day after. I could bump into him at any moment, that was how it felt. That night I locked the door. And the following morning the first thing I did was visit Hege to tell her what had happened.

"He lost it," she said. "He won't do it again. Were you scared?"

"Me? No. I wasn't even there. But Nils Erik was."

"It's just nonsense really. He would never have used it, you know. He just wanted to frighten the living shit out of you."

"For what? For talking to you?"

She nodded.

I was already looking forward to describing what had happened in the letters I wrote. It was as crazy as it was flattering; I lived in a place where people broke in brandishing a gun, and I was important enough for it to be me the madman was after.

For the next few days I was nervous, not perhaps of being shot at, it was unpleasant enough imagining that he would probably beat me up if he got half a chance.

Did he really have a gun?

That is what I remember. But could it have been true?

Unlikely things happened in the north, things that only a year earlier would have seemed deeply alien, perhaps even impossible, and only a year later had that same deeply alien, impossible quality although they seemed absolutely normal, a matter of course, when I lived there.

Nils Erik, who had brought back his diving equipment from home at Christmas and in the spring would go down to the harbor wearing a wetsuit, put on a mask, flippers, and an oxygen cylinder, sit on the edge holding a harpoon, and slip down into the transparent water, a shimmering figure who became fainter and fainter until he disappeared, only to reappear ten minutes later with a fish speared on the harpoon, which he cooked for dinner.

Did that happen?

Did he have any diving equipment?

Did he harpoon fish for dinner after school?

I have never been back, but I do sometimes have nightmares about it, really terrible nightmares that consist of me driving into the village again after all these years, nothing else. That is obviously bad enough.

Why?

Did terrible things happen there? Did I do something I shouldn't have done? Something awful? I mean beyond staggering around drunk and out of control at night?

I once wrote a novel that took place there. I wrote it without a second thought. I paid no regard to the relationship between fiction and reality, for a world opened up when I wrote, it meant everything to me for a while, and it consisted partly of descriptions of real buildings and people, for the school in the book is the school as it was when I worked there, and partly of fictional ones, and it was only when the novel had been written and published that I began to wonder how it would be received up there in the north, by those who knew the world I described and who could see what was reality and what wasn't. I used to lie awake at night in fear. The story had not been plucked out of the air. On the contrary, it had been in the air. I worked as a teacher for a year in the north, and when occasionally I was able to relish the thought of going to work in the morning, it was because she was there.

She: Andrea.

A gaze, a hand cupping her forehead, a little foot bobbing up and down, a child who was a woman who was a child who I liked to be in the same room with so much.

That was how it was during the months where day was night, and that was how it was when the light unveiled the room in the mornings, at first cold and shimmery, then, slowly and imperceptibly, full of warmth. The snow on the road disappeared, the enormous piles of snow dwindled, patches of shale began to peep through on the soccer field, and from all the roofs and raised surfaces water dripped and gurgled.

It was as though the light rose in the people living there too. Everywhere there was a mood of gaiety and expectation.

In one class, Andrea and Vivian presented me with a diploma. They had chosen me as the school's sexiest teacher.

I hung the diploma on the classroom wall and said that the competition might not have been that fierce.

They laughed.

A few days later, with the sun shining from the middle of the endlessly blue sky, I told them to go outside and write down what they saw. They could go wherever they wanted, write whatever they wanted, the sole conditions I set were that they should write down what they saw and it had to be at least two pages.

Some went down to the shop, others sat against the wall outside the school in the sun. I went behind the school building and smoked a cigarette, gazed across the soccer field, which was now almost completely free of snow, and at the glittering fjord beyond. Made the rounds of the pupils and asked how it was going. They squinted up at me.

"It's going fine," Andrea said.

"Here comes Karl Ove," Vivian said slowly, to show me that this was what she was writing as her pen moved across the page of her notebook. "He's really sexy."

Andrea looked away when she said that.

"That's what Andrea thinks anyway!" Vivian said.

"Don't be so stupid," Andrea said.

Both looked up at me and smiled. They had tied their jackets around their waists and were sitting there in T-shirts with their arms bare.

I was overcome by the same feelings that had filled me in the spring I was in the seventh grade myself. When we ran after girls, held them tight, pulled up their T-shirts and fondled their breasts. The girls had screamed but never loud enough for a teacher to hear.

I was overcome by the same feelings, but everything else was different: I wasn't thirteen, I was eighteen and not their classmate but their teacher.

They couldn't see my feelings. They couldn't know anything about what stirred inside me. I was their young teacher, and I smiled at them.

"I'm going to read out what you've written in the class," I said. "So you might want to choose your material with a little more prudence?"

"Prudence?" Vivian said. "What does that mean?"

"Look it up when you get inside," I said.

"That's just like you," Andrea said. "We always have to look words up. Look it up, look it up! Can't you just tell us?"

"He doesn't know himself," Vivian said.

"Five more minutes," I said. "Then you have to go back inside."

I walked toward the entrance, heard them laughing behind me, I felt such warmth for them, not only for them though, for all the pupils and all the people in the village, in fact, for everyone in the world.

It was that kind of day.

Eleven years later I was sitting in the study of our first flat in Bergen answering e-mails when the phone rang.

"Hello, Karl Ove speaking," I said.

"Hi, this is Vivian."

"Vivian?"

The moment she said her name everything went cold and black inside me.

"Yes. Don't you remember me? You were our teacher."

There wasn't a hint of accusation in her voice. I rubbed my hand, which was clammy, on my thigh.

"Of course I remember you!" I said. "How are things?"

"Wonderful! I'm here with Andrea. We read about you in the paper, and then we saw you were going to give a reading in Tromsø. And so we thought perhaps we could see you."

"Of course," I said. "That would be nice."

"We've read your book. It was great!"

"Do you think so?"

"Yes! Andrea does too."

To avoid going into detail about what was actually in the book, to nip that discussion in the bud, I asked what they were doing now.

"I'm working at the fish-processing factory. No big surprise there. And Andrea's studying in Tromsø."

"Good," I said. "It'll be fun to meet you again. Should we arrange a time and place now?"

She suggested a café close to where I was going to read, some hours before. I said OK, see you then, and we hung up. A few weeks later I opened the café door and saw them sitting at the back of the room, they laughed when they spotted me, said I hadn't changed at all. But you have, I said, and indeed they had, for although their faces were the same, and the way they behaved, they were adults now, and the zone of ambivalence they had lived in then was completely gone. The woman in them held undisputed sway now.

I took off my coat, went over to the counter, and ordered a coffee. I was nervous, they had both read the novel and would probably have recognized themselves in it. I decided to take the bull by the horns. Sat down, lit a cigarette, so you've read the novel, I said. Yes, they both replied, and nodded. It's not you I was writing about, you know, although I'm sure there are similarities, I said. Enormous similarities, Andrea added. But don't worry about it, it's just funny, that's all.

They told me about everything that had happened in the village since I was there, and it was not so little. The biggest sensation was a sex scandal at the school, which had led to a conviction and prison, and the village had been split into two camps. Otherwise lots of the same teachers were still at the school. Vivian often met the people she had known then, as well as the fishermen who had been my age at the time, of course. Andrea lived in Tromsø, where she was a student, and went home during the holidays and for the odd weekend.

I treated them as if they were still thirteen years old, the mold was already set, I couldn't change that, and when I left an hour later it struck me how stupid that was, especially with regard to Andrea.

They went and listened to the reading and subsequent discussion, came over when it was finished and said their good-byes, I left with Tore, whom I had done my reading with, and a couple of others, and drank all evening. Later that night I saw Andrea again, she was standing with a guy in a taxi queue, he was behind her and she stretched her hands back while he kissed her neck and then stroked her breasts. An almost desperate feeling of failure came over me then, I crossed the street, she didn't see me or pretended she hadn't seen me, and I thought, I could be with her now if I had played my cards right. But I was married, and I wasn't playing a game, so I never got further than the thought, which pursued me across the ensuing months and years: I should at least have tried to get her out of my mind.

Two weeks after Vidar had sat down on the edge of Nils Erik's bed and asked where I was, I went south for the Easter holiday.

Mom, who was standing on the quay in Lavik when I arrived, seemed tired, she had worked a lot that year and when she wasn't working was looking after her parents in Sørbøvåg.

During the day we chatted, she did all the cooking and I lay on the sofa reading or walked down to the mall in Førde to do the shopping, in the evening we watched TV.

She told me that Jon Olav was also home, I called him, we arranged to meet in Førde the next night. He had grown up in Dale, an hour's drive away, and the disco where we went was full of people he knew.

I drank beer and talked to him, and away from the reservation, which was how I had come to consider Håfjord, everything felt much simpler and easier. I said I was thinking of applying for a writing course at the Skrivekunstakademi in Hordaland. He had never heard of it even though it was in Bergen, the town where he was studying. But it was a new course, this year's intake was the first.

"Who are the teachers?" he said.

"I've never heard of them. I think they're some obscure Vestland writers. Ragnar Hovland, Jon Fosse, and Rolf Sagen. You heard of them?"

Jon Olav shook his head.

"It's sort of too bad that it's such a local affair," I said. "But it's one year and you can get a study loan. So at least I'd be able to write full time."

"In your last letter you were going to Goldsmiths in London," he said.

I nodded. "I'll apply there too. Yngve got me the address, and I've just written off for application forms."

Jon Olav was scanning the back of the disco, which was packed, it was the first day it had been open since the weekend.

"I'll just be a minute," he said.

"I'm not going anywhere," I said.

Oh, the pleasure of being in a place where no one knew me!

Felt the alcohol going to my head. Smoked a few cigarettes, eyed up some of the girls, relaxed completely for a change.

When he came back an hour later I was sitting on the same stool, in the same posture even, elbow on the bar, chin resting on my hand.

"I met some gymnas friends," he said. "We're over there. Come and join us."

I slid off the stool and followed him. He stopped by a table at the other end of the room, near the exit.

"This is my cousin, Karl Ove," he said.

Those sitting round the table looked at me without interest and nodded.

In the midst of them was a girl. She was talking to someone on the opposite side of the table and didn't see me. She laughed and leaned forward with both palms on the table. Her skin was pale, her dark bangs hung over her eyes, but that wasn't what made me stare at her, it was her eyes, they were blue and at first joyous, only to turn serious and gentle the next second.

There was something French about her, I thought, slipping down onto the chair next to Jon Olav. Her features were beautiful, but it was only when she laughed again that a shiver ran through me.

She had an aura around her.

"Do you want a beer?" Jon Olav said. "They're closing soon."

Two minutes earlier I would have been glad they were closing soon, now the thought made me desperate in the same senseless way that I was sad whenever anyone left a drinks party, as though with every person who left I came a step closer to death or some other calamity.

"I'll come with you," I said, and followed him to the bar.

"I can carry two beers," Jon Olav said.

"Who's she?" I said.

"Who?"

"The girl at the table."

Jon Olav turned. Hadn't he even noticed there was a girl sitting at our table?

"Oh her," he said. "That's Ingvild."

"Do you know her well?"

"No, hardly at all. She lives in Kaupanger. But I know her boyfriend. Tord. Sleeping in the chair over there. Can you see him?"

Typical.

As though I could have had a chance if she hadn't been with him.

I was on vacation, at my mother's, leaving in two days, what was I dreaming of? One look at a beautiful stranger, was that supposed to be the future? Me and her, yes?

Why?

She had an aura around her.

I drank half the glass at the bar while Jon Olav was paying, then I ordered another and took both glasses with me to the table.

Four of Jon Olav's friends at the table got up and left immediately afterward. They had come in the same car and were going home, I gathered.

Around the table now were only Jon Olav, someone he was talking to, Ingvild, and me. As well as her boyfriend, that is, but he was asleep and so didn't count.

I took a couple of long swigs.

She was staring over her shoulder.

"Do you want this beer?" I said when she finally turned her eyes back to the table. "It's untouched. I haven't had a sip."

"If anything was likely to make me suspicious it would be a total stranger offering me a beer he's had standing in front of him for a while. But you look harmless enough."

She spoke in the Sogne dialect, and her eyes narrowed when she smiled.

"I am," I said.

"But no thanks. I have to drive."

She motioned toward the guy sleeping at the table.

"I have to drive him home among other things."

"I'm a good driver," I said. "I can give you a few tips if you like."

"Oh please! I'm a terrible driver."

"First of all, it's important to drive fast," I said.

"Oh yeah?"

"There are those who claim it's best to drive slowly, but I think they're mistaken. It's better to drive fast."

"OK, fast. Anything else?"

"Well, let me see . . . Yep, I was driving along the road once. The car in front of me was going slowly. I think it's important to drive fast, so I simply overtook him. It was on a bend, I crossed into the opposite lane, stamped my foot down on the accelerator, and then I was past him."

"Yes?"

"That was all. I just carried on."

"You don't have a license, do you?"

"No. I really admire those who do. Actually it's incredible that I dare talk to you. Usually I would have just sat staring at the table. But I've had a bit to drink and I love talking about driving. The theory, that is. I think a lot about how best to change gear to get the smoothest drive, for example. The whole interaction between clutch and gear and accelerator and brakes. But not everyone likes to talk about it."

I looked at her. "Does your boyfriend have a license?"

"How do you know he's my boyfriend?"

"He who?"

"He on the chair."

"Is he your boyfriend?"

She laughed. "Yes, he is. And he has a license."

"That's what I thought," I said. "Was it driving cars that brought you together?"

She shook her head.

"But tonight it seems to be forcing us apart. I could have done with a few beers as well. Especially if he's asleep. He might have had the decency to fall asleep without drinking. Then I could have had one."

She looked at me.

"Are you interested in anything else apart from driving cars?"

"No," I said, and took a swig of beer. "What are you interested in?"

"Politics," she said. "I'm passionately interested in politics."

"What kind? Local politics? Foreign affairs?"

"Just politics. Politics in general."

"Are you flirting with my cousin while your boyfriend is asleep?" Jon Olav said.

"I'm not flirting," she said. "We're talking about politics. And then perhaps we'll end up talking about emotions, if I know me."

"I'm sure you do," I said.

"I have an abysmal emotional life. What about you?"

"It's not great, actually. Yes, if I'm honest. I never usually talk about it. But there's something about you that gives me the courage."

"Ironic girls tend to have that effect. That's my experience. Eventually people get so sick of irony they'll do anything to stop it. Since I started being ironic I've been told quite a few intimate details."

The music in the room was switched off.

Jon Olav turned to me.

"Shall we go?"

"OK," I said, and looked at her as I got up. "Drive home fast!"

"I'll drive like a bat out of hell," she said.

When I woke up the next morning she was on my mind. Jon Olav, who had slept at our place, went home to Dale in the morning. He was the only connection I had with her, and before he left I made him promise to send me her address when he got home, even though something told me he would only do so with a heavy heart, after all she was going out with someone he knew.

It felt completely meaningless going back to Håfjord, but on the other hand there were only three more months until it finished for good and I could spend the entire rest of my life in familiar surroundings, if that was what I wanted.

The letter from Jon Olav lay in my postbox a few days after I returned. She lived in Kaupanger, he wrote, and was in her final year at gymnas in Sogndal.

Kaupanger, I thought, that must be a fantastic place.

I spent more than a week on the letter to her. She knew nothing about me, had no idea what my name was, and had no doubt forgotten me the moment she left the disco that night. So I didn't immediately reveal my identity, I touched on driving a couple of times so that she could, if she remembered, figure out who I was. I didn't give an address; if she wanted to answer the letter she would have to make an effort to get hold of it, and in that way, I thought, I would have a deeper impact on her consciousness.

That same week I prepared my application for the writing course at the akademi in Bergen. They wanted twenty pages of prose or poetry and I enclosed the first twenty pages of my novel in the envelope, wrote a short letter of introduction, and sent it off.

Now the mornings were light when I woke and went downstairs for a shower and breakfast, outside the house, gulls were screaming, and if we opened the kitchen window, we could also hear the waves lapping and gurgling over the pebbles beneath. At school the younger children were running around in sweaters and sneakers during the breaks, the older ones sat on the ground leaning back against the wall with their faces to the sun. Everything that had happened in the darkness, when life had closed itself around me and even the tiniest details had become charged with tension and destiny, seemed incredible now, for out in the open, beneath this slow deluge of light, I saw it as it was.

How was it?

It was nothing special. It was how it was.

Oh, I still cast glances at Liv when I had the opportunity and could do so unobserved, and in English classes a shiver could still go through me when I saw Camilla's shapely body sitting there, but the mounds and curves, all the softness and grace they possessed, no longer had a disorientating effect, I was no longer fascinated. I saw, and I liked what I saw, but it wasn't part of me. With Andrea it was different, she was special, but if I was happy when she looked up at me from the corner of her eyes in the way she did, I didn't let it show, no one could see what I felt, not even her.

What was it I felt?

Well, it was nothing. A tenderness, that was all, something light and sparkling that whistled past and was gone, it had no right to exist.

One day a letter from Kaupanger arrived.

I couldn't read it standing in the post office or sitting at home or lying in bed, the conditions had to be perfect, so I put it aside, ate with Nils Erik, had a smoke, drank a cup of coffee, then I took the letter with me to the beach, sat on a rock, and opened it.

A strong smell of salt and decay rose from around me. The air was still and warmed by the sun, but every so often a gust swept in from the fjord taking everything with it, which then had to be painstakingly built up again. The mountaintops on the other side of the fjord were still white, but if I turned and looked toward the village, there was a faint green glimmer on the ground, and although all the low trees and bushes were still leafless, they didn't appear to be dead, as in winter, they stood as though they could sense life was on its way back.

I opened the letter and began to read.

She wrote nothing about herself. Nonetheless she began to take shape within me, I could sense who she was, this is different, I thought. This is quite, quite different.

When I folded the letter and replaced it in the envelope it was as though I was a new person. I walked slowly back to the house. She had an aura around her, and every sentence, no matter how tentative and probing, was testimony to that.

I considered getting on a bus the next morning, catching the boat to Tromsø, flying to Bergen, taking the boat to Sogndal, and then simply standing in front of her and declaring that the two of us belonged together.

I couldn't of course, that would have ruined everything, but that was what I wanted to do.

Instead I sat down and wrote another letter. Any hint of emotion or openness was stifled at birth, this was going to be an eloquent, calculating letter that would press all the buttons I had at my disposal, make her laugh, make her reflect, arouse a desire in her to want to know me.

Writing was, after all, something I could do.

On May 17 I stayed home reading the whole day. There was an expectation that teachers would take part in the Constitution Day procession and the subsequent activities, but it was not compulsory, so when the meager procession passed by on the road outside I was sitting on the sofa and watched it through the window, heard the pathetic flutes and the scattered cheers, lay back and continued reading The Lord of the Rings, which I had read only two years before but had already completely forgotten. I couldn't get enough of the battle between light and darkness, good and evil, and when the little man not only resisted the superior powers but also showed himself to be the greatest hero of them all, there were tears in my eyes. Oh, how good it was. I had a shower, put on a white shirt and black trousers, tossed a bottle of vodka into a bag, and walked up to Henning's, where there was a whole gang of people drinking. There was a party on Fugleøya, we drove there a few hours later, one minute I was standing in the parking lot talking, the next I was on the dance floor rubbing up against someone or other, or up on an embankment fighting with Hugo, trying to prove that I wasn't the weakling everyone took me for. He laughed and threw me to the ground, I jumped up and he threw me to the ground again. He was much smaller than me, so it was humiliating, I ran after him and said he wouldn't be able to do it again, but he'd had enough and came over, wrapped his arms around me and threw me to the ground with such force that he knocked the air out of my lungs. And that was how they left me, gasping for air like a fish. I took the nearly empty vodka bottle with me and sat on a little mound beside the parking lot. The light hovered above the countryside. There was something sickly about it, it seemed to me, and I don't remember anything until I was trying to prize open a door surrounded by young fishermen, I must have told them I had some experience in such matters, presumably I had given the impression that a locked door was no problem for me, I could do a bit of everything, had done a bit of everything, but now, trying all the keys I had found in the drawer downstairs, and then a screwdriver and various other tools, it began to dawn on them that we were not going to get into the locked studio in the house Nils Erik and I were renting, and one after the other they trooped back down to the sitting room, which was already bathed in sunlight.

When I woke up I couldn't remember a thing at first. I didn't know where I was or what time of day it was. Fear pumped through me.

The light outside told me nothing, it could equally well have been morning as night.

But nothing had happened, had it?

Oh yes, it had. I had run after Hugo and had been thrown to the ground time after time.

I had tried to kiss Vibeke when we were dancing and she had turned away.

And the girl standing by the entrance, the one with the sassy expression, I had stopped and exchanged a few words with her, and then I'd kissed her.

How old would she have been?

She had told me. She was in the seventh grade.

Oh God, was that possible?

Please be kind to me.

Oh no, oh no.

I was a teacher, for goodness' sake. What if this got out? Teacher kisses thirteen-year-old at party?

God almighty.

I covered my face with my hands. Heard music downstairs, scrambled out of bed, couldn't stay there being tortured by the awfulness of my deeds. No, I had to be active, move on, talk to someone who would say it didn't matter, that kind of thing happened.

But it didn't.

It happened only to me.

Why did I have to kiss her? It had just been a spontaneous move, something I did on impulse, it meant nothing.

Who would believe that?

As I left my bedroom I had to support myself on the wall, I was still drunk. Downstairs, Nils Erik was at the stove frying fish tongues. He turned when I entered the room. He was wearing a plaid shirt and a pair of those green hiking pants with loads of pockets.

"So you're honoring me with your presence?" he said with a smile.

"I'm still drunk," I said.

"I can believe that," he said.

I sat down at the kitchen table, rested my head on my hands.

"Richard was not best pleased today," he said. He slipped the spatula under the fried tongues and transferred them to a plate, filled the pan with more tongues coated in white flour. They hissed.

"What did you tell him?"

"I said you weren't feeling well."

"Which was true."

"Yes, but he was pretty angry."

"I don't give a shit about him. There's only a month left now. What's he going to do? Give me the boot? Besides, I haven't been ill once all damn year. So it's no big deal."

"A few cod tongues?"

I shook my head and got up.

"Think I'll have a bath."

But it was unbearable lying in hot water staring at the ceiling, it didn't fill me with peace, it just gave all my painful thoughts ample room to spread, so I got out after a few minutes, dried myself, put on my tracksuit, which was the only thing clean I could find, and lay down on the sofa with Felix Krull instead.

For a few minutes at a time I succeeded in engrossing myself totally in the book. Then the dreadful thoughts returned like an electric shock and everything became distorted. Again I had to force myself back into the confidence trickster's world, where I could stay for several minutes until another shock reopened the sores.

Nils Erik came in and put on a record. It was half past five. He stood for a moment gazing across the fjord, then he sat down with a newspaper. His presence helped, what I had done didn't seem so terrible when there was a friendly person in the room.

I read aloud a passage describing Krull's view of the Jews.

"He wasn't so high-minded, this Thomas Mann," I said. "That's pure anti-Semitism!"

Nils Erik looked at me.

"You don't think it's ironic then?"

"Ironic? No, do you?"

"He's famous for being ironic."

"So he doesn't really mean it. Is that what you're saying?"

"Yes."

"I don't think so," I said, because I hated it when Nils Erik thought he knew better than me. Which he often did.

The image of the seventh grader with her tousled hair and sassy expression was clear in my mind's eye again. And my lips closing on hers.

Why had I done it? Oh why, oh why!

"What's up?" Nils Erik said.

"What?" I said.

"You went like this," he said, and raised his head, narrowed his eyes and pinched his lips together hard.

"Nothing in particular," I said. "I was just thinking about something."

But nothing happened. I went to school the next day and no one there said anything about what had happened, everyone behaved as they normally did, even my pupils, who I thought might have heard about it, some of them probably knew her.

But no.

Could it simply pass, just like that?

The only place it existed was in me. And if I let it stay where it was, there was no problem, it would slowly lose its power and in the end vanish, as sooner or later all the other shameful things I had done had vanished.

Toward the end of May a letter from the akademi arrived in my postbox, I tore open the envelope and read it standing outside the post office. I had been accepted. I lit a cigarette and started to walk back toward the school, I would call Mom and tell her, she would be pleased. And then I would call Yngve because it meant I would be moving to Bergen that autumn. In a strange way I had expected to be accepted because although I knew what I had written might not have been that good and consequently they ought to have rejected me, it was me, however, who had done the writing and that, I felt, they would not be able to ignore.

May passed, June began, and it was as though everything was dissolving into light. The sun no longer set, it wandered across the sky all day and night, and I had never seen anything like the light it cast over the wild terrain then. The light was reddish and full, it was as if it belonged to the ground and the mountains, it was them that were glowing, as if after a catastrophe. On a couple of nights Nils Erik and I drove along the deserted coastal roads, and we seemed to be on a different planet, so alien was everything. Through sleeping villages, everywhere the reddish gleam and the strange shadows. The people were transformed too, out at night, couples walking, cars driving past, whole flocks of young people rowing out to the islands for picnics.

I received another letter from Ingvild. She said she had rolled up her trousers to her knees and was sitting with her feet in Sogne Fjord as she was writing. I loved Sogne Fjord, the feeling the surface gave of the enormous depth, the immense chains of mountains with the snowy peaks towering above it. All clear and still, green and cool. Ingvild, who was moving in these surroundings and who affected me in so many ways, wrote more about herself this time. But it wasn't much. The tone approached self-irony, she was in defensive mode. Against what? She wrote that she had been an exchange student in the United States for a year, that was why she was still a senior. So we were the same age, I reflected. She was going back there in the summer for a holiday with her host family, they were going to cross the country in a camper van. She would write more from the States. In the autumn she would be going to Bergen to study.

The last day of school came. I wrote HAVE A GOOD SUMMER! on the board, handed out the report cards to my pupils, wished them luck with the rest of their lives, ate cake with the teachers in the staff room, shook everyone's hand and thanked them for the past year. As I walked downhill on my way home I was, as I had expected, neither happy nor relieved because I had been waiting for this day for more than six months, just empty inside.

In the afternoon Tor Einar stopped by. He had brought with him some gull eggs and a crate of Mack beer.

"It's a scandal you haven't eaten seagull eggs before," he said. "There are two dishes which are the essence of Northern Norway. Mølje and seagull eggs. You can't leave before you have tried them."

Nils Erik had a temperature and was on the sofa, there was no question of him having beer or eggs, so it was left to Tor Einar and me to do them justice.

"Why don't we go down to the beach?" Tor Einar said, eyeing me with that knowing grin of his. "It's such fantastic weather."

"Why not," I said.

I had never quite found the right tone with Tor Einar. We were the same age and had a lot in common, much more than I and Nils Erik had, but it didn't help, it was irrelevant. I always played a role when I was with Tor Einar, which wasn't the case with Nils Erik, and I didn't like myself when I did, when there was a distance between the person I was and what I said, a kind of delay that allowed space for calculations, as if I wanted to say what he preferred to hear rather than what I had to say or talk about.

On the other hand, that is how I was with almost everyone, in fact it had even become like that with Jan Vidar, who was the closest friend I'd had for the past five years.

It wasn't a problem, just a little uncomfortable, and the only consequence was that by and large I tried to avoid being on my own with Tor Einar for any period of time.

Now this wasn't possible. Luckily, though, we had beer with us as we trudged down to the beach, it would only take a couple of bottles before such problems disappeared like chalk beneath a wet sponge.

Under the deep blue sky, beside the water, with the sun playing on it, we both sat down on a rock. Tor Einar opened a beer and passed it to me, opened one for himself, winked and said skål.

"Now we're laughing, eh!" he said. "Last day of school, the sun's shining, and we have enough beer for a long night."

"That's right," I said.

Some fishing boats were chugging shoreward, bobbing up and down on the waves in the middle of the fjord, with a trail of gulls behind them.

What a scene.

"How about if we sum things up," said Tor Einar.

"Regarding the school year?" I said, producing a pouch of tobacco.

"Yes," he said. "Has it fulfilled our expectations?"

"I didn't have any, I don't think," I said. "I just came up here and hoped for the best. But you? Are you happy with how things went?"

He hesitated.

"Every year without a girlfriend is a bad year," he said, squinting into the sunlight. Then he turned to me.

"You had a couple of adventures anyway. Ine and Irene? And that temp on Fugleøya, what was her name? Anne?"

"Yes," I said. "But it didn't work out. Actually nothing worked out."

"Didn't you have them?"

"No."

"Not one of them?"

"No."

He stared at me in disbelief. "And there I was going around thinking at least one of us had some luck this year. Then you tell me you didn't either."

I looked at him and smiled, clinked my bottle against his, drank the last drop, opened another.

"Who did you have your eye on?" I said.

"Tone," he said.

That was the girl who had rejected my approach while she was brushing her teeth.

"Yes, she's nice," I said. "I went after her as well, but she wasn't at all interested."

"No, it's not easy," he said. "But I've got a chance. We're going InterRailing together. Well, not just us two, there will be four others, but, Jesus, a month traveling together through Europe, surely there's got to be a chance."

"You're InterRailing?"

He nodded.

"Me too," I said. "Well, it's not InterRailing. I'm going to hitch down through Europe with a friend after the Roskilde Festival."

"Then I'll do my best to avoid you," he said. "I don't want to warm her up just so that you can take over."

"You must have a very high opinion of my qualities as a seducer," I said. "If there's one thing I can't do, it's that."

"My strategy is to be present," he said. "That's the only chance I have. Amble along behind her like a dog, always be there, and then hope she'll cuddle me sooner or later."

I shuddered. "That's a terrifying image."

"You're right, but it's true."

"That's why it's so terrifying. There's a little of the doggie in me as well."

He stuck out his tongue and panted heavily a few times.

"Anyone else you've been trotting along behind this year?" I said.

"Liv," he said, staring straight at me.

"Liv?" I said.

"Yes," he said. "All the girls our own age have left the village. But she's unbelievably pretty. Don't you think?"

"Yes," I said with a smile. "Have you seen her body? Her backside?"

"Oh yes," he said. "She's gorgeous. Camilla isn't bad either."

"No, that's true," I said. "But at least Liv's sixteen. Camilla's only fifteen."

"Who gives that a second thought?" he said.

"You're right there."

We opened another beer. He smiled, his face was bathed in sunlight.

"Her breasts," he said. "Have you seen them?"

"Naturally," I said. "I've hardly looked at anything else in the classes with them."

"She is pretty. But she can't beat Liv."

"No," I said.

I turned and gazed into the distance. A car was coming up the hill from the fish hall, farther along the road a kid was holding a stick and hitting the poles used to demarcate the edge of the road in deep snow. A seagull was sitting on the ridge of our roof surveying the scene.

"And then there's Andrea," I said.

"Yes," he said.

"She's a real beauty too. Have you seen her?"

"Yes."

"Actually, I've thought a lot about her," I said.

"I can imagine," he said.

"What else could we do?" I said. "They were the only ones around!"

We laughed and said skål.

"She has such incredible eyes," I said. "And what long legs she has."

"It's true. What about Vivian then?"

"Nothing compared to her sister."

"No, that's true. But she has something. A charm of her own."

"Yes."

"What do you think would happen if anyone heard this conversation?" I said.

He shrugged.

"We'd never get a teaching job again. That's for sure."

He laughed and raised his bottle to me.

"A skål for schoolgirls!" he said.

"Skål!" I said.

"What about their mothers then?" he said.

"I've never thought about them."

"Haven't you?"

"Have you?"

"Oh sure, of course I have."

"I think I might have been a little in love with Andrea," I said.

"I had a soft spot for her too," he said. "But I wasn't in love. Liv, on the other hand. She brightened my days."

"Yes," I said. "But it's good it's all over."

"Yes," he said.

The next day I packed my things, taped up the cardboard boxes again, and carried them to Nils Erik's car. He was going to drive me down to the express boat quay in Finnsnes, where I would have them sent to Bergen. Apart from the new stereo, some records, and quite a few books, my belongings were identical to those that had come up the year before.

Once that was done I fried some sausages and potatoes, which I ate with Nils Erik in the kitchen. This was my last meal in the village. Nils Erik would be staying on for a few more weeks, he was planning to spend the time hiking, and except for my bedroom, which I lightly dusted, he would deal with cleaning the house.

"I'll keep the deposit on the bottles as my reward," he said with a smile. "It'll add up."

"OK," I said. "What do you think, should we get going?"

He nodded, and we got into the car. We slowly drew away, said our goodbyes to east and west, and for every meter we covered, part of the village disappeared for good for me, I didn't look back and I would never, under any circumstances, set foot here again.

The chapel disappeared, the post office disappeared, Andrea's house disappeared, Hege and Vidar's house disappeared, and then the shop was gone, and my old flat, and Sture's house. And there went the community center and the soccer field, and then the school . . .

I leaned back in my seat.

"How absolutely wonderful that it's over," I said as the darkness of the tunnel filled the car. "I'll never take a job again in my life, that's for sure."

"So you are a shipowner's son after all?" Nils Erik said.

"Yes," I said.

"Same shipping, new wrapping," he said. "Whack a cassette in, will you?"

After a night in a cheap hotel in Tromsø, I caught a flight for Bergen the next morning, and at three I jumped off the airport bus in Bryggen and headed for the Hotel Orion, where Yngve worked at the receptionist desk. I was wearing black cotton trousers, wide at the thighs, a white shirt, a black suit jacket, black shoes, and a pair of Wayfarer Ray-Bans. Slung over my shoulder was my seaman's kitbag. The sun was shining, the water in Vågen glittered, a gentle wind blew in across the fjord.

I saw myself as a kind of primeval inhabitant going to a city for the first time, because every time a car revved or a bus or a truck thundered past I was jolted, and the sight of all these faces moving back and forth on the sidewalk made me feel insecure. Then I was reminded of something Yngve had once said, that his friend Pål always called them prime evil inhabitants, and once that was in your mind it was impossible to see anything else.

I smiled and gleefully slung the kitbag over my other shoulder.

Yngve was at the reception desk when I entered, wearing the hotel uniform, hunched over a little map on the counter explaining something to an elderly couple in shorts, caps, and fanny packs. He looked up and motioned with his head to the sofa, where I slumped down.

As soon as the Americans had gone, he came over.

"I'll be done in about ten minutes. Then I'll have to get changed and we'll be off. OK?"

"OK," I said.

He had a car now, a little red Japanese number he had leased from the volleyball team he played for, and half an hour later we were heading for his flat in Solheimsviken. It was situated some way up the mountainside, toward the end of a long row of brick-built terraced houses originally designed for shipyard workers.

We sat on the doorstep with cold beers in our hands. From the living room "Teenage Kicks" by the Undertones wafted over, evidently this summer's favorite band.

"So, are you going to Roskilde?" he said.

I nodded. "I think so."

"I might come down there too," he said. "Arvid and Erling are going, and lots of others too, so I'll just have to scrape together some cash . . . the Church are playing, you know?"

"Are they?"

"Yes. I wouldn't want to miss out on the chance to see them."

Cars were parked nose to tail on both sides of the street. People were constantly going in and out of the neighboring houses. The town beneath us was buzzing, an endless stream of cars passing through the streets. In the sky there was the occasional flash of a plane, long white plumes of condensed water hovered in the air long after they had gone. The sun burned in the sky to the west. The roofs down the mountainside shimmered in red and orange, and between them stood trees swaying in the breeze.

After a while we went indoors, Yngve made pasta carbonara for dinner, and then we had another couple of beers on the doorstep. Our conversation flagged, it was as though a little distance had grown between us since we last met, but it didn't matter, it could have been for all sorts of reasons.

In one of the letters he had sent he'd, very discreetly, told me to remember to use a condom. I appreciated his concern, but I had smiled when I saw that, because he would never have been able to say it to my face. It was only possible in a letter, and then en passant. Or if he was drunk.

"Are you still suffering after Kristin?" I said after we had sat down.

"It's one big suffering," he said.

"And you can't get her back? There's no chance of that?"

"Do you think I would be sitting here with you if there were?"

"Maybe not." I smiled.

"It was my fault. I took her for granted. All of a sudden she didn't want to continue, and by then it was too late. Shit, that's the hardest part to deal with, that I could have prevented it. But I took it for granted. I didn't value it highly enough."

"But you do now?"

"Now I'm in the privileged position of being able to see what I had, yes."

The sun was no longer shining on the doorstep, and I took off my sunglasses, folded them, and put them in my shirt pocket.

"You shouldn't keep them there," Yngve said. "It doesn't look good."

"You're right," I said, and took them out again.

"And while I'm at it, that studded belt of yours might have had its day."

"It's possible," I said. "But I'll give it a while yet."

There was a silence. We smoked, gazed down at the sunless but warm street.

"Can I ask you something?" I said after a while.

"Of course," he said.

"When did you . . . well, first do it?"

He glanced at me. Then gazed down again.

"When I was eighteen. On the trip to Greece. When I went with Helge, if you remember. On Antiparos Beach. At night. In the moonlight."

"Is that true?"

"Yes, it was late but good. Or, in retrospect, it seems better than it actually was. Why?"

I shrugged.

"Don't tell me you haven't slept with a girl yet? You're not a virgin, are you?"

"No, no, of course not," I said. "You know I'm not."

We fell silent again. The air around us was full of noises. All the windows were open, all the shouting, bikes occasionally whizzing past, cars creeping slowly up the mountainside, the wonderful solid sound of car doors shutting.

It wasn't a lie. Technically speaking, I wasn't a virgin, I had penetrated that girl at the russ party – not much, a centimeter or two – but for Christ's sake there had been contact, I had fucked. It wasn't a lie.

"I'll order a taxi," Yngve said, getting up. "We'll swing down to Ola's first. You've really got to meet him."

My possessions arrived a few days later, we picked up the boxes from the hurtigrute quay, put them in the cellar, and then I traveled down to Kristiansand, where I mostly stayed in Lars's studio. After Roskilde we were going to hitch down through Europe together, and we planned the journey, first to Brindisi on the southeastern tip of Italy, and then across to Athens, and from there to the Greek Islands. I suggested Antiparos, he agreed. I managed to squeeze in a visit to Grandma and Grandad too, and Gunnar, who'd heard I was in town, invited me to their place on the last evening. I had to meet my cousins, we were a small family, as he put it, it was important to stay in contact. He picked me up from Rundingen, Tove was waiting for us with dinner, we spent the evening talking, his two sons kept crawling all over him, and the fact that they weren't frightened of him – actually they exuded trust, this struck me every time I was there – gladdened my heart. No one said a word about Dad, and that was fine, it seemed to me. I slept in their cellar, and in the morning, after a hurried breakfast, Gunnar drove me to the ferry terminal, where Lars and his girlfriend were waiting for me.

During the crossing to Denmark we were mostly up on deck. The sun was shining, the sea lay like a vast sheet around us, we sat in deck chairs drinking and smoking, got up now and then and drifted around, especially me, I was so restless.

After arriving in Roskilde by train, we lined up, were given our armbands, and went to the campsite. I had borrowed a small, brown, two-man tent from Lars, he would share his girlfriend's.

Once the tents were up, I left Lars and went to look for Bassen. We had arranged to meet at the rendezvous point, we had agreed to check in every hour on the hour, and the first time I went there, he was already waiting.

"Hi," he said, and smiled. "Want to go for a drink?"

He laughed when I told him about Northern Norway. I said nothing about Andrea, I wouldn't ever do that, not to anyone, there was no reason.

We went for a scout around, not many people had come yet, he said he was hungry, I was hungry too, I said, and when we passed the Hells Angels campsite and saw that they were grilling enormous chunks of meat over a fire he stopped and shouted to them.

"Hi! Could we have some of your food? We're starving! A bit of meat for two Norwegians!"

One of them got up and made a move toward us.

"He's going to let us in," Bassen said. "They're much better than their reputation. If you're not aggressive toward them, they aren't aggressive toward you."

"Hi there!" he said when the Hells Angel – who not only had long hair, a hefty handlebar moustache, leather pants, leather jacket, and a bandanna around his forehead but also impenetrable black sunglasses – was only a couple of meters away.

He moved quickly toward us and did not look enormously friendly. But perhaps it was just as Bassen had said, they just looked dangerous.

He stopped, then spat at us, turned, and went back.

The glob of phlegm hit Bassen on the chest.

"Jesus Christ," he said as we hurried away, angry and frightened. "He spat at us! Why did he do that? All we wanted was something to eat!"

"Oooh, shit," I said. "I think we got off easy there. It seems they are dangerous."

Bassen laughed.

"Yes, now we're out in the big wide world, Karl Ove!" he said.

I laughed too. We went for some more to drink and a bite to eat. After an hour I returned to the tent, I had to spend some time with Lars and the others as well, after all I had come with them. They were sitting outside drinking wine with a girl I'd never seen before.

"Say hello to our neighbor," Lars said.

"Hi," she said. "I'm Vilde."

I shook hands. It transpired she came from Kongsvinger and had traveled from Norway to the festival all on her own. Later she was going to visit a friend of hers in Århus, she told me.

She was dark-haired, a bit plump, forward by nature, sometimes obstinate. She was two years older than me, her eyes were brown, not always open, but they revealed sudden flashes of softness.

The bottle of wine made the rounds, when it was empty Vilde went to find another from her tent, knelt down, and opened it. The pressure made her thighs as fat as tree trunks.

"Here," she said, and handed it to me. She smiled.

Half an hour later it too was empty.

Lars and his girlfriend exchanged brief glances.

"Well," Lars said, getting up. "We're going to have a look around."

He grabbed her hand and they were gone.

I trembled, fearing something terrible was about to happen.

What though?

I didn't know, but it ran through my mind that it had been a mistake to come here, I'd had enough and now I couldn't take much more.

"We don't have any more wine," Vilde said. "Feel like coming with me to buy a few more bottles?"

"Sure," I said.

On the way I kept a lookout for Yngve and his friends, but it was hopeless, there were tens of thousands of people here.

"He-llo!" Vilde said. "Contact! Contact!"

"Hm?" I said.

"You're walking with me! Be a little friendly."

"OK," I said. But I couldn't think of a thing to say.

"Are you looking for someone?" she said.

"My brother's here, I think. And his friends."

"Is he as good-looking as you?"

I flushed and looked down at her. She laughed and lightly ran her hand across my shoulder.

"I'm just teasing," she said. "It's so funny to see you go red."

"I didn't go red," I said.

"You definitely aren't as tough as you look!" she said.

We stopped in front of one of the counters, she bought three bottles of wine and then we went back.

Vilde said, "Shall we go to my tent? It's big and we can hang out inside and drink."

"Sure," I said, and a chasm in me opened.

We went into her tent. We sat down, she opened a bottle. We looked at each other. She made a grab for me, I made a grab for her, she lay down, I tore her T-shirt over her head and her breasts flopped out. I undid her trousers and pulled them down over her hips. Oh my God, so much flesh. I bent down and kissed her white thighs, stuck my nose in her black panties and at the same time stretched for her breasts with both hands, and then she said, get your clothes off, come on, hurry, hurry, I want you now, and I jumped up, dragged my T-shirt over my head and pulled down my trousers as I watched her wriggle out of her panties and lie there naked and raise her legs slightly as she parted them, and I could barely breathe, my underpants stuck out like a small tent and I took them off and sank down on her, she put her hand behind my head and I tried to enter her, missed the target, oh no, no, God, please not now, hang on, she said, I'll help you, that's it, yes, oh, there we are, and I was inside her and I managed to thrust twice before everything contracted and I held her tight.

Oh, it was brief, and it was embarrassing.

She stroked my hair a few times.

I lay on my back beside her.

At least it had gone inside.

That was the first time.

I smiled.

"Would you like some wine?"

"Love some," she said.

We each took a swig.

"How many girls have you had?" she said.

I flushed and concealed my embarrassment by raising the bottle to my mouth again.

Then I pretended to count.

"Ten, actually," I said.

"That's a lot," she said.

"And you?" I said.

"Three."

"Three?"

"Yes."

"Am I the third or the fourth?"

"The third. But wouldn't you like to be the fourth too?"

"Yup."

This time it went a little better, perhaps twenty seconds passed before we were lying next to each other again. We drank more wine, I put my arm around her, snuggled up to her well-upholstered body, and that was how we fell asleep. When we woke up it was dark. We did it again, and then again.

We lay talking, laughing, and drinking, and I thought, is it true, is it really true, am I lying beside a naked girl with whom I can do what I want?

We fell asleep, when we woke up we made love again, and then we went for a walk, saw two minutes of a gig, shared a bottle of wine, and then we hurried back to the tent. We stayed there all day. We got drunker and drunker. I couldn't get enough of her ass and her big soft breasts, couldn't fathom what happiness had befallen me. As we kept at it she suddenly lunged to the side and put her hand to her mouth, I knew what was happening and withdrew, she crawled over to the tent opening, pulled down the zip and then, with her backside in and her chest out, she threw up. Groaned and another spasm ran through her, and I saw her big ass before me, suddenly I couldn't resist it, placed my hands on her hams, poked it in, and began to pump away again.

My Struggle

BOOK FIVE

Translated from the Norwegian by Don Bartlett

archipelago books

The fifth volume of what has been called "perhaps the most significant literary enterprise of our time" (The Guardian) delves deeply into the psychological drama of early adulthood. At nineteen, Karl Ove is the youngest student accepted into a writing academy. He arrives in Bergen full of excitement and conviction, but his confidence is swiftly shattered. He watches his friends and peers, one by one, release their debut books. Socially awkward and disenchanted, he seeks escape in alcohol and steadies himself with literature and music. A great love pulls Karl Ove out of his own darkness, but it isn't long before self-destructive behaviors reemerge and he finds himself drawn back into punishing solitude. Book Five is an emotional whirlwind, spinning from heady highs to harrowing lows, whose visceral memories become our own.

Part 1

The fourteen years I lived in Bergen, from 1988 to 2002, are long gone, no traces of them are left, other than as incidents a few people might remember, a flash of recollection here, a flash of recollection there, and of course whatever exists in my own memory of that time. But there is surprisingly little. All that is left of the thousands of days I spent in that small, narrow-streeted, rain-shimmering Vestland town is a few events and lots of sentiments. I kept a diary, which I have since burned. I took some photos, of which twelve remain; they are in a little pile on the floor beside the desk, with all the letters I received during those days. I have flicked through them, read bits and pieces, and this has always depressed me, it was such a terrible time. I knew so little, had such ambitions, and achieved nothing. But what spirits I was in before I went! I had hitchhiked to Florence with Lars that summer, we stayed there for a few days, caught the train down to Brindisi, the weather was so hot it felt as though your head was on fire when you poked it through the open train window. Night in Brindisi, dark sky, white houses, heat as in a dream, big crowds in the parks, young people on mopeds everywhere, shouting and noise. We lined up by the gangway to the big ship going to Piraeus, with lots of others, almost all young and carrying backpacks like us. It was 120 degrees in Rhodes. One day in Athens, the most chaotic place I have ever been, and so insanely hot, then the boat to Paros and Antiparos, where we lay on the beach every day and got drunk every night. One evening we met some Norwegian girls, and while I was in the toilet Lars told them he was a writer and had been accepted to start at the Writing Academy in the autumn. They were discussing this when I returned. Lars just smiled at me. What was he up to? I knew he was prone to telling little fibs, but while I was standing there? I said nothing, decided to give him a wide berth in the future. We went to Athens together, I had run out of money, Lars was still rolling in it, he decided to fly back home the day after. We were sitting in a terrace restaurant, he was eating chicken, his chin glistening with fat, I was drinking a glass of water. The last thing I wanted to do was ask him for money, the only way I could get any out of him was if he asked me whether I wanted to borrow some. But he didn't, so I went hungry. The next day he left for the airport, and I took a bus to the suburbs, got off near a motorway on-ramp and started hitchhiking. After no more than a few minutes a police car stopped, the officers couldn't speak a word of English, but I got the message that hitchhiking wasn't allowed there, so I caught a bus back to the city center, and with the last of my money bought a train ticket to Vienna, a loaf of bread, a big bottle of Coke, and a carton of cigarettes.

I thought the trip would take a few hours and was shocked to learn it would be more like two full days. In the compartment were a Swedish boy of my age and two English girls who turned out to be a couple of years older. We were well into Yugoslavia before they figured out that I had no money, nor any food, and they offered to share theirs with me. The countryside outside the window was so beautiful it hurt. Valleys and rivers, farms and villages, people dressed in ways I associated with the nineteenth century and obviously worked the land the way they did then, with horses and hay carts, scythes and plows. Part of the train was Russian, I walked through the carriages in the evening, spellbound by the foreign letters, the foreign smells, the foreign interior, the foreign faces. When we arrived in Vienna one of the two girls, Maria, wanted to exchange addresses, she was attractive and normally it would have gone through my mind that I could visit her in Norfolk some day, perhaps start a relationship and live there, but on this day, wandering through the streets on the outskirts of Vienna, the idea meant nothing to me, I was still consumed by Ingvild, whom I had met only once, at Easter that year, but whom I later wrote to. Everyone else paled into insignificance compared with her. I got a lift with a stern-looking blond woman in her thirties to a gas station on the motorway, where I asked some truck drivers if they had any room for me, one of them nodded, he must have been in his late forties, dark complexioned and thin with deeply glowing eyes, first though he had to have something to eat.

I waited outside in the warm dusk smoking and watching the lights along the road that were beginning to become more and more distinct as evening fell, surrounded by the drone of traffic, occasionally interrupted by the brief but heavy slamming of doors, the sudden voices of people crossing the parking lot on their way to or from the service station. Inside, people sat silently eating on their own except for a few families who swamped the tables they sat around. I was filled with an inner exultation, this was precisely what I loved best, the familiar, the known – the motorway, the gas station, the cafeteria, which weren't familiar at all actually, everywhere I looked details differed from the places I knew. The driver came out, nodded to me, I followed him, clambered up into the enormous vehicle, put my backpack in the back, and settled in. He started the engine, everything rumbled and shook, lights were switched on, we set off slowly, gradually sped up, but were still lumbering, until we were safely coasting on the inside lane of the motorway, at which point he glanced at me for the first time. Sweden? he said. Norwegen, I said. Ah, Norwegen! he said.

Throughout the night and well into the next day I sat at his side. We had exchanged the names of some soccer players, Rune Bratseth in particular, had excited him, but since he couldn't speak a word of English that was as far as we got.

I was in Germany, and I was very hungry, but without a krone in my pockets all I could do was smoke and hitch and hope for the best. A young man in a red Golf stopped, his name was Björn, he said, and he was going a long way, he was affable, and in the evening when he had gone as far as he was going to go, he invited me into his house and gave me some muesli and milk, I ate three portions, he showed me some pictures of his holidays with his brother in Norway and Sweden when he was young, their father was crazy about Scandinavia, he told me, hence the name Björn. His brother's name was Tor, he said, shaking his head. He drove me to the motorway, I gave him my cassette of the Clash's triple album, he shook my hand, we wished each other good luck, and I took up a position at one of the on-ramp again. After three hours a tousled bearded man in a red 2CV stopped, he was going to Denmark, I could have a lift all the way. He asked me questions, was interested when I said that I wrote, I wondered if he might have been a professor of some kind, he bought me food at a cafeteria, I slept for a few hours, we reached Denmark, he bought me more food, and when I finally left him I was in the middle of Jutland, only a few hours away from Hirtshals, so I would soon be home. But the last part of the journey was more difficult, I got lifts of thirty-odd kilometers at a time, by eleven in the evening I had advanced no farther than Løkken, and I decided to sleep on the beach. I wandered along a narrow road through a low forest, here and there the asphalt was covered with sand, and soon dunes rose before me, I walked up them, cast my eyes over the shiny gray sea lying in front of me in the light of the Scandinavian summer night. From a campsite or a cluster of seaside cabins a few hundred meters away came the sound of voices and car engines.

It was good being by the sea. Breathing in the faint aroma of salt and the raw breeze off the water. This was my sea. I was nearly home.

I found a dip in the sand and unrolled my sleeping bag, crept inside, pulled up the zip, and closed my eyes. It was unpleasant, anyone could stumble across me out here, that was how it felt, but I was so tired after the past few days that in an instant I was gone, as if someone had blown out a candle.

I awoke to rain. Cold and stiff, I struggled out of the sleeping bag, pulled on my trousers, packed everything, and set off for the town. It was six o'clock. The sky was gray, there was a light, almost imperceptible, drizzle, I was freezing cold and walked fast to generate some heat. I'd had a dream and the images were still tormenting me. Dad's brother, Gunnar, had been in it, or his anger, that was because I had drunk so much and done so many bad things, I realized now as I hurried through the same low forest I had walked through the previous evening. All the trees were motionless, leaden, beneath the dense cloud cover, more dead than alive. The sand lay in mounds between them, swept up in their changing and unpredictable yet always distinctive patterns, like a river of fine sand grains traversing the coarser tarmac.

I came onto a bigger road, continued along it for some distance, put down my backpack by a crossing, and started thumbing. It wasn't many kilometers to Hirtshals. Though what would happen there, I had no idea. I had no money so it wouldn't be that easy to get onto the Kristiansand ferry. Perhaps I could arrange to have a bill sent on to me? If I came across a kindly soul who appreciated the predicament I was in?

Oh no. Now the raindrops were getting bigger as well.

Fortunately it wasn't cold though.

I lit a cigarette, ran a hand through my hair. The rain had made my hair gel sticky, I dried my hand on my thigh, leaned forward and took the Walkman from my pack, rummaged through the few cassettes I had with me, chose Skylarking by XTC, put it in, and straightened up.

Had there been an amputated leg in the dream as well? Yes. It had been sawn off just below the knee.

I smiled, and then, when the music began to flow out of the tiny speakers I was taken back to the time the record came out. It would have been the second class at gymnas. Mostly, though, I was filled with recollections of the house in Tveit: sitting in a wicker chair drinking tea and smoking and listening to Skylarking, head over heels in love with Hanne; Yngve, who was there with Kristin; all the conversations with Mom.

A vehicle came down the road.

When Miss Moon lays down
And Sir Sun stands up
Me, I'm found floating round and round
Like a bug in brandy
In this big bronze cup

It was a pickup truck with a company name on the hood in red, probably a builder on his way to work, as he raced past he didn't even look at me, and then the second song seemed to rise out of the first, I loved this segue, something rose in me as well, and I punched the air several times as I slowly danced round and round.

Another vehicle hove into view. I stretched out my thumb. Once again the driver was sleepy and didn't acknowledge my presence with so much as a glance. I was obviously hitching on a road with a lot of local traffic. But couldn't they stop anyway? Take me to a main road?

Only after a couple of hours did someone take pity on me. A German in his midtwenties with round glasses and a severe expression pulled over in a tiny Opel, I ran toward him, threw my backpack onto the backseat, which was already full of baggage, and got in beside him. He had come from Norway, he said, and was on his way south, could drop me off by the motorway, it wasn't far, but it might help. I said, yes, yes, very good. The windows misted up badly, he leaned forward as he drove and wiped the windshield with a rag. Maybe that's my fault, I said. What? he said. The mist on the window, I said. Of course it is, he hissed. OK, I thought, if that's how you want it, and leaned back in my seat.

He dropped me off twenty minutes later, by a big gas station, I walked back and forth outside asking everyone I saw if they were going to Hirtshals and whether they would take me with them. I was wet and hungry, my appearance was a mess after all the days on the road, and everyone shook their heads until, a long time later, a man driving a van I could see was full of bread and bakery products smiled and said, come on, jump in, I'm going to Hirtshals. The whole way I kept thinking I should ask him if I could have something to eat, but I didn't dare, the closest I came was to say that I was hungry, but he didn't take the hint.

As I was saying good-bye to him in Hirtshals a ferry was just about to leave. I ran over to the ticket office with my backpack heavy on my back, breathlessly explained my situation to the clerk, I had no money, would it be possible to have a ticket anyway and have the bill sent on to me? I had a passport, so could produce ID, and I was reliable. She smiled nicely and shook her head, she was unable to help, I had to pay cash. But I have to get across! I said. I live there! And I haven't got any money! She shook her head again. Sorry, she said, and turned away.

I sat down on a curb in the harbor area with my backpack between my legs and watched the big ferry slip its moorings, glide away, and vanish from view.

What was I going to do?

One possibility was to hitchhike south again, to Sweden and then go up that way. But wasn't there some water that had to be crossed as well?

I tried to visualize the map, wondering if there was a land connection between Denmark and Sweden somewhere, I didn't think there was, was there? So you would have to go right down to Poland and then up through Russia to Finland and from there into Norway, was that right? A couple of weeks' hitchhiking then. And you would probably need a visa or something for the Eastern Bloc countries. Of course I could go to Copenhagen, that was only a few hours away, and then do whatever it took to get some money for the ferry to Sweden. Beg on the streets if necessary.

Another way would be to get Mom to transfer some money to a bank here. That wouldn't be a problem, but it might take a couple of days. And I didn't have any coins to phone home.

I opened another packet of Camels and looked across at the vehicles that were quietly rolling in and joining the new queue as I smoked three cigarettes, one after the other. Lots of Norwegian families who had been to Legoland or the beach in Løkken. Some Germans heading north. Lots of camper vans, lots of motorbikes, and, farthest away, the juggernauts.

With a dry mouth, I took out my Walkman again. This time I inserted a Roxy Music cassette. But after only the second song the sound became distorted and the battery light came on. I put the Walkman back and stood up, swung my backpack over my shoulder, and set off for the town center, through the few dreary Hirtshals streets. Now and then hunger gnawed at my guts. I considered going to the bakery and asking if they could spare me some bread, but of course they wouldn't give me any. I couldn't bear the thought of such a humiliating rejection and decided to save my efforts until I was in serious discomfort, and wandered back toward the harbor. I stopped in front of a kind of café-cum-snack-bar, where it would surely be possible to get a glass of water at least.

The girl nodded and filled a glass from the tap behind her. I sat down by the window. The place was nearly full. Outside, it had started raining again. I drank the water and smoked. After a while two boys my age came in the door, wearing full rain gear. They undid their hoods and looked around. One of them came over to me. Were the seats free? Of course, I said. We got into conversation, it turned out they were from Holland, on their way to Norway and they had cycled up. They laughed in disbelief when I told them I had hitchhiked from Vienna without any money and now I was trying to get on the ferry. Is that why you're drinking water? one asked, I nodded, he asked if I would like a cup of coffee, that would be nice, I answered, he stood up and went off to get me one.

I left with them, they said they hoped we would meet again on board, took their bikes, and were gone, I plodded over to the truck queue and began to ask the drivers if they would take me along, I had no money for the boat. No, no one was interested, needless to say. One by one they started their engines and trundled on board while I walked back to the café and sat watching the ferry, which, once again, glided slowly away from the quay and became smaller and smaller until, half an hour later, it had disappeared.

The last ferry left in the evening. If I didn't get on it I would have to hitch down to Copenhagen. That would have to be the plan. While waiting, I took the manuscript from my backpack and read. I had written a whole chapter in Greece, on two mornings I had waded out to a little island and from there to another island with my shoes, T-shirt, writing pad, pen, cigarettes, and a paperback copy of Jack in Swedish in a little bundle on my head. There, in a hollow in the mountainside, I had sat all on my own writing. It felt as if I had arrived at where I wanted to go. I was sitting on a Greek island in the middle of the Mediterranean writing my first novel. At the same time I was restless, there was nothing there, only me, and it wasn't until that was all there was that I experienced the emptiness. That was how it was there, my own emptiness was everything, and even when I became immersed in Jack or was bent over my pad writing about Gabriel, my protagonist, what I noticed was the emptiness.

Sometimes I dived into the water, dark azure and wonderful, but I had hardly swum a few strokes before it occurred to me there might be sharks there. I knew there were no sharks in the Mediterranean, but I still had these thoughts as I scrambled up onto the shore dripping wet and cursing myself, it was idiotic, scared of sharks here, what was this, was I seven years old? But I was alone beneath the sun, alone by the sea, and utterly empty. It felt as if I were the last human on earth. It rendered both my reading and writing meaningless.

Yet when I read the chapter about what I considered to be a seamen's pub in the harbor quarter of Hirtshals I thought it was good. The fact that I had been accepted at the Writing Academy proved I had talent. Now all I had to do was demonstrate it on paper. My plan was to write a novel during the coming year, and then have it published next autumn, depending on how long it took to print and that kind of thing.

Water Above/Water Below it was called.

A few hours later, in the falling dusk, I walked along the queue of lorries again. Some of the drivers were dozing in their cabs, I knocked on the side window and saw them give a jolt, then either open the door or roll down the window to hear what I wanted. No, I couldn't have a lift. No, that wasn't going to happen. No, of course not, were they supposed to pay for my ticket or what?

The ferry was moored at the quayside with its lights blazing. Everywhere around me people began to start up their engines. One line of cars moved slowly forward, the first ones disappeared through the open jaws into the bowels of the ship. I was desperate, but told myself everything would be fine in the end. Had there ever been any stories of young Norwegians starving to death on their holidays or being stranded in Denmark, unable to get home?

Outside one of the last, three men stood chatting. I walked over to them.

"Hi," I said. "Could any of you take me on board? I haven't got any money for the ticket, you see. And I have to get home. I haven't eaten for two days, either."

"Where are you from?" one asked in broad Arendal dialect.

"Arendal," I said, in as thick an accent as I could muster. "Or, to be precise, Tromøya."

"I'll be damned!" he said. "That's where I'm from!"

"Which town?"

"Færvik," he said. "And you?"

"Tybakken," I said. "Could you take me then?"

He nodded.

"Jump in. Squat down as we drive on board. It'll be a cinch."

And that was what I did. As we drove on board I sat huddled up on the floor with my back to the windshield. He parked, switched off the ignition, I grabbed my backpack and jumped down to the deck. My eyes were moist as I thanked him. He shouted after me as I left, hey, hold on! I turned, he handed me a Danish fifty-krone note, said he didn't need it, perhaps I did?

I sat down in the cafeteria and ate a large portion of meatballs. The boat began to move off. The air around me was full of animated conversation, it was evening, we were under way. I thought about my driver. Usually I had no time for his type, they had wasted their lives sitting behind a wheel, they had no education, were fat and full of prejudices about all sorts of things, and he was no different, I saw that right away, but what the hell, he had got me on board!

After the cars, trucks, and motorbikes had – amid much revving and banging – driven off the ferry and onto the roads in Kristiansand the next morning, the town lay still behind them. I sat on the steps of the bus station. The sun was shining, the sky was high, the air already warm. I had saved some of the money I had been given by the truck driver so I could call Dad and say I was coming. His pet hate was surprise visitors. They had bought a house thirty kilometers or so away, which they rented out in the winter and lived in themselves throughout the summer until they had to start back at work in Northern Norway. My plan was to stay there a few days and then borrow some money for a ticket to Bergen, perhaps catch a train there, which was the cheapest.

But it was too early to ring.

I took out the small travel diary I had been keeping for the past month and entered everything that had happened from Austria upward. I spent a few pages on the dream I had in Løkken, it had made such an impression on me, it was deeply entrenched in my body, like a barrier or a boundary I mustn't cross, it seemed important.

Around me, the frequency of the buses began to increase, until at one point barely a minute passed without a bus stopping and disgorging its passengers. They were going to work, I could see it in their eyes, they had that vacant wage-earner look.

I stood up and went for a walk around town. The pedestrian street, Markens, was almost completely deserted, only a lone figure dashing up or down. Seagulls were pecking and snatching at the rubbish under a trash can with no bottom. I ended up at the library, it was habit that drove me there, some of the same sensation of panic I'd had when I walked around here during my years at gymnas had me in its grip now, I had nowhere to go and everyone could see that, I had always solved this by seeking refuge here, the place where you could hang around without anyone questioning what you were doing.

Before me lay the market square and the gray stone church with the verdigris roof. Everything was small and dismal, Kristiansand was a minor town, I could see that very clearly now after having been in Southern Europe and experiencing how things were there.

Against the wall on the other side of the street sat a tramp, asleep. With his long beard and hair and his ragged clothes he looked like a wild man.

I sat down on a bench and lit a cigarette. Just suppose he was the one who had the best life! He was doing exactly what he liked. If he wanted to break in somewhere, he did. If he wanted to drink himself senseless, he did. If he wanted to hassle passersby, he did. If he was hungry he stole some food. Fine, people treated him like shit or as though he didn't exist. But as long as he didn't care about anyone else, it was water off a duck's back.

This must have been how the first humans lived before they established communities and started farming, when they just wandered around eating whatever they could find, sleeping wherever felt right, and every day was like the first or the last. The tramp had no house to return to, no house to tie him down, he had no job to attend to, no schedules to keep, if he was tired, well, then he lay down wherever he was. The town was his forest. He was outdoors all the time, his skin was tanned and wrinkled, his hair and clothes filthy.

Even if I wanted to, I could never end up the way he was, I knew that. I could never go mad and become a tramp, it was inconceivable.

An old VW camper van stopped by the market square. A plump, lightly clad man jumped out on one side, a plump, lightly clad woman jumped out on the other. They opened the rear door and started unloading boxes of flowers. I threw my cigarette down on the dry asphalt, slipped on my backpack, and walked back to the bus station, where I rang Dad. He was bad-tempered and annoyed and told me I had arrived at an inconvenient time, they had a little child now, they couldn't receive visitors at such short notice. I should have phoned before, that would have been OK. As it was now, Grandma was coming, and a colleague too. I said I understood, apologized for not calling before, and we hung up.

I stood with the receiver in my hand for a while thinking, and then I dialed Hilde's number. She said I could stay there and she would come and pick me up now.

Half an hour later I was sitting beside her in her old Golf, on our way out of town, with the window open and the sun in my eyes. She laughed and said I smelled terrible, I would have to have a bath when we arrived. Then we could sit in the garden behind the house, in the shade, and she could serve me breakfast, I looked like I needed it.

I stayed at Hilde's for three days, long enough for Mom to transfer some money into my account, and then I caught the train to Bergen. I left in the afternoon, the sun flooded the heavily forested countryside in Aust-Agder, which received it in its manifold ways: the water in the lakes and rivers glittered, the dense conifers shone, the forest floor blushed, the leaves on the deciduous trees flashed on the few occasions a gust of wind caught them. Amid this interplay of light and color the shadows slowly lengthened and thickened. I stood by the window in the last carriage for a long time watching features of the countryside that kept disappearing, cast aside as it were, to be replaced by new ones, which always made their appearance in quick succession, a river of stumps and roots, cliffs and uprooted trees, streams and fences, unexpected cultivated hillsides with farmhouses and tractors. The only feature that didn't change was the rails we followed, and the two shimmering points where the sun was reflected on them all the way. It was a strange phenomenon. They looked like two balls of light, which seemed to be standing still while the train was traveling at more than a hundred kilometers an hour, and the balls of light remained at the same distance from me.

Several times during the journey I went back to see the balls of light again. They lifted my spirits, made me somehow happy, as though there was hope in them.

Otherwise I sat in my seat smoking and drinking coffee, reading newspapers but no books, on the basis that it might affect my prose, that I might lose whatever it was that had got me into the Writing Academy. After a while I took out the letters from Ingvild. I had carried them with me all summer, the folds were wearing thin and I knew them nearly by heart, but a radiance emanated from them, something good, something pleasurable, which touched me whenever I read them. It was her, both what I remembered of her the one time we had met and the her that arose from what she wrote, but it was also the her of the future, the unknown her that awaited me. She was different, something else, and the odd thing was that I also became different and something else when thinking about her. I liked myself better when I thought about her. It was as though thinking about her erased something in me, and that gave me a fresh start or moved me on.

I knew she was the right one, I had seen that straightaway, but perhaps I hadn't thought, only felt, that what she had in her and what she was, and which in glimpses her eyes revealed, was something I wanted to be close to or embrace.

What was it?

Oh, her self-awareness and insight into the situation, which laughter suspended for an instant, but which returned the very next second. Something evaluative and skeptical even, in her nature, that wanted to be won over, but was afraid of being duped. In it resided vulnerability but not weakness.

I had enjoyed talking to her so much, and I had liked writing to her so much. The fact that she was the first thought in my mind the day after we had met didn't necessarily mean anything, it was often like that, but it hadn't stopped there, I had thought about her every day since, and now four months had passed.

I didn't know if she felt the same way about me. Presumably she didn't, but something in the tone of her writing told me there was some excitement and appeal in this for her too.

Mom had moved from a terrace apartment to a basement one in a house in Angedalen, in Førde Municipality, ten minutes from the center. It was a wonderful location with a forest on one side, a field ending in a river on the other, but the flat was small and studenty, one big room with a kitchen and bathroom, that was it. She was planning to stay there until she found something better to rent or perhaps even buy. I had intended to do some writing while I stayed with her, during the two weeks before I would finally move to Bergen, and she suggested I use Uncle Steinar's cabin, which was up by the old house in the forest pasture above the farm Grandma came from. She drove me there, we had a coffee outside the house, then she made her way back and I went into the cabin. Pine walls, pine floor, pine ceiling, and pine furniture. A woven rug here and there, a few plain paintings. A pile of magazines in a basket, a fireplace, a kitchenette.

I placed the dining table by a wall without a window, put my pile of papers on one side, a pile of cassettes on the other, and sat down. But I couldn't write. The emptiness I had first felt on the island off Antiparos returned, I could feel it again, exactly as it had been before. The world was empty, or nothing, an image, and I was empty.

I went to bed and slept for two hours. When I awoke dusk was falling. The bluish-gray twilight lay like a veil over the forest. The thought of writing still repelled me, so instead I put on my shoes and went outside.

I could hear the roar of the waterfall in the forest above, otherwise everything was still.

No, it wasn't, I could hear bells ringing somewhere.

I walked down to the path by the stream and followed it up into the forest. The spruces were tall and dark, the rock face beneath was covered in moss, here and there roots lay bare on the surface. In places small, thin deciduous trees tried to force their way up into the light, elsewhere little clearings had formed around fallen trees. And alongside the stream the forest was open, of course, where it swirled and crashed, threw itself over rock and stone on its way down. Otherwise everything was dense and dark green from the spruce needles. I could hear my own breathing, could feel my pulse beating in my chest, throat, and temples as I walked up. The noise from the waterfall became louder, and soon I was standing on a crag above a deep pool beneath, looking at the steep bare rock face where the water plummeted downward.

It was beautiful, but it was of no use to me, and I walked up through the trees beside the waterfall, climbed to the exposed rock that I wanted to follow right to the top, a few hundred meters above me.

The sky was gray, the water that cascaded down beside me shiny and clear, like glass. The moss I was walking on was drenched and often gave way; my foot slipped and the dark rock beneath was revealed.

Suddenly something jumped out just in front of my feet.

Paralyzed by fear, I stood stock still. My heart seemed to have stopped too.

A small gray creature darted off. It was a mouse or a small rat.

I laughed nervously to myself. Continued upward, but the little scare had a hold on me, now I peered into the dark forest with a sense of unease, and the constant blanket of sound from the waterfall, which I had hitherto regarded as agreeable, became threatening, prevented me from hearing anything else except my own breathing, so a few minutes later I about-turned and made my way back down.

I sat by the brick grill outside the farmhouse and lit a cigarette. It might have been eleven o'clock or maybe half past. The farmhouse looked the way it must have when Grandma worked here, in the 1920s and '30s. Yes, everything looked more or less the same as it did then. Yet everything was different. It was August 1988, I was an '80s person, contemporaneous with Duran Duran and the Cure, not that fiddle and accordion music Grandpa listened to in the days when he trudged up the hill in the dusk with a friend to court Grandma and her sisters. I didn't belong here, with all of my heart I felt that. It didn't help that I knew the forest was actually an '80s forest and the mountains actually '80s mountains.

So what was I doing here?

My plan had been to write. But I couldn't, I was all on my own and lonely to the depths of my soul.

When the week was over and Mom drove up the narrow gravel road, I was sitting on the steps waiting with my rucksack packed and ready between my legs, not having written a single word.

"Have you had a nice time?" she said.

"Yes, great," I said. "I didn't get much done though."

"Oh well," she said, looking at me. "But perhaps the rest did you good."

"Yes, I'm sure it did," I said, buckling my seat belt, and then we drove back to Førde, where we parked and had lunch at Sunnfjord Hotel. We chose a window table, Mom hung her bag over her chair, then we went over to the buffet in the middle of the dining room to serve ourselves. The place was quite empty. When we sat down, each with a plate, a waiter came over, I asked for a Coke, Mom wanted a Farris mineral water, and after he had gone she began to talk about her plans – which now looked as if they were going to materialize – to establish a farther training course in psychiatric patient care at the school. She had located some suitable premises herself, a wonderful old school, according to her, which wasn't that far from the School of Nursing. It had soul, she said, it was an old timber building, with big rooms, high ceilings, quite different from the cramped brick bunker she was teaching in now.

"That sounds good," I said, my gaze wandering to the parking lot, where a handful of vehicles glinted in the sunlight. The mountainside across the river was completely green, apart from one plot that had been blasted out with dynamite, where a house had been built that vibrated with all of its many different colors.

The waiter returned and I drank the glass of Coke in one long swig. Mom began to talk about my relationship with Gunnar. She said I seemed to have internalized him and turned him into my superego, the one that told me what I could and couldn't do, what was wrong and what wasn't.

I put down my knife and fork and looked at her.

"Have you been reading my diary?" I said.

"No, not your diary," she said. "But you left a book you'd been writing in on your holiday. You're usually so open and tell me everything."

"But, Mom, that was a diary," I said. "You don't read other people's diaries."

"No, of course not," she said. "I know that. But if you leave it on the sitting-room table, there's hardly anything secret about it, is there?"

"But you could see it was a diary, couldn't you?"

"No," she said. "It was a travelogue."

"OK, OK," I said. "That was my mistake. I shouldn't have left it lying around. But what was it you said about Gunnar? That I'd internalized him? What did you mean by that?"

"That's how it seemed from the dream you described and your subsequent thoughts."

"Really?"

"Your father was very strict with you when you were growing up, as you know. But then he was suddenly gone, and perhaps you had a sense that you could do whatever you liked. So you've got two sets of norms, but both derive from the outside. What's important is that you set your own limits. That has to come from the inside, from you yourself. Your father didn't do that, and that's maybe why he was so confused."

"Is," I said. "He's still alive to my knowledge. Anyhow, I spoke to him on the phone a week ago."

"But now it appears you've installed Gunnar in your father's place," she continued, flashing me a look. "This has nothing to do with Gunnar. We're talking about setting your limits. But you're old enough now. You'll have to work it out for yourself."

"That's what I'm trying to do in my diary," I said. "Then all sorts of people read it and it becomes impossible to work it out for myself."

"I apologize," Mom said. "I really didn't think you regarded it as a diary. If I'd known, I wouldn't have read it."

"I told you it's not a problem," I said. "Shall we have something for dessert?"

We sat in her apartment talking until late, then I went into the hall, closed the door behind me, found the air mattress, which was leaning against the wall in the little bathroom, laid it on the floor, covered it with a sheet, undressed, switched off the light, and lay down. Faintly I could hear her moving around indoors and the occasional car passing outside. The smell of plastic from the air mattress reminded me of my childhood, camping trips, and the open countryside. Times were different now, but the feeling of anticipation was the same. The next day I was off to Bergen, the big university town, I would be living in my own digs and attending the Writing Academy. In the evenings and at night I would sit in Café Opera or go to gigs with great bands at Hulen. It was fantastic. But the most fantastic thing of all was that Ingvild would be moving to the same town. We had arranged to meet, I had her phone number, I would call her when I arrived.

It was too good to be true, I thought, lying there on the airbed, filled with a restlessness and a joy that this was about to begin. I lay on one side, then on the other, listening to Mom talking in her sleep in the sitting room. Yes, she said. Then there was a long pause. Yes, she said again. That's true. Long pause. Yes. Yes. Mhm. Yes.

The following day Mom took me to Handelshuset, where she wanted to buy me a jacket and some trousers. I chose a fur-lined denim jacket, it looked pretty cool, and a pair of green military-style pants, as well as some black shoes. Then she drove me to the bus station, gave me the money for the ticket, stood by the car waving as the bus moved off and into the road.

After a few hours of forests, lakes, vertiginously steep mountains and narrow fjords, farms and fields, a ferry and a long valley where the bus was high up a mountainside one minute and right down by the water's edge the next, and an endless succession of tunnels, the frequency of houses and signs began to increase, there were more and more populated areas, industrial buildings appeared, fences, gas stations, shopping centers, and estates on both sides of the road. I saw a sign for the business school and it struck me, that was where Agnar Mykle went forty years ago, on one side I saw Sandviken Psychiatric Hospital rise like a fortress at the foot of the mountains, while on the other the water glittered in the afternoon sun, with yachts and boats whose outlines seemed to blur in the haze against a backdrop of islands and mountains and the low sky over Bergen.

I jumped off the bus at the far end of Bryggen, the old wharf. Yngve was working the evening shift at the Orion Hotel and I had arranged to pick up the key to his flat there. The town around me was sunk in the stupor that only late-summer afternoons can evoke. Now and then a figure sauntered past in shorts and a T-shirt, followed by a long flickering shadow. House walls shimmering in the sun, motionless leaves on trees, a yacht chugging out of the harbor, masts bare.

The reception area at the hotel was packed with people. Yngve, busy behind his desk, looked up at me and said a busload of Americans had just arrived, look, here's the key, see you later, OK?

I caught the bus to Danmarksplass and walked the three hundred meters up to his flat, unlocked the door, put down my backpack in the hall, stood still for a while and wondered what to do. The windows faced north and the sun was in the west, setting over the sea, so the rooms were dark and chilly. They smelled of Yngve. I went into the sitting room and looked around, then into the bedroom. There was a new poster on the wall, an eerie photograph of a naked woman with Munch og fotografi written at the bottom. Photos he had taken himself were there too, a selection from Tibet, the ground was a gleaming red, a group of ragged boys and girls posing for him, their eyes dark and foreign. In one corner, beside the sliding door, was his guitar leaning against an amplifier. On top of it a large echo box. A plain white IKEA blanket and two cushions converted the bed into a sofa.

I had visited Yngve several times while I was at gymnas, and to me there was something almost sacred about his rooms, they represented who he was and who I wanted to become. Something that existed outside my life and something that one day I would move into.

Now I was here, I thought, and went into the kitchen to make some sandwiches, which I ate standing in front of the window, with a view of the terraces of old workers' houses going down to Fjøsangerveien at the bottom. On the other side, the mast on Mount Ulriken flashed in the sunshine.

It occurred to me that I had been on my own a lot recently. Apart from the few days with first Hilde and then Mom, I hadn't spent time with anyone since I said good-bye to Lars in Athens. I could hardly wait for Yngve to come home.

I put on a Stranglers' record and settled down on the sofa with one of Yngve's photo albums. My stomach ached and I didn't know why. It felt like hunger, not for food but for everything else.

Perhaps Ingvild was also in town? Perhaps she was sitting in one of the hundred thousand studio apartments around me?

One of the first questions Yngve asked me when he arrived was how it was going with Ingvild. I hadn't told him much, a few words when we were sitting on the steps earlier that summer, that was all, but it had been enough for him to realize it was serious. Maybe also that it had huge significance for me.

I told him she was coming to Bergen around now and would live in Fantoft, and I would be calling her to arrange the first meeting.

"Might turn out to be your year," he said. "New girlfriend, Writing Academy . . ."

"We're not there yet."

"No, but from what you've said, she's interested, isn't she?"

"A little maybe. But I doubt it means as much to her as it does for me."

"But it could. If you play your cards right."

"For once, you mean?"

"I didn't say that," he said, eyeing me. "Feel like some wine?"

"Certainly do."

He got up and disappeared into the kitchen, reappeared with a carafe in his hand and went to the bathroom. I heard some snorting and gurgling noises, then a steady glug until he emerged holding a full carafe.

"Vintage 1988," he said. "But it's pretty good. And there's plenty of it too."

I took a swig. It was so sour it made me wince.

Yngve smiled.

"Pretty good?" I said.

"Taste is relative, as you know," he said. "You have to compare it with other homemade wine."

We drank for a while without speaking. Yngve stood up and went toward the guitar and amplifier.

"I've written a couple of songs since you were last here," he said. "Want to hear them?"

"I'd love to," I said.

"Well, they're not really songs," he said, fastening the strap over his shoulder. "Just a few riffs really."

I felt a sudden tenderness as I watched him.

He switched on the amplifier, stood with his back to me and tuned the guitar, adjusted the echo box and began to play.

The tenderness vanished, this was good, what he was playing, the guitar sound was big and majestic, the riffs melodious and catchy, it sounded like a cross between the Smiths and the Chameleons. I couldn't understand where he had got it from. Both his musicality and the dexterity were way beyond my capacities. He simply had the gift, from the moment he started, as though it had always been there.

He turned toward me only after he had finished and put down the guitar.

"That was really good," I said.

"Do you think so?" he said, sitting down on the sofa. "It's just a couple of little ideas. I could use some lyrics so that I can finish them off."

"I don't understand why you don't play in a band."

"Well," he said. "I jam a little with Pål now and then. Otherwise I don't know anyone who plays. You're here now though."

"I can't play."

"You can start by writing a few lyrics, can't you? And you can play the drums as well."

"No, I can't," I said. "I'm not good enough. But maybe I could write something. That'd be fun."

"You should," he said.

Autumn was on its way, I thought, as we stood in the road outside the long line of low brick terraced houses waiting for the taxi. There was a kind of heaviness in the light summer night, impossible to localize yet unmistakable. An augury of something damp and dark and gloomy.

The taxi arrived a few minutes later, we got in, it raced recklessly down to Danmarksplass, past the big cinema and over a bridge, along Nygård Park and into the center, where I lost my bearings, streets were just streets, houses just houses, I disappeared into the large town, was swallowed up by it, and I liked that, because I became visible to myself, the young man on his way into a metropolis filled with glass and concrete and tarmac, strangers caught in the light from street lamps and windows and signs. A shiver ran down my spine as we drove into the town center. The engine hummed, the traffic lights changed from green to red, we stopped outside what must have been the bus station.

"Isn't that where we went that time?" I said, nodding toward the building across the road.

"That's right," Yngve said.

I had been sixteen, visiting him for the first time; I had held the hand of one of the girls we were with in order to get in. I had borrowed Yngve's deodorant, and in the minutes before we left his place he had stood in front of me, rolled up the sleeves of my shirt, passed me his hair gel, watched me rubbing it in, and said, good, now let's go.

Now I was nineteen and all this was mine.

I caught a glimpse of the lake in the middle of the town, and then we turned left, past a large concrete building.

"That's the Grieg Hall," Yngve said.

"So that's where it is," I said.

"And there's Mekka," he said straight afterward, nodding toward a supermarket. "That's the cheapest in town."

"Is that where you shop?" I said.

"If I've got any money," he said. "Anyway, this is Nygårdsgaten. Do you remember the Aller Værste! song? 'We ran down Nygårdsgata as though we were in the Wild West.'"

"Yes," I said. "What about Disken then? 'I went into Disken and the place was bloody heaving?'"

"That was the disco in Hotel Norge. Right behind that building there. But it's called something else now."

The taxi pulled into the curb and stopped.

"Here we are," the driver said. Yngve passed him a hundred-krone note, I got out, looked up at the sign on the building where we were parked. Café Opera it said in pink and black letters on a white background. Inside the big windows the place was full of people, shadowy figures among the small clear flames of the candles. Yngve got out on the other side of the taxi, said good-bye to the driver, and slammed the door shut. "Right, in we go," he said.

He stopped inside the entrance and scanned the crowd. Looked at me.

"No one I know. Let's go upstairs."

I followed him up, past some tables, which were laid out in exactly the same pattern as downstairs, and over to the bar. I had been there before, but only fleetingly and in the daytime: this was different. Everywhere people were drinking beer. The room looked a lot like an apartment, I reflected, with chairs and tables and a curved bar in the middle.

"There's Ola!" Yngve exclaimed. I followed the direction of his nod. Ola, whom I had met once earlier this summer, was sitting at a table with three others. He smiled and waved. We walked over.

"Find yourself a chair and let's sit here, Karl Ove," Yngve said.

There was a chair beside a piano by the other wall, I went over and took it, feeling quite naked as I lifted it into the air, was that how I should do it? Could I carry it through the room like this? People looked at me, the place was full of students, regulars who were on their home ground, and I blushed, but saw no alternative and carried the chair to the table where Yngve was already sitting.

"This is my little brother, Karl Ove," Yngve said. "He's about to start at the Writing Academy."

He smiled as he said that. I briefly met the eyes of the three people I hadn't seen before: two girls and a boy.

"So you're the famous little brother," said one of the girls. She had fair hair and narrow eyes, which almost vanished when she smiled.

"Kjersti," she said.

"Karl Ove," I said.

The other girl had black hair in a pageboy cut, bright red lipstick, and a black outfit, she told me her name, and the boy next to her, a shy figure with reddish-blond hair and pale skin, followed suit with a broad smile. I forgot their names the very next second.

"Want a beer?" Yngve said.

Was he going to leave me here, all on my own?

"Please," I said.

He stood. I looked down at the table. Suddenly remembered I could smoke here, took out my tobacco pouch and began to make a roll-up.

"Were you at R-roskilde?" Ola said.

He was the first person I had met since junior school who stammered. You wouldn't believe it to look at him. He had Buddy Holly glasses, dark hair, regular facial features, and even though he didn't dress flashily at all there was still something about him that had made me think he was in a band the first time I saw him. Nothing had changed. He was wearing a white shirt, black jeans, and a pair of black pointed shoes.

"I was," I said. "But I didn't get to see many bands."

"Why n-not?"

"There was so much else going on," I said.

"Yes, I c-can imagine." He smiled.

You didn't have to be with him for long to know that he had a warm heart. I was glad he was Yngve's friend, and the stammering, which had made me ill at ease the previous time – did Yngve have friends who stammered? – didn't feel as disconcerting now that I could see that at least he had three more friends. None of them reacted to the stammer, neither with forbearance nor condescension, and what I myself felt when he said anything – that the situation I found myself in, he is stammering now and I mustn't show that I've noticed, was so obvious and awkward, because couldn't he see that was what I was thinking while he was talking? – wasn't apparent on their faces.

Yngve placed the beer on the table in front of me and sat down.

"So what do you write?" said the dark-haired girl, looking at me. "Poetry or prose?" Her eyes were also dark. There was something unmistakably aloof about her manner.

I took a long swig of beer.

"I'm writing a novel at the moment," I said. "But I'm sure I'll be doing some poetry as well. I haven't done much of that, but perhaps I'll have to . . . heh heh!"

"Wasn't it you who had your own radio program and stuff?" Kjersti said.

"Plus a review column in the local paper," Yngve added.

"Yes," I said. "But that's a while ago now."

"What's your novel about then?" said the dark-haired girl.

I shrugged.

"Variety of things. It's a mixture between Hamsun and Bukowski, I suppose. Have you read any Bukowski?"

She nodded and slowly turned her head to watch the people coming up the stairs.

Kjersti laughed.

"You'll have Hovland as your teacher, did Yngve tell you? He's fantastic!"

"Good," I said.

There was a little pause, the focus of conversation moved away from me, and I leaned back as the others chatted. They knew one another as they were in the same department, Media Studies, and that was what they were talking about. Names of lecturers and theorists, titles of books, records, and films ping-ponged across the table. While they were talking Yngve took out a cigarette holder, stuck a cigarette in it, and started smoking with gestures that the presence of the mouthpiece made seem affected. I tried not to look at him, not to show I had noticed, which is what the others did too.

"Another beer?" I said as a distraction, he nodded, and I walked over to the bar. One of the barmen was standing by the beer tap on the opposite side while the other was putting a tray of glasses through a hatch which turned out to be a dumbwaiter.

How wonderful, a little lift going up and down between floors with food and drink!

The barman by the tap turned lethargically, I raised two fingers in the air, but he said nothing and turned back. The second barman faced me, and I leaned over the bar to signal that I wanted to order.

"Yes?" he said.

He had a white towel slung over his shoulder, a black apron over a white shirt, and long mutton chops, and what looked like a tattoo was visible on his neck. Even the barmen looked cool in this town.

"Two beers," I said.

He held the glasses in one hand under the two taps while scanning the room.

A familiar face appeared at the back, it was Yngve's friend Arvid, he was with two others, they made a beeline for the table where Yngve was sitting.

The first barman put two glasses on the bar.

"Seventy-four kroner," he said.

"But I've just ordered them from the other barman!" I said, nodding toward the second man.

"You just ordered two from me. If you've ordered two from him as well, you'll have to pay for four."

"But I don't have enough money."

"Are you expecting me to pour the beer down the drain? You have to be clearer with your orders. One hundred and forty-eight kroner, please."

"Just a moment," I said, and went over to Yngve.

"You got any money?" I said. "You'll get it back when I have my study loan."

"Weren't you supposed to be paying for this round?"

"Yes . . ."

"Here you are," he said, handing me a hundred-krone note.

Arvid looked at me.

"Ah, it's you, is it?"

"Yes," I said with a quick smile, not knowing quite what to do, and ended up pointing toward the bar and saying, "Just gotta . . . ," and went to pay.

When I returned they had sat down at another table.

"Did you get four beers?" Yngve said. "Why?"

"Just the way it went," I said. "Some mix-up with the order."

The following morning it was raining, and I stayed in the flat all day while Yngve was at work. Perhaps it was meeting his friends that had done it, perhaps it was just term fast approaching, at any rate I suddenly panicked, I was no good and soon I would be sitting alongside the other students, who were probably much more experienced and gifted than me, writing texts, reading them out, and being judged.

I took an umbrella from the hat shelf, opened it, and made my way downhill in the rain. There was a bookshop in Danmarksplass, as far as I remembered. Yes, there it was. I opened the door and went in, it was completely empty and sold predominantly office equipment, it seemed, but they had some shelves of books, which I ran my eye along, with the dripping umbrella in my hand. I had very little money, so I decided to buy a paperback. Hunger by Hamsun. It cost 39.50, which left me with twelve kroner, I spent it on a nice loaf at the baker's in the little market square just behind. I plodded back uphill in the pouring rain which, along with the dark heavy clouds, cast a thick shroud over the landscape and changed its whole appearance. The water ran down windows and over car hoods, trickled out of gutters and down the hills, where it formed plow-shaped wavelets. The water gushed past me as I trudged upward, rain beating down on my umbrella, and the bag containing the loaf and the book slapping against my thigh with every step I took.

I let myself into the flat. The room inside was dimly lit, in the corners farthest from the windows it was dark, but all the furniture and objects in it quietly made their presence felt. It was impossible to be there without sensing Yngve, his personality seemed to permeate the rooms, and while I was slicing the fresh bread on the counter and taking out margarine and brown cheese, I wondered what atmosphere my room would exude and whether there was anyone in existence who would care. Yngve had found a place for me, he knew a girl who was going to Latin America for a year, she lived up on the Sandviken side of Bergen, in Absalon Beyers Gate, and I could have it until next summer. I was lucky, most new students lived in one of the dorms at first, either Fantoft, where Dad had rented a room during his studies when I was small, or Alrek, where Yngve had stayed for the first six months. Living in a student hall had low status, I knew that, the cool option was to live in town, preferably near Torgalmenningen, but Sandviken was good too.

I ate, cleared away the food, and settled down to read in the sitting room with a cigarette and a cup of coffee. Usually I read quickly, raced through the pages without taking much notice of how it was written, what devices or style of language the writer used, all I was interested in was the plot, which sucked me in. This time I tried to read slowly, take it sentence by sentence, notice what went on in them, and if it seemed significant to me, to underline the passage with the pen I held at the ready.

I discovered something on the very first page. There was a tense shift. First of all, Hamsun wrote in the past, then he suddenly switched to the present, and then back again. I underlined it, put the book down, and went to get a sheet of paper from the desk in my bedroom. Back on the sofa, I wrote:

> Hamsun, Hunger. Notes, August 8, 1988
> Starts in general terms, about the town. Perspective from a distance. Then main protagonist wakes up. Switches from past to present. Why? To create more intensity, presumably.

Outside, the rain was pouring down. The roar of the traffic in Fjøsangerveien sounded like an ocean. I carried on reading. It was striking how simple the storyline was. He wakes up in his room, walks noiselessly downstairs as he hasn't paid his rent for a while and then into the town. Nothing particular happens there, he just walks around and is hungry and thinks about it. I could write about exactly the same topic. Someone waking up in their room and going outside. But he had to have something about him, something special, like him being hungry for example. That was what it was all about. But what could it be?

Writing isn't black magic. You just have to come up with an idea, as Hamsun had done.

Some of my fears and anxieties subsided after I had formulated that thought.

When Yngve came home I was asleep on the sofa. I got up the moment I heard the door, rubbed my face a couple of times, for some reason not wishing to show that I had been sleeping in the middle of the day.

I heard him put his backpack down on the floor in the hall, he hung his jacket on the hook and said a brief hi to me on his way to the kitchen.

I recognized the closed face. He didn't want to have anything to do with anyone, least of all me.

"Karl Ove?" he shouted after a while.

"Yes?" I said.

"Come here."

I did as he said and stopped in the doorway.

"Just look at the brown cheese. You can't cut such thick slices. Do you want me to show you how to do it?"

He placed the slicer on the cheese and drew off a slither.

"Like this," he said. "Do you see how easy it is to cut a thin slice?"

"Yes," I said, and turned away.

"And another thing," he said.

I turned back.

"If you eat here clear away the crumbs. I don't want to have to go around cleaning up after you."

"OK," I said, and went into the bathroom. There were tears in my eyes, and I rinsed my face a couple of times with cold water, dried it, went into the sitting room, sat down, started reading Hunger while listening to him eat in the kitchen, clean up, and go into the bedroom. Soon there was total silence and I realized he must have fallen asleep.

A similar incident took place the next day, this time what annoyed him was that I hadn't dried the bathroom floor after having a shower. He ordered me around this time as well, as though he were on a higher level than me. I said nothing, bowed my head, did as he commanded, but inside I was furious. Later that day, as we were returning from a shopping trip I closed the car door in a way that he considered was too hard – do you have to slam the door so hard, can't you just be a little bit careful, this is not my car – and I exploded.

"Stop telling me what to do, alright!" I yelled. "I can't take any more of this! You treat me like a kid! Always telling me off!"

He looked at me for a moment with the car key in his hand.

"Have you got that?" I said, my eyes shiny.

"I'll never do it again," he said.

And he never did, either.

We went out often that week, and every time the same thing happened, Yngve met people he knew, introduced me to them, said I was his brother and I was about to start at the Writing Academy. That gave me an advantage, I was somebody already, didn't have to prove myself, although it also made things more difficult since I had to live up to the billing. Had to say something a writer-to-be might conceivably say which they hadn't considered before. It didn't work like that though. They had considered everything, they all knew more than me, indeed to such a degree that I gradually realized that what I said and thought was what they had said and thought a good while ago and had now put behind them.

But it was good drinking with Yngve. Our spirits rose after a few beers, all that lay between us during the day, the silences that could develop from nowhere, the irritation that could set in, the sudden inability to find areas of common interest, even though there were so many, all of that vanished as our spirits soared and we felt the concomitant warmth: we looked at each other and knew who we were. Walked through the town half drunk and uphill to the apartment without a care in the world, not even the silences troubled us, streetlights shone on the smooth asphalt, taxis raced past in dark haste, lonely men or women came toward us, or other young people who had been out on the town, and I could look at Yngve, who was walking bent double, just as I was, and ask: how is it with Kristin, have you got over her? And he could look at me and answer no, I'll never get over her. No one can hold a candle to her.

The drizzle, the clouds above scurrying past, illuminated from below by the lights, Yngve's serious face. The strong odor of car fumes that I had realized always hung over Danmarksplass. The moped carrying two teenagers, which stopped at the traffic lights: the boy at the front who put his feet down on the road; the girl at the back with her arms wrapped tightly around him.

"Do you remember when Stina broke up with me?" I said.

"Vaguely," he said.

"You played the Aller Værste! for me. 'All things pass, all things must decay.'"

He looked at me and smiled.

"Did I?"

I nodded.

"The same holds true for you now. It'll pass. Then you'll fall for another girl just the same."

"How old were you then? Twelve? It's not quite the same. Kristin was the love of my life. And I only have one."

I said nothing in response. We walked up the hill on the other side of Verftet, the old docklands complex, turned left beneath the massive red brick building I knew was a school.

"But one good thing has come out of it," he said. "Showing no interest in other girls has meant they've suddenly started taking an interest in me. I don't give a damn, and as a result I can have them."

"I know that's how it works," I said. "My problem is that I can't not give a damn. Take Ingvild, for example. I get so damn nervous when we meet that I can't say a word. So she thinks that's the way I am, and then it's no good."

"Don't worry," Yngve said. "It'll be fine. She knows who you are. You've been writing to each other all spring and summer after all."

"But that's the point, then I'm writing," I said. "Then I can be anyone I want to be. I can take my time, think things through. But I can't when I meet her face-to-face."

Yngve snorted.

"Don't think about it so much and it'll be fine. She'll be feeling the same as you."

"Do you think so?"

"Yes, of course! Have a few beers with her and relax. It'll be fine."

He took the key from his pocket, lowered his umbrella, and went in through the gate, up the little steps, which were dark and slippery from the rain. I stood behind him waiting for him to open the door.

"Feel like a glass of wine before going to bed?" he said.

I nodded.

My impatience grew throughout the week, I became more and more restless, a feeling I had otherwise never experienced. It must have been because I wanted life to get moving, to turn serious. And to do my own thing, not to be dependent on Yngve for whatever I did. I had already borrowed a couple of hundred kroner from him and probably needed a couple more to tide me over until my student loan arrived. I had been stupid enough to tell the post office that I was changing address when I moved from Håfjord, to c/o Yngve, so when I arrived, a debt recovery letter from the Northern Norwegian electricity company and the shop where I had bought the stereo were waiting for me. The latter was the more serious: if I didn't pay this time they would take legal action to retrieve the money.

If it had been a good sound system I wouldn't have minded so much. But what I had bought was such crap. Yngve had a NAD amplifier and two small but good JBL speakers, and Ola also had a good system, made up of components he had bought individually, that was what you should have, not a fucking Hitachi rack system.

Soon I would receive twenty thousand kroner.

I was also wondering whether to buy myself a porn magazine. I was living in a big town now, I knew no one, all I had to do was take one down from the shelf, place it on the counter, pay, put it in a bag, and go home. But I couldn't bring myself to do it, I was in a nearby tobacconist's a couple of times, and my eyes roamed down to the women's blond hair and their big breasts, and the mere sight of their skin, printed on glossy paper, made my throat tighten. But it was always a newspaper that I placed on the counter, and a pouch of tobacco, never any of the magazines. Mostly because I was living with Yngve, it didn't feel right to have to hide things in his place, but also because I didn't have the courage to meet the assistant's eyes as I laid the magazine on the counter.

I would have to wait.

The day of the move came, with Yngve I carried my Håfjord possessions up from the cellar into the car, there were eight boxes in all and they completely blocked the rear view when Yngve, more cautiously than usual, pulled away from the curb and set off down into Bergen.

"If you brake sharply now my neck's a goner," I said, because the boxes reached right up to the car roof.

"I'll try not to," he said. "But I can't promise anything."

For the first time in several days it was nice weather. The dense cloud cover over the town was grayish white, and the light in the streets around us was gentle, though not such that it veiled or enhanced, it was more that it allowed whatever there was to appear in its own right. Asphalt: gray and speckled black, walls: green and yellow, dulled by car fumes and street dust, trees: gray and green, the water in the bay by Verftet: gray and shiny. The colors became more vivid as we began to climb the hills on the Sandviken side of town, most of the houses there were timber constructions, and the shiny paint shimmered through the neutral light.

Yngve pulled up to the curb by a little park, in front of a telephone booth. On the wall across the road there was a sign saying Absalon Beyers Gate.

"Is it here?" I asked.

"It's the corner house," Yngve said, getting out. He raised his hand in a brief greeting, I followed his gaze, there was a girl with a cloth in her hand watching us from behind the window in the ground-floor apartment.

We crossed the street, she came to the door, I shook her hand. She said it was good timing, she had just finished cleaning the place up.

"Come on in!"

The apartment consisted of a small room, furnished in the simplest fashion: beneath the window there was a sofa, in front of it a coffee table, and against the wall on the opposite side a desk. There was also a sofa that could be turned into a bed. Adjoining the little room, separated by a door, was a tiny kitchenette. That was all. The walls were a dark, brownish color, and that would have been drab but on the fire wall beside the kitchen door a landscape had been painted: a tree on a cliff above the sea, not dissimilar to the picture on the front of matchboxes, the one Kjartan Fløgstad had used as the cover for Fire and Flame.

She noticed me staring at it, and smiled.

"Yes, isn't it nice!" she said.

I nodded.

"Here are the keys," she said, passing me a little bunch of them. "This one's for the front door, this is for this one, and that's for a storage room in the loft."

"Where's the toilet?" I said.

"Downstairs. There's a shared shower and toilet. It's a bit impractical, but it reduces the rent by quite a bit. Shall we go down and have a look?"

The staircase was steep, the corridor downstairs narrow, with a small basement studio on one side, where someone named Morten lived, a shower and a toilet on the other. I liked the unrefinedness of it and the old walls that vaguely smelled of mold, it had a Dostoevsky feel, the impoverished young student in the metropolis.

Back upstairs, she gave me a wad of rental forms, already filled in, grabbed the empty pail in one hand, the broom in the other, and turned to us in the doorway.

"I hope you'll have a nice time here! I've spent some happy hours here anyway."

"Thank you," I said. "Have a good trip and see you next summer!"

She disappeared around the corner with the broom slung over her shoulder, and we set about bringing in the boxes. When that was done, Yngve got in his car and drove down to the hotel, where he had an afternoon shift, while I put my feet on the table and smoked a cigarette before starting to unpack.

The apartment was at street level, the sidewalk went by the windows, and if there wasn't a constant stream of people passing, there was a regular bobbing of heads, and so enticing was the sight of a curtainless apartment that almost everyone succumbed to the temptation to peer in. I was bending over my record collection when I turned and met the gaze of a woman in her forties, who despite immediately looking away still left an impression on me. I put up the poster of John Lennon, turned and met the eyes of two twelve-year-old boys, I assembled the coffee machine, inserted the plug in the socket beside the cupboard, turned and found myself looking straight into the eyes of a bearded man in his late twenties. To put an end to this, I pinned a bedsheet over one window, a tablecloth over the other, and then I sat down on the sofa, strangely restless, it was as though the tempo inside me was greater than that outside.

I played a few records, brewed some tea, and read some pages of Hunger. Outside, it was beginning to rain. In the short pauses between the LP tracks I heard raindrops pitter-pattering against the window just behind my head. Now and then I heard noises from the floor above as dusk fell and the room slowly darkened. The stairs creaked, loud voices came from above, music was turned on, it was an early drinking session.

I wondered whether to call Ingvild, she was the only person I knew in town, but dismissed the idea, I couldn't meet her unprepared, I had only one chance and I didn't want to waste it.

45

Strange what an impression she had made. I had sat at the same table as her for half an hour.

Could you fall in love within half an hour?

Oh yes, you certainly could.

Could someone you didn't know, you barely knew about, captivate your senses entirely?

Oh yes.

I got up to find her letters. The longest one had arrived in the middle of the summer, she told me she was on her way across America with her ex-host family, they stopped at all the sights worthy of the name, they were many, according to her, nearly every single town had something it prided itself on and was famous for. She used the stops to sneak off and have a quiet cigarette, she wrote, otherwise she lay on her bed in the mobile home staring out at the countryside, which at times was sensationally beautiful and dramatic, at others monotonous and boring, though always exotic.

I could visualize her, but it was more than that, I also identified with her, that is, I knew exactly what she thought, how she felt, there was something about the tone in which she wrote, or the glimpses she gave of herself, which I recognized from myself, and I hadn't experienced that before, another person reaching the point where I was. Light, happiness, a lightness of feeling, excitement, somehow balancing on the edge of nausea, constantly on the verge of despair, because I wanted it so much, it was all I wanted, but what if it didn't work out? What if she didn't want me? What if I wasn't good enough?

I put down the letters, slipped on my jacket and shoes and went out, considered walking down to see Yngve, he didn't finish his shift until eleven, but if I was lucky he wouldn't have much to do, so we could exchange a few words or have a smoke or something.

First I crossed the street to have a look up at the floor above mine, but all I could see was the backs of some heads in the window. It was raining quite heavily, I didn't have an umbrella and I didn't want to wear my raincoat, so even though it was unpleasant and hair gel was beginning to run down my forehead, I hunched my shoulders and began to tramp downhill.

In the district closest to me, the houses were white and made of wood, all the angles askew, the roofs of varying heights, some had stone steps down to the pavement, others none. In the district below, the buildings were made of brick, long, relatively tall blocks of flats that might have been built at the beginning of the twentieth century, probably for workers, judging by the plain, unadorned walls.

Rising above the town, visible from even the deepest and darkest alleyway, were the mountains. And below, in glimpses between houses and trees, was the sea. The mountains here were higher than those in Håfjord, and the sea was just as deep, but they didn't affect your consciousness to the same degree; the main weight here lay in the town, in the cobblestones, the asphalt, the solid blocks of flats and timbered houses, in the windows and lights, cars and buses, the mass of faces and bodies in the streets, against which the sea and mountains were insubstantial, almost weightless, something that merely caught your eye, a backdrop.

If I had lived here all on my own, I thought, in a little cabin in the mountains, for example, without a house nearby, but set in exactly the same landscape, then I would have felt the weight of the mountains and the depth of the sea, then I would have heard the winds sweeping across the peaks, the waves beating against the shore, and although I would hardly have been afraid, I would definitely have been vigilant. I would have taken my leave of the landscape every night and woken up to it every morning. Now that wasn't the case, I could feel it with every fiber of my being, here it was faces that counted.

I walked by the long red timber shed, where the rope makers used to ply their trade, up the road on the other side, past the supermarket, down to the wider main road and turned right at the bottom, past the quiet gray Saint Mary's Church, which I had noticed when I visited Yngve and Mom here three years ago, as it was so unpretentious and merged so unobtrusively into its surroundings, it had stood there since the twelfth century, past it and down to Bryggen.

Cars drove by with their lights on. The water, gently billowing in the harbor, was pitch-black. A few yachts were moored to the quay, their shiny hulls dully reflecting the light from the street lamps along the road. On board one of them some people sat drinking under a canopy, voices low, faces barely illuminated. From over in Vågsbunnen came the strident sounds of cars, music, shouting, which had already become distant on the way here.

Yngve was standing behind the reception desk next to a colleague. He turned his head toward me as I entered.

"Are you bored already?" he said. Glanced at his colleague. "This is my brother, Karl Ove. He moved here a week ago."

"Hi," said the other person.

"Hi," I said.

He went into the back room. Yngve tapped a pen on the desk in front of him.

"Just had to get a breath of air," I said. "I thought I would pop by so my walk had some purpose."

"Well, there's nothing going on here," he said.

"So I see," I said. "Are you going home afterward?"

He nodded.

"But Asbjørn's in town. Perhaps we can drop in on you tomorrow and see how you're getting on?"

"Yes, why don't you," I said. "Could you bring an umbrella with you? You've got two, haven't you? Then I can borrow it until I get my study loan."

"I'll try and remember."

"See you then."

He nodded, and I went back out. I still didn't want to sit around in my flat, so I went for a walk through the rain-wet streets, up past Café Opera, which as predicted was packed with people, but I didn't dare venture in alone, down to the sea on the northern side of Vågen, past some run-down warehouse buildings, up a hill, on the crest of which I stopped because now, lo and behold, Bryggen and Sandviken were below me, on the far side of the bay, glittering in the damp gray-black air!

I strolled down to the broad open square on the southern side, passed a hotel of brick and glass, called Neptun, an apt name, it struck me, in this town where water was constantly trickling and dripping, and then I thought

I had better remember it so that I could write it down when I got home, looked behind me and saw a large stone gate at the end of a pedestrian street, and knew this was one of the old town gatehouses because Mom had shown me an identical one at the other end of the city center. I crossed the street, passed a large office block that towered up from the water like a rock face, rounded the corner and in front of me stood the Strandkai Terminal, where the Sognefjord ferry departed, and behind it, once again, Vågsbunnen.

A rush of happiness surged through me. It was the rain, it was the lights, it was the city. It was me, I was going to be a writer, a star, a beacon for others.

I ran a hand through my hair, greasy with gel, wiped it on my trouser leg, and stepped up my pace in the hope that this feeling of happiness would last all the way home and deep into the time awaiting me in the flat until I felt able to go to bed.

While asleep that night I imagined my bed was in the street. That wasn't so strange, I thought as I woke up, presumably from the distant pealing of church bells, because the bed was against the wall under the windows, and not only could you clearly hear every footfall on the pavement outside, but the house was also situated next to a junction where people going in their various directions stopped to have a chat on their way home from town, and across the street was a telephone booth, which it turned out was in constant use, also at night, people trying to book taxis, crowds of them, people wanting to deliver a few home truths to a partner or a friend or whoever it was they imagined had let them down and now needed to be put in their place or begged for forgiveness.

I lay still for a while to gather my thoughts, then dressed and went down to the basement with a towel in one hand and shampoo in the other. The corridor was full of steam, I placed my hand on the shower door, it was locked, a girl's voice from inside shouted, I won't be long! OK, I said, and leaned against the wall to await my turn.

The door beside me opened and a boy my age with tousled hair stuck his head out.

"Hi," he said. "Thought I heard someone. My name's Morten. Have you moved in to the apartment on the ground floor?"

"Yes," I said, shaking hands.

He chuckled. He was standing there in no more than his underpants.

"What do you do?" he said. "Are you a student?"

"I've just come to town," I said. "I'm about to start a kind of writing course."

"Interesting!" he said.

At that moment the shower door opened. A girl I reckoned was in her midtwenties came out. She had a large towel wrapped around her body and a smaller one around her head. A cloud of steam followed.

"Hi," she said with a smile. "We'd better do proper introductions later. Anyway, the shower's free now!"

She went down the corridor.

Morten chuckled.

"And what about you?" I said. "Are you a student?"

"Let's save that for later! You have a shower, and we'll come back to it!"

The shower-room floor was made of concrete and freezing cold where the hot water hadn't been. The drain was full of tangled hair that glistened in the foam from her shampoo. The foot of one wall panel was warped, and the otherwise white door was black and discolored at the bottom and a good way up. But the water was hot, and soon I was massaging shampoo into my hair and for some strange reason humming "Ghostbusters."

Returning upstairs, I didn't dare go out as Yngve hadn't said when they would come, but that didn't matter, my body felt much calmer than the day before, and I spent my time putting the kitchen utensils in their places, arranging clothes in the wardrobe, putting up the last posters, making a list of what I needed to buy when the study loan arrived. That done, I stood by the door and tried to see the room through Yngve's and Asbjørn's eyes. The typewriter on the desk, that looked good. The poster of the barn and the bright-yellow corn under the dramatic black American sky, that was good, a source of inspiration. The poster of John Lennon, the most rebellious of the four Beatles, that was also good. And my record collection on the floor against the wall, it was large and impressive, even for Asbjørn, who I was told knew what he was talking about. On the downside, the book collection was limited, comprising only seventeen volumes, and I didn't have enough experience of other collections to determine what impression the various titles made. Beatles and The Snails by Saabye Christensen, couldn't be too far wide of the mark though. The same was true for Ingvar Ambjørnsen. I had three of his books: The 23rd Row, The Last Joint Venture, and White Niggers.

I left Novel with Cocaine open on the table and placed a couple of issues of Vinduet next to it, one open, one closed. Three books open seemed a bit much, it looked arranged, but no one would be suspicious of two open and one closed, that was perfect.

An hour later, while I was trying to write, there was a ring at the door. Yngve and Asbjørn were standing on the steps. There was a restlessness about them, I felt, they couldn't wait to move on.

"Bit of a surprise, you turning up in Bergen, Karl Ove," Asbjørn said with a smile.

"Yes," I said. "Come in!"

I closed the door behind us. They stood in the middle of the floor looking around.

"You've done a nice job here," Yngve said.

"Mm," Asbjørn said. "Great place to have a room. Hang on though."

"Yes?" I said.

"The Lennon poster has to come down. It doesn't work."

"Oh?" I said.

"That's what you have at gymnas. John Lennon. C'mon."

He smiled as he spoke.

"Do you agree?" I said, looking at Yngve.

"Of course," he said.

"What should I put up instead?"

"Anything," Asbjørn said. "Norwegian C&W would be better. Bjøro Håland."

"Actually I like the Beatles," I said.

"You're kidding me," Asbjørn said. "Not the Beatles surely."

He turned to Yngve and smiled again.

"I thought you said your brother had great taste in music. And his own radio program."

"No one's perfect," Yngve said.

"Take a seat," I said. Even though I had been wrong-footed by the Lennon-poster discussion, and my head was still buzzing, since I had understood exactly why it was wrong the moment Asbjørn opened his mouth, it was schoolboy-ish of course, I was still proud to have them both here, in my place, surrounded by my possessions.

"We were thinking of going into town and having a café au lait or something," Yngve said. "You coming?"

"Can't we have a coffee here?" I said.

"It's better in Café Opera, isn't it?" Yngve said.

"Sure," I said. "Just a moment. I'll put on some clothes."

When we emerged onto the steps, both Yngve and Asbjørn donned shades. Mine were indoors, but it would have been too embarrassing to go back to get them, so I rejected the idea, set off down the hill with them, along the wet streets gleaming with the reflected sunbeams breaking through the holes in the clouds above us.

I had met Asbjørn only a couple of times, had never chatted with him at any length, but I knew he was important to Yngve, so he was important to me too. He laughed a lot, and always went very quiet afterward, I had noticed. He had short hair, a hint of sideburns, a slightly plump face and warm, observant eyes. With a not infrequent glint in them. Today, like Yngve, he was dressed all in black. Black Levi's, black leather jacket, black Doc Martens with yellow seams.

"Getting into the Writing Academy is pretty cool," he said. "And of course Ragnar Hovland's bloody great. Have you read anything by him?"

"No, actually I haven't," I said.

"You must. Sveve over Vatna, that's the definitive Norwegian student novel."

"Really?"

"Yes. Or the definitive Bergen novel. It's completely over the top. Oh yes, he's good, he is. He likes the Cramps. Enough said!"

Over the top was an expression they used a lot, I had noticed.

"Yes," I said.

"You've heard of the Cramps, I take it."

"Yes, of course."

"You're starting tomorrow, aren't you?" Yngve said.

I nodded.

"I'm a bit nervous, I must admit."

"You got in," Yngve said. "They know what they're doing."

"Let's hope so," I said.

Café Opera during the day was quite different from Café Opera in the evening. Now it was no longer packed with students drinking beer, now there were all sorts of people, even older ladies in their fifties, each with a cup of coffee and a piece of cake in front of them. We found a window table on the ground floor, hung our jackets over the backs of our chairs, and went to order. I was flat broke, so Yngve bought me a café au lait while Asbjørn ordered an espresso. When I saw him being handed a little cup I recognized it, it was like the one Lars and I had been served at the first motorway café after the Italian border, we had asked for coffee and were given those tiny cups, with coffee that was so concentrated and strong it was completely undrinkable. I had spat it back into the cup and looked at the waiter, who ignored me, nothing wrong with this coffee, ragazzi.

But Asbjørn seemed to like it. He blew on the black-brown surface and took a sip, put the cup down on the saucer and looked out the window.

"Have you read anything by Jon Fosse?" I said, looking at him.

"No, is he good?"

"No idea. He's one of the teachers, too."

"He writes novels, I know," Asbjørn said. "He's a modernist. A Vestland modernist."

"Why don't you ask me if I've read anything by Jon Fosse?" Yngve said. "I read books too, you know."

"I haven't heard you mention him, so I figured you hadn't," I said. "But you have?"

"No," Yngve said. "But I might have."

Asbjørn laughed.

"You two are brothers and no mistake!"

Yngve took out his cigarette holder and lit up.

"You haven't given up on the David Sylvian poses yet, I see," Asbjørn said.

Yngve just shook his head and slowly blew smoke across the table.

"I was looking for some Sylvian glasses, but my frame of mind changed when I heard the price."

"Dear God, Yngve," Asbjørn said. "That's the worst joke yet. And that's saying something."

"Yes, I hold up my hands." Yngve laughed. "But out of ten puns maybe one or two work well. The problem is you have to go through all the bad ones to get to the really good ones."

Asbjørn turned to me.

"You should've seen Yngve when he joked that the tiny rural airstrip in Jølster would have to be called Astrup International Airport. After our famous local artist. He laughed so much he had to leave the room!"

"Well, it was a good one," Yngve said, starting to laugh. Asbjørn laughed as well. Then, as if a switch had been thrown, he stopped and for a moment sat completely still. Took out his pack of cigarettes, he smoked Winstons, I noticed, lit one, and emptied his cup of espresso with his second sip.

"Is Ola in town, do you know?" he asked.

"Yes, he's been here for a while," Yngve said.

They began to talk shop. I had never heard of most of the names they mentioned, I knew nothing about Media Studies, so I couldn't join in, not even when they touched on films and bands I knew. It almost developed into an argument. Yngve thought there was nothing that was genuine per se, everything was in some way a pose, even Bruce Springsteen's image, which he used as an example. His naturalness was as affected and carefully studied as the eccentricity and posturing of David Sylvian or David Bowie. Of course, Asbjørn said, you're absolutely right, but that doesn't necessarily mean there can be no genuine expression, does it? Who then? Give me an example, Yngve said. Hank Williams, Asbjørn suggested. Hank Williams! Yngve snorted. He's surrounded by myths, that's all there is to him. What sort of myths? Country music myths, Yngve protested. Oh my God, Yngve, Asbjørn said.

Yngve glanced over at me.

"It's the same in literature. There's no difference between pulp fiction and highbrow fiction, one is as good as the other, the only difference is the aura they have, and that's determined by the people who read the stuff, not by the book itself. There's no such thing as 'the book itself.'"

I hadn't thought about any of this before, and I said nothing.

"What about comic books then?" Asbjørn said. "Is Donald Duck just as good as James Joyce?"

"In principle, yes."

Asbjørn laughed and Yngve smiled.

"But in all honesty," Yngve said. "It's the reception that defines a work or an artist, and that's what artists play on, of course. Irrespective of whether they enjoy high or low status, everything is a pose."

"You work as a receptionist, so you ought to know about reception," Asbjørn said.

"And the seams on your Doc Martens, by the way, they aren't real, they just seem it," Yngve said.

They laughed again, and then there was silence. Yngve got up for a newspaper, I did the same, and while we flicked through the pages I was so exhilarated by this scenario, by me sitting with two worldly-wise students in a café in Bergen on a Sunday afternoon and the fact that this wasn't an exception, wasn't a visit, I was part of this scenario and belonged here, I was so exhilarated that I could hardly take in what I was reading.

Half an hour later we left, they were going to see Ola, he lived in one of the streets behind the Grieg Hall, and Yngve asked me if I wanted to join them, but I said no, I had to try to prepare for the following day, while the real reason was that I was so happy it was too much for me and I had to be on my own.

We parted at the end of Torgalmenningen, outside a restaurant called Dickens, they wished me luck, Yngve told me to call and say how everything had gone, I asked if he could lend me some money, the very last time, he nodded and dug up a fifty-kroner note, and then I hurried across the large open square in the middle of the town as the rain gusted down, for even though the sun was still shining on the houses along the mountainside, the sky directly above me was heavy and black.

Back home in my room, I didn't just take down the poster of John Lennon, I tore it into small pieces and threw them into the wastepaper basket. Then I decided to ring Ingvild and ask if we could meet over the weekend, it was a good opportunity, I was in such a cheerful mood, and it was as though my cheerfulness opened a path to her, because it was her I had been thinking about all the way up the long hills, as though my inner being knew no better way to cope with the excitement after the hour with Yngve and Asbjørn than to counter it with more excitement, of a very different kind it was true, for while the unbearable excitement generated by Yngve and Asbjørn resided in the moment itself, what was happening there and then, the tension and excitement I felt with regard to Ingvild was about what was going to happen, at some point in the future, when the tension could actually be released and she would be mine.

Her and me.

The thought that this was indeed a possibility, and not just an illusory dream, exploded inside me.

Outside, the sky was clouding over, the sun could no longer be glimpsed, rain spattered on the road. I ran over to the telephone booth, placed the slip of paper showing the Fantoft number on top of the coin box, inserted a five-krone piece in the slot, dialed the number, and waited. A young man's voice answered, I asked to speak to Ingvild, he said no one by that name lived there, I said she was moving in soon, maybe she hadn't done so yet, he said, oh yes, that's right, one of the rooms is still unoccupied, I apologized for the disturbance, he said it was no problem, and I cradled the receiver.

At around seven the doorbell rang. I went out into the hallway and opened up; it was Jon Olav.

"Hi!" I said. "How did you know I was here?"

"I called Yngve. Can I come in?"

"Yes, yes, of course."

I hadn't seen him since Easter when we had been out in Førde and met Ingvild. He was studying Law in Bergen, but I understood from what he said over the next half an hour that he spent most of his time and energy on Young Friends of the Earth. He was the idealistic type, always had been: one summer when we had been staying with Grandma and Grandpa in Sørbøvåg, twelve or thirteen we must have been at the time, I had been leaning over the handlebars of a bike and talking about various girls who lived nearby, one of whom I had described as yucky, quick as a flash he had riposted, think you're a great catch, don't you?

I had cycled back and forth in my embarrassment, and I have always remembered that moment, his consideration for others and willingness to spring to their defense.

We chatted and drank a cup of tea, he asked if I wanted to see his place, it was nearby, of course I did, and off we went, down the hills.

"Have you seen anything of Ingvild this summer?" I said.

"Yes, a bit, a couple of times. How's it going with her? You were writing letters, weren't you?"

"Yes, we've been writing ever since. She's coming to Bergen now, so I was thinking of meeting her."

"Are you interested?"

"That's an understatement," I said. "I've never felt so strongly about anyone."

"Wow," he said with a laugh. "Here we are, by the way."

He stopped by one of the doors to a long tall brick building opposite the ropemaker's shed. The hall and stairs were made of wood, making it seem bare, almost primitive. The place consisted of two small rooms with a toilet in the corridor, no shower. His record collection, which I flicked through while he was in the bathroom, was small and random, there were as many good records as there were bad, some everyone bought when they came out, a couple of really good ones, like the Waterboys, a couple of less good ones, like the Alarm. It was the kind of collection that belonged to someone who wasn't particularly interested in records and who mostly followed the herd. But he had been in a band once, he could play the saxophone, and he had taught me the basic beat on the drums when we were young, and how to coordinate the hi-hat, the snare, and the bass drum.

"We'll have to go out one evening," he said when he returned. "Then you can meet my friends."

"Are they the same ones as before?"

"Yes. They always will be, I hope. Idar and Terje, they're the two I see most."

I got up.

"Let's talk about it. I'd better be off. First day of the course tomorrow."

"Congratulations on getting in, by the way!" he said.

"Thank you, it's a nice feeling," I said. "But I'm a bit nervous too. I've got no idea what the level is."

"Just do your thing. What I read was good anyway."

"Let's hope it goes alright," I said. "Catch you later!"

I came in the middle of the night, it woke me up and I lay for a few seconds in the darkness wondering whether to get up and put on clean underpants, but fell asleep immediately afterward. At ten to six I opened my eyes again. As soon as I became conscious and knew where I was, my stomach churned with nerves. I closed my eyes in an attempt to go back to sleep, but the tension inside me was too strong, so I got up, wrapped a towel around my waist, walked down the cold stairs, along the cold corridor, and into the equally cold shower room. After half an hour under the boiling hot water I went back upstairs and dressed, carefully and methodically. A black shirt and the black vest with the gray back. The black Levi's, the studded belt, the black shoes. Not a drop of gel spared to make my hair stand up as it should. I had also saved a plastic bag Yngve had given me, from Virgin, and in it I put my notebook and a pen, as well as Hunger, to give it a bit more weight.

I made the bed into a sofa again, had a cup of tea with a generous helping of sugar as I didn't feel like any breakfast, sat looking out the window, at the shiny telephone booth, sparkling in the sunshine, the sunless grass in the park behind, the trees at the back, and then the mountain that rose steeply, with the row of brick houses above, also in shadow, then got up and put on a record, flicked through a few issues of Vinduet, all to pass the time until it was nine and I could leave. Lessons didn't start until eleven, but I had planned to walk around town first, perhaps find a café and read a little.

A chimney sweep came down the street with his long brush wound into a ring over one shoulder. A cat strolled across the grass. An ambulance drove down the road along the mountainside, behind the brick houses, visible between them as it passed, it moved slowly, no siren blaring, no lights flashing.

Right there, at that precise moment, I felt as if I would be able to meet whatever challenges came my way, as if there were no limits to what I could do. This wasn't about writing, this was something else, a boundlessness, as if I could get up and go now, this very minute, and then just walk and walk to the end of the earth.

This feeling lasted for thirty seconds perhaps. Then it was gone, and even though I tried to summon it back, it refused to return, a bit like a dream that goes, slips from your grasp as you struggle to recall it after waking.

When, a couple of hours later, I wandered down to the center it was with a gentle, not unpleasant, nervousness in my body, indeed I felt light and at ease as I walked, there was something about the sun shining and the life in the streets around me. On my way up the hill to the square known as Klosteret I saw that long stalks of grass were growing through the asphalt and that in some places there were small bare boulders between the houses, they linked the town to the wild mountains around, and to the sea below, everything that had not been wrought by human hand, and the fact that the town was part of the landscape, not separate, somehow closed in around itself, as I had felt during the first two days there, sent a fresh wave of good feeling through me. Rain fell everywhere, the sun shone everywhere, everything was connected with everything.

Yngve had explained the route to me in detail and I had no problem finding my way, I walked down a narrow path, passed some strange crooked cottages, and there, at the bottom of a hill, lay Verftet at the water's edge. Made of brick, and built in the nineteenth century, it even had a tall factory chimney. I walked round to the entrance, touched the door, it was open, went in. An empty corridor with some doors, no signs. I continued along it. A man came out of one door, in his thirties or thereabouts, wearing big black glasses, a stained t-shirt, an artist.

"I'm looking for the Writing Academy," I said. "Do you know where it is?"

"No idea," he said. "It's not here anyway."

"Are you sure?"

"Of course I'm sure," he said. "If I wasn't I wouldn't have said anything."

"No, right," I said.

"But try upstairs on the other side. There are some offices and stuff there."

I did as he said. Went upstairs and through the door. A corridor with some pictures of Verftet in its heyday on the walls, a spiral staircase at the end.

I opened a door and walked along a corridor, one of the many doors was ajar and I peeped in, a workshop, I turned around and went back, stopped at the entrance hall, where a woman, probably in her early thirties with a light-blue coat and a plump face, big eyes and slightly crooked teeth, was just coming in.

"Do you know where the Writing Academy is?" I said.

"I think it's up there," she said. "Are you in the course?"

I nodded.

"Me too," she said, laughing. "I'm Nina."

"Karl Ove."

I followed her up the stairs. She carried a big bag over her shoulder, and the conventionality of her appearance, which resided not just in her coat, bag, and the small ladylike boots she wore but also in the way her hair was pinned up, how little girls used to have it in the nineteenth century, disappointed me, I had expected something rougher, wilder, darker. Not the norm at any rate. If they let in the norm, maybe I was also there because I was the norm.

She opened the door at the top of the stairs, and we stepped into a large room with slanting walls and three big windows on one side, two doors with a bookshelf between them on the other. In the middle were some desks arranged in a horseshoe shape. Three people sat there. Two men were standing in front of them. One, tall and slim, wearing a suit jacket with the sleeves rolled up, looked straight at us and smiled. He wore a gold chain around his neck, I noticed, and had several rings on his fingers. The other man, shorter in stature, also wearing a suit jacket, with a slight paunch which the much-too-tight jacket emphasized, sent us a hasty glance and looked down. Both had mustaches. The former may have been pushing thirty-five; the latter, who stood with his arms crossed, was around thirty.

They appeared nervous, in the sense that they both radiated a feeling that they would rather not be right here, right now. But in diametrically opposed ways.

"Welcome to the Writing Academy," the tall one said. "Ragnar Hovland."

I shook his hand, said my name.

"Jon Fosse," said the other one, and he said it quickly, in fact, he almost spat it out.

"Take a seat while we're waiting," Ragnar Hovland said. "There's coffee in the pot, and water in there, if you want it."

As he said this he alternated his gaze between Nina and me, but once he had finished he looked away. His voice trembled slightly as though he really had to make an effort to say what he did. At the same time he gave an impression of wiliness, as though he knew something no one else knew and then looked away to laugh at us inside.

"I haven't read any of your books yet," I said, looking at him. "But I've just been working as a teacher and at the school we used one of your textbooks."

"Well, that's strange," he said. "I've never published any textbooks."

"But I saw your name on it," I said. "I'm absolutely certain. Ragnar Hovland, isn't it?"

"Yes, it is. But, as I said, I haven't written any textbooks."

"But I saw it," I said.

He smiled.

"You couldn't have. Unless of course I have a doppelgänger somewhere."

"I'm absolutely positive," I said, but realized I wouldn't get any farther with this and put my bag down on a chair, went to the coffee machine, pulled a plastic cup off the low stack and filled it with coffee. I had seen his name, I was pretty sure. Why wouldn't he admit it? Surely there was no shame in publishing a textbook for schoolchildren? Or was that precisely what it was?

I took a seat, lit a cigarette, and pulled over an ashtray. Across the table a dark-haired, middle-aged woman sat looking at me. She smiled when I met her eyes.

"Else Karin," she said.

"Karl Ove," I said.

Beside her a girl was reading. She was probably about twenty-five, had long fair hair in a ponytail, it seemed to tauten her face and, along with her small straight lips, gave her a stern appearance, which the fleeting glance she sent me – where I sensed a good deal of skepticism – reinforced.

On her other side there was a man of the same age, tall and thin, he had a small head and a big Adam's apple, and a conspicuously drooping mouth, there was something distinctly formal about him, and conventional.

"I'm Knut," he said. "Nice to meet you."

At the door two more appeared, one had a beard and glasses, a red lumberjack shirt, a light-blue windbreaker, and a pair of brown corduroy trousers. He reminded me of the kind of temp who worked in shops selling second-hand comics or something like that. The other was a girl, quite short, wearing a large black leather jacket, black trousers, and a pair of robust black shoes. Her hair was also black, and she tossed her head and stroked back her bangs twice in the short time I was watching them. But her mouth was sensitive, and her eyes were as black as two lumps of coal.

"Petra," she said, and pulled a chair back.

"And my name's Kjetil," he said, and smiled slyly down at the desk.

She blinked twice in quick succession, and her lips drew back over her teeth as though she were snarling.

I didn't want to gape, so I stared through the large attic windows onto the fjord, there was a dock on the other side, containing a great rusting hull of a boat.

The door opened again, a woman of thirty to thirty-five came in, thin with a gray, dull appearance, apart from her eyes, which were happy and alive.

I took a sip of coffee and glanced at the dark-haired girl again.

Her face was so attractive, but her aura was hard, almost brutal.

She looked at me, I smiled, she didn't smile back, and I blushed, stubbed my cigarette out firmly in the ashtray, took my pad and placed it on the desk in front of me.

"I imagine that's everyone," Ragnar Hovland said, walking to the other end of the room with Jon Fosse, where there was a board on the wall. They sat down.

"Shall we wait for Sagen?" Fosse said.

"We'll give him a few more minutes," Hovland said.

I was definitely the youngest person there, by a fair margin. The average debut age for writers in Norway was a little over thirty, I had read somewhere. I would be a little over twenty. But several of the others were also younger than the average. Petra, the stern girl, Knut, Kjetil. They were all around twenty-five. The dark-haired one might be forty. She dressed like a forty-year-old anyway, wide sleeves and big earrings. But tight pants. Meticulously drawn eyebrows. And thick lipstick on her narrow lips. What the hell could she write?

And then there was the other one: Nina. There was something nebulous about her face, pale, a lot of skin, dark shadows under her eyes, cascading fair hair. She was probably better at writing; however, how good could she be?

In through the door came a short man who must have been Sagen. He was wearing a blue fur trapper hat, a brown leather jacket, blue shirt, and dark-brown corduroy trousers. Dark curly hair, a slight paunch.

"Sorry I'm late," he said, opened the door to the right, rummaged around in the room there, reemerged minus his jacket and hat. Sat down. A little bald patch.

"Shall we start then?" he said, looking at the other two. Hovland holding the edge of the chair, Fosse sitting with his arms crossed and looking down with his head turned to the side. Both nodded, and Sagen welcomed us to the course. He told us a little about how the school had come about, it had been his idea, how it had been established, this was the second year, and how it was a privilege to be here, we had been selected from more than seventy applicants, and the lecturers were among the best writers in the country. He turned it over to Fosse and Hovland, who told us a bit about the teaching program. This week we would go through the texts that we had sent in with our applications. Then there would be a section devoted to poetry, followed by one on prose, drama, and essays. In between there would be writing periods and guest lecturers. One of them would be here for several of the periods, his name was Øystein Lønn and he would be a kind of main teacher, as well as Hovland and Fosse, that is. In spring there would be a longish period for writing, after which we would submit an extended piece before the end and we would be assessed on that. As for teaching, the two lecturers would deal with the theory first, and this would be followed by written activities and textual analysis. There would be no history of literature, Jon Fosse said, this was the first time he had spoken, the texts they would go through and discuss would be predominantly recent ones, therefore modernist and postmodernist.

Øystein Lønn, another unknown writer.

I put up my hand.

"Yes?" Hovland said.

"Do you know anything about who the other guest lecturers are?"

"Yes. Not all the names have been confirmed yet. But Jan Kjærstad and Kjartan Fløgstad are two definites."

"Great!" I said.

"No women?" Else Karin said.

"Yes, of course," Hovland said.

"Perhaps we should do a round of introductions?" Sagen said. "If you say who you are, how old you are, and what you write, that sort of thing."

Else Karin, who started, took her time and looked at everyone around her individually as she spoke. She was thirty-eight, she said, and had published two novels, but she had never had any form of training, this year she hoped to take a step forward. Bjørg, the dull woman with the lively eyes, had also published a novel. None of the others had made their debut yet.

When it came to my turn, I said who I was, told them I was nineteen and wrote prose, somewhere between Hamsun and Bukowski, and was working on a novel at the moment.

"Petra, twenty-four, prose," Petra said.

We were given a syllabus, and then Sagen fetched a pile of books, they were for us, a gift from a publishing house, we could choose: either Gravgaver by Tor Ulven or Fra by Merete Morken Andersen. I hadn't heard of either of them, but chose Ulven because of his name, wolf.

Everyone drifted out of the rooms at the same time, and up the hill above Verftet I found myself walking alongside Petra.

"What do you think?" I said.

"About what?"

"The course!"

She shrugged.

"The lecturers were full of themselves and vain. But they might be able to teach us something all the same."

"They weren't vain, were they?"

She snorted and tossed her head, ran her hand over her fringe, looked at me and a little smile flitted across her lips.

"Did you see all the jewelry on Hovland? He was wearing a necklace and rings and even a bracelet. Looked like some sort of pimp!"

I didn't say anything, although I thought she was being hard.

"And Fosse was so nervous he didn't even dare look at us."

"They're writers, aren't they?" I said.

"So? Is that supposed to give them a dispensation? They only sit somewhere and write. That's all there is to it."

Kjetil sidled up alongside us.

"I wasn't actually accepted," he said. "I was on the waiting list and someone bailed at the last minute."

"That was lucky for you," Petra said.

"Yes, it wasn't a big deal. I already live here, so all I had to do was turn up."

He spoke Bergen dialect. Petra spoke Oslo dialect, the others did too, apart from Nina, who came from Bergen, and Else Karin, who came from somewhere in southern Vestland. I was the only Sørlander, and now that I thought about it, had there been any writers from Sørland at all? Vilhelm Krag, yes, but that was around the turn of the last century. Gabriel Scott? Same. Bjørneboe, of course, but then he had almost tried to erase any traces of his origins from his personality, at least that was how it seemed, judging by the TV interviews I had seen, in which he had spoken a refined form of riksmål, and, as far as the books he wrote were concerned, there weren't many characteristic Sørland features such as sea-smoothed rocks or double-ender boats in them.

Else Karin came up behind us all in a flurry. She seemed to be one of those women who surrounded themselves with a cloud of gestures and objects, bags and clothes, and cigarettes and arms.

"Hi," she said, planting her eyes on me. "I've worked out that I'm exactly twice your age. You're nineteen and I'm thirty-eight. You're really young!"

"Yes," I said.

"Fantastic that you got into the course."

"Yes," I said.

Petra turned away, Kjetil watched us with his good-natured eyes. Then we caught up with the others, they were standing at an intersection waiting for the lights to go green. The houses opposite were run-down, the walls gray with traffic fumes and dust from the road, the windows completely opaque. The sun was still shining, but over the mountains to the north the sky was very black.

We crossed the road, walked up a gentle hill, past a secondhand bookshop of the grubby kind, from what I could see in the windows: various comics were hanging at the back and some cheap paperbacks were laid out on a green felt cloth, all badly faded by the sun, which shone on the shop front during the afternoon. A bit farther, on the other side of the road, was the indoor swimming pool. I decided I would go there someday soon.

Up at Café Opera, we dispersed, I said good-bye and hurried homeward. I would have liked to buy some books, preferably a couple of collections of poetry because I had barely read a poem in my life, except for those we'd had at school, which had mostly been by Wergeland and Wildenvey, and the stuff I encountered during the weeks when we put on a kind of cabaret in Norwegian at gymnas, with Lars and me reading texts by Jim Morrison, Bob Dylan, and Sylvia Plath on stage. Those six poems were the only real poems I had read in my life, and first of all, I didn't remember any of them, and secondly, I had an inkling the kind of poems we would be analyzing at the Writing Academy would be different. However, books would have to wait until my loan arrived.

In the mailbox at home there were nothing but advertising leaflets, but among them was a little catalogue for an English book club based in Grimstad, of all places, which I perused carefully as you didn't need to have cash to get books there. I put a cross by Shakespeare's Complete Works, Oscar Wilde's Collected Works, T. S. Eliot's Complete Poems and Plays, all in English, and on one of the last pages there was a photography book, which I ordered, with pictures of scantily clad and naked women, it wasn't porn though, it was art, or at least serious photography, but for me it was all the same, and pins and needles ran down my spine at the thought that I could soon be sitting here and poring over them and . . . yes, jerking off. I still hadn't done it, but now I sensed that it would be unnatural not to do it, everyone probably did it, and then up came this opportunity, this book, and I put a cross next to it, wrote the number and title on the back, my name and address underneath, and tore out the order form. It was free, the book club also paid the postage.

While I was posting it I could send some change-of-address cards, I thought, and strolled off to the post office with the form and my little red and black address book in hand.

On the way back it began to rain. And it wasn't just the odd drop or two, gradually increasing in intensity, which I was used to, no, here it went from zero to a hundred in one second flat: one moment it wasn't raining, the next, billions of drops were falling to the ground at once, and from the road around me came a spattering, almost a clattering sound. I jogged downhill, laughing inside, what a fantastic town this was! And as always when I saw or experienced something wonderful, I thought of Ingvild. She was a living person who existed in the world with her own way of perceiving it, her own memories and experiences, she had her mother and father, her sister and her friends, the countryside she had grown up and walked in, all this resided within her, this immense complexity that is another person and of which we see so little when we are with them, yet it is enough to like them, to love them, for it takes nothing for this to happen, two serious eyes that suddenly beam with happiness, two playful teasing eyes that suddenly become unsure or introspective, that falter, a person faltering, is there anything more beautiful than that? With all their inner richness, yet faltering all the same? You see it, you fall in love with it, and it is not much, perhaps you will say it is not much, but the heart is always right. It never errs.

The heart never errs.

The heart never ever errs.

For the next few hours it was all pounding rain, bobbing umbrellas, furious windshield wipers, car headlights piercing the rain and murk. I sat on the sofa occasionally looking out to see what was happening, occasionally looking down at my book, Ulven's Gravgaver, of which I understood not one word. Even when I really concentrated and read as slowly as I could, several pages at a time, I didn't understand. I understood as good as all the words, that wasn't the problem, and I also understood the sentences, as such, but I didn't understand what they meant. I had no idea. And that took the wind out of my sails because I knew of course that there was a reason we had been given these two particular books. They were regarded as good literature, as having importance, and I didn't understand them.

I didn't have a clue. There was something about someone coughing on an old gramophone recording, then there was a man who drove an unbelievably warm car to a funeral, and then there was a couple who were at some kind of holiday resort. I understood that, but firstly there was no plot, and secondly there was no sequence of events, and no coherence, everything came at you higgledy-piggledy, and that was fine per se, but what was it that was higgledy-piggledy? It wasn't thoughts, there was no one in particular thinking this. There were no lines of argument either, or descriptions, it was just a bit of everything all at the same time, but it was no use trying to understand this, as I couldn't make sense of the bigger picture, what did it mean?

I hoped this was what we were going to learn.

I would have to follow closely, note down everything that was said, not waste a moment.

Modernism and postmodernism Fosse had said, that sounded good, it meant us and our time.

While I was eating lunch, that is, because of my impecunious state, five slices of bread, butter, and three soft-boiled eggs, there was a knock at the door. It was my neighbor from down below, Morten, holding a long black umbrella with a walking-stick handle and wearing a red leather jacket, blue Levi's, and boat shoes with white socks, and even though his hair wasn't a mess this time, there was still something wild about him, perhaps especially the look he was giving me, but it was in his body language too, as if something powerful was stirring inside him and he was expending all his energy on that. And then there was his laughter, which burst forth in the strangest of places.

"Hi again!" he said. "Can I come in? For a chat? A bit brief last time, you might say, heh heh."

"Come in," I said.

He stopped inside the door and looked around.

"Have a seat," I said, kneeling down by the stereo to put on a record.

"Betty Blue, yep," he said. "I've actually seen that one."

"It's a good film," I said, and turned to face him. He hitched his trousers up over his knees before he sat down. There was something formal about him, which, along with the vague yet intense impression of wildness, filled the whole room.

"Yes," he said. "Not bad, that one. Especially when she went nuts!"

"Yes, she did go nuts," I said, sitting down on the chair across the table from him.

"Have you lived here long?" I asked.

He shook his head.

"No, sir! I moved in two weeks ago."

"And you're studying Law?"

"Exactly. Clauses and paragraphs. And you're going to be a writer, didn't you say?"

"Yes. Started today."

"Shit, I wouldn't mind doing that. Articulating everything you feel inside," he said, thumping his chest. "I get so sad sometimes. Maybe you do, too?"

"Yes, it happens."

"Great to get it out, is it?"

"Yes. But that's not why, you know."

"Why what?"

"Why I write."

He looked at me with a self-assured smile, slapped both palms against his thighs, and prepared to stand up, or so it seemed, but he didn't, instead he leaned back in the sofa.

"Are you in love? Right now, I mean," he said.

I looked at him.

"Are you? Since you're the one asking."

"I'm fascinated by a girl. If I can put it like that. Fascinated."

"I am too," I said. "Incredibly so."

"What's her name?"

"Ingvild."

"Ingvild!" he said.

"Don't tell me you know her," I said.

"No, no. Is she a student?"

"Yes."

"Are you a couple?"

"No."

"Same age as you?"

"Yes."

"Monica's two years older than me. That's perhaps not so good."

He fiddled with the ribs of the umbrella, which was propped up against the sofa next to his calf. I took out my tobacco pouch and began to make a roll-up.

"Have you met the others in the house yet?" he said.

"No," I said. "Only you. And I caught a glimpse of the girl who was having a shower."

"Lillian," he said. "She lives behind the staircase on the same floor as you. An old lady lives above her. She sticks her nose into everything, but she's not dangerous. Above you is Rune. A nice fellow from Sogndal. That's it."

"I'll get to know them in time," I said.

He nodded.

"But now I won't take any more of your time," he said, getting up. "See you. I have the feeling I'll be hearing more about Ingvild soon enough."

He went out, his steps grew fainter as he went downstairs. I continued eating.

The next morning I walked up to the university to find out whether my loan had come through, it hadn't, and I went down a street alongside Høyden, as the university area was called, at the end was Mount Dragefjell, where the Law students' building was, there I turned right down one of the narrow alleyways and emerged unexpectedly by the swimming pool. As I passed I drew the air deep into my lungs because from a grating set in the pavement came the smell of chlorine, and with it all the pleasant memories of my childhood unfolded like flowers in the first rays of sun after a night of slumber.

Where I walked, however, there wasn't much sun to speak of, the rain was pouring down, hard and unremitting, and between the buildings the water in the fjord was heavy and gray, beneath a sky that was so low and full of moisture that the dividing line between it and the fjord appeared to have been erased. I had admitted defeat and put on a raincoat, a light-green affair that made me look like a bumpkin from the hills or something, but in this weather there was nothing else you could do, these weren't showers that were over in half an hour; the cloud cover above me was thick and gray, bordering on black, and hung over the town like a tarpaulin bulging with water.

It affected the atmosphere in the classroom because with all the boots and umbrellas and wet coats, as well as the gray light outside, which caused the room to be reflected in the windows, it was vaguely reminiscent of how it had been in all the various classrooms I had sat in over the years, including those in Northern Norway, which had already joined all the other good memories I had of rooms.

I sat down, took out my notebook, grabbed one of the stapled copies from the pile, and started to read, as that was what all the others were doing. Under the board sat Fosse and Hovland, doing the same. We were going through Trude's – she was the stern one – texts first. They were poems, and they were beautiful, I could see that right away. There were dreamy landscapes, horses, wind, and light, all concentrated into a few lines. I read them, but I didn't know what I was supposed to be looking for, had no idea what was good or not, or what might make them better. And as I read the fear grew in my breast, for this was immeasurably better than what I had written, there was no comparison, this was art, that at least I did understand. And what would I say if Fosse or Hovland asked me to comment on them? Some horses standing under a tree and, in the next line, a knife sliding across skin – what did it mean? Horses galloping across a field with thundering hooves and an eye hanging above the horizon?

Minutes later work started in earnest. Fosse asked Trude to read. She sat still for a few moments, concentrating, then she began. Her voice seemed to tone into her poems, it wasn't as if the poems came out of her mouth, I felt, rather, that they were already there in advance and she used her voice to access them. At the same time there was no room for anything else, her voice could only contain the poems, the few words that made up a rounded whole, with nothing of her in it.

I liked her writing, but also felt uncomfortable because it meant nothing to me, I didn't know what she was trying to say or what the poems were about.

After she had finished, Hovland took over. Now we had to comment on the texts, and we would do it in sequence so that everyone spoke and had a chance to say something. What we had to remember, he said, was that none of the texts we discussed in class was necessarily finished or complete, and we learned through criticism. But it wasn't only criticism of our own texts that was important to us, it was equally important to be involved and discuss others' texts, for what this course was based on primarily was reading, learning to read, improving our ability to read. For a writer it was perhaps most important not to write, but to read. Read as much as you can because in so doing you won't lose yourselves, become unoriginal, what happens is the opposite, by doing this you'll find yourselves. The more you read, the better.

The round of comments began. There was a lot of hesitation and groping for words, most people confined themselves to saying they liked this image or that sentence, but amid all this some concepts emerged which were carried on and slowly became the standard currency for everyone, such as "rhythm," the rhythm was "good" or "didn't quite flow," and then there was mention of "tone" and "the opening" and "the ending" and "deleting" and "cutting." That was a nice opening, and the rhythm's spot on, there's something a little unclear in the middle section, I'm not quite sure what it is, but something jars there, well, maybe you could shorten it a bit, I don't know, but then there's that strong image at the end which elevates the whole poem. That was how it began to sound when poetry was being discussed. I liked this way of talking because it didn't exclude me, I could understand openings and endings, I became particularly good at endings, the idea that something had to rise and resonate after the last line. I always looked for that, and if I found it I piped up. If I didn't, I said so too. You sort of shut off the poem here, I would say then. Can you see? The last line? It's a conclusion, it shuts itself off. Can't you delete it? Then you open everything up. Do you see? Also the question of line breaks came up in these readings. It soon transpired that chopped-up prose, as it was called, whereby standard prose was divided up as if it were a poem, was the enemy, the nightmare in person. It looked like a poem, but it wasn't, and this was the 1970s, something they did back then. We also discussed all the literary devices, such as metaphors and alliteration, but not often, because Fosse and the students who wrote poetry had an aversion to metaphors, I noticed, there was almost something ugly about metaphors, or old-fashioned, in the sense of passé or antiquated and useless for our purposes. It was bad taste, quite simply, tacky. Alliteration was even worse. What was important was mostly rhythm, tone, line breaks, openings and endings. Jon Fosse, I noticed, when he made any comments, was always looking for whatever was unusual, different, out of the ordinary, as well.

This first session, however, was almost completely terminology-free, only Knut had a vocabulary fit to talk about poems, and his words also had the greatest impact. Trude sat in deep concentration, taking it all in, making occasional notes and also asking direct questions, why this, why not that. I could see she was a writer and a poet, and she not only wanted to go far, she was already well ahead.

When my turn came I said the poems were full of atmosphere and they were profound but a bit difficult to talk about. In some places I didn't quite understand what she was trying to achieve. I said I agreed with a lot of what

Knut had said, I particularly liked this line while she might consider leaving out that line.

While I was speaking, I could see she didn't care. She didn't take any notes, she wasn't concentrating, and she watched me with a little smile at the corners of her mouth. I was upset and angry, but there was nothing I could do, other than sit back, push my papers away, say I had nothing more to add, and sip my coffee.

After that Jon Fosse held forth. While both the way he moved his head – in jerks, like a bird, sometimes as if he had been startled by or remembered something – and the way he spoke – hesitantly, full of pauses, stutters, coughs, snorts, an unexpected deep breath here and there – suggested nervousness and unease, what he said was, by contrast, completely assured. He was utterly sure of himself, there was no room for doubt: what he was saying was right.

He went through all the poems, commented on their strengths and weaknesses and said that horses were a fine ancient motif in poetry and art. He cited the horses in The Iliad and the horses in the Parthenon Frieze, he cited the horses in Claude Simon, but these, he said, were more a kind of archetype, I don't know, have you read Ellen Einan? Something here is reminiscent of her. Dream language.

I wrote everything down.

The Iliad, the Parthenon, Claude Simon, archetype, Ellen Einan, dream language.

On my way home that afternoon I nipped up the alleyway to the left after the hill by Verftet to avoid having to walk with the others. It was still raining, as persistently and heavily as when I arrived, and all the walls, all the roofs, all the lawns, and all the cars were wet and shiny. I was elated, it had been a good day, and Trude's total disregard for what I had to say, indeed her demonstration of this to others, didn't bother me at all anymore because in the break, when we had been in the café opposite Klosteret, I had spoken to Ragnar Hovland and exchanged opinions about Jan Kjærstad. In fact, it had been me who brought up his name. Else Karin had asked me what I liked reading, apart from Hamsun and Bukowski, I had said my favorite author was Kjærstad, especially his last book, The Big Adventure, but also Mirrors and Homo Falsus, yes, and also The Earth Turns Quietly was good. She said his books were a little cold and contrived. I said that was exactly the point, Kjærstad wanted to describe humanity in a different way, not from within but from without, and the notion that characters in books were warm was a delusion, that was a construct too, of course, we had just got used to it and thought of this mode as genuine or warm while other ways of writing were equally genuine. She said yes, I understand that, but I still think his characters are cold. And this "I think" was a victory for me, it wasn't an argument, just a feeling, empty words.

After the break it was Kjetil's turn, and his texts, which were prose and bordered on fantasy and the grotesque, were talked about in quite a different way. This wasn't about openings and endings or tone, we dealt more with the plot and individual sentences, and when someone said it was too exaggerated, I said I had perceived this to be the whole point, that it was "over the top." The discussion was much livelier, this was easier to talk about, and it was a relief, this was material I could get my head around.

Tomorrow my texts would be read and discussed. I was terrified, yet looking forward to it too, as I walked up Strandgaten, in some way what I had written had to be good, otherwise I wouldn't have been accepted into the course.

Up the mountainside, from the station with the gleaming cobblestones, the bright red Fløibanen glided smoothly into the green. Funicular, it said in neon lights, and there was something alpine about this short ascent, a funicular railway rising from a town center, a stone's throw from the old German wooden houses. If you took away the water you could well imagine yourself in the German-Austrian Alps.

And, oh, the darkness that was a constant in Bergen! Not linked to night in any way, nor to shadow, nevertheless it was almost always here, this muted darkness suffused with falling rain. Objects and events became so concentrated when it was like this because the sun opened up airspace, and everything that was in it: a father putting shopping bags in the trunk of a car outside Støletorget, while the mother bundled their children onto the back seat, got in at the front, drew the safety belt across her chest and buckled it into place, watching this when the sun was shining and the sky was light and open was one thing, then all their movements seemed to flutter past and vanish the moment they were carried out; however, it was a very different matter watching the same family if it was raining, enveloped by the muted darkness, for then there was something leaden about their movements, it was as if they were statues, these people, transfixed in this moment – which, the very next, they had left anyway. The garbage cans outside the stairs, seeing them in strong sunlight was one thing, they were hardly there, as almost nothing was, but it was quite a different matter in rain-darkened daylight, then they stood like shining pillars of silver, some of them magnificent, others sadder and more wretched, but all there, just then, at that moment.

Yes, Bergen. The incredible power that lay in all the various housefronts squeezed together everywhere. The head rush you had as you slogged your way uphill and saw this, at your feet, could be wonderful.

But it was also good to lock yourself in your room after a walk through the town, it was like being in the eye of a storm, sheltered from prying eyes, the only place where I was totally at peace. This afternoon I had run out of tobacco, but I had known it would happen and had saved all the stubs from recent days. After putting on the coffee machine, I took the scissors from the drawer and set about snipping the ash off the stubs. When I had done that I opened them up and sprinkled the bone-dry tobacco into the pouch, which in the end was half full. My fingertips were black and reeked of smoke, I rinsed them under the tap, and then I cut a slice of raw potato and put it into the pouch; soon the tobacco would have absorbed the moisture and be like new again.

In the evening I went to the pay phone and called Ingvild. Once again a man answered. Ingvild, yes, hold on a moment and I'll see if she's at home.

I was trembling as I waited.

Footsteps approached. I heard someone take the receiver.

"Hello?" she said.

Her voice was darker than I remembered.

"Hello," I said. "Karl Ove here."

"Hi!" she said.

"Hi," I said. "How's it going? Have you been in town long?"

"No, I arrived on Monday."

"I've been here a couple of weeks already," I said.

Silence.

"We were talking about meeting, if you remember," I said. "I don't know if you still want to, but what about Saturday?"

"Yes, I've got nothing on the calendar then, no." She chuckled.

"Café Opera maybe? Then we can go to Hulen afterward. What about that?"

"Just like real students do, you mean?"

"Yes."

"Sounds fine. But I warn you: I'll be a bundle of nerves."

"Why?"

"Well, I've never been a student before. Plus, I don't know you."

"I'll be a bundle of nerves too," I said.

"Good," she said. "So perhaps it doesn't really matter if we don't say much."

"No," I said. "Quite the contrary. That sounds great."

"Now don't exaggerate."

"It's true!" I said.

She chuckled again.

"This is my first student date. Café Opera on Saturday. Shall we say . . . well, when do students actually go out?"

"Your guess is as good as mine. Seven?"

"That sounds about right. Let's say seven then."

My stomach constricted as I crossed the street and went back to my room.

I felt as if I could throw up at any time. And that was after everything had gone well. However, saying a few words on the phone was not the same as sitting face-to-face, with nothing to say and your guts on fire.

There were two things that particularly bothered me in those days. One was that I came too fast, often before anything had happened at all, and the other was that I never laughed. That is, it did happen once in a while, maybe once every six months, when I could be overcome by the hilarity of something and just laugh and laugh, but that was always unpleasant because I completely lost control of myself then, I was unable to regain my composure, and I didn't like showing that side of me to others. So basically I was able to laugh, I had the capacity, but in my everyday life, in social situations, when I was with people around a table chatting, I never laughed. I had lost that ability. To make up for this, I smiled a lot, I might also emit some laughter-like sounds, so I don't think anyone noticed or found it conspicuous. But I knew: I never laughed. As a result, I became especially conscious of laughter as such, as a phenomenon, I noticed how it occurred, how it sounded, what it was. People laughed almost all the time, they said something, laughed, others said something, everyone laughed. It lubricated conversations or gave them a shot of something else, which didn't have so much to do with what was being said as with being together with others. People meeting. In this situation everyone laughed, each in their own way, of course, and sometimes because of something genuinely funny, in which case the laughter lasted longer and could at times completely take over, but also for no apparent reason at all, just as a token of friendliness or openness. It could conceal insecurity, I knew that well, but it could also be strong and generous, a helping hand. When I was small I laughed a lot, but at some point it stopped, perhaps as early as the age of twelve, at any rate I remember there was a film with Rolv Wesenlund that filled me with horror, it was called The Man Who Could Not Laugh, and it was probably when I heard about it that I realized actually I didn't laugh. From then on, all social situations were something I took part in and watched from the outside as I lacked what they were full of, the interpersonal link: laughter.

I wasn't glum though. I wasn't a wet blanket! I was no introverted brooder! I wasn't even shy!

I just seemed to be.

Even though it was only the third time I had attended the Writing Academy it already felt familiar, almost homey, both the way there, first the steep hills down to Vågsbunnen, then along the row of office blocks and shops in Strandgaten, then up the hills by Klosteret and down the narrow alleyway opposite, all woven into the veil of rain that fell from the low sky and even the room we occupied, with the bookshelf on one side, the board on another, and the slanting wall with the windows on a third. I entered the room, said hi to those already present, took off my wet coat, retrieved my papers and book from my wet plastic bag, placed them on the table, poured myself some coffee, and lit a cigarette.

"What weather," I said, shaking my head.

"Welcome to Bergen," Kjetil said, looking up from a book.

"What are you reading?" I said.

"All Fires the Fire. Short stories by Julio Cortázar."

"Are they good?"

"Yes. But they're perhaps a bit cold," he said, smiling. I smiled back. In the middle of the table was a pile of photocopies, I recognized them as mine from the typeface, the typewriter symbols and the few corrections I had made with a black felt pen, and took one.

Else Karin caught my eye.

She was sitting with one leg tucked underneath her on the chair, her left arm wrapped around her knee, her right hand holding a cigarette and my manuscript.

"Are you nervous?" she said.

"Yes and no," I said. "A bit maybe. Did you like it?"

"You'll have to wait and see!" she said.

Bjørg, who was sitting next to her, glanced at us and smiled.

Through the door at the other end came Petra – with neither an umbrella nor rain gear – her black leather jacket glistening and her wet hair hanging over her forehead. Right behind her came Trude, wearing green waterproof trousers and jacket, the hood laced up tightly around her neck, on her feet high wellies, on her back a leather backpack. I stood up, went to the kitchenette, and poured myself another cup of coffee.

"Anyone else want any?" I said.

Petra shook her head, no one else looked in my direction. Trude was standing under the slanting window and pulling off her trousers, and even though she had jeans underneath, just the movements, wriggling and squirming, gave me a hard-on. I put my hand in my pocket as I walked back to my place as nonchalantly as possible.

"Is everyone here?" Hovland said from his chair under the board. Fosse was sitting beside him with his arms crossed and his eyes downcast, as on the first two days.

"We're going to spend the first part of today on Karl Ove's texts. Then we'll go through Nina's after the break. If you're ready, Karl Ove, you can start reading yours."

I read, the others followed attentively in their copies. When I had finished, the commentary round began. I jotted down key words. Else Karin thought the language fresh and alive, but the plot somewhat predictable, Kjetil said it was credible but slightly tedious, Knut thought it was reminiscent of Saabye Christensen, not that there was anything wrong with that per se, as he put it. Petra considered the names stupid. Come on, she said, Gabriel and Gordon and Billy. That's intended to be cool, but it's just childish and silly. Bjørg thought it was interesting, but she would like to know more about the relationship between the two boys. Trude said the writing had oomph, but there were many clichés and stereotypes, in fact, as far as she was concerned there were so many it bordered on being unreadable. Nina liked the radical use of "a" endings in the Norwegian and the descriptions of nature.

Finally, Hovland gave his opinion. He said this was realistic prose, it was recognizable and good, in some places he had been reminded of Saabye

Christensen as well, and of course there were some linguistic shortcomings here and there, but the writing had great power, and it was a story, which was an artistic achievement in itself.

He looked at me and asked if I wanted to add anything or if I had any questions. I said I was happy with the way we had gone through the text and I had got a lot out of it, but I was wondering what the clichés and stereotypes were, could Trude give me some examples?

"Yes, of course," she said, and picked up her text. "'Land where no white man has set foot' for example."

"But that's supposed to be a cliché," I said. "That's the whole point. That's how they see the world."

"But even that's a cliché, you know. And then you've got 'the sun peeped through the foliage' and 'the ominous black clouds that betokened thunder' – betokened, right? Then you have 'the Colt nestling warmly in his hand' – nestling warmly. I ask you. And it's like that throughout."

"It's also quite affected and pseud," Petra said. "When 'Gordon,'" she said, making finger quotes and smiling, "says 'gir deg five seconds,' that's so stupid because we understand the writer wants us to understand the characters have seen it on TV and, like, use English."

"Now I think you're being unfair," Else Karin said. "This is not poetry we're talking about. We can't make such high demands of single sentences; it's the totality that counts. And as Ragnar said, this is a story, and making it work is an art."

"Just keep at it," Bjørg said. "I think it's interesting! And I'm sure there will be a lot of changes along the way."

"I agree," Petra said. "Just change the stupid names and I'm happy."

After this discussion I was angry and ashamed, but also confused because although I assumed the positive words had been said to reassure me, the fact still remained that I had gotten into the course, which, for example, Kjetil had not, so there must have been something good in what I had written. Clichés though were the bane, and according to Trude my texts consisted of nothing else. Or was it just that she was so snobbish she thought she was someone, a poet, in some way better than everyone else? Else Karin had said that I wasn't writing poetry, and Hovland had also emphasized that this was realistic prose.

This was how my mind was working as the others unpacked their lunches and Else Karin put on a new pot of coffee. But I realized I couldn't turn introspective now, that would give the impression it had upset me, that they had scored a hit, which would be the same as admitting that what I wrote wasn't as good as what they wrote.

"That book you were reading, could I have a look at it?" I said to Kjetil.

"Of course," he said, and passed it to me. I skimmed through it.

"Where's he from?"

"Argentina, I think. But he lived in Paris for a very long time."

"Is it magic realism?" I said.

"Yes, you might call it that."

"I really like Márquez," I said. "Have you read him?"

Kjetil smiled.

"Yes, but he's not quite my style. It's a bit too high-flown for me."

"Mhm," I said, handing the book back and writing 'Julio Cortázar' in my notebook.

After lessons I went to Høyden to pick up my student loan. I joined the line at the Natural History Museum, it wasn't very long, the day was almost over, I showed my ID, signed, and was given an envelope with my name on it, I shoved it into my plastic bag and set off toward the Student Center, where, among many other things, there was a little bank. The gray concrete building on a gentle slope shimmered in the rain. Through the doors, one at the front and two at the sides, students came and went, individuals hurrying, groups walking slowly, some familiar with this world, others new like me, they weren't difficult to spot, at least if my theory was correct: that those who seemed flustered and confused, with all their senses open, could not have been there more than a few days.

I went in, up the long stairs, and entered the large open concourse, full of columns and staircases, people at stands everywhere, there was the Student Radio, Student Newspaper, Student Sports Association, Student Kayak Club, Student Christian Association, but I had been here before and headed with determined step toward the bank at the end, where once again I joined a line, and after a few minutes I had transferred the money into my account and taken out three thousand kroner, which I stuffed into my pocket before going down to Studia, the student bookshop, where I wandered among the shelves for the next half hour, at first disorientated and irresolute, there were so many subjects that were interesting and I thought I might need when I was writing, such as psychology, philosophy, sociology, or art history, but I concentrated on literature, that was the most important, I wanted something about how to read poetry, and perhaps a book about modernism, as well as some collections of poetry and novels. First I found a novel by Fosse, called Blood. The Stone Is, the cover was black with a picture of a semi-illuminated face, I turned the book over, on the back it said "Jon Fosse, 27 years old, cand. Philol. and lecturer at the Writing Academy in Hordaland, has this year published his fourth book," and I was proud because I studied at the Writing Academy, it was almost as though this was about me. I had to have that one. In addition, there were several books by James Joyce, I chose the one with the most appealing title, Stephen Hero, and then I found one on textual analysis, it was Swedish and called From Text to Plot, I had a flip through, the chapters were entitled "What Is a Text?," "Explain or Understand?," "The Text," "The Plot," "The Story," and might have been a bit basic, I thought, yet there were terms in it I didn't understand, such as "Toward Critical Hermeneutics" or "Historical Time and Phenomenological Time's Aporia," but that just whetted my appetite, I wanted to learn, and I took the book with me. I found a collection of poems by Charles Olson, I knew nothing about him, but as I leafed through it I saw the same kind of poetry as Trude had written, and I took that as well. It was called Archaeologist of Morning. I added two books by Isaac Asimov to the pile, I had to have something light to read as well. Beside them was a novel by someone called John Berger, G., on the inside flap it said it was an intellectual novel, and I took that, too. I couldn't find any Cortázar, but I did find a paperback entitled The Thief's Journal by Jean Genet, which I couldn't resist either, and finally I decided I should have some philosophy as well and was lucky enough to lay my hand immediately on a book about philosophy and art: Introduction to Aesthetics, Hegel.

After paying for all these books I went up the stairs to the canteen. I had been there once before, with Yngve, but then I hadn't needed to think, he took care of everything, now I was on my own, and my brain reeled at the sight of all the students sitting in the enormous room eating.

At one end was the counter, where you were either served lunch or you helped yourself to what there was in the glass cabinet, and then you paid at one of the three cash registers and went to find somewhere to sit. The windows at the opposite end were misted up, the air, through which the buzz of voices rose and sank, was damp and clammy.

I looked across all the tables, but needless to say didn't see anyone I knew. The thought of sitting there all alone was terrible, so I turned and went the other way, for there, at the side facing Nygård Park, was the Grill, where they served hot dishes and beer, a bit more expensive than the canteen, but what did that matter, my pockets were full of money and I didn't need to scrimp and save.

I ordered a hamburger, fries, and a large beer and carried the tray to an unoccupied window table. The students sitting here seemed older and more experienced than those in the canteen, and there were also some older men and women who, I guessed, were lecturers, unless they belonged to the group of eternal students I had heard about, men in their forties with tousled hair and beards and sweaters, who in the fifteenth year of their studies were still working on their majors in an attic somewhere as the world raced past.

As I ate I flicked through the books I had bought. On the inside flap of the Fosse book there was a 1986 quote from Kjærstad: "Why isn't Bergens Tidende full of feature articles about Jon Fosse?"

So Fosse was a good writer, and not just that, he was one of the leading lights in the country, I thought, raising my gaze as I chewed the bread and meat into a tasty pulp. The bushes in Nygård Park stood like a green wall against the narrow wrought-iron fence, and in the gray air above them the rain angled down, caught by a sudden gust of wind that whistled along the street beneath me the very next moment and flapped at the umbrellas of two women who had just walked down the stairs.

In the evening I called Yngve and asked where he had been hiding recently. He said he'd been working and had been out the night the loan arrived and I had to get a phone so that he didn't have to walk all the way up to my digs every time he wanted something from me. I said I'd gotten my loan now and I would think about buying a phone.

"Did you have a good time?" I persisted.

"It was good. I came home with a girl."

"Who was she?" I said.

"No one you know," he said. "We've seen each other at Høyden, that's all."

"Are you going out with her now?"

"No, no, no. It's not like that. What about you? How's it going?"

"Fine. But there's a lot to read."

"Read? I thought you were supposed to be writing."

"Ha ha. I just bought a Jon Fosse. Looks good."

"Oh yes," he said.

There was a silence.

"But if you haven't started writing yet, perhaps you can write some lyrics for me? Or preferably several. So that I can finish the songs."

"I'll try."

"Why don't you?"

I sat over Yngve's songs all evening and into the night, with music on my stereo, drinking coffee and smoking. When I went to bed at three, I had two semi finished, well on the way, and one completely finished.

YOU SWAY SO SWEETLY

Give me a smile

Dance, dance, dance
In a mindless trance
Don't ever stop
Keep on dancing
Until you drop

You sway so sweetly
You sway so sweetly
You sway so sweetly
You move so well

After lessons on Friday we went out. Hovland and Fosse took us on their obviously well worn path to Wesselstuen. It was a great place, the tables were covered with white cloths, and as soon as we sat down a waiter in a white shirt and black apron came over to take our orders. I hadn't experienced that before. Our mood was nice and relaxed, the week was over, I was happy, there were eight of us carefully selected students sitting round the table with Ragnar Hovland, already a legend in student circles, at least in Bergen, and Jon Fosse, one of the most important young postmodern writers in the country, who had also received good reviews in Sweden. I hadn't spoken to them privately yet, but now I was sitting next to Hovland, and when the beer arrived, and I'd had a swig, I seized the opportunity.

"I've heard you like the Cramps."

"Oh?" he said. "Where have you heard such malicious gossip?"

"A friend told me. Is it true? Are you interested in music?"

"Yes, I am," he said. "And I do like the Cramps. So, yes . . . Say hi to your friend and tell him he's right."

He smiled, but there was no eye contact.

"Did he mention any other bands I liked?"

"No, just the Cramps."

"Do you like the Cramps then?"

"Ye-es. They're pretty good," I said. "But the music I listen to most at the moment is Prefab Sprout. Have you heard their latest? From Langley Park to Memphis?"

"Certainly have, although Steve McQueen is still my favorite."

Bjørg said something to him from across the table, and he leaned over to her with a polite expression on his face. Jon Fosse sat beside her and chatted to Knut. His texts had been the last ones we went through, and he was still full of it, I could see that. He wrote poems, and they were remarkably short, often only two or three lines, sometimes only two words beside each other. I didn't grasp what they were about, but there was something brutal about them, and you wouldn't believe that when you saw him sitting there smiling and laughing, his presence was almost as friendly as his poems were short. He was garrulous as well. So personality wasn't the reason.

I put my empty beer glass down on the table in front of me and wanted another, but I didn't dare call over the waiter, so I had to wait until someone else ordered.

Petra and Trude sat beside me chatting. It was as if they knew each other from before. Petra suddenly seemed very open while Trude had completely lost her stern concentrated demeanor, now she had a girlish air, as though a burden had been lifted from her shoulders.

Although I couldn't really claim to know any of the other students, I had seen enough of them to form an impression of their characters, and even though these didn't necessarily coincide with their texts, except in the case of Bjørg and Else Karin, who both wrote the way they looked, I felt pretty sure I knew who they were. The exception was Petra. She was a mystery. Sometimes she would sit quietly staring down at the desk, with no presence in the room at all, it was like she was gnawing at her insides, I thought then, for despite not moving and despite her eyes being fixed on the same point, there was still an aggression about her. She was gnawing at herself, that was the feeling I had. When she eventually looked up there was always an ironic smile playing on her lips. Her comments were usually ironic, and not infrequently merciless, though somehow correct, albeit exaggerated. When she was enthusiastic this could vanish, her laughter might then become heartfelt, childish even, and her eyes, which so often smoldered, sparkled. Her texts were like her, I thought, as she read them, just as spiky and grudging as she was herself, at times clumsy and inelegant, but always full of bite and force, invariably ironic, though not without passion even so.

Trude got up and walked across the room. Petra turned to me.

"Aren't you going to ask me what bands I like?" she said with a smile, but the eyes she fixed on me were dark and mocking.

"I could," I said. "What bands do you like?"

"Do you imagine I care about boys' room banter?" she said.

"How should I know?" I said.

"Do I look like that type of girl?"

"In fact, you do," I said. "The leather jacket and everything."

She laughed.

"Apart from the stupid names and all the clichés, and the lack of psychological insight, I quite liked what you wrote," she said.

"There's nothing left to like," I said.

"Yes, there is," she said. "Don't let what others say upset you. It's nothing, just words. Look at those two," she said, motioning toward our teachers. "They're wallowing in our admiration. Look at Jon now. And look at Knut lapping it up."

"First of all, I'm not upset. Second of all, Jon Fosse is a good writer."

"Oh, really? Have you read any of his stuff?"

"A little. I bought his latest novel on Wednesday."

"Blood. The Stone Is," she said in a deep Vestland voice, fixing me with her eyes. Then she laughed that heartfelt bubbling laugh of hers, which was abruptly cut short. "Ay yay yay, there's so much posturing!" she said.

"But not in the stuff you write?" I said.

"I've come here to learn," she said. "I have to suck as much out of them as I can."

The waiter came over to our table; I raised my finger. Petra did the same, at first I thought she was making fun of me, but then realized she wanted a beer too. Trude came back, Petra turned to her, and I leaned across the table to catch Jon Fosse's attention.

"Do you know Jan Kjærstad?" I said.

"Yes, a bit. We're colleagues."

"Do you consider yourself a postmodernist as well?"

"No, I'm probably more of a modernist. At least compared with Jan."

"Yes," I said.

He looked down at the table, seemed to discover his beer, and took a long swig.

"What do you think of the course so far?" he said.

Was he asking me?

I flushed.

"It's been good," I said. "I feel I've learned a lot in a short time."

"Nice to hear," he said. "We haven't done much teaching, Ragnar and I. It's almost as new to us as it is to you."

"Yes," I said.

I knew I ought to say something, I suddenly found myself at the beginning of a conversation, but I didn't know what to say, and after the silence between us had lasted several seconds, he looked away, his attention was caught by someone else, whereupon I got up and went to the bathroom, which was behind the door at the other end of the room. There was a man peeing in the urinal, I knew I wouldn't be able to perform with him standing there, so waited for the cubicle to become vacant, which happened the very next moment. There was some toilet paper on the floor tiles, wet with urine or water. The smell was rank and I breathed through my nose as I peed. Outside the cubicle I heard water rush into the sinks. Immediately afterward, the hand dryer roared. I flushed and went out, just as the two men left through the door, while another older man with a huge gut and a ruddy Bergen face came in. Although the toilet was a mess, with the floor wet and dirty and the smell vile, it still had the same solemnity as the restaurant outside with its white tablecloths and aproned waiters. No doubt it had something to do with its age: both the tiles and the urinals came from a different era. I rinsed my hands under the tap and looked at my reflection in the mirror, which bore no resemblance to the inferiority I felt inside. The man positioned himself, legs apart, by the urinal, I thrust my hands under the current of hot air, turned them over a few times, and went back to the table, where there was another beer waiting for me.

When it was finished and I had started on the next, slowly my timidity began to ease, in its place came something soft and gentle and I no longer felt I was on the margins of the conversation, on the margins of the group, but in the center, I sat chatting first with one person, then with another, and when I went to the toilet now it was as though I took the whole table there with me, they existed in my head, a whirl of faces and voices, opinions and attitudes, laughter and giggles, and when some began to pack up and go home I didn't notice at first, it happened on the extreme periphery and didn't matter, the chatting and drinking carried on, but then first Jon Fosse got up, followed by Ragnar Hovland, and it was terrible, we were nothing without them.

"Have another one!" I said. "It's not so late. And it's Saturday tomorrow."

But they were adamant, they were going home, and after they had gone, the urge to leave spread, and even though I asked each and every one of them to stay a bit longer the table was soon empty, apart from Petra and me.

"You're not going to go as well, are you?" I said.

"Soon," she said. "I live quite a way out of town, so I have to catch the bus."

"You can crash at my place," I said. "I live up in Sandviken. There's a sofa you can sleep on."

"Are you that keen to keep drinking?" She laughed. "Where shall we go then? We can't stay here any longer."

"Café Opera?" I suggested.

"Sounds good," she said.

Outside, it was lighter than I had expected, the remnants of the summer night's luster had blanched the sky above us as we ascended the hill toward the theater, past the row of taxis, the ocher glow from the street lamps as if drawn across the wet cobblestones, the rain pelting down. Petra was carrying her black leather bag and although I didn't look at her I knew her expression was serious and dogged, her movements rigid and awkward. She was like a polecat: she bit the hands of those who helped her.

At Café Opera there were many vacant tables, we went up to the first floor, beside a window. I got us two beers, she drank almost half hers in one swig, wiped her lips with the back of her hand. I searched my brain for something to say, but found nothing, and drank almost half mine in one swig too.

Five minutes passed.

"What did you actually do in Northern Norway?" she said out of the blue but in a matter-of-fact way, as though we had been chatting for ages, while staring into the nearly empty beer glass she was nursing in front of her.

"I was a teacher," I said.

"I know that," she said. "But what made you decide to do that? What did you hope to achieve?"

"I don't know," I said. "It just happened. The idea was to do some writing up there, I suppose."

"It's a strange notion, looking for work in Northern Norway so you can write."

"Yes, maybe it is."

She went to get some beer. I looked around me; soon the place would be full. She had rested her elbow on the bar, held up a hundred-krone note, in front of her one of the barmen was pouring a beer. Her lips slid over her teeth as she knit her brow. On one of the first days she told me she had changed her name. Her surname, I assumed, but no, she had changed her first name. It had been something like Anne or Hilde, one of the most common girl's names, and I had thought a lot about Petra rejecting her first name, because personally I was so attached to mine, changing it was inconceivable, in a way everything would change if I did. But she had done it.

Mom had changed her name, but that was to dad's surname, it was a convention, and when she changed it again, it was back to her maiden name. Dad had also changed his name, that was more unusual, but he had changed his surname, not his first name, which was him.

She walked across the floor, half a liter in each hand, and sat down.

"Who do you think will make it?" she said.

"What do you mean?"

"In class, at school."

I didn't care much for her choice of word, I preferred Academy, but I said nothing.

"I don't know," I said.

"I said think. Of course you don't know."

"I liked what you wrote."

"Flattery will get you nowhere."

"It's true."

"Knut: nothing to say. Trude: posturing. Else Karin: housewife's prose. Kjetil: childish. Bjørg: boring. Nina: good. She's repressed, but she writes well."

She laughed and slyly glanced up at me.

"What about me?" I said.

"You," she snorted. "You understand nothing about yourself and you have no idea what you're doing."

"Do you know what you're doing?"

"No, but at least I know I don't know," she said, and laughed again. "And you're a bit girly. But you've got big strong hands, so that makes up for it."

I looked away, my insides on fire.

"I've always had a wicked tongue on me," she said.

I took some long swigs of the beer and scanned the room.

"You weren't offended by that little gibe, were you?" she said, with a giggle. "I could say far worse things about you if I wanted."

"Please don't," I said.

"You take yourself too seriously as well. But that's your age. It's not your fault."

And what about you then! I felt like saying. What makes you think you're so damn good? And if I'm girly, you're butch. You look like a man when you walk!

I said nothing though, and slowly but surely the fire subsided, not least because I was beginning to get seriously drunk and approaching the point where nothing meant anything anymore, or to be more accurate, when everything meant the same.

A couple more beers and I would be there.

In the room, between all the occupied tables, strode a familiar figure. It was Morten, wearing his red leather jacket and carrying a light brown backpack and a folded umbrella in his hand, the long one I had seen before. When he spotted me his face lit up and he rushed at full speed across to our table, tall and lanky, his hair spiky and glistening with gel.

"Hi there!" He grinned. "Out drinking, are you?"

"Yes," I said. "This is Petra. Petra, Morten."

"Hi," Morten said.

Petra gave him a once-over and nodded, then turned and looked the other way.

"We've been out with the Academy," I said. "The others went home early."

"Thought writers were on the booze twenty-four/seven" he said. "I've been in the reading room until now. I don't know how this is going to work out. I don't understand a thing! Not a thing!"

He laughed and looked around.

"Actually I'm on my way home. Just popped by to see if there was anyone I knew. But I'll tell you one thing: I admire you writers-to-be."

He looked at me seriously for a moment.

"Well, I'm off," he said. "See you!"

When he had rounded the corner by the bar I told Petra he was my neighbor. She nodded casually, drank the rest of her beer, and got up.

"I'll be off now," she said. "There's a bus in fifteen minutes."

She lifted her jacket from the back of the chair, clenched her fist, and put it in the sleeve.

"Weren't you going to sleep at my place? It's not a problem, you know."

"No, I'm going home. But I might take you up on your offer another time," she said. "Bye."

So, with her hand around her bag and a steadfast gaze ahead she walked toward the staircase. I didn't know anyone else there, but sat for a little longer, in case someone turned up, but then being on my own began to prey on my mind and I put on my raincoat, grabbed my bag, and went out into the blustery night.

I woke up at around eleven to rattling and banging inside the wall. I sat up and looked around. What was that noise? Then I realized and slumped back into bed. The mailboxes were on the other side of the wall, but so far I hadn't slept long enough to know what it sounded like when the postman came.

Above me someone was walking around singing.

But the room, wasn't it remarkably light?

I got up and lifted the curtain.

The sun was shining.

I got dressed, went over to the shop and bought some milk, rolls, and today's papers. When I returned I opened the mailbox. Apart from two bills that had been sent on to me, there were two parcel-delivery cards. I hurried to the post office and was given two fat parcels, which I opened with the scissors in the kitchen. Shakespeare's Complete Works, T. S. Eliot's Complete Poems and Plays, Oscar Wilde's Collected Works, and a book with photos of naked women.

I sat down on my bed to flick through it, trembling with excitement. No, they weren't completely naked, many of them were wearing high heels and one had a blouse hanging open around her slim, tanned upper body.

I put down the book and had breakfast while reading the three papers I had bought. The main news in Bergens Tidende was a murder that had taken place yesterday morning. There was a picture of the crime scene, which I thought I recognized, and I had my suspicions confirmed when I read the text underneath: the murder had been committed only a couple of blocks from where I was sitting now. And as if that wasn't enough the suspected murderer was still at large. He was eighteen years old and attended technical school, it said. For some reason, this made quite an impression on me. I pictured him at this moment, in a basement apartment, so I imagined, alone behind drawn curtains which every so often he parted to see what was going on in the street, he viewed it from ankle height, his heart pounding and despair tearing at his insides because of what he had done. He punched the wall, paced the room, considering whether to hand himself in or wait for a few days, and then try to get away, on board one of the boats perhaps, to Denmark or England, and then hitchhike his way down through Europe. But he had no money and no possessions, only what he had on him.

I peered out the window to see if anything unusual was happening, uniformed officers gathering, for example, or some parked police cars, but everything was as normal, except for the sunshine, that is, which hung like a veil of light over everything.

I could talk to Ingvild about the murder, it was a good topic of conversation, his presence here, in my part of town, right now, while virtually the whole of the police force was out looking for him.

Perhaps I could write about that too? A boy who kills an old man and goes into hiding while the police slowly close in on him?

I would never ever be able to do that.

A wave of disappointment washed over me and I got up, took the plate and glass, put them in the kitchen sink, together with all the other dirty crockery I had used during the week. Petra was wrong about one thing, and that was that I didn't understand myself, I thought, looking across the resplendent green park as a woman crossed with a child holding each hand. Self-knowledge was the one quality I did have. I knew exactly who I was. Not many of my acquaintances knew as much about themselves.

I went back into the living room, was about to bend down to browse through my records when it was as if my eye was dragged toward the new book. A stab of joy and fear went through me. It might as well be now, I was alone, I had nothing in particular to do, there was no reason to defer it, I thought, and picked the book up, looked over my shoulder, how could I take it down to the bathroom unnoticed? A plastic bag? No, who on earth takes a plastic bag with them to the toilet?

I opened the button of my jeans and unzipped, pushed the book down, covered it with my shirt, leaned forward as far as I could to see what it looked like, whether anyone would realize I had a book there.

Maybe.

What about taking a towel with me? If anyone came I could casually hold it over my stomach for the few seconds the encounter lasted. Then I could have a shower afterward. Nothing suspicious about that surely, going to the toilet and then having a shower.

And that was what I did. With the book stuffed down my trousers and clasping the biggest towel I had, I went out the door, crossed the landing, down the stairs, along the corridor, into the bathroom, where I locked the door, pulled out the book, and began to leaf through.

Even though I had never masturbated before and wasn't exactly sure how to do it, I still knew how, the expressions "jerk off" and "beat the meat" had been ever present in all the jokes I had ever heard over the years, not least in soccer changing rooms, and so with the blood throbbing in my member I took it out of the little pouch formed by my underpants, and as I ogled the long-legged red-lipped woman standing outside a kind of holiday bungalow in the Mediterranean somewhere, judging by the white walls and the gnarled trees, beneath a line of washing, with a plastic bowl in her hand, although otherwise completely naked, while I looked and looked and looked at her, all the beautiful erotic lines of her body, I wrapped my fingers around my dick and jerked it up and down. At first the whole shaft, but then after a few times only the tip, while still staring at the woman with the bowl, and then as a wave of pleasure rose in me, I thought I should look at another woman too, to make maximum use of the book, and turned over the page, and there was a woman sitting on a swing, wearing only red shoes with straps up her ankles, and then a spasm went through me and I tried to bend my dick down to ejaculate into the toilet, but I couldn't, it was too stiff, so instead the first load of sperm hit the seat and slowly oozed down while later blobs were pumped out, farther down, after I had the great idea of leaning forward to improve the angle.

Oh.

I had done it.

I had finally done it.

There was nothing mysterious about it after all. On the contrary, it was incredibly easy and quite remarkable that I hadn't done it before.

I closed the book, wiped the seat, washed myself, stood stock still to hear if, contrary to expectation, anyone was outside, shoved the book back down my trousers, grabbed my towel, and left.

It was only then that I wondered if I had done it right. Should you shoot into the toilet? Or maybe the sink? Or a wad of rolled-up toilet paper in your hand? Or did you usually do it in bed? On the other hand, this was an extremely secretive business, so it probably didn't matter if my method deviated from the norm.

Just as I had put the book down on the desk, folded the unused towel and placed it in the cupboard, there was a ring at the door.

I went out to answer it.

It was Yngve and Asbjørn. Both were wearing sunglasses, and as on the previous occasion there was something restless about them, something about Yngve's thumb in his belt loop and Asbjørn's fist in his trouser pocket or them both standing half turned away until I opened the door. Or perhaps it was the sunglasses they didn't take off.

"Hi," I said. "Come in!"

They followed me into my room.

"We were wondering if you felt like coming with us into town," Yngve said. "We're going to some record shops."

"Great," I said. "I've got nothing to do anyway. Right now?"

"Yes," Yngve said, picking up the book with the naked women. "I see you've bought a photography book."

"Yes," I said.

"It's not hard to guess what you're going to use that for," Yngve laughed. Asbjørn chuckled too, but in a way that suggested he wanted this aspect of the visit over as quickly as possible.

"These are serious pictures, you know," I said as I put on my jacket, bent over and tied my shoes. "It's a kind of art book."

"Oh yes," Yngve said, putting it down. "And the Lennon poster has gone?"

"Yes," I said.

Asbjørn lit a cigarette, turned to the window, and looked out.

Ten minutes later, side by side, all wearing sunglasses, we were crossing Torget. The wind was blowing off the fjord, flags were fluttering and cracking on masts, and the sun, which was shining from a clear blue sky, glittered and shimmered on every surface. Cars tore down the street from Torgalmenningen like a pack of hounds whenever the traffic lights changed to green. The market was packed with people, and in the fish tanks in the midst, caught in their few cubic meters of greenish and probably freezing cold water, cod swam around with their mouths agape, crabs crawled on top of one other, and lobsters lay still, their claws bound with white elastic.

"Shall we eat at Yang Tse Kiang afterward?" Yngve suggested.

"We could," Asbjørn said. "If you promise not to say Chinese food in China tastes quite different."

Yngve didn't answer, took out a packet of cigarettes from his pocket, and stopped by the traffic crossing. I looked to the right where there was a vegetable stall. The sight of the orange carrots lying in bunches in a big heap made me think of the two seasons I had worked at the market gardener's on Tromøya, when we pulled up the carrots, washed and packed them, and I was always so near to the earth, rich and black, under the late-August and early-September evening sky, the darkness and the ground so close together, and the rustle of the bushes and trees at the end of the field sent small shivers of happiness through me. Why? I thought now. Why had I been so happy then?

The lights changed to green and we crossed the street surrounded by a crowd of people, passed a watchmaker's shop, continued to the large square that opened up between the buildings like a clearing in a forest, I asked where we were going actually, Yngve said actually we were going to Apollon, and afterward we were planning to visit some secondhand record shops.

Flicking through records in music shops was something I was good at, I knew most of the bands in the racks, I picked them up and looked to see who the producer was, who played what on the various tracks, which studio was used. I was a connoisseur, yet still I glanced over at Yngve and Asbjørn as we went through the LPs, and if either of them lifted a record out, I tried to see what it was, what passed muster here, and in Asbjørn's case I could see it was partly old stuff, and curiosities such as George Jones or Buck Owens, what particularly caught my eyes was a Christmas record he held up to show Yngve, they laughed, Asbjørn said it was really over the top, and Yngve said yes, it was really camp. But he kept to the same categories that I liked, British post-punk, American indie rock, the odd Australian band perhaps, and of course a couple of Norwegian bands, but nothing beyond that as far as I could see.

I bought twelve records, most by bands I already had and one on Yngve's recommendation: Guadalcanal Diary. An hour later, sitting in a Chinese restaurant, they laughed at me for having bought so many records, but I sensed there was some respect in their laughter, it didn't just say I was a new student who had never had so much money in his hands before but that I was dedicated. A huge dish of steaming rice was set on the table, it stuck to the big accompanying porcelain spoon, we dug in and transferred a heap onto our plates, Yngve and Asbjørn poured the brown sauce onto the rice and I did the same. It almost completely disappeared between the grains, and what had been at first thick and black was brown the very next moment, and the grains of rice visible through it. It tasted a little sharp, I felt, but the next mouthful, of beef chop suey, more than compensated for that. Yngve ate with chopsticks, manipulating them with his fingers like a native. Afterward we had fried banana with ice cream, and then we had a cup of coffee with a small After Eight mint in the saucer.

During the whole meal I had tried to figure out what exactly the chemistry was between two such good friends when they got together. How long they looked into each other's eyes when they said anything before breaking off and looking down. What they talked about, for how long, and why they had chosen that particular subject. Reminiscing: do you remember the time . . . ? Other friends: did he say this or that? Music: have you heard this or that song, this or that record? School? Politics? Something that had just happened, yesterday, last week? When a new topic was broached was it linked to the previous one, did it peel off, so to speak, or was it just plucked out of the air?

But this didn't mean that I sat silently observing them, I was actively involved throughout, I smiled and made comments, the only thing I didn't do was embark on long monologues of my own, out of the blue, which both Yngve and Asbjørn did.

So what was going on? What was it all about?

First of all, they asked each other almost no questions, which I usually did. Second, to a large extent everything was connected, very little came up that was unrelated to what went before. Third, most of it was aimed at making them laugh. Yngve told a story, they laughed at it, Asbjørn picked up the baton and moved the story into hypothetical mode, and if that worked, Yngve built on it until it became wilder and wilder. Their laughter ebbed away, a few seconds passed, Asbjørn recounted something that was closely related, also with the intention of making them laugh, and then it was more or less the same routine. Now and again they did touch on serious matters, in the same way, then they tossed a subject back and forth, sometimes in the form of a debate, all right, yes, but, you could say that, but no, I'm not with you there, and there might be a pause, which made me fear there was bad blood between them, until a new story, anecdote, or piece of banter emerged.

I was always especially vigilant with regard to Yngve, it was important for me that he didn't say anything stupid or display any form of ignorance, thus appearing inferior to Asbjørn, but that wasn't the case, they were on a level footing, and that pleased me.

Both replete and content, I walked uphill from the center with a bag of records dangling from each hand, and it was only when I was almost home and saw a police car slowly driving past that I remembered the young murderer. If the police were still looking for him, well, he would be in hiding somewhere in the town. Imagine how frightened he must be. Imagine how insanely frightened he must be. And horrified by what he had done. He had killed another human being, stabbed a knife into another person's body, who fell to the ground dead. For what? a voice must be shouting in his head. For what? For what? A wallet, a few hundred-krone notes, nothing. Oh, how terrible he must feel.

When I had got myself ready to meet Ingvild it was only a few minutes past five, and so to kill the remaining time, I went down to Morten's and knocked on his door.

"Come in!" he yelled from inside.

I opened the door. Dressed in a T-shirt and shorts, he turned down the stereo.

"Hello, sir," he said.

"Hello," I said. "Can I come in?"

"Why of course, grab a seat."

The white brick walls were high with two narrow, rectangular, almost opaque skylights as windows at the top. The room was spartanly furnished, if not bare: a box bed, also white, with a brown mattress upholstered in a kind of corduroy and large brown cushions made of the same material. A table in front and a chair on the other side, both the sort you find at flea markets and in secondhand shops, 1950s style. A stereo, some books, of which the fat red Norwegian Law was the most prominent.

He sat down on the bed with two of the large cushions behind him and appeared more relaxed than I had seen him before.

"One week at damned Høyden behind me," he said. "Out of how many? Three hundred and fifty?"

"It's better to count days in that case," I said. "Then you've already done five."

"Ha ha ha! That's the most foolish thing I've ever heard! In which case, there are two and a half thousand to go!"

"That's true," I said. "If you think in years, you've only got seven left. On the other hand, you haven't done a thousandth yet."

"Or a millionth, as someone in my class once said," he said. "Sit down, monsieur! Are you going out tonight or what?"

"What do you mean?" I said, sitting down.

"You look like you are. So well-groomed, sort of."

"Yes, but I have to be. I'm meeting Ingvild. In fact, it's the first time."

"First time? Did you find her in a lonely-heart ad? Ha ha ha!"

"I met her once this spring, in Førde, for half an hour or so. I completely fell for her. Since then I've hardly thought about anything else. But we've been writing to each other."

"I see," he said, and leaned across the table, knocked a cigarette packet back toward him, opened it, and tapped out a cigarette.

"Want one?"

"Why not? My tobacco's upstairs. But you can have a roll-up from me some other time."

"I moved here to get away from people who smoke rollies," he said, throwing me the packet.

"Where are you from?" I said.

"Sigdal. A little dump in Østland. All forest and misery. That's where they make the kitchens, you know. Sigdal Kitchens. We're very proud of that."

He lit up and ran his hand quickly through his hair.

"Is it good or bad to look well groomed?" I said.

"It's good, of course," he said. "You're going on a date. You have to doll yourself up a bit."

"Yes," I said.

"And you're from Sørland?" he said.

"Yes. I come from a little dump down there. Or rather a shithole."

"If you come from Shithole, I come from Shitville."

"Hole and ville are quite alike, if you don't like one you won't like the other," I said.

"Ha ha! What was that again?"

"Dunno," I said. "I just made it up."

"Oh, that's right, you're a writer," he said, as he leaned back against the cushions on the bed, put one foot on the mattress, and blew smoke up to the ceiling.

"What was your childhood like?" he said.

"My childhood?"

"Yes, when you were a young boy. What was it like?"

I shrugged.

"Don't know. I howled a lot, I remember."

"Howled a lot?" he said, and then went into a fit of hysterics. It was contagious, I laughed too, although I didn't really know what he was laughing at.

"Ha ha ha! Howled?"

"What's wrong with that?" I said. "I did."

"How?" he said, sitting up. "OOOOOOUUUU! Like that?"

"No, howled as in blubbered. Or cried, if you want it in plain language."

"Oh, you cried a lot as a child! I thought you howled and yelled!"

"Ha ha ha!"

"Ha ha ha!"

After we had finished laughing there was a pause. I stubbed out the cigarette in the ashtray, crossed my legs.

"I went around on my own a lot when I was a kid," he said. "And I longed to get away from ungdomsskole and gymnas. So it's fantastic to be here, basically, in my room, even though it looks terrible."

"Mm," I said.

"But I'm nervous about studying Law. I'm not sure it's really up my alley."

"You only started on Monday, didn't you? Isn't it a bit early to say?"

"Maybe."

A door slammed outside.

"That's Rune," Morten said. "He's always taking showers. An unbelievably hygienic person, you have to say."

He laughed again.

I got up.

"I'm meeting her at seven," I said. "And I've got a few things to do first. Are you going out this evening?"

He shook his head.

"I was going to read."

"Law?" I said.

He nodded.

"Good luck with Ingvild!"

"Thanks," I said, and went back up to my place. Outside, the evening was exceptionally light; the sky in the west, which I could barely see from the window, rising from the trees and rooftops, had a reddish glow. Some black clouds hung like disks in the distance. I put on an old Big Country single, ate a bread roll, put on my black suit jacket, moved my keys, lighter, and coins from my trouser pocket to a jacket pocket to avoid the inelegant bulge on my thigh, put the tobacco pouch in the inside pocket, and went out.

Ingvild didn't see me at first when she entered Café Opera. She wandered around shyly, looking from side to side, dressed in a white pullover with blue stripes, a beige jacket, and blue jeans. Her hair was longer than when I last saw her. My heart was pounding so much I could barely breathe.

Our eyes met, but hers didn't light up as I had hoped. A little smile on her lips, that was all.

"Hi," she said. "You're already here?"

"Yes," I said, half getting up. But we didn't know each other, a hug was perhaps too much, yet I couldn't just sit down again, like some jack-in-the-box, so I followed through and offered my cheek, which luckily she brushed with hers.

"I'd hoped I would arrive first," she said, hanging first her bag, then her coat over the back of the chair. "So that I would have home advantage."

She smiled again and sat down.

"Would you like a beer?"

"Ah, good idea," she said. "We have to drink. Could you get this round and I'll get the next?"

I nodded and went over to the bar. The room had begun to fill up, there were a couple of people ahead of me in the queue, and I studiously avoided looking straight at her, but from the corner of my eye I could see that she was staring out the window. She had her hands in her lap. I was glad of the break, glad not to be sitting there, but then it was my turn, I was given the two beers and had to go back.

"How's it going?" I said.

"With my driving? Or are we past that stage?"

"I don't know," I said.

"There's so much that's new," she said. "New room, new subject, new books, new people. Well, not that I've studied any other subject before," she added with a giggle.

Our eyes met, and I recognized that happy-go-lucky expression in her eyes that I had fallen for the first time I saw it.

"I said I'd be a bundle of nerves!" she said.

"I am too," I said.

"Skål," she said, and we clinked glasses.

She leaned to the side and took a packet of cigarettes from her bag.

"Well, how are we going to do this?" she said. "Shall we start again? I come in, you're sitting here, we give each other a hug, you ask how it's going, I answer, and then I ask you how it's going. A much better start!"

"I feel a bit the same," I said. "A lot of new things. Especially at the Academy. But my brother is studying here, so I've been hanging on his coattails."

"And your crazy cousin's?"

"Jon Olav, yes!"

"We've got a cabin where his grandparents live. There's a fifty percent chance they're your relatives too."

"In Sørbøvåg?"

"Yes, we've got a cabin on the other side of the water, at the foot of Lihesten."

"Have you? I've been there every summer since I was a kid."

"You'll have to row over and visit me one day then."

There was nothing I would rather do, I thought, a weekend alone with her in a cabin beneath the mighty Lihesten, what on this earth could be better than that?

"That'd be fun," I said.

There was a pause.

I tried to keep my eyes off her, but couldn't stop myself, she was so beautiful sitting there looking down at the table with the lit cigarette in her hand.

She glanced up and met my gaze. We smiled.

The warmth in her eyes.

The light around her.

At the same time there was that slightly awkward insecurity that came over her when the moment was past and she watched her hand flicking the ash from her cigarette into the ashtray. I knew where the feeling came from, I recognized it in myself, she was wary of herself and the position she was in.

We stayed there for almost an hour, it was torture, neither of us managed to get a grip on the situation, it was as if it existed independently of us, something much bigger and heavier than we could handle. When I said anything, it was tentative, and every time it was the tentativeness, not what was said, that prevailed. She kept looking out the window, not wanting to be where she was, either. But, I sometimes thought, perhaps she too is struck by sudden intense waves of happiness at just sitting there with me, as I was at sitting with her. I couldn't begin to guess, I didn't know her, didn't have a clue what she was like normally. But when I suggested leaving, it was relief she felt, I could see that. The streets had grown dark, apart from the heavy rain clouds there was something summery about the dusk, it was more open, lighter, filled with promise.

We walked up a hill toward Høyden, along a road cut into the mountain, a high wall on one side, railings on the other, and a row of tall brick houses beneath. The rooms inside the lit windows looked like aquariums. People were out in the streets, footsteps resounded in front of and behind us. We said nothing. All I thought about was that she was only a few centimeters from me. Her footsteps, her breathing.

When I woke up the next morning it was raining, the steady precipitation that was so typical of this town, distinguishable neither by its force nor its ferocity but still dominating everything. Even though you wore a rain jacket and rubber boots when you went out, you were still wet when you got back home. The rain crept up your sleeves, soaked into your collar, and the clothes under your rain gear steamed with humidity, not to mention what the rain did to all the walls and roofs, all the lawns and trees, all the roads and gateways as it relentlessly bucketed down onto the town. Everything was wet, everything had a membrane of dampness over it, and if you walked along the quay it felt as though what was above water was closely related to what was below it, in this town the borders between the two worlds were fluid, not to say floating.

It even affected your mind. I stayed at home all Sunday, yet still the weather seeped into my thoughts and feelings, which were somehow enveloped in something gray and unvarying and vague, reinforced by the Sunday atmosphere – empty streets, everything closed – which compounded with all the countless other Sundays I had known.

Apathy.

After a late breakfast I went out and called Yngve. Fortunately he was in. I told him about my date with Ingvild, how I was unable to say anything or be myself, he said she probably felt exactly the same way, that was his experience, they were just as nervous and self-critical. Call her and thank her for the evening, he said, then suggest meeting again. Not perhaps for a whole evening but a coffee. Then I would know how the land lay. I said we had already arranged to meet again. He asked who suggested it. Ingvild, I said. Well, then there you go, he said. Of course she's interested!

I was happy to hear he was so sure. If he was sure, I was too.

Before we hung up he told me he was going to have a party at his place on Saturday, I could come and bring someone with me. As I ran across the street in the rain, I wondered who it should be, who I could take with me.

Oh, Ingvild of course!

Back home again, I thought about Anne, who had been the technician for me when I was working for local radio in Kristiansand, she was in Bergen and would no doubt like to come along. Jon Olav and his friends. And maybe Morten?

Three times during the following hours I went down to the basement with the book stuffed down my trousers. I spent the rest of the day writing, and when evening came I sat on the sofa with the collection of poetry and the text analysis book I had bought to prepare for the poetry course that began the next day.

The first poem was short.

Nowadays

Whatever you say, let the roots follow, let them
dangle

With all the dirt

just to make it absolutely clear
where they came from

Make it absolutely clear where who came from?

I read it again, and then I realized it was referring to the roots of words. That is, you should display the roots of words and the dirt around them to make it clear to those listening where the words came from. So, talk coarsely, or at least don't be frightened to.

Was that all there was to it?

No, surely it couldn't be. The words were probably a symbol of something else. Perhaps of us. In other words, we mustn't hide our origins. We mustn't forget who we once were. Even if they were nothing to be proud of. The poem wasn't at all difficult, you just had to read carefully and think about every word. But this didn't work with all the poems, some of them I couldn't crack however many times I read them and however much I thought about what they might mean. One poem in particular irritated me.

He who walks with a house on his head is heaven he who walks with a house
on his head is heaven he who walks with a house on his head

This was pure surrealism. Was it the man who had the house on his head – and what did that mean, by the way? – who was like a heaven or was it the house that was his heaven? OK, let's say the house was a symbol of a head and his thoughts were various rooms in the house and this arrangement was heaven. So? Where was he going with this? And why repeat exactly the same words two and a half times? This was just pretension, he had nothing to say, he put a few words together and hoped for the best.

For the next two days we were bombarded with poems and names of poets, schools and movements. There were Charles Baudelaire and Arthur Rimbaud, Guillaume Apollinaire and Paul Éluard, Rainer Maria Rilke and Georg Trakl, Gottfried Benn and Paul Celan, Ingeborg Bachmann and Nelly Sachs, Gunnar Ekelöf and Tor Ulven, there were poems about cannons and corpses, angels and whores, gatewomen and turtles, coachmen and soil, nights and days, all thrown together in incongruous assortments, it seemed to me as I sat there taking notes, because, since I had never heard of any of these names before, apart from Charles Baudelaire and Tor Ulven, it was impossible to establish any kind of chronology in my mind, they all became part of the same morass, modern poems from modern Europe, which clearly wasn't so modern after all, it was quite a long time since the First World War had raged, and I talked a bit about that in one of the breaks, the paradox of the poems being modernist while being so old-fashioned, at least as regards the content. Jon Fosse said that was an interesting point, but they were modern primarily in terms of form and the radical thinking they expressed. This was still radical, he said. Paul Celan, no one had gone farther than he had. And that made me realize that everything I didn't understand, everything I couldn't get my head round, everything in these poems that appeared closed or introspective to me, this was precisely what was radical about them and made them modern, also to us.

Jon Fosse read a poem by Paul Celan called "Death Fugue," and it was dark and hypnotic and eerie, and I read it again at home in the evening, and heard in my inner ear the way Fosse had recited it, and I found it just as hypnotic and eerie then, surrounded by my own familiar things, which merely by virtue of these words going through my head lost their familiarity, they too were woven into the poem, and darkness swept through the poem, for the chair was only a chair, dead; the table was only a table, dead; and the street outside, it lay empty and still and dead in the darkness that emanated not only from the sky but also from the poem.

Although the poem touched a nerve in me, I didn't understand how it did or why.

Black milk of daybreak we drink it at sundown we drink it at noon in the morning we drink it at night we drink it and drink it
we dig a grave in the breezes there one lies unconfined

One thing was the fathomless darkness that existed in this poem, quite another was what it meant. What thoughts lay behind it? If I were ever to write like this I would have to know where it originated, be conversant with its starting point, the philosophy it expressed. I couldn't just write something similar. I had to understand it.

What would I write if I were to write a poem right now?

It would have to be about what was most important.

And what was most important?

Ingvild was.

So, love. Or falling in love. The lightness of spirit that flooded through me whenever she was on my mind, the surge of happiness at the thought that she existed, she was here now, in the same town, and we would meet again.

That was what was most important.

What would a poem about that be like?

Immediately, after two lines, it would be traditional. There was no way I could rip it into pieces, so to speak, and fling it over the pages the way modernists did. And the images that came to mind when I was thinking about it were also traditional. A mountain stream, cold mountain water glittering in the sun, the high mountains with white glaciers down the sides of the valley. That was the only image of happiness I could conjure up. Her face maybe? Zoom in on her eyes, the iris, the pupil?

Why?

The way she smiled?

OK, that's fine, but I was already light miles away from the starting point, the dark hypnotic and bewitching allure of Paul Celan.

I got up from the bed and switched on the light, sat down at the desk, and began to write. Half an hour later I'd finished a poem.

Eye, I'm calling you, come
Face, my beloved, sorrow
And life that plays
a black melody
Eye, I'm calling you, come

That was the first decent poem I had written, and when I switched off the light and settled back in bed I had a better feeling about the Writing Academy than I'd had since I started. I had made huge progress.

The next day we were given our first written assignment, by Jon Fosse. Write a poem based on a picture, he said, any picture at all, and after lunch I was on my way to the art museums by Lille Lundgård Lake to look for a picture I could write about. The sun had come out in the morning, and there was a vibrancy about all the colors in town, everything was wet and gleamed with rare intensity, dazzling beneath the verdant mountain slopes and the azure sky.

Once inside, I took out my notebook and a pen from my backpack, then deposited it in a cloakroom, paid, and went into the quiet, almost deserted gallery. The first picture that caught my eye was a simple landscape painting, depicting a village by a fjord, everything was clear and tangible, the sort of scene you could imagine seeing anywhere along the coast, yet there was something dreamlike about it, not in a fairy-tale way as with Theodor Kittelsen, this was a different dream, harder to grasp, but even more compelling.

Had I seen this landscape in real life, I would never have dreamed of staying there. But when I saw it here, hanging in the white room, I wanted to go there, I longed to go there.

My eyes moistened. I liked the picture, which had been painted by someone called Lars Hertervig, it was so intense, and in a way it turned the whole situation on its head, I wasn't just a Writing Academy student without a notion in his head about art, who had to write a poem about a picture, a pretender, but rather someone who felt so passionate about it that it brought tears to his eyes.

Happy about this, I went on. The museum had a large collection of Astrup paintings, I knew, that was one of the reasons I had come here. Astrup came from Jølster, Grandma's home village, where his father had been the priest. During the whole of my childhood we'd had an Astrup painting on the wall above the staircase. It portrayed a meadow stretching up to an old farmyard, beneath some mighty towering, though not unfriendly, mountains, and it was a midsummer night, the light floated gently across the meadow, which was full of buttercups. I had seen this picture so many times it was part of me. Outside the wall it hung on was the road and a housing estate, a quite different, sharper, and more concrete world with manhole covers and bicycle handlebars, mailboxes and caravans, homemade carts with baby-carriage wheels and kids with moon boots, nevertheless the nocturnal world in the picture was not a dream, not a fairy tale, it also existed in reality, near the farm Grandma came from, where many of her siblings still lived and whom occasionally we visited in the summer. Grandma could remember Astrup, Mom said, he was someone people talked about in the village, and at Grandma and Grandpa's house there was another picture he had painted – which I had also seen all my life. It depicted a birch forest, thick with black and white tree trunks and children walking between them picking something or other, the picture was eerie and almost completely without a sky, but it hung there in the midst of their everyday life, above their sideboard, and merged into the sense of security there.

By and large all the pictures by Astrup had motifs from Jølster, they portrayed places I knew in real life, and were recognizable, yet they weren't. This duality, scenes that were both known and unknown, wasn't something I thought about or reflected on, but I was still familiar with it, in much the same way that I never reflected on the room I went into to read, although I was familiar with it: the way I left the reality surrounding me and went into another from one moment to the next, and invariably longed to be where I wasn't.

The Astrup painting was part of me, and when Jon Fosse asked us to write a poem based on a picture, that was the first one that occurred to me. I walked around the museum, keeping my senses open, if anything loomed up and inspired me I would write about it, but if not, I would write about an Astrup painting that was already in my head.

I wandered around for half an hour, stood taking notes in front of the picture by Lars Hertervig and the Astrup paintings, described the details so that I could remember them later, when I got home and had to write the poem. Afterward I walked around the lake and into Marken, an area of the town I had hardly ever been in before. It was packed, the sunshine had brought people outside. I had a coffee and wrote a few lines at Café Galleri, continued toward Torgalmenningen and there, seeing the church towering over the town, it struck me that I could pop up and see whether Ingvild was in the reading room. The mere thought made me tremble. But there was nothing to fear, I told myself, she was only a human being like everyone else, the same age as me even, and it wasn't just me who had found it difficult to talk and behave naturally last time, she had probably felt the same, and the very idea that she might be full of trepidation but wanted this as much as me was such a good, uplifting thought that I rushed up the steps to Høyden.

Besides, I thought, when I arrived at the top and started walking in the direction she had indicated, I did also have a reason to see her, I was going to invite her to Yngve's party. If this went well, I could wait until later, then I would have a reason to ring her again, but if it didn't I could use the invitation as a trump card.

After the bright sunshine, the entrance to the Psychology Building was so dark that at first I couldn't read the letters on the sign there. And when they became clearer I was so distracted by nerves that for a few seconds I could hardly concentrate. My throat dry, my head burning, I finally managed to locate the reading room, and when I got there, so obviously flustered compared with the students I had met on the way, and scanned the rows of desks, there was someone standing at the far end waving, it was her, she cleared her desk at top speed, put on her denim jacket, and came over to me with a smile on her lips.

"Great to see you!" she said. "Shall we go for a coffee?"

I nodded.

"You'll have to lead. I don't know my way around here at all."

There were lots of students outside today, on benches and curbs and steps, and in the canteen at Sydneshaugen School, where we sat down with a cup of coffee, there was plenty of room between the tables. The atmosphere between us this time was much more relaxed, first we chatted a little about her studies and the people she shared her kitchen with in Fantoft, I told her about Morten, mentioned Yngve, how fantastic it had been to visit him in Bergen when I was at gymnas, she started to tell me about her childhood, she said she had been a typical tomboy playing soccer and climbing trees, I commented that there couldn't be much left of that in her now, she laughed and said she hadn't been planning to play soccer in Bergen, but that she would be going to the stadium the next time Sogndal came and she had also been thinking of taking in some of the home games at Fosshaugane. I talked a bit about IK Start and said that Yngve and I had been at the stadium when they beat Rosenborg 4-3 in the last match of the season in 1980 and became league champions, I described how we had stormed onto the field and stood outside the dressing room cheering on the players, and how they had tossed their shirts out, and unbelievably I had caught Svein Mathisen's, the most valuable of all, number nine, but a man had ripped it out of my hands and gone off with it. I said it was great being able to talk with a girl like her about soccer, she said she might have a few more surprises up her sleeve. She started to talk about her sister again, and then about all her inferiority complexes, there wasn't one thing she was good at, or so it seemed, but what she said was constantly contradicted by her laughter, and her eyes, which not only belied her tale of wretchedness but also turned it onto its head. For some reason I told her about an incident in my childhood, I had got hold of some slalom goggles, I could only have been eight or nine, they were so cool, but there was one snag, they didn't have any glass in them. Despite that I put them on the next time we went miniskiing on the slopes down from our house. It was snowing, the snow blew into my eyes making it almost impossible to see but I kept on going all the same, and everything was fine until some bigger boys turned up. They thought my goggles were as cool as I did, and said so, at which my chest burst with pride, and then of course they asked if they could borrow them, I said no, no way, but in the end I allowed myself to be persuaded, and one of them donned the goggles and was about to set off when he turned to me and said, there's no glass in them! He didn't make fun of me or anything, he was just genuinely surprised, why would anyone ski with slalom goggles if there was no glass in them?

We sat there for half an hour until I accompanied her back to the reading room. We stopped outside and continued chatting, then Morten came up the hill, it was impossible to mistake him, even at a distance, there weren't many young men who wore red leather jackets, and of those only Morten could stride along the way he did, his limbs as rigid as a doll's, yet energetic and full of power. But now his head wasn't held high, as it had been the other times I had seen him, it was bowed, and as he approached and I waved a hand in greeting, I could see his face was racked with anguish.

He stopped, I introduced Ingvild and Morten, he smiled fleetingly, then trained his eyes on mine. There were tears in them.

"I'm so desperate," he said. "I'm so fucking desperate."

He looked at Ingvild.

"Excuse my language, fair maid."

He turned back to me.

"I don't know what to do. I can't stand it. I have to get hold of a psychologist. I have to talk to someone. I called one, and do you know what they said? They only take acute cases, I said I was an acute case, I can't stand it any longer, I said, and they asked whether I had suicidal thoughts. Of course I have suicidal thoughts! I've got a broken heart and everything's going to pot. But apparently that wasn't acute enough."

He fixed his eyes on me. I didn't know what to say.

"You study Psychology, Ingvild, don't you?"

She glanced at me before answering.

"I started a week ago."

"Do you know where I can turn in such circumstances?"

She shook her head.

He looked at me again.

"I may come up and see you tonight. Is that alright?"

"Yes, of course, come whenever you like," I said.

He nodded.

"See you," he said, and strode off again.

"Is he a close friend?" Ingvild said when he was out of earshot.

"I can't say he is, no," I said. "He's the neighbor I was telling you about. I've only spoken to him three or four times. He wears his heart on his sleeve. Never seen anything like it."

"You can say that again," she said. "I'll be off then. Can you call me?"

What a shock. For a brief moment, no more than a second or two, I was unable to breathe.

"Yes," I said. "I can."

When, shortly afterward, I stopped at the top of the hill and saw the town beneath me, my feeling of happiness was so ecstatic that I didn't know how I would be able to make it home, sit there and write, eat, or sleep. But the world is constructed in such a way that it meets you halfway in moments precisely like these, your inner joy seeks an outer counterpart and finds it, it always does, even in the bleakest regions of the world, for nothing is as relative as beauty. Had the world been different, in my opinion, without mountains and oceans, plains and seas, deserts and forests, and consisted of something else, inconceivable to us, as we don't know anything other than this, we would also have found it beautiful. A world with gloes and raies, evanbillits and conulames, for example, or ibitera, proluffs, and lopsits, whatever they might be, we would have sung their praises because that is the way we are, we extol the world and love it although it's not necessary, the world is the world, it's all we have.

So as I walked down the steps toward the town center on this Wednesday at the end of August I had a place in my heart for everything I beheld. A slab of stone worn smooth in a flight of steps: fantastic. A swaybacked roof side by side with an austere perpendicular brick building: so beautiful. A limp hot-dog wrapper on a drain grille, which the wind lifts a couple of meters and then drops again, this time on the pavement flecked with white stepped-on chewing gum: incredible. A lean old man hobbling along in a shabby suit carrying a bag bulging with bottles in one hand: what a sight.

The world extended its hand, and I took it. All the way through the town center and up the hills on the other side, straight into my room, where I immediately sat down to write my poem.

At the beginning of the first class on the following day we handed in our pieces of work. While we sat chatting and drinking coffee, they were being copied, we could hear the drone of the photocopier and, as the door was open, see the flashes in the room whenever the machine illuminated the sheet of paper. The pile was ready, Fosse distributed the poems, for the next few minutes we read in silence. Then he threw out his arm and checked his watch, time for the analysis.

There was already a routine: one student read, the others commented in turn, and when the round was over, the teacher gave his analysis. The latter carried the most weight, especially when the teacher was Fosse, because even though he never seemed to be at ease, there was a gravitas and a conviction in what he said that made everyone listen whenever he spoke.

He spent a long time on each poem, went through them line by line, sometimes word by word, praised what was good, rejected what wasn't, highlighted what was promising and could be developed in other directions, concentrated throughout, his gaze fixed on the text, hardly ever on us, making notes on what he said.

My poem, which was the last one we analyzed, was about nature. I had tried to describe the beauty and openness of the countryside, and the poem closed with the grass whispering come, as though it were talking to the reader and expressed the feeling I'd had when I saw the painting. As it was a landscape painting there was nothing modern about the poem, and I had sat over it for a while trying various techniques to make it feel more contemporary and had suddenly thought of a word, widescreen, which I put to use in widescreen sky, it made the same kind of impression I had created in my prose, the boys' reality was colored by what they had seen on TV and read, but mostly TV. This produced the same effect, indirectly. It represented a break with the lyrical and poetic description of nature, I had thought, and when I read the poem aloud to the others it seemed to have that function.

Fosse, wearing a white shirt with rolled-up sleeves and blue jeans, stubble on his chin and dark bags under his eyes, didn't study the poem immediately after I had read it out, as he had done with some of the others, but went straight to the point.

He said he liked Astrup, and I wasn't the first to choose a painting by him, Olav H. Hauge had done so, too. Then he started on the poem. The first line, he said, is a cliché, you can cross that out. The second line is also a cliché. And the third and fourth. The sole value of this poem, he said after rejecting every single line, is the phrase widescreen sky. I've never seen that before. You can keep that. The rest you can scrub.

"But then there's nothing left of the poem," I said.

"No," he said. "But the description of nature and your enthusiasm for it are clichés. There's nothing of Astrup's mystique in your poem. You've completely trivialized it. But widescreen sky. As I said, that's not bad."

He looked up.

"That's it then. Anyone want to come for a beer at Henrik's?"

Everyone did. We walked together through the drizzle up to the café across the street from Café Opera. I was on the verge of tears and didn't say a word, knowing full well I could only get away with this while we were walking, you could be silent now but as soon as we sat down I would have to say something and seem happy, or at least interested, so that they wouldn't realize how much Fosse's words had hurt me.

However, I thought, as I slumped down on the sofa with a beer on the table in front of me, I mustn't appear too enthusiastic either, then it would be obvious that I was fighting too hard to act nonchalant.

Petra sat down beside me.

"Nice poem you wrote," she giggled.

I didn't answer.

"It's what I told you, you take yourself too seriously. It's just a poem," she said. "Come on now."

"Easy for you to say," I said.

She looked at me with those ironic eyes of hers and smiled her ironic smile.

Jon Fosse eyed me.

"It's difficult to write good poems," he said. "Not many people can. You found a great word there, and that's something, you know."

"Yes. Yes, I know," I said.

He looked as if he wanted to say more, but instead he sat back and averted his gaze. His attempt to console me was even more humiliating than his analysis. It meant he perceived me as someone who needed consoling. He talked literature with the others, but he consoled me.

I couldn't be the first to leave, everyone would think it was because I was upset and couldn't take criticism. Nor the second, nor the third. They would think the same. If I was the fourth, though, no one would think that, at least not with any reasonable justification.

Fortunately this didn't look as though it was going to be a long evening, we had come here for a beer following the day's work, and after an hour I was able to get up and go without losing face. It was raining harder now, the wind was gusting through the streets, which in the center were empty now that the shops were closed. I didn't give a damn about the rain, I didn't give a damn about people, I didn't give a damn about all the rows of crooked wooden terraced houses on the sloping mountainside I was walking up as fast as I could. I just wanted to get home, lock the door, and be on my own.

Once indoors, I took off my shoes, hung my dripping raincoat in the wardrobe, and placed the bag with my texts and notebook on the top shelf because one glance at that and my mortification would return.

To my dismay, we had been given another writing assignment. Another poem had to be written this evening and read and assessed the following day. I wasn't going to give a damn about that either, was I?

Anyhow I can't be bothered with it now, I thought, and lay down on my bed. The rain beat against the window above my head. There was a faint whoosh as the wind swept across the grass and pressed against the walls of the houses. The woodwork creaked. I was reminded of the wind outside the house where I grew up, its whoosh was so much stronger and more powerful because of the trees it moved. What a sound it had been. It soared into the air, moved off, disappeared, soared again, sigh after sigh went through the forest and the trees threw themselves forward and backward, as though trying to escape.

The trees I had liked best were the pines that stood on the vacant plots in the housing estate. They had been part of a forest, but then it had been cut down, the rocks had been blasted and lawns had been laid and houses built, which they stood beside. Tall and slim, many of them with branches only toward the top. Reddish, almost flamelike, when the sun shone on them. They resembled masts, I thought, whenever I was standing by the window in my bedroom and looking up at the neighboring plot, where they swayed back and forth and creaked, the plots of land were ships, the fences railings, the houses cabins, the estate an armada.

I got up and went into the kitchen. The night before I had put all the dirty dishes and cutlery in the sink, filled it with hot water, squirted a bit of soap in it, and left it to soak; now all I had to do was rinse everything in cold water and it would be spotlessly clean. I was pleased at having discovered this method, thereby avoiding all the hassle.

Once this was done, I sat down at my typewriter, switched it on, rolled in a sheet of paper, and stared at it for a while. Then I began to write a new poem.

I took out the sheet of paper and looked at it.

The thought of reading this at the Academy filled me with glee, I purred with delight as I imagined what it would be like, how they would react, what they would say. The text consisted of nothing more than clichés and I would have to cross everything out, except for one word?

Ha ha ha!

I poured a cup of coffee and lit a cigarette. The delight was not undiluted, I would be taking a big risk if I read it aloud, it was a provocation, a slap in the face, and if there was one thing I didn't want, it was to fall out with anyone. My fear of this was so strong that it made the thought of doing it even more enticing. It was the attraction of the forbidden that I could feel, that I could actually do it, a dizzying sensation, like the fear of heights.

At around eight there was a ring at the door, I thought it would be Morten, but it was Jon Olav, he stood there in an open jacket and sneakers in the rain, as though he had only crossed the yard, and in a way this was true, it wasn't far from his place to mine.

"Are you working?" he said.

"No, I've finished," I said. "Come in!"

He flopped down on the sofa, I made two cups of coffee and sat on the bed.

"How's it going at the Academy?" he said.

"Well enough, I suppose," I said. "But it's tough. They don't mince their words when we discuss texts."

"Really?" he said.

"Now we're writing poetry."

"Can you do that?"

"I've never done it before. But that's the whole point of being there. You have to try new things."

"Yes," he said. "I haven't really got going yet. And there's so much to read that I already feel left behind. It's not like arts subjects, where you can get by with what you already know or use your common sense . . . Well, of course you have to use your common sense as well," he laughed. "But there's so much you have to know. There's quite a different degree of precision involved. So the only thing that counts is reading. And everyone's so disciplined. They're in the reading room from the crack of dawn to late at night."

"But not you?"

"I'll have to at some point." He smiled. "I just haven't started yet."

"I think the Writing Academy's just as tough, only in a different way. We don't have to know the way you do. You can't read your way to becoming a writer."

"That's clear," he said.

"You've either got it in you or you haven't, I figure. But it's important to read too, of course. But that's not the decisive factor."

"No, right," he said, taking a sip and glancing at the desk and the meager selection of books on the shelf.

"I've been thinking of writing about ugliness and trying to find the beauty in it, if you see what I mean. It's not true that a thing of beauty is exclusively beautiful, or ugly things are only ugly. It's a lot more relative than that. Have you heard the latest by Propaganda?"

I looked at him. He shook his head. I went over and put the record on the stereo.

"This part is nice and dark and beautiful, and then all of a sudden we're in an atonal ugly part and it destroys the beauty, but it's still good, you see?"

He nodded.

"Listen. This is where the ugly part starts."

We both sat listening in silence. Then it finished and I went over and turned down the volume.

"What you said about ugliness was really good. But it wasn't quite how I'd imagined it," he said. "It wasn't that ugly."

"Maybe not," I said. "But writing's different anyway."

"Yes," he said.

"I wrote a poem just now. I'm going to read it out at the Academy tomorrow. Well, I'm not sure. It's pretty radical. Do you want to see it?"

He nodded.

I went to the desk, picked up the poem and passed it to him.

He took it unsuspectingly, read with concentration, then I saw a pink flush spread across his cheeks and he suddenly turned round and burst into loud laughter.

"You're not going to read this, are you?" he said.

"Yes, I am," I said. "That was the idea."

"Don't even think about it, Karl Ove. You'll make a fool of yourself."

"It's a provocation," I said.

He laughed again.

"It certainly is," he said. "But don't read it out loud. You said you weren't sure. Don't do it."

"I'll see," I said, took the piece of paper he handed me and placed it on the desk. "Would you like some more coffee?"

"I have to be getting back soon."

"By the way, Yngve's having a party on Saturday. Do you feel like coming? He asked me to ask you."

"Yes, that would be fun."

"I was thinking of having drinks here before. Then we can take a taxi up there afterward."

"Great!"

"I'm sure you can bring along some friends if you like," I said.

He got up.

"What time shall I come by?"

"I don't know. Seven?"

"See you then," he said, slipped his feet into his shoes, shrugged on his jacket, and went out. I accompanied him to the steps. He turned to me.

"Don't read it out loud!" he said. Then he disappeared around the corner into the darkness and rain.

Just after I had gone to bed, at around two, I heard someone stop outside the front door, unlock it, and then slam it shut. From the footsteps that went along the hall and down the stairs I guessed it was Morten. Some music was put on, louder than he had ever played it before, it lasted for maybe five minutes, then suddenly everything went quiet.

Waking up the next day, I still hadn't decided what to do, and I took the poem with me so that I could make a last-minute decision. It wasn't difficult. As I went into the seminar room and saw the others sitting in their places, relaxing with a cup of tea or coffee on the desk in front of them – a handbag, backpack, or plastic bag resting against the desk leg unless they were lying against the wall behind them with the wet umbrellas, which were sometimes left open on the floor in the photocopy room or between the table and the kitchenette, so that they could dry, ready for use again – as I saw all this and absorbed the friendly atmosphere this created, I realized I couldn't read the poem out loud. It was full of hatred, it belonged in my room, where I was all alone, not here where I was with other people. Of course I could break down the partition between these two worlds, but there was something very strong holding them apart, which told me they shouldn't be mixed.

Having to admit I hadn't written a poem was humiliating. Everyone realized I hadn't written one because of Fosse's analysis the previous day, and that was tantamount to saying I had no spine, no stamina, was hypersensitive, a child, I lacked independence and strength of mind.

To rectify this impression I tried to appear attentive, interested and enthusiastic as the others' poems were analyzed. And it went quite well, I had already begun to grasp the technique of how to comment on poems, I knew what to look for, what was considered good or not good, and also succeeded in articulating this in a concise, comprehensible manner, which not everyone could do. For people who were supposed to have language at their fingertips there was a conspicuous amount of fumbling and hesitation, around the table there were evasive looks and arguments that were retracted the moment they were presented, some almost unbearably flimsy and lame, and sometimes when I spoke up it was simply to bring clarity and order into the discussion.

On my way home I popped into Mekka and spent more than seven hundred kroner on food, I came out with six full bags, and the prospect of lugging them all the way home was so demoralizing that I hailed a taxi, which pulled into the curb and came to a halt, I put the bags into the trunk and got into the back to be transported through the wet streets like royalty, elevated from the daily slog that was evident all around me, and even though it was expensive and I knew I was spending all the money I had saved by shopping at Mekka it was worth it.

At home I put away my things, took a little trip down to the basement with the photography book, had lunch, and tried to do some writing, not poems this time, I had finished with poems, I was a prose writer, and when I noticed that the sentences were coming as easily as before, all I had to do was write, I was relieved because somehow I had feared that Fosse's analysis of the catastrophic poem would affect my confidence with regard to prose, too, but such was not the case, everything flowed as before, and I wrote four pages without a pause before going to phone Ingvild.

This time I wasn't so nervous, first of all she had asked me to call, and secondly I was only going to invite her to the party – if she said no, it wasn't the same as her saying no to me.

Under the little dome of transparent plastic I stood with the receiver pressed to my ear waiting for someone to pick up at the other end. Raindrops sailed across the plastic, gathered in large clusters beneath, and let go at regular intervals and fell with a little plop onto the asphalt. In the light from the street lamp above me, the air was striped with rain.

"Hello?"
